The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki

रामायणं वाल्मीकीयं

AN EPIC OF ANCIENT INDIA

Volume VI: Yuddhakāṇḍa

Translation and Annotation by
Robert P. Goldman, Sally J. Sutherland Goldman, and Barend A. van Nooten

Introduction by
Robert P. Goldman and Sally J. Sutherland Goldman

PRINCETON LIBRARY OF ASIAN TRANSLATIONS

The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki

The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki

AN EPIC OF ANCIENT INDIA

Volume VI — Yuddhakāṇḍa

Translation and Annotation by
Robert P. Goldman, Sally J. Sutherland Goldman, and Barend A. van Nooten

Introduction by
Robert P. Goldman and Sally J. Sutherland Goldman

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS • PRINCETON AND OXFORD

In Memory of Professor Murray Barnson Emeneau
1904–2005
Mentor, Colleague, and Friend

Copyright © 2009 by Princeton University Press
Requests for permission to reproduce material from this work should be sent to Permissions, Princeton University Press

Published by Princeton University Press, 41 William Street, Princeton, New Jersey 08540

In the United Kingdom: Princeton University Press, 6 Oxford Street, Woodstock, Oxfordshire OX20 1TW

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Vālmīki.
[Rāmāyaṇa. Yuddhakanda. English]
The Rāmāyana of Vālmīki : an epic of ancient India; volume VI, Yuddhakāṇḍa / translation and annotation by Robert P. Goldman, Sally J. Sutherland Goldman, and Barend A. van Nooten ; introduction by Robert P. Goldman and Sally J. Sutherland Goldman.
p. cm.—(Princeton Library of Asian translations)
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-691-06663-9 (hardcover : alk. paper) 1. Vālmīki. Rāmāyaṇa. Yuddhakāṇḍa. I. Goldman, Robert P., 1942– II. Sutherland Goldman, Sally J. III. Nooten, Barend A. van, 1932– IV. Title.
BL1139.242.Y84E5 2009
294.5'92204521—dc22 2008032292

British Library Cataloging-in-Publication Data is available

This book has been composed in Baskerville Printed on acid-free paper. ∞ press.princeton.edu

Printed in the United States of America

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Frontispiece: The final battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa. From the "Jagat Singh Rāmāyaṇa," Sahib Din 1653. British Library Add. 15297-166. By permission of the British Library.

The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki: An Epic of Ancient India

Robert P. Goldman, General Editor

Sally J. Sutherland Goldman, Associate Editor

Kristi L. Wiley, Editorial Assistant

Translators: Robert P. Goldman, Rosalind Lefeber, Sheldon I. Pollock, Sally J. Sutherland Goldman, Barend A. van Nooten

PRINCETON LIBRARY OF ASIAN TRANSLATIONS

adya karma kariṣyāmi yal lokāḥ sacarācarāḥ
sadevāḥ kathayiṣyanti yāvad bhūmir dhariṣyati

Today, I shall perform such a feat that all the worlds, with their moving and fixed contents and including the gods themselves, will talk about as long as the earth shall endure.
—Rām 6.88.53

ātmānaṃ mānuṣaṃ manye rāmaṃ daśarathātmajam yo 'haṃ yasya yataś cāhaṃ bhagavāṃs tad bravītu me

I think of myself only as a man, Rāma, the son of Daśaratha. May the Blessed Lord please tell me who I really am, to whom I belong, and why I am here.
—Rām 6.105.10

Contents

List of Abbreviations ix
Preface xiii
Guide to Sanskrit Pronunciation xvii

PART I. INTRODUCTION 1

1. The Significance of the Yuddhakāṇḍa 3
2. Synopsis of the Yuddhakāṇḍa 7
3. Statecraft and Violence: The Themes of the Yuddhakāṇḍa 17
4. The Major Characters of the Yuddhakāṇḍa 43
5. Style and Structure of the Yuddhakāṇḍa 89
6. Text, Translation, and Commentaries 99

PART II. YUDDHAKĀṆḌA 119

PART III. NOTES 495

Glossary of Important Sanskrit Words, Proper Nouns, and Epithets 1553
Glossary of Flora and Fauna 1557
Glossary of Weapons 1559
Emendations and Corrections of the Critical Edition 1561
Bibliography of Works Consulted 1563
Index 1579

List of Abbreviations

Manuscripts, Commentaries, and Editions Used in Volume VI, Following the Conventions Established in the Critical Edition of the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see pp. ix–xi)

I. MANUSCRIPTS

Northern Manuscripts (N) forming the Northern Recension (NR) (18 MSS, including 7 Devanāgarī)

NW Northwestern Manuscripts
- i. Śāradā
  - Ś1 undated
  - Ś2 A.D. 1885

NE Northeastern Manuscripts
- i. Ñ Nepālī
  - Ñ1 A.D. 1020
  - Ñ2 A.D. 1675
- ii. V Maithilī
  - V1 A.D. 1748
  - V2 A.D. 1841
  - V3 undated
- iii. B Bengali
  - B1 A.D. 1671
  - B2 A.D. 1798
  - B3 undated
  - B4 undated
- iv. D Devanāgarī manuscripts allied with N, including Western (W)
  - D1 A.D. 1773 NW
  - D2 A.D. 1660 NW
  - D3 A.D. 1731 W
  - D4 A.D. 1732 W
  - D8 A.D. 1779 NW
  - D12 undated NW
  - D13 undated NE

Southern Manuscripts (S) forming the Southern Recension (SR) (16 MSS, including 6 Devanāgarī)

- i. T Telugu
  - T1 undated
  - T2 undated
  - T3 A.D. 1808
- ii. G Grantha
  - G1 A.D. 1818
  - G2 undated
  - G3 undated
- iii. Malayālam
  - M1 A.D. 1690
  - M2 A.D. 1642
  - M3 undated
  - M5 undated
- iv. D Devanāgarī manuscripts allied with S
  - D5 A.D. 1767 S
  - D6 A.D. 1776 S (Contains the commentary of Cg)
  - D7 A.D. 1776 S (Contains the commentary of Cm)
  - D9 A.D. 1686 S
  - D10 A.D. 1831 S
  - D11 A.D. 1715 S (Contains the commentary of Ct)

II. COMMENTARIES

(Note: Spelling follows the conventions established by the critical edition; see vol. 7, pp. 655–56.)

Cg	the commentary called Bhūṣaṇa of Govindarāja
Ck	the commentary called the Amṛtakataka of Mādhava Yogīndra
Cl	the commentary called Manoharā of Lokanātha Cakravartī
Cm	the commentary called Tattvadīpikā of Maheśvaratīrtha
Cnā	the commentary of Sarvajña Nārāyaṇa (as cited by Lokanātha Cakravartī)
Cr	the commentary called Śiromaṇi of Vaṃśīdhara (Bansidhara) Śivasahāya*
Crā	the commentary called Ṭīkā of Rāmānuja*
Cs	the commentary of Satyatīrtha
Ct	the commentary called Tilaka of Nāgeśa (Nāgoji) Bhaṭṭa, composed in the name of Rāmavarmā
Ctr	the commentary called Dharmākūtam of Tryambaka Yajvan
Ctś	the commentary called Taniślokī of Ātreya Ahobala
Cv	the commentary called Vivekatilaka of Varadarāja Uḍāli (Uḍāri)

III. EDITIONS

Gita Press	Śrīmad Vālmīki-Rāmāyaṇa. (1969). 3 vols. Gorakhpur: Gita Press.
Gorresio	Ramayana, poema indiano di Valmici. (1843–1867). Paris: Stamperia Reale. Edited by Gaspare Gorresio.
GPP	Gujarati Printing Press (also called the vulgate). Rāmāyan of Vālmīki. (1914–1920). 7 vols. Bombay: Gujarati Printing Press. With three commentaries called Tilaka, Shiromani, and Bhooshana. Edited by Shastri Shrinivas Katti Mudholkar.
KK	Śrimadvālmīkirāmāyaṇam. (1911–1913). 7 vols. Bombay: Nirṇayasāgar Press. Also called the Kumbakonam Edition. Edited by T. R. Krishnacharya and T. R. Vyasacharya.
Lahore	Rāmāyaṇa. (1928–1947). 7 vols. Lahore: D.A.V. College. Northwestern recension critically edited for the first time from original manuscripts by Vishva Bandhu. D.A.V. College Sanskrit Series, nos. 7, 12, 14, 17–20.
NSP	The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmīki. (1930). 4th rev. ed. Bombay: Nirṇayasāgar Press. With the commentary (Tilaka) of Rāma. Edited by Wāsudeva Laxmaṇ Śāstrī Paṇaśīkar.

* The critical edition uses the abbreviation Cr for the commentary of Rāmānuja and gives no abbreviation for the commentary of Vaṃśīdhara (Bansidhara) Śivasahāya.

VSP Veṅkaṭeśvara Steam Press. Śrīmadvālmīkirāmāyaṇa. 3 vols. Bombay: Lakṣmīveṅkaṭeśvara Mudraṇālaya, 1935. With the commentaries of Govindarāja, Rāmānuja, and Maheśvaratīrtha and the commentary known as Taniślokī. Edited by Gaṅgāviṣṇu Śrīkṛṣṇadāsa.

Journals

ABORI	Annals of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute
AJP	American Journal of Philology
AOR	Annals of Oriental Research (University of Madras)
IHQ	Indian Historical Quarterly
JA	Journal asiatique
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JAS	Journal of Asian Studies
JIP	Journal of Indian Philosophy
JOIB	Journal of the Oriental Institute, Baroda
JORM	Journal of Oriental Research, Madras
JRAS	Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society
PO	Poona Orientalist
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft

Commonly Quoted Sanskrit Texts

AdhyāRā	Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa
AgniP	Agnipurāṇa
AitBr	Aitareyabrāhmaṇa
AmaK	Amarakośa (-koṣa)
ArthŚā	Arthaśāstra
AV	Atharvavedasaṃhitā
Avimā	Avimāraka
BhagGī	Bhagavadgītā
BhāgP	Bhāgavatapurāṇa
BrahmāṇḍP	Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa
BrahmP	Brahmapurāṇa
DevīBhāP	Devībhāgavatapurāṇa
GaruḍaP	Garuḍapurāṇa
HariVaṃ	Harivaṃśa
JaimiBr	Jaiminīyabrāhmaṇa
KāvyaPra	Kāvyaprakāśa
KumāSaṃ	Kumārasaṃbhava
KūrmaP	Kūrmapurāṇa
ManuSm	Manusmṛti
MatsyaP	Matsyapurāṇa

MBh	Mahābhārata
Meghdū	Meghadūta
Mṛcch	Mṛcchakaṭika
Pā	Pāṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyī
PadmaP	Padmapurāṇa
RaghuVa	Raghuvaṃśa
Rām	Rāmāyaṇa
ṚV	Ṛgvedasaṃhitā
SāhiDa	Sāhityadarpaṇa
ŚatBr	Śatapathabrāhmaṇa
ŚiśuVa	Śiśupālavadha
ŚivaP	Śivapurāṇa
TaiBr	Taittirīyabrāhmaṇa
TaiS	Taittirīyasaṃhitā
UttaRāC	Uttararāmacarita
VāmaP	Vāmanapurāṇa
VāyuP	Vāyupurāṇa
ViṣṇuP	Viṣṇupurāṇa
YājñaSm	Yājñavalkyasmṛti

Other Important Abbreviations

App.	Appendices to the critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa
MW	Monier-Williams, Monier. (1899). A Sanskrit-English Dictionary. Oxford: Oxford University Press. Reprint 1964.
PW	Petersburg Wörterbuch: Böhtlingk, Otto, and Rudolph Roth. Sanskrit-Wörterbuch. St. Petersburg: Kaiserliche Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1855–1875. Reprint in seven volumes, Osnabrück/Wiesbaden, 1966.
v.l.	varia(e) lectio (nes)

Preface

THE TRANSLATION and annotation of so massive and complex a work as the Yuddhakāṇḍa, a work with a profound and intricate web of intertextuality throughout the religious, literary, artistic, and performative traditions of South and Southeast Asia, has required the intellectual and physical energies of many people over a very long period of time. This work could not have been carried forward without the support and assistance of several scholars and institutions whose help must be acknowledged here.

Before doing so, however, it would be appropriate, because of the collaborative nature of the work, to provide a brief history of the project and of how, and through whose efforts, it took its present shape. At the time of the first convening of the Sanskrit scholars who would form the Rāmāyaṇa Translation Consortium in the late 1970s, the daunting task of tackling the ponderous Yuddhakāṇḍa was heroically accepted by Professor Barend van Nooten of the University of California at Berkeley.

Professor van Nooten undertook this work with characteristic seriousness and energy and, working single-handedly, completed a draft translation of the text and a provisional annotation by the early 1990s. At that time the general and associate editors were deeply engrossed in work on the translation, annotation, and introduction of the Sundarakāṇḍa, which appeared in print in 1996. Thus the editing, revision, and expansion of Professor van Nooten's original draft did not begin in earnest until the mid-1990s. This work proceeded slowly as is invariably the case when university scholars are heavily burdened with instructional and administrative duties, which take precious time from their research and writing.

During this period Professors Robert and Sally Goldman reread the text closely, along with Professor van Nooten's draft translation, and significantly revised it in keeping with the protocols, styles, and conventions of the Consortium. They also significantly revised and expanded the original annotation, drawing on a number of additional translations, editions, and commentaries, as well as secondary sources not consulted by Professor van Nooten. In addition, they prepared the extensive Introduction to the Yuddhakāṇḍa that precedes the translation. The resulting volume is therefore a genuinely collaborative effort to which all three scholars have contributed significantly.

In addition to the principals mentioned above, the work has benefited from the scholarship, generosity, and assistance of a number of experts in Sanskrit and Rāmāyaṇa studies, and it would be highly remiss of us to fail to acknowledge them here.

First and foremost, we must express our gratitude to our friend, colleague, and guru, Dr. Ram Karan Sharma, the founder and former kulapati of the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan. During his many protracted visits to Berkeley, Dr. Sharma ungrudgingly spent many hours with us reading over difficult passages in the text and the commentaries, and sharing with us his profound reservoir of knowledge of a vast spectrum of the Sanskrit literary and śāstraic corpora. Time and again his knowledge and insight clarified a problem that had left us utterly at a loss. We gratefully acknowledge his learned and unstinting assistance, mindful always of the vedic injunction, "gurudevo bhava."

We should also like to acknowledge the advice and help of Dr. V. Kutumba Sastry, Vice-Chancellor of the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan, who, on a visit to Berkeley and in Delhi, helped us shed light on some problematic issues in the text. Professor Sheldon Pollock of Columbia University, one of the principal contributors to the translation project, was also unstinting in his excellent advice, while Professor Philip Lutgendorf of the University of Iowa, a great Rāmāyaṇi and Hanumānbhakta, was generous, as always, with his vast store of knowledge of variant versions of the Rāmakathā and especially the many tales of the monkey divinity.

Several of our Sanskrit students, past and present, have lent their labors to the production of this volume. Without their efforts the volume would never have seen the light of day. Among these we express our debt of gratitude to our Editorial Assistant, Dr. Kristi Wiley, whose meticulous scholarship, unstinting devotion of her energies, and careful reading of our drafts caught and corrected numerous errors and infelicities. Gratitude is similarly owed to Dr. Deven Patel of the University of Pennsylvania, who, as our research assistant, brought his careful and informed reading to the translation and annotation.

We also extend our thanks to a number of research assistants whose work has made the project possible. These include Geeta Pai, Siyonn Sophearith, Samir Shah, Dr. Chandan Narayan, Dr. Adheesh Sathaye, Luther Obrock, Elisabeth Andersson Raddock, Lauren Bausch, and Robert Raddock. Special mention must be made of Michael Slouber, who, as our research assistant during the past year, meticulously read through the huge and challenging manuscript, checking for the accuracy and consistency of the textual apparatus and transliterations and making many valuable suggestions.

Support for the work has come, directly and indirectly, from a number of institutional sources. We thank the Rāmāyaṇa Department of the Oriental Institute of Baroda for generously making available to us copies of the transcripts of the commentaries of Mādhava Yogin and Uḍāli Varadarāja. The Committee on Research of the Academic Senate of the University of California at Berkeley has been consistently generous over the years in providing funding for the project, especially in supporting the work of the many research assistants mentioned above.

Special thanks are also due to the University of California's Dwinelle Computer Research Facility and its director, Mark Kaiser, for providing and maintaining a workstation dedicated to the Rāmāyaṇa Translation Project. The ability of our research assistants to have access to this invaluable facility around the clock has greatly expedited the complex and labor-intensive work they contributed to the project.

We must also express our thanks to Ms. Rita Bernhard, Copy-editor of Princeton University Press, who cheerfully took on the Herculean task of working through a complex manuscript of some twenty-six hundred pages filled with unfamiliar Sanskrit text and terms. Her innumerable suggestions for the improvement of the grammar, syntax, and general readability of the introduction, translation, and, above all, the dense and difficult annotation enabled us to make countless improvements in the finished work.

Finally, and with a profound sense of loss, we note the passing, during the past year, of two friends and scholars who played critical roles in the development of Translation Consortium.

Mr. K. Venugopalan (1922–2007), Sub-Editor Emeritus of the Dictionary Department of the Deccan College, Pune, was involved with the project from its inception in the mid-1970s through the publication of the Sundarakāṇḍa in 1996. Together with his colleague and mentor Pt. T. Śrīnivāsaśāstrī, "Venu" read closely through the text and several commentaries of the epic with the General and Associate Editors and helped clarify many difficult issues. He will be missed by many Sanskrit scholars to whom he extended his generosity.

The noted poet Leonard E. Nathan (1924–2007), Professor Emeritus of Rhetoric at the University of California at Berkeley, served the project as its Editorial Consultant. His extraordinary gifts as a poet and rhetoritician were placed at the disposal of the translators and helped to save the translation from many, if not all, of its infelicities. Both of these friends will be sorely missed.

Robert P. Goldman and Sally J. Sutherland Goldman
Vālmīkijayantī, 2007

Guide to Sanskrit Pronunciation*

The pronunciation of Sanskrit is not very difficult for English speakers. A few guidelines will serve to clarify the basic pronunciation of the sounds. English examples are based on hypothetical "dictionary" pronunciation.

Vowels

a	like the u in "but"
ā	like the o in "mom"
i	like the i in "bit"
ī	like the ee in "beet"
u	like the first u in "suture"
ū	like the oo in "pool"
ṛ	somewhat like the ri in "rig"
e	like the a in "gate"
ai	somewhat like the i in "high"; this sound becomes a diphthong to glide slightly into the "i" vowel
o	like the o in "rote"
au	somewhat like the ou of "loud" with a similar lip-rounding glide

Consonants

k	like the k in "skate"
kh	like the k in "Kate"
g	like the g in "gate"
gh	somewhat like the gh in "doghouse"
ñ	like the n in "sing"
c	like the ch in "eschew"
ch	like the ch in "chew"
j	like the j in "jewel"
jh	like the dgeh in "hedgehog"
ñ	like the n in "cinch"
ṭ	like the t in "stop"
ṭh	like the t in "top"
ḍ	like the d in "dart"
ḍh	like the dh in "adhere"
ṇ	like the n in "tint"

*adapted from Goldman and Sutherland Goldman 2004

t, th, d, dh, n	like the five preceding sounds, respectively, but with the tip of the tongue touching or extending slightly between the teeth
p	like the p in “spin”
ph	like the p in “pin”
b	like the b in “bin”
bh	like the bh in “abhor”
m	like the m in “monk”
y	like the y in “yellow”
r	like the r in “drama”
l	like the l in “lug”
v	produced generally with just the slightest contact between the upper teeth and the lower lip; slightly greater than that used for English w (as in “wile”) but less than that used for English v (as in “vile”)
ś	like the sh in “shove”
ṣ	produced with the tip of the tongue farther back than for ś but giving a similar sound s	like the s in “so”
h	like the h in “hope”
ṃ	a nasalization of the preceding vowel
ḥ	an aspiration of a preceding vowel pronounced, almost like an echo, as an “h” followed by the short form of the preceding vowel. For example: devaḥ, pronounced deva(ha)

INTRODUCTION

1. The Significance of the Yuddhakāṇḍa

If, as we have argued, the Sundarakāṇḍa is the heart of the Rāmāyaṇa,[1] the Yuddhakāṇḍa, or "the Battle Book," may be seen as the guts, as it were, of the poem. This is so not simply in the sense that the wrought emotionality of the fifth Book is here replaced with the many, long, and pervasive renderings of battle replete with graphic descriptions of the gushing blood, mangled limbs, and spilling entrails of the slain. For the massive sixth Book, nearly twice the length of the next-longest kāṇḍa, concerns itself with what, from an important perspective, may be considered to be the real business of the Rāmāvatāra.

Clearly the two most significant roles of the towering figure of Rāma are his elaborate portrayal as the ideal man, the paragon of self-control and exemplar of social dharma, who calmly gives up his rightful succession to the throne to preserve the truth of his father's word, and his critical function as a major avatāra, or "incarnation," of the great Lord Viṣṇu, who takes on a human birth to rid the world of the oppression of the monstrous and otherwise invincible rākṣasa monarch, Rāvaṇa. In a rather mechanical fashion we can, perhaps, judge the cultural significance of these two aspects of the hero by the amount of energy—in the form of the sheer number of verses—the poet and later redactors have devoted to them.

The enactment of the former of these roles forms the subject of the second longest of the poem's seven kāṇḍas, the Ayodhyākāṇḍa.[2] The fulfillment of Rāma's mission in the latter constitutes the grand subject of the massive Yuddhakāṇḍa, which, at nearly forty-five hundred verses in the critical edition, dwarfs even the Ayodhyākāṇḍa.[3] By this fairly crude calculation we can infer that the central events of the

[1] See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 13, 79–86.

[2] For a discussion of Rāma as an exemplar of idealized social behavior, see R. Goldman 1984, pp. 49–59 and Pollock 1986, pp. 64–73.

[3] The critical editors of the volume have admitted 4,435 verses as belonging to their best reconstruction of the text based on the manuscripts collated for the edition. The critical edition of the Ayodhyākāṇḍa has 3,170. Thus the Yuddhakāṇḍa is some 40 percent longer than the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. Other versions of the poem, notably the popular and widely published versions of the so-called vulgate text, are considerably longer. Vaidya states that the "traditional extent of Yuddhakāṇḍa has only 5,710 stanzas" (Vaidya 1971, p. xxxi).

Yuddhakāṇḍa, comprising the bridging of the ocean, the siege of Laṅkā, the prodigious battles fought before the city walls, the slaying of Rāvaṇa, the installation of the righteous rākṣasa prince Vibhīṣaṇa on the Laṅkan throne, and the long-delayed consecration of Rāma as the divine, universal monarch,[4] together form the principal theme of the epic. This observation is amply confirmed by the receptive history of the poem and by the majority of the innumerable versions in which it has been rendered over the course of the last two to three millennia in all regions and virtually all languages of southern Asia.

For what, after all, is the "point" of the Rāma story, especially in its many influential Vaiṣṇava versions, if not to narrate the edifying tale of the earthly incarnation of the Lord, who, at the behest of the gods, compassionately consents to take on the role of a vulnerable and suffering mortal to save the world from the depredations of the evil and powerful Rāvaṇa and his minions and to restore a golden age of righteousness to a universe on the point of rupture? As the framing of the narrative in the Bālakāṇḍa[5] makes abundantly clear, if the Rāmakathā is about any one thing, it is the history of God's descent to destroy the very avatar of evil in the world in keeping with the principle so famously stated by Rāma's successor incarnation Kṛṣṇa at Bhagavadgītā 4.7–8.

With this in mind, then, it is only natural that the poet should devote the greatest portion of his narrative in this Book to a detailed, extensive, and often repetitive account of the many battles—both chaotic mass encounters and richly described single combats—that prefigure and set the stage for the culminating duel between the hero Rāma and the classic anti-hero Rāvaṇa.[6] Just as in the poem's

[4] For a discussion of this matter, see Pollock 1971, pp. 15–54.

[5] 1.14–16.

[6] The intensity of this final struggle is popularly regarded as so great that it has given rise to the formulaic verse in MBh and Rām to the effect that, although even the vast ocean and sky can find objects of comparison in each other, the battle between these two mighty antagonists beggars comparison itself. For a discussion of the textual history of these verses, see notes to 6.96.19 below. Despite this, the final duel comes off as a bit anticlimactic after the description of the extraordinary fight put up by Rāvaṇa's incomparable son Indrajit. Indeed, many later versions of the Rāma story indicate that Rāvaṇa is, after all, not that formidable an adversary and that he is far exceeded in martial skill and power by such later creations as the much mightier subterranean demons Mahīrāvaṇa and/or his brother Ahirāvaṇa from whose clutches sister epic, the Mahābhārata, with its five central "battle books,"[7] it is clear that the mythic heart of the tale and the culmination of its theological message lies precisely where its intended audience would no doubt find the greatest excitement and pleasure, that is, in its grand narrative of heroism and violence. It is in this sense, then, that the Yuddhakāṇḍa, although it may seem overly long, tiresome, and repetitive to audiences schooled on the "rapid, plain and direct" style of the Homeric epics,[8] comes into its own as in many ways the core and culmination of the epic narrative.[9] It is this, together with the at-long-last permissible epiphany of Rāma as the supreme divinity without need for his sustained representation of himself and his self-understanding as a mere man, that no doubt account for much of the impact of the Book.

But the Yuddhakāṇḍa is not entirely given over to gory combat. Its capacious sargas offer plenty of room for much other material, including some of the literature's finest discourses on dharma- and nītiśāstra, colorful renderings of fabulous and much larger than life characters, such as Indrajit and Kumbhakarṇa, and some of the tradition's best-known and deeply loved scenes, such as the building of the bridge to Laṅkā (setubandha), Rāma's emotional reunion with Bharata, and, of course, the highly iconic missions of Hanumān to bring back the mountain of healing herbs from the Himalayas to

---

Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa must be rescued by Hanumān. On the legends involving these figures, see Smith 1988, pp. 145–53 and Lutgendorf 2007, pp. 211–16, passim. Vālmīki himself can be somewhat ambivalent in his representation of Rāvaṇa's military prowess. Early on in the war, for example, Rāma is depicted as easily besting the demon king but then sparing his life and letting him withdraw in humiliation from the field of battle (6.47). Then, too, in the epic's closing chapters, we learn that a rākṣasa, Lavaṇa, even more powerful than the slain Rāvaṇa, is harassing the sages living along the Yamunā River, and Rāma must send his brother Śatrughna to defeat him with an immensely powerful divine lance (7.59–61). On this story, see R. Goldman 1986, pp. 471–83.

[7] These are the Bhīṣmaparvan through the Sauptikaparvan (Books 6–10).

[8] Arnold 1905, pp. 41ff.

[9] Because of the centrality of the battle to the mission of the avatāra and its role as the centerpiece of this Book, the section is generally entitled the Yuddhakāṇḍa, or "Battle Book," although it is also called the Laṅkākāṇḍa, or "Book of Laṅkā," in many, mainly northern, manuscripts.

Laṅkā. It also contains some of the most interesting and controversial scenes in the epic, most notably Rāma's harsh treatment of his recovered wife and her unforgettable fire ordeal. These are discussed in greater detail below.

Let us begin with a brief synopsis of the kāṇḍa.

2. Synopsis of the Yuddhakāṇḍa

THE ACTION of the Yuddhakāṇḍa takes place over a time frame the duration of which forms the object of considerable discussion and controversy among the commentators.[1] It is continuous with the closing scenes of the Sundarakāṇḍa, where Hanumān, having returned from his mission in Laṅkā, reports to Rāma on Sītā's condition and his own adventures in the rākṣasa capital.[2]

The Book then opens with Rāma commending Hanumān for the success of his mission and for his exploits in Laṅkā. The hero, however, then succumbs to despair at the thought of the formidable obstacle in the form of the ocean that lies between him and the island citadel. The monkey king Sugrīva, however, exhorts Rāma to be resolute and urges him to have a bridge built whereby he and his army can cross the ocean and lay siege to Laṅkā. Rāma, his resolve now restored, interrogates Hanumān as to the defenses of the citadel and receives a full briefing. Then, with the exuberant monkeys, the hero leads a march across the Sahyādri hills to the shore of the mighty ocean, observing many auspicious omens. Once encamped on the seashore, however, Rāma gives way once again to a moving lamentation for his lost love. This and the preceding action occupy the first five sargas of the Book.

One interesting feature of the Yuddhakāṇḍa's narrative that is more prominent in this Book than in any of the others is the almost cinematic way in which the action jumps back and forth between the worlds of the hero and of his enemy. After these opening five chapters, the poet leaves the hero encamped on the shore and, for the next five, takes us to Laṅkā, where we join Rāvaṇa as he takes counsel with his ministers and military advisers. Most of the demon-king's courtiers and generals are mere sycophants ready to support their master in his evil ways and in his intransigence. His advisers

[1] See note to 6.4.12 and p. 17, note 1, for more detailed discussions of this issue, which occupies a good deal of the commentators' attention, energy, and ingenuity.

[2] In fact, there is no clear break in the action between the two Books, and the formal break between them is generally not made in the northern recension until after the construction of the causeway and the crossing of the ocean in sarga 15 of the critical edition.

urge him to fight and destroy the impudent human Rāma, reminding the king of his vast military resources and his own mighty exploits in subduing the gods themselves in battle. The rākṣasa generals then boast, in turn, of their own martial prowess, each vowing to slaughter Rāma and his monkey hosts single-handedly.

Rāvaṇa's younger brother Vibhīṣaṇa, alone willing to speak truth to power, restrains the impetuous generals and warns the king for his own good that he is facing an irresistibly mighty foe and that he should repent of his wrongful deed in abducting Sītā and return her to Rāma. In his arrogance and folly, however, Rāvaṇa harshly rejects his brother's sage counsel, accusing him of treachery motivated by envy. He launches into a meditation on the danger inherent in one's kinsmen, citing the example of the song of the wild elephants who lament the fact that it is their (domesticated) kin that bring them into captivity. Wounded and incensed by his brother's vituperative rejection of his well-meant advice, Vibhīṣaṇa flies up into the air accompanied by his own four retainers and announces that he is abandoning Rāvaṇa (sargas 6–10).

After this set of five sargas, the scene shifts for the next five once more to the northern shore of the sea, where we learn that Vibhīṣaṇa has not only abandoned his brother but has actually defected to Rāma's side. He announces himself to the monkey chiefs, promising to aid Rāma in his campaign against Rāvaṇa, all the while carefully hovering in the air so as to remain out of immediate reach. All the monkey leaders, except Hanumān, express grave suspicion of the rākṣasa and urge that he be killed or at least captured. Hanumān, however, perceives that Vibhīṣaṇa is as good as his word and advises that he be accepted as an ally. Rāma concurs, arguing that, in any case, he would never turn away someone who comes to him seeking refuge, regardless of his motives. Indeed, in advance of even confronting his enemy, Rāma has Lakṣmaṇa consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa as king of the rākṣasas in Rāvaṇa's place.

The newly crowned, but not yet enthroned, monarch seconds Sugrīva's earlier suggestion that Rāma, after first propitiating Sāgara, the god of the sea, somehow contrive to bridge the ocean. Rāma duly worships Sāgara for three days, but the divinity remains obdurate and will not calm his waters. At length Rāma loses patience and begins to pierce the waters with his fearsome and fiery arrows, throwing the sea and its creatures into turmoil. Chastened, Sāgara emerges from the deep and humbly consents to being bridged. He informs Rāma that one of the monkey chiefs, Nala, is the son of Viśvakarman, the architect-builder of the gods, and is capable of designing and constructing a causeway whereby the army may safely cross over to Laṅkā. Under Nala's direction, the monkeys gather trees and great boulders and hurl them into the sea to form a smooth and level causeway, a hundred leagues in length and ten in width. With Rāma and Sugrīva at their head, the vast army of monkeys crosses the ocean and encamps on the southern shore (sargas 11–15).

At the end of these five sargas, the poet returns once more to Rāvaṇa's council chamber from which the king dispatches two spies in order to discover the strength and disposition of Rāma's forces. Despite assuming the appearance of monkeys, the spies' disguise is quickly penetrated by Vibhīṣaṇa, who seizes them and brings them to Rāma. The latter, in keeping with his compassionate nature, frees them and sends them back with a message to Rāvaṇa, warning of the rākṣasa monarch's impending defeat. Rāvaṇa, taking the spies up to an observation tower, has them point out and identify the principal heroes besieging his city and enumerate the vast hordes of their monkey troops. Contemptuously dismissing the failed agents, Rāvaṇa sends out yet another spy, who meets with a similar fate. The monkeys handle this spy roughly before Rāma releases him to tell his tale to the rākṣasa king.

After further consultation with his counselors, Rāvaṇa decides that he can break Sītā's will and force her to bend to his by convincing her that Rāma has, in fact, been slain and his monkey army massacred during a night raid on the sleeping camp by the rākṣasa forces. To this end he has one of his more skilled illusionists, a rāksasa named Vidyujjihva, create a simulacrum of Rāma's severed head and one of his great bow. At the sight of the grisly simulacra, Sītā succumbs to despair and bitterly laments Rāma's and her own wretched fate. But when her tormentor is called away to attend to the looming military threat, the apparitions disappear and a friendly rākṣasī (rākṣasa woman) named Saramā privately reassures her that Rāvaṇa's tale was as false as the simulated head. Sītā is comforted and sends Saramā to eavesdrop on Rāvaṇa's consultations with his ministers.

During these consultations, a rākṣasa elder, Rāvaṇa's maternal great-uncle Mālyavān, sternly lectures the king on the folly of his ways and points out the many inauspicious omens that have appeared, presaging the destruction of the rākṣasas. But in his arrogance, Rāvaṇa rebukes him and begins to make preparations for the defense of the city (sargas 16–27).

Rāma similarly prepares for the siege of Laṅkā and leads his forces to the summit of Mount Suvela where he is able to secure a good view of the citadel, which is described in rich detail. Rāma, who has also observed the various omens, disposes his troops at the four gates of Laṅkā and then sends Aṅgada to Rāvaṇa as an emissary to warn him of his impending doom. After Aṅgada returns, foiling Rāvaṇa's attempt to capture him, the rākṣasa king sends out his troops on their first sortie. This leads to a long and chaotic battle between the rākṣasa and the monkey armies. The fierce fighting continues into the night, with both sides lashing out blindly and indiscriminately against friend and foe alike. In the thick of the battle, Aṅgada attacks Rāvaṇa's mighty son Indrajit and succeeds in destroying his horses and chariot. In his rage, Indrajit takes recourse to a boon he had received from Brahmā whereby he can make himself invisible. Using this as a cloak, he employs his dreadful serpent-weapons to pierce and bind both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, rendering them hors de combat. Seeing the great Rāghava heroes felled, Sugrīva and his forces give way to despair but are reassured by Vibhīṣaṇa that this is but a temporary setback and that the heroes will ultimately regain consciousness (sargas 28–36).

Meanwhile, Indrajit, believing he has ended the threat posed by Rāma, returns to the city to report his victory to his father. The latter, attempting to press his advantage and break the will of Sītā, has her flown over the battlefield so that she can see with her own eyes the fall of her mighty husband. When she sees Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa struck down and comatose, she thinks that they are dead and gives way to despair and lamentation. But, as in the Sundarakāṇḍa, the kindly rākṣasī Trijaṭā consoles Sītā and points out that her husband still shows signs of life. Meanwhile, on the battlefield itself, Rāma, still bound fast by Indrajit's powerful serpent-weapons, regains consciousness. Seeing that his beloved brother has been similarly struck down and believing him to be dead, Rāma gives way to grief and despondency, stating, famously, that seeing Lakṣmaṇa dead, he no longer cares for Sītā nor even for life itself.

Sugrīva, perceiving that the brothers are merely injured and bound but not dead, consults with his wise father-in-law, Suṣeṇa, who informs him that there are two mountains—Candra and Droṇa—situated in the midst of the ocean of milk on which grow powerful healing herbs that can restore the heroes to health and vigor. Suṣeṇa urges the monkey king to dispatch swift monkey heroes, including Saṃpāti, Panasa, and Hanumān, to fetch the herbs. But, in what appears to be a strange narrative discontinuity, before Sugrīva can act on Suṣeṇa's advice, the great divine bird Garuḍa, the legendary enemy of all snakes, appears on the scene, causing the dreadful serpent arrows to flee and, with his touch, restoring Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa to health and vitality, their wounds completely healed (sargas 37–41).

Then follows a series of single combats between rākṣasa warriors and monkey heroes. In these battles Hanumān slays the rākṣasas Dhūmrākṣa and Akampana, while Nīla kills Prahasta. Enraged at the loss of these generals, Rāvaṇa himself comes forth to battle. He wreaks havoc among the monkey forces and engages in hard-fought duels with Sugrīva, Hanumān, and Lakṣmaṇa, wounding the latter with a powerful lance. Finally, he is confronted by Rāma. They fight until Rāma, seeing that Rāvaṇa has been dazed by his arrows and is weakening, refrains from killing him. Rāma then dismisses the rākṣasa king from the battlefield, humbling his pride (sargas 42–47).

Once back in Laṅkā, the rākṣasa lord, at last realizing Rāma's power and recalling his vulnerability to human foes, instructs his attendants to waken the most formidable of all the demons, his gargantuan brother Kumbhakarṇa. This monster is so powerful and voracious that Brahmā had placed him under a spell of nearly perpetual sleep to prevent him from devouring the whole world. The rākṣasas proceed to Kumbhakarṇa's cavelike sleeping chamber and engage in protracted, violent, and amusing efforts to wake the sleeping giant—beating him, sounding drums and trumpets, goading him with weapons, and having elephants trample him. At length the monster awakens and, after a truly gluttonous feast washed down with a thousand jars of liquor, reports to his brother.

Seeing the giant towering over the ramparts of the city, Rāma asks Vibhīṣaṇa who this giant might be, and the rākṣasa responds by giving one of the poem's several accounts of the career and curse of Kumbhakarṇa. The monkey hosts are terrified at the sight of the monstrous creature, and Vibhīṣaṇa urges Rāma to calm them by telling them that he is just a mechanical contraption.

Meanwhile, Kumbhakarṇa attends upon Rāvaṇa in his throne room, where he is informed of what has transpired during his sleep and of the grave threat now facing Laṅkā. Kumbhakarṇa lectures his brother on the folly of his ways, offering a number of arguments based on a sound reading of nītiśāstra, or the rules of proper governance. Rāvaṇa, now desperate, acknowledges for the first time how foolish he was to have abducted Sītā. Nonetheless, he calls upon his brother's loyalty in his time of need, and Kumbhakarṇa dutifully goes off to battle on his behalf. His arrival on the battlefield produces a rout of the monkeys, and he crushes and devours thousands of them. Finally, Rāma himself engages the giant and cuts him to pieces with his sharp arrows (sargas 48–55).

Rāvaṇa laments his fallen brother and then sends forth a series of other champions—Narāntaka, Devāntaka, Triśiras, Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, and Atikāya—all of whom are ultimately slain by one or another of the monkey warriors or by Lakṣmaṇa (sargas 56–59).

At this point, mighty Indrajit returns to the battlefield and, relying on his power of invisibility, annihilates or disables virtually the entire host of the monkeys, as well as Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa themselves. Only Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa appear to remain unscathed. Wandering the grisly battlefield at night, they come upon the gravely wounded Jāmbavān, who directs Hanumān to fly to the Himalayas, where there is a mountain covered in powerful healing herbs, and to bring back the herbs to heal and restore the fallen heroes. Hanumān makes this heroic journey. But, upon finding that the herbs have concealed themselves, he tears up the entire mountain and carries it back to the shores of Laṅkā, thus bringing the slain and wounded back to life and health. The revivified monkeys then launch a night raid on Laṅkā and set the citadel ablaze (sargas 60–61).

Following this, Rāvaṇa sends forth still more champions—Kumbha, Nikumbha, and Makarākṣa—all of whom make valiant sorties but are ultimately slain in combat. Distraught at the death of Makarākṣa, Rāvaṇa once again sends forth Indrajit, who performs a black magical sacrifice. Then, hiding behind his magically created cloak of fog, darkness, and invisibility, he rains down death and destruction on Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and their forces. In his frustration, Lakṣmaṇa proposes using the dreaded brahmāstra, which, he claims, could instantly annihilate all the rākṣasas, Indrajit included; but Rāma rebukes him, arguing that it would be wrong to punish an entire race for the transgressions of one of their number.

Unable to kill the two heroes with his weapons, Indrajit withdraws and decides to resort to deception and psychological warfare to demoralize his foes. Using his powers of māyā, or magical illusion, he creates an illusory double of Sītā, which he proceeds apparently to slaughter in his chariot right before the eyes of the horrified monkeys. This has its desired effect, and the monkeys flee in horror and dejection. But the rout is stopped by Hanumān, who rallies the troops once more (sargas 62–69).

Vibhīṣaṇa then manages to console Rāma and the monkeys, who are stricken with grief at the apparent murder of Sītā, explaining that Rāvaṇa would never countenance such an act and that this must have been one of Indrajit's feats of illusion. Indrajit, meanwhile, has withdrawn to the Nikumbhilā grove to perform yet another of his black magic rituals that seem to be the basis for his extraordinary powers. Lakṣmaṇa follows him there and challenges him to a duel before the rite can be concluded. A protracted and dramatic battle ensues between the two heroes, and, in the end, Lakṣmaṇa manages to kill the formidable warrior. The exhausted and wounded Lakṣmaṇa is then healed of his wounds by Suṣeṇa through the use of his powerful healing herbs (sargas 70–79).

Rāvaṇa grieves sorely for the loss of his son and, in his blind rage, seizes a sword with which to kill Sītā, but he is dissuaded from this gross iniquity by a righteous rākṣasa, Supārśva. He then orders his remaining troops into combat in one last desperate assault, and a grand, final clash begins in which Rāma cuts down the demonic troops by the thousand with his powerful weapons, leaving the rākṣasīs to bitterly lament their slain sons and husbands, and to decry the folly and wickedness of Rāvaṇa. At long last, his troops decimated and his last great champion slain, Rāvaṇa himself sallies forth with his remaining warriors for the final battle in the face of many evil omens presaging his doom. Before the final duel, however, yet a few more battles ensue between monkey and rākṣasa heroes during which Sugrīva kills Virūpākṣa and Mahodara, while Aṅgada dispatches Mahāpārśva (sargas 80–86).

The final duel now begins in earnest, with Rāma and Rāvaṇa assaulting each other with all kinds of powerful supernatural weapons. At one point Lakṣmaṇa joins the fray, only to be struck down by Rāvaṇa's mighty javelin. Rāma drives his enemy from the field but then succumbs to grief for his brother, whom he thinks has been killed. He is comforted, however, by the monkey physician Suṣeṇa, who once more dispatches Hanumān on a flight to the Himalayas to bring back healing herbs. In a reprise of his earlier feat, the great monkey brings back the whole mountain, and Suṣeṇa skillfully employs the herbs to effect Lakṣmaṇa's recovery.

Rāma and Rāvaṇa then resume their duel, but this time on more equal terms, as the god Indra sends the former his own divine chariot and his charioteer, Mātali, so that the battle now becomes a chariot duel. Rāma begins to get the better of his foe, and, to save him, Rāvaṇa's charioteer drives the rākṣasa king to safety. This enrages Rāvaṇa, who orders his charioteer to return to the field. The battle continues for some time with both heroes scoring hits and suffering blows. Rāma finally gains the advantage and begins to sever Rāvaṇa's heads, only to find that they grow back instantly when cut off. Mātali then advises Rāma that he will be unable to dispatch his foe unless he uses the all-powerful brahmāstra, the divine missile of the god Brahmā. Accordingly, Rāma selects a magnificent arrow and invests it with the power of the astra. He looses it, and it finds its mark, killing Rāvaṇa instantly (sargas 98–100).

The many women of Rāvaṇa's harem now come out to the battlefield and utter their lamentations for their fallen lord, after which the dead king's chief queen, Mandodarī, also laments piteously. The somewhat reluctant Vibhīṣaṇa, acting on Rāma's instructions, performs the funeral rites for his fallen brother and is then formally consecrated as king of the rākṣasas (sargas 98–100).

Hostilities now concluded, Rāma sends Hanumān as a messenger to Sītā to inform her of his victory and her liberation. Hanumān greets the queen and begs that she permit him to slaughter the fierce rākṣasīs who have tormented her during her captivity. But Sītā forbids such violence, arguing that the women were only following Rāvaṇa's orders, and that, in any case, it is the nature of rākṣasas to speak and act injuriously.

Urged by Hanumān to see Sītā, Rāma sends Vibhīṣaṇa to fetch her. But when she arrives to greet her beloved lord, he shocks the assembled monkeys and rākṣasas by harshly repudiating her. He tells her that he slew Rāvaṇa merely for the sake of his honor and that he has no further use for a woman who has dwelt in the house of another man. In her grief and desolation Sītā offers to prove her fidelity by entering the fire. A pyre is constructed and lit, and she mounts it only to be brought out unharmed by Agni, the fire god himself, who testifies to her faithfulness and purity. Rāma announces that he had never doubted her but treated her as he had to avoid any hint of scandal (sargas 101–106).

At this point the gods assemble and praise Rāma as the Supreme Lord, a circumstance that amazes him, since the prince had always thought of himself merely as an ordinary man, Daśaratha's son, because of the force of the boon of Rāvaṇa, which immunized the demon against the power of any god. Sītā and Rāma are at last happily reunited, and the shade of Daśaratha himself arrives to greet his sons and daughter-in-law.

The king of the gods, Indra, then offers boons to Rāma, who chooses the restoration to life and health of all the monkeys who fell in his cause. Vibhīṣaṇa then places the magical flying palace Puṣpaka at Rāma's disposal for his return journey to Ayodhyā, the fourteen years of his exile having been completed. Rāma takes Sītā and all the monkeys, along with Vibhīṣaṇa and his advisers, and sets out on the homeward flight, describing to his wife the various scenes of their struggle and exile as they pass over them. The party then proceeds to the ashram of the sage Bharadvāja. From there, Rāma dispatches his faithful messenger, Hanumān, to Nandigrāma to inform Bharata of his victory and his return to claim his rightful place as the king of Kosala. Hanumān takes on a human form and arrives just in time to prevent Bharata from carrying out his vow to immolate himself should Rāma not return before completing the fourteen-year period of exile that Kaikeyī had stipulated.

After hearing Hanumān's account of the trials and triumphs of Rāma and Sītā during their long absence from Ayodhyā, Bharata, together with the dowager queens and notables of Ayodhyā, goes forth to welcome his brother. Meanwhile, Vasiṣṭha and the other religious functionaries under the direction of Bharata and Śatrughna make preparations for a lavish royal consecration ceremony for Rāma, which is then carried out with great pomp and circumstance.

The Book concludes with a glowing description of the paradisiacal conditions that prevailed during the glorious ten-thousand-year reign of Rāma (sargas 107–116).

3. Statecraft and Violence:

The Themes of the Yuddhakāṇḍa

THE Yuddhakāṇḍa is primarily a book of narrative action. Its considerable body of text appears to pack more dramatic events into a relatively short time frame[1] than any other Book of the epic. The action is generally linear, carrying the tale from Rāma's discussions with Sugrīva and Hanumān upon the latter's return from his mission to Laṅkā through the great military campaign, the fluctuations of battle, and Rāma's eventual triumph, to the hero's return to Ayodhyā and his long-deferred consecration as king.

The narrative sustains its dramatic interest by repeatedly switching its focus back and forth between the activities of Rāma and his allies, on the one hand, and those of Rāvaṇa, his advisers, and Sītā and her wardresses, on the other. Thus the scene of the action alternates periodically in an almost cinematic fashion between its principal locations, the encampment of the monkey army, and the council chamber and women's quarters of the rākṣasa king, frequently bringing the two streams of narration together in the intermediate no-man's-land of the grisly battlefield outside the city gates. This central pattern is broken only by occasional brief excursions to other Laṅkan locales, such as the sleeping chamber of the gargantuan rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa, the fearsome Nikumbhilā grove frequented by the sorcerer-warrior Indrajit, and, of course, the remote high country of the Himalayas to which Hanumān makes two visits to procure the powerful healing herbs that grow there. Although the action of the Book is thus framed almost entirely within the confines of the island kingdom of Laṅkā, that action is itself framed by locales on the mainland. For the Book begins with Rāma's march to and encampment on the northern shore of the ocean[2] and ends with his triumphal return to Ayodhyā, the starting point of the entire epic tale. In this way the Book, like the Sundarakāṇḍa and the epic as a whole, has a sort of annular structure of the "there and back again" type that characterizes many folk and epic quest tales.

[1] The actual time frame of the events narrated in the critical edition of the text (and in the southern recension in general) is not unambiguously clear and forms the basis for considerable disagreement among those commentators who concern themselves closely with the chronology of the epic in general and of the Book in particular. The commentators either understand the duration of the battle to be approximately two weeks and the action of the entire Book to take somewhat longer than that (Cg, Cv, Cm, Ck), although Cg provides an alternative chronology that has the battle last only seven days (see notes to 6.80.55 and 6.96.30), or they understand the duration of the Book to include the sleep of Kumbhakarṇa, extending the duration of the events to just over six months (Ct). Cs, depending on the Padmapurāṇa's account, seems to understand the battle to take some forty-eight days (see note to 6.50.12). See R. Goldman 2003 and 2006b. In any case, it appears that, for most of the commentators, the duration of the actual battle is about two weeks. See note to 6.4.4.

As the title of the Book indicates, its major theme is the great yuddha, or war, between two formidable armies.[3] Rāma's host consists of himself, his brother Lakṣmaṇa, the rākṣasa defector Vibhīṣaṇa and his four loyal ministers, and the vast host of monkey troops under the command of the vānara monarch Sugrīva and the wise and sagacious king of the apes, the ṛkṣarāja, Jāmbavān. Rāvaṇa's forces are made up of himself, his powerful kinsmen and generals, and the hordes of rākṣasa soldiery.

For this reason, a great proportion of the Book is given over to discussions of the preparations for war and lengthy descriptions of the combatants, along with their weaponry and other military paraphernalia, and, above all, protracted, detailed, and often repetitive accounts of both large-scale clashes between the opposing armies and heroic single combat involving pairs of powerful rival warriors.

[2] Northern versions of the epic, including the printed editions of Lahore and Gorresio, place the break between the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas later in the narrative than do the southern texts. Thus northern versions of the poem generally begin the kāṇḍa only at a point after the army has built and crossed the bridge to Laṅkā. For this reason, for example, the Book's opening chapter in the editions of Lahore and Gorresio corresponds to the sixteenth sarga of the critical edition. On structural grounds, it would seem that the southern ordering of the sargas is to be preferred. For a discussion of the structure of the Sundarakāṇḍa, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 14–16.

[3] It should be noted that in some, mainly northern, manuscripts the Book is called the Laṅkākāṇḍa, perhaps in an effort to maintain consistency with the poem's other central four kāṇḍas, which, with the possible exception of the Sundarakāṇḍa, are named for the places where their principal plots unfold. For a discussion of the names of the kāṇḍas, especially the obscurely named Sundarakāṇḍa, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 75–78.

The encounters described are in some ways similar to those narrated in the "battle books" of the Mahābhārata, most especially when the poet focuses on the duels between the most prominent rākṣasa champions, such as Indrajit and Rāvaṇa himself, and the two heroic Rāghavas, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Here, as in the longer epic, there are elaborate descriptions of the astras, or supernaturally powerful divine missiles, control of which the warriors have obtained through various boons, penances, sacrifices, and the like. However, because of the particular demands of the Rāmāyaṇa's narrative, the only battle that truly approximates the typical Bhāratayuddha duel is the epic's culminating and most significant duel, the one between Rāma and Rāvaṇa. For it is only in this encounter that we see the classical epic duel between two powerful warriors, both mounted in chariots, launching, parrying, and receiving divinely empowered shafts while their drivers execute the various military movements for which they are trained.

It must be kept in mind that whereas both the Pāṇḍava and Kaurava combatants go to war with the full panoply of military mounts, vehicles, weaponry, and tactics, in the Rāmāyaṇa these things are, for the most part, available only to the rākṣasas. Rāma and his brother have gone into exile in the guise of wandering forest ascetics stripped of most of the accoutrements and resources of the warrior class of their day. They have only their powerful bows and arrows, and lack the armor, mounts, chariots, and arsenals of diverse weapons normally associated with epic warfare. Unlike Rāvaṇa, they are without the support of the classical army of the śāstras, the caturañgabala with its four divisions of chariots, cavalry, elephant corps, and infantry.

It is only in Rāma's final, magnificent duel with the rākṣasa lord that, in order to level the playing field, as it were, Indra lends him his own celestial chariot and his heavenly charioteer, Mātali, to drive it. This divine intervention lends the duel its more classical form, enabling both combatants to maneuver and wheel freely across the field of battle so that the great clash can earn its reputation as truly incomparable.[4]

The troops Rāma does have at his command and with which he must confront the heavily armed rākṣasa forces consist largely of a vast host of powerful, but often poorly disciplined,[5] forest-dwelling monkeys. Now it is true that these monkeys are the partial incarnations of the various vedic divinities[6] and are therefore gifted with extraordinary size, strength, and supernatural abilities, which make them formidable fighters. However, despite the fact that they are said in the Bālakāṇḍa to be as skilled in the use of divine missiles as the gods themselves,[7] nowhere are they represented in the Yuddhakāṇḍa as equipped with any sort of specific military weapon. Instead, almost invariably they are depicted as fighting with their hands, feet, and fangs and with a motley assortment of boulders and trees, which they uproot and use to smash their enemies, together with their vehicles. In the few cases where one of the monkey warriors is shown using a purpose-made weapon, it is one of those dropped on the battlefield by slain, wounded, or routed rākṣasas.

[4] See notes to 6.96.19.

This significant difference lends many of the battle scenes in the kāṇḍa a kind of raw, even savage quality in which the chaos of violent conflict and the general "fog of war" is starkly rendered by the poet as he describes the frenzied armies of monkeys and demons flailing at one another almost indiscriminately. Consider, for example, the chilling passage in sarga 34, where the violent encounter continues unabated far into the night, when, in the dust and darkness, the combatants can no longer distinguish friend from foe.

> In that terrible darkness they slaughtered one another in battle: the tawny monkeys crying, "Are you a rākṣasa?" and the rākṣasas crying, "Are you a monkey?"
>
> "Kill!" "Rend" "Come on!" "What, running away?" Such were the tumultuous cries that were heard in that darkness.
>
> With their golden armor, in the darkness, the swarthy rākṣasas looked like great mountains with thickets of luminescent herbs.
>
> Beside themselves with fury, the swift rākṣasas raced about in that impenetrable darkness, devouring the monkeys.

[5] As witness the various occasions at which the vānara forces panic, break ranks, and flee in disarray only to be rallied by one figure or another.

[6] See 1.16, where the incarnation of the gods as allies of Rāma is described. The divine parentage of the principal monkey warriors is also frequently alluded to throughout the text.

[7] sarvāstraguṇasampannān amṛtaprāśanān iva (1.16.4).

> But the monkeys hurled themselves upon the rākṣasas' golden-plumed horses and their banners that resembled flames of fire and, in a terrifying rage, tore them to pieces with their sharp fangs.
>
> Beside themselves with fury, they dragged about elephants with their riders and chariots bedecked with flags and banners, slashing at them with their fangs.
>
> Meanwhile, with arrows that resembled venomous serpents, Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma cut down the foremost among the rākṣasas, whom they could make out but dimly in the darkness.
>
> The thick dust raised by the horses' hooves and chariot wheels blocked up the eyes and ears of the warriors.
>
> And there, as that terrible, hair-raising battle proceeded in this fashion, swift rivers with blood for water began to flow.[8]

Vālmīki's descriptions of the realities, the technologies, and the consequences of war are numerous, vivid, and interesting. On the one hand, he can be brutally direct and graphic, giving almost Homeric accounts of the devastating effects of the violence. Compare, for example, such passages as the following:

> His head shattered by the crushing blow of that fist, Devāntaka, son of the rākṣasa king, all at once fell lifeless to the ground, his teeth and eyes knocked out, his tongue lolling.[9] or

> Then, spying an opening, the monkey, in his rage, brought his huge palm down upon Virūpākṣa's temple.
>
> Struck by that palm, which was like the thunderbolt of great Indra, he fell to the ground drenched in gore and vomiting blood.

[8] 6.34.3–11. One is all but inevitably reminded of Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach":

> And we are here on a darkling plain
> Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
> Where ignorant armies clash by night.

[9] 6.58.24.

> Drenched with foaming blood, his eyes rolling with rage, Virūpākṣa appeared to the monkeys to have his eyes still more disfigured than before.
>
> The monkeys watched their enemy as, drenched in blood, he rolled in convulsions from side to side, moaning piteously.[10]

On the other hand, the poet is fond of bringing out what one may call the aesthetics of violence by glossing the ugliness of the carnage with various poetic figures. Thus, for example, he will often describe stricken warriors gushing blood from their many wounds as resembling kiṃśuka or other red-flowering trees in full bloom.[11] Or, as in the following example, a hemorrhaging giant may be compared to a pleasant mountainside with its sparkling waterfalls.

> Stripped of his ears and nose and gushing blood, mighty Kumbhakarṇa looked like a mountain covered with waterfalls.[12]

In some cases the poet carries the juxtaposition of the emetic and the aesthetic to great lengths as in the following extended metaphor, where the horrific details of battlefield carnage are mapped onto a conventional description of a charming or romantic riverside scene.

> Indeed, the battleground resembled a river. Masses of slain heroes formed its banks, and shattered weapons, its great trees. Torrents of blood made up its broad waters, and the ocean to which it flowed was Yama. Livers and spleens made up its deep mud, scattered entrails its waterweeds. Severed heads and trunks made up its fish, pieces of limbs, its grass. It was crowded with vultures in place of flocks of haṃsas, and it was swarming with adjutant storks instead of sārasa cranes. It was covered with fat in place of foam, and the cries of the wounded took the place of its gurgling. It was not to be forded by the faint of heart. Truly, it resembled a river at the end of the rains, swarming with haṃsas and sārasa cranes.[13]

In some cases he is content merely to catalog in long lists the weaponry used.

[10] 6.84.28–31.
[11] For example, at 6.35.9; 6.55.22; 6.60.34; 6.67.33; and 6.76.28.
[12] 6.55.70.
[13] 6.46.25–28. Cf. notes to 6.7.15. Cf. 6.42.23, where the ghastly sounds of the battlefield are compared to a musical recital.

> As the rākṣasas, eager for victory, hurled themselves upon the monkeys, the swords, javelins, broadswords, arrows, lances, cudgels, maces, iron clubs, darts, various battle-axes, and splendid bows they had taken up glittered.[14]

Elsewhere, when the gravity of the occasion demands it, Vālmīki can lavish great attention on a single weapon, describing it thickly in terms of its appearance and sound as well as its history and the powers that invest it. The following is the poet's twelve-verse description of the ultimate weapon, the arrow with which Rāma finally succeeds in killing the mighty Rāvaṇa.

> Reminded by Mātali's words, Rāma took up a blazing arrow that, as he did so, made a hissing sound like that of a snake. Presented to him earlier by the powerful and blessed seer Agastya, it was a gift of Brahmā. It was a mighty arrow, unfailing in battle. Brahmā, whose power is immeasurable, had fashioned it long ago for the sake of Indra and had presented it to that lord of the gods, who was eager to conquer the three worlds. Pavana resided in its feathers. Agni, the purifier, and Sūrya, bringer of light, were in its arrowhead. Its shaft was made of all of space, and the mountains Meru and Mandara lent it their weight. Radiant with its splendor, beautifully fletched, and adorned with gold, it was fashioned with the blazing energy of all the elements, and it was as brilliant as Sūrya, bringer of light. It looked like the smoking fire at the end of a cosmic age and glistened like a venomous snake. It could instantaneously shatter hosts of chariots, elephants, and horses. It could shatter gateways, together with their iron beams, and even mountains. With its shaft drenched with the blood of many different creatures and smeared with their marrow, it was truly frightful. Hard as adamant and roaring deafeningly, it was terrifying in every sort of battle. Dreadful, hissing like a serpent, it inspired terror in all beings. It was fearsome and looked like Yama. In battle, it provided a never-ending supply of food to flocks of vultures and adjutant storks as well as rākṣasas and packs of jackals. Fletched with the various feathers of Garuḍa—beautiful and variegated—it brought joy to the monkey chiefs and despair to the rākṣasas. That ultimate arrow, which robbed one's > enemies of their glory but brought joy to oneself, was to encompass the destruction of that menace to the Ikṣvākus and indeed to all the worlds.

[14] 6.46.3–4.

>
> Then immensely powerful and mighty Rāma consecrated that arrow with mantras and placed it on his bow in the manner prescribed by the science of archery.[15]

In these ways, the author deploys some of the tradition's repertory of poetic techniques of "ornamentation" (alaṃkāra) in order to soften and aestheticize the graphic violence that forms so central a theme of the Book.

Yet another rhetorical technique the poet uses to distance himself and his audience somewhat from the grim realities of the killing fields of Laṅkā is that of a kind of grand hyperbole (atiśayokti) that serves to leaven somewhat the sanguinary tone of the battle scenes while inspiring in the audience a sense of wonder. His most consistent and effective use of this technique is undoubtedly seen in his treatment of the almost comically gargantuan figure of Rāvaṇa's monstrous brother, the giant, narcoleptic Kumbhakarṇa. The magnificent excess of Vālmīki's treatment of this wonderfully drawn character is discussed in detail below when we examine the Book's various prominent characters. However, in the present context, we may consider the poet's dramatic rendering of the fall of the monster's head when it is severed from his body by Rāma's swift arrow.

> With it, Rāma severed the rākṣasa lord's head—huge as a mountain peak, its fangs bared, and its gorgeous earrings swinging wildly—just as, long ago, Indra, smasher of citadels, severed the head of Vṛtra.
>
> Struck off by Rāma's arrow, the rākṣasa's head, which resembled a mountain, fell. It smashed the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares and knocked down the lofty rampart.
>
> Finally, the enormous rākṣasa, who looked like Himalaya, fell into the sea, abode of waters. There he crushed crocodiles, shoals of huge fish, and serpents before he entered the earth.[16]

[15] 6.97.3–14. Compare the shorter description of the arrow with which Rāma dispatches the giant Kumbhakarṇa at 6.55.120–23.
[16] 6.55.123–25.

Thus the frightful images that inspire the sentiments of fear, horror, or disgust (bhayānaka, bibhatsā, and jugupsā rasas) are often skillfully crafted by the poet to rouse other sentiments critical to the aesthetic appreciation of the piece, such as the sentiments of valor and wonder (vīra and adbhuta rasas).[17]

Aside from these graphic, figurative, and hyperbolic descriptions of conventional warfare as it was represented in the Indian epics with both ordinary and divinely empowered weapons, the Yuddhakāṇḍa contains some interesting passages that involve the use of unconventional methods of fighting, including the deployment of abhicāra, or black magic, and the application of what can only be thought of as a form of psychological warfare.

All the principal nonhuman characters in the epic drama, vānaras and rākṣasas alike, are represented as creatures endowed with certain supranormal powers. Specifically they are said to be kāmarūpins, beings capable of changing their appearance at will, and are beings possessed of māyā, or the power of creating magical illusions or simulacra of real people or objects.[18] These capacities are ascribed to the monkeys, in general, and also to the rākṣasas.[19]

Among the monkeys, the demonstration of the power to change form and size is most frequently associated with the figure of Hanumān, who changes both several times in the Kiṣkindhā-, Sundara-, and Yuddhakāṇḍas.[20]

Although the rākṣasas, too, seem to possess these powers as a class, only relatively few of them actually demonstrate them during the course of the epic narrative. Rāvaṇa, of course, as the most powerful of the rākṣasas and their master, possesses them and demonstrates them most notably and most infamously earlier in the poem when [17] For a discussion of Vālmīki's use of the spectrum of rasas as cataloged in the Nāṭyaśāstra, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 36–37.

[18] For a discussion of māyā in the Rāmāyaṇa, see S. Goldman 2006b.

[19] On the monkeys, see 1.16.2–3; and for the rākṣasas, 1.25.11. At 4.3.3 Hanumān assumes the form of a mendicant on the instructions of Sugrīva in order to find out Rāma's intentions. At 6.28.33–34 Rāma orders Vibhīṣaṇa and his four ministers to assume human form for the battle.

[20] For a discussion of Hanumān's frequent changes of size in the Sundarakāṇḍa, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 45–47. Hanumān again takes on a human form when deputed by Rāma to serve as his messenger to Bharata at 6.113.18. At the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa all the monkeys are said to assume human form when they accompany Rāma to Ayodhyā to participate in his consecration (6.115.35; 6.116.29).

he assumes the form of a pious forest ascetic in order to deceive and abduct Sītā.[21]

Nonetheless, in order to carry out his most nefarious plots, Rāvaṇa several times has recourse to rāksasas who appear to specialize, as it were, in this kind of deception. He does this most famously in forcing the reluctant Mārīca to assume the form of a golden deer in order to infatuate Sītā and lure Rāma away from his ashram, so he, Rāvaṇa, can carry out her abduction.[22] But perhaps the cruelest use of the rākṣasas' powers of illusion must be here in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where Rāvaṇa instructs the rākṣasa Vidyujjihva, a master of illusion (māyāvit), to magically produce simulacra of Rāma's severed head, bow, and arrows in order delude Sītā and break down her spirited resistance to his threats and blandishments.[23] This ruse, accompanied by Rāvaṇa's fraudulent account of how his troops have slaughtered Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and all the monkeys, fails in its purpose, but it does succeed in reducing Sītā to a state of grief and despair, since she is forced to believe the testimony of her eyes. The illusion vanishes the moment Rāvaṇa, called away by urgent business, leaves the scene.[24]

Some fifteen sargas farther on, Rāvaṇa again tries to break Sītā's resistance to his advances by attempting to convince her that her husband has been slain, and that therefore she has no further hope of rescue. Convinced that Indrajit has, in fact, killed the Rāghava brothers, Rāvaṇa has Sītā's wardresses take her on a flight in the Puṣpaka flying palace over the battlefield where Rāma and [21] 3.44.8. Aside from this, Rāvaṇa appears to have at least two basic forms: his fierce ten-headed and twenty-armed form, which he assumes in battle, and a less fearsome, one-headed and two-armed guise, which he takes on for his calmer and gentler moments. On this point, see notes to 5.8.13,19; 6.90.31.

[22] 3.38.15ff.

[23] 6.22.6ff.

[24] 6.23.38. This somewhat abortive episode does not exhaust the poet's fondness for having his characters devise deceptive and underhanded ways of attempting to demoralize either Rāma or Sītā. In sarga 52, the rākṣasa counselor Mahodara proposes that the rākṣasas stage an elaborate hoax, fabricating, and publicly celebrating, a false report that Rāma has been slain in battle. This, he argues, will break Sītā's will so that she will yield to Rāvaṇa. In this way, Mahodara reasons, Rāvaṇa will achieve his goal without having to risk battle. It is worth noting that this elaborate ruse is similarly never carried through, as both Kumbhakarṇa and Rāvaṇa dismiss it as the product of a coward's mind (6.52.24–35; 6.53.1–10).

Lakṣmaṇa lie gravely wounded.[25] Sītā is once more thrown into a paroxysm of sorrow and lamentation only to be consoled again, this time by the sympathetic rākṣasī Trijaṭā.[26]

The potential of psychological warfare through the demoralization of the enemy is a theme that seems to fascinate Vālmīki, especially when it is combined with the rākṣasas' powers of māyā, or illusion. This is demonstrated most dramatically, and most effectively, at the point where Indrajit, anticipating that Rāma may be able to defeat him despite his recourse to his deceptive battle tactics, stages his most horrific and elaborate deception. Employing his power of illusion, the rākṣasa prince conjures up an apparently living, breathing image of Sītā in his battle chariot and appears to brutally murder her before the very eyes of the monkey troops.[27] This heinous act shocks and demoralizes the monkeys and even the normally imperturbable Hanumān, who orders his troops to withdraw from the battlefield since, he now believes, the princess they have been sacrificing their lives to rescue has now been slain.[28]

Worse still, when Hanumān reports the apparent murder to Rāma, the hero is so demoralized and incapacitated with grief that he is unable to return to the battle for some time, even after Vibhīṣaṇa, well aware of his nephew's deceptive powers, reassures him that Rāvaṇa would never have countenanced Sītā's death.[29] Indeed, Rāma is so shocked by the report that he is temporarily unable to fight and must follow Vibhīṣaṇa's advice and send Lakṣmaṇa out for the final confrontation with the wily and formidable Indrajit.[30]

Another of the most prominent of the rākṣasa champions, Kumbhakarṇa, also avails himself of supranormal powers of this kind when, as he sets out for battle, he magically increases his already gargantuan body to truly colossal proportions.[31] Similarly, it would seem, Vibhīṣaṇa, although he never employs his powers of illusion to deceive anyone, is also able to use them to see through the

[25] 6.37.6ff.
[26] 6.38.
[27] 6.68.4–31.
[28] 6.69.19–22.
[29] 6.70.7–6.71.17.
[30] 6.72.14ff.
[31] At a height of six hundred bow lengths, Kumbhakarṇa is represented as making himself approximately one kilometer tall (6.53.33–35).

illusions of others as, for example, when he, alone among Rāma's allies, is able to clearly see the otherwise invisible Indrajit.[32]

But the Yuddhakāṇḍa is not entirely devoted to the strategies and conduct of war. In addition to its colorful and often harrowing descriptions of bloody conflict, the Book's narrative offers many opportunities for discussions of statecraft, moral and ethical debates, reflections on social and political relations, and moving lamentations for those who have been or are believed to have been slain during the course of the war. The poet makes ample use of these opportunities.

Thus the Book contains a number of striking passages that, in a way reminiscent of parts of the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, lend it something of the quality of nītiśāstra and dharmaśāstra. Notably, in many cases, the exponents of moral conduct and ethical statecraft are figures from whom one might least expect this kind of discourse, that is, some of the epic's greatest violators of the moral and ethical norms of brahmanical civilization, figures like the voracious monster Kumbhakarṇa and even the archenemy of the vedic order, that "thorn in the side of the world," Rāvaṇa himself.

The principal junctures for the exposition and discussion of ethical and expedient conduct are the councils and debates that take place frequently on both sides of the conflict when the leaders, Rāma and Rāvaṇa, are confronted with crises and calamities and are forced to make critical decisions.

The first of these occasions occurs quite early in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, even before Rāma has crossed the sea to begin the siege of Laṅkā. Rāvaṇa, after inspecting the destruction wrought in his city by Hanumān's rampage in the Sundarakāṇḍa, shows the first signs of doubt as to his invulnerability and summons his counselors to advise him on what course to take in response to the threat now confronting him. In so doing, he lectures them on the importance of sound counsel to a monarch and discourses learnedly on the different types of counsel and counselors that are described in the texts on artha and nīti.

[32] 6.36.8–10. The invisibility of Indrajit actually appears to be somewhat overdetermined. Although here it seems to be a function of the rākṣasa's innate māyā, or power of illusion, at other points in the Book it is said to derive from specific abhicāra, or black magic, sacrifices that Indrajit performs at the Nikumbhilā shrine. Cf. 6.60.18–28; 6.71.13–22. The question of Indrajit's magical powers is discussed further below in connection with an analysis of his character. See pp. 78–80 and S. Goldman 2006a.

"Those who are venerable and wise say that counsel is the cornerstone of victory. Therefore, I seek your counsel, mighty warriors, with regard to Rāma.

"There are three types of men in this world: the highest, the lowest, and those in between. I will now set forth the merits and demerits of each of them.

"The highest type of man, they say, is he who first takes counsel with those counselors intent upon his welfare and competent in counsel, with those friends who share his goals, or with those kinsmen who wish him well, and only then initiates undertakings such that his efforts are in harmony with the will of the gods.

"The man who stands in between, they say, is he who reflects upon a matter by himself, who by himself directs his thoughts to righteous action, and then carries through those actions by himself.

"And the lowest type of man is he who, after saying, 'I will do this,' undertakes an action—regardless of its merits and demerits and without relying on the will of the gods—and then fails to carry it through.

"Just as men are invariably of three types: the highest, the lowest, and those in between, so also must counsel, itself, be of the same three types: the highest, the lowest, and that which is in between.

"The highest type of counsel, they say, is when counselors are consistently of one mind through insight informed by the śāstras.

"The counsel that is known as that which is in between, they say, is when counselors, having adopted many different opinions, subsequently reach unanimity as to how to decide a matter.

"The lowest type of counsel is when counselors go on debating, one after another, each defending his own position, and no conclusive argument can bring about unanimity.

"Therefore, you eminent counselors should agree on some excellent and appropriate counsel for me to follow. I will follow it faithfully.[33]

[33] 6.6.5–15.

The king's sycophantic counselors and generals predictably boast about how easily they will annihilate Rāma and his forces, and only his younger brother Vibhīṣaṇa has the good sense and moral courage to warn Rāvaṇa of the grave danger in which his evil behavior has placed him and to urge him to save himself and his people by returning Sītā to Rāma forthwith. His argument presents another example of śāstraic reasoning:

> But Vibhīṣaṇa stopped them as they all stood there, weapons in hand, and bade them be seated once again. Then, cupping his hands in reverence, he said these words:
>
> "The learned have prescribed as appropriate the use of force only on those occasions where one's object cannot be achieved by means of the other three stratagems, dear brother.
>
> "And, dear brother, the use of force, even when made judiciously and in accordance with the proper injunctions, succeeds only against those who are off guard, preoccupied, or stricken by misfortune.
>
> "How then can you all hope to assail someone who is vigilant, intent upon victory, firm in his strength, the master of his anger, and utterly unassailable?
>
> "Who could have imagined the impossible feat that Hanumān accomplished, leaping across the fearsome ocean, the lord of rivers and streams?
>
> "By no means, night-roaming rākṣasas, should we rashly underestimate our foes; for their forces and valor are immeasurable.
>
> "And what offense had Rāma previously committed against the king of the rākṣasas that the latter should have abducted that illustrious man's wife from Janasthāna?
>
> "Even if Rāma did kill Khara, who was attacking him, in battle, still, all living creatures must strive to the limit of their strength to save their own lives.
>
> "For this reason Vaidehī constitutes a grave danger to us. She who has been abducted must be surrendered. There is no point in acting merely to provoke a quarrel.

"It would therefore not be appropriate for us to engage in pointless hostility with this powerful and righteous man. You must give Maithilī back to him.

"You must give Maithilī back to him before, with his arrows, he lays waste to our city together with its elephants, its horses, and its myriad precious things.

"You must give back Sītā before this vast, dreadful, and unassailable army of tawny monkeys storms our Laṅkā.

"If you do not of your own free will give back Rāma's beloved wife, the city of Laṅkā and all its valiant rākṣasas will surely perish.

"As your kinsman, I beseech you. Do as I say. What I am telling you is both salutary and beneficial. You must give Maithilī back to him.

"You must give Maithilī back to Dāśaratha before he unleashes for your destruction his massive and unfailing arrows, newly tipped and fletched and resembling the rays of the autumnal sun.

"Give up your wrath, so destructive of both happiness and righteousness. Practice righteousness, which is conducive to pleasure and fame. Calm yourself that we may survive together with our sons and kinsmen. You must give Maithilī back to Dāśaratha."[34]

That Rāvaṇa's response to his brother's well-meaning words is harsh and bitter and that it drives the latter to defect to the side of Rāvaṇa's enemies is well known. Less well known, perhaps, is that this response, too, is couched in the form of an interesting bit of cynical worldly wisdom of the type associated with the nīti literature in both its aphoristic and fable genres. Arguing that one's own false friends and treacherous kinsmen are more dangerous than one's open enemies, and that the fraternal relationship is vitiated by sibling rivalry, the rākṣasa lord quotes a series of verses that he characterizes as "well known" and that he attributes to a group of wild elephants. The burden of this "song of the elephants" is that the greatest danger in this world arises from one's own jealous, ambitious kinfolk. He says, [34] 6.9.7–22.

"One can live with one's enemy, or even with an enraged venomous serpent, but never with a false friend in the service of one's foes.

"I know very well the nature of kinsmen all the world over, rākṣasa. Kinsmen always take pleasure in one another's hardships.

"If a man is a leader, competent, learned, righteous in his conduct, and valiant, rākṣasa, then his kinsmen will malign him and bring him down.

"Always affecting pleasure in one's company, they turn on one in times of trouble. Concealing their true feelings, vicious kinsmen are a source of danger.

"There are these well-known verses that were sung once upon a time in the Padmavana by some elephants who had seen some men carrying ropes to snare them. Listen to them, as I recite them.

" 'It is not the fire, the other weapons, or the ropes that put us in danger; it is our own vicious kin intent on their own self-interest that are the real danger to us.

" 'For no doubt, it is they who point out the means of capturing us; therefore, we know that the danger presented by one's kin is the most severe of all.'

"In cattle there is wealth; in a brahman, self-restraint. In women, there is fickleness; from kinsmen, danger.

"And that is why, dear brother, you cannot bear it, that I am respected throughout the worlds, that I have attained universal sovereignty, and that I have set my foot on the heads of my enemies.[35]

In fact, despite the expectedly prevailing tone of warlike bravado that characterizes the advice of most of Rāvaṇa's more conventional rākṣasa advisers, several of his intimates, other than Vibhīṣaṇa, are noteworthy for their grounding in nīti- and dharmaśāstra. One noteworthy example of this is the sage advice given to the rākṣasa king during one of his first war councils by his maternal great-uncle Mālyavān. The rākṣasa elder rebukes Rāvaṇa, basing his arguments not only on the pragmatic issues of nīti and his interpretation of the unfavorable omens that have appeared but in terms of the broader universe of moral discourse. Indeed, his reference to the eternal conflict between dharma and adharma is reminiscent of Vaiṣṇava framings of the theology of the avatāra as put forth in such texts as the Bhagavadgītā. Mālyavān states, in part,

[35] 6.10.2–10.

> "Therefore, Rāvaṇa, I would recommend making peace with Rāma. You should give him back Sītā on whose account we are so heavily besieged.
>
> "All the gods, seers, and gandharvas desire Rāma's victory. Therefore, you should not oppose him. You should choose to make peace with him.
>
> "The blessed Grandfather Brahmā created two races: that of the gods and that of the asuras, who had recourse to righteousness and unrighteousness, respectively.
>
> "For righteousness is said to be the way of the great gods, Rāvaṇa, while unrighteousness is the way of the asuras and the rākṣasas.
>
> "For they say that when righteousness eclipses unrighteousness, that ushers in the golden age, known as the Kṛta. But when unrighteousness eclipses righteousness, that brings on the degenerate Tiṣya Age.
>
> "In rampaging through the worlds, you trampled glorious righteousness and embraced unrighteousness instead. It is for that reason that your enemies have grown more powerful than we.
>
> "Grown strong through your reckless actions, the serpent of unrighteousness is devouring us; while righteousness, which the deities revere, strengthens the forces of the gods."[36]

Mālyavān then goes on to castigate Rāvaṇa for oppressing the holy and righteous vaidika sages[37] before, surprisingly, concluding that:

[36] 6.26.9–15.
[37] 6.26.16–20.

> "We truly believe that Rāma is none other than Viṣṇu, who has taken the body of a man. For this Rāghava, so firm in his valor, is surely no ordinary human."[38]

This theme of the "righteous rākṣasa" is clearly an important one to Vālmīki and, along with the major figure of Vibhīṣaṇa, such characters, both male and female, emerge at a number of critical points in the narrative of the Sundara- and Yuddhakāṇḍas.[39]

Nonetheless, it is particularly striking when one of the Book's most articulate exponents of the canons of morality and sound polity turns out to be the almost comically monstrous rākṣasa champion Kumbhakarṇa, a figure so grotesquely exemplary of his race's vice of bloodthirsty voracity that he makes the ordinary, run-of-the-mill demons seem almost civilized by comparison.[40]

When, after Rāvaṇa's first humiliating defeat at Rāma's hands, he has his attendants undertake the heroic task of waking the sleeping giant, Kumbhakarṇa reports to him for his instructions. But, upon hearing about the siege of Laṅkā, the monstrous warrior, who has trampled on all norms of righteous conduct, rather than taking his brother's part, first lectures him sternly on the śāstraic norms for the righteous exercise of royal power.

> "Since you paid no heed to those who had your welfare at heart, you have now met with that very calamity that we foresaw earlier, at the council of ministers.
>
> "You are suffering the immediate consequences of your wicked deed, just as evildoers suffer an instant descent into their respective hells.
>
> "You carried out this action, your majesty, without first reflecting upon it. In the sheer arrogance of your strength, you did not consider the consequences.
>
> "A person who, relying upon his royal authority, does later what ought to be done first, and first what ought to be done later, has

[38] 6.26.31.
[39] Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 65–68.
[40] Recall that the reason Kumbhakarṇa is being subjected to the curse (or "boon") of near-perpetual sleep is the gods' well-grounded fear that in his insatiable hunger he might devour the entire world. See 6.49.19–23; 7.10.31–42. See R. Goldman 2006b.

no comprehension of the distinction between sound and unsound policy.

"Actions that are performed in inverted order, without reference to the proper time and place, are harmful, just as are offerings of food to impious persons.

"A king who perceives the fivefold application of the three types of action after coming to a decision with his ministers remains on the proper path.

"So does a king who desires to reach a decision in conformance with the texts on polity, who pays heed to his ministers, and who recognizes his true friends by virtue of his own intelligence.

"A man should pursue all three human ends—righteousness, profit, and pleasure—at their proper times, lord of the rākṣasas, either all at once or two at a time.

"And a king or one exercising royal power who learns which among these three is foremost and yet does not take it to heart finds all his great learning to be in vain.

"But, foremost among rākṣasas, the self-possessed monarch should consult with his ministers concerning the timely use of bribery, conciliation, sowing dissension, coercive force, or any combination of these means, as well as the proper and improper ways of applying them. He who does so and practices righteousness, profit, and pleasure at their appropriate times never comes to grief in this world.

"And the king who, together with ministers who understand the true nature of things and have his interests at heart, deliberates over what he ought and ought not do in this world in order to achieve a beneficial result thrives.

"There are some men—dumb brutes, in fact—utterly ignorant of the import of the śāstras, who, once they are brought into discussions of policy, wish to speak out of sheer arrogance.

"One should not follow the pernicious advice of those who are ignorant of the śāstras, and unfamiliar with the treatises on statecraft, and simply eager to enhance their own positions.

> "And those men who undermine all undertakings by foolishly uttering in their insolence pernicious advice that only seems beneficial should, after careful examination, be excluded from discussions of policy.
>
> "For in this world some counselors, acting in concert with cunning enemies, persuade their master to engage in self-destructive actions, thus bringing him to ruin.
>
> "When it comes to evaluating counsel, a master must, through a full investigation, determine which of his ministers are, in fact, enemies who are posing as friends although they have actually been suborned.
>
> "For his enemies find the weak points of a rash king who suddenly rushes into undertakings, just as birds plunge into the gap in the Krauñca mountain.
>
> "And so a king who underestimates his enemy and fails to protect himself meets with calamities and falls from his lofty state."[41]

Only when Rāvaṇa, in his anger and self-pity, rebukes Kumbhakarṇa and then begs him to offer his brotherly assistance does the latter vow to destroy the invading army.[42]

The last, most extensively argued, and in many ways the most interesting sustained discourse on the subjects of dharma, artha, and nīti is that delivered by Lakṣmaṇa at one of the Book's most emotionally wrought moments.

After Indrajit, as mentioned above, has deluded and demoralized the monkey army with his apparent murder of a simulacrum of Sītā, Hanumān sorrowfully reports the horrific event to Rāma. The latter, who must maintain his status as an "ordinary man" until the completion of his divine mission, collapses with grief at this news and will remain unfit for combat until after Indrajit is defeated and dies.

At this juncture Lakṣmaṇa, in what is represented as an attempt to console his brother,[43] delivers himself of a lengthy critique of dharma, truth, and the entire edifice of morality of which Rāma is the tradition's greatest exemplar and upon which his entire career is based.

[41] 6.51.2–20.
[42] 6.51.27ff.
[43] 6.71.1.

Essentially Lakṣmaṇa takes a cynical and worldly view, arguing that the fact that terrible things (such as the apparent murder of Sītā) happen to such virtuous people as Rāma, whereas those like Rāvaṇa, who flout every rule of dharma, prosper is proof that the practice of righteousness is in vain. Lakṣmaṇa revives his old argument that Rāma should never have agreed to accept banishment in deference to some abstract notion of truth but should, in fact, have imprisoned Daśaratha, who had treated him so wrongfully and cruelly.[44] Refuting the entire concept of dharma as an independent force, Lakṣmaṇa resorts to a more Machiavellian realpolitik, deriving its logic from the principles of arthaśāstra. He argues that the ability to perform righteous action is made possible only through wealth and power, both of which Rāma has foolishly forfeited by relinquishing the kingship that was rightfully his. Lakṣmaṇa then utters a virtual paean of praise to wealth and power from which, he argues, all blessings flow, concluding his peroration with a vow to avenge the killing of Sītā by destroying Rāvaṇa and Laṅkā along with him.[45]

What is particularly striking about Lakṣmaṇa's sustained critique of the fundamental principles of dharmaśāstra here is not so much its content as the fact that Rāma makes no effort to refute it. In a number of places in the epic, characters question or criticize actions that Rāma has taken or proposes to take.[46] In most of these episodes, the characters debating Rāma argue from the perspective of some aspect of dharma as it is encoded in the śāstra or in the oral tradition. Nonetheless, in each of his rebuttals, Rāma trumps these arguments with those derived from a higher, more comprehensive, or more correct reading of dharmic conduct.

In a few of these cases, however, a character will take a position directly contrary to the normal dharmic rules of filial deference and obedience to legitimate royal authority or even one that denies the foundational ontological and eschatological principles of mainstream vedic and Hindu ideology. These positions proceed from a pragmatic and distinctly materialistic worldview that rejects such core concepts as rebirth and an afterlife whose conditions are governed by a karmic system of moral rewards and punishments. In denying—explicitly or implicitly—the existence of the adṛśya, or invisible, worlds of the gods, heavens, and hells, such arguments speak to a hedonistic and materialistic philosophy according to which one should take what one can get in this world in terms of pleasure, wealth, and power.

[44] See 2.18.

[45] 6.70.13–42.

[46] Examples are Kausalyā's arguments that Rāma should obey her maternal command to stay in Ayodhyā rather than Daśaratha's paternal order of banishment or at least allow her to accompany him into exile (2.18.18–24; 2.21.5–6), Sītā's argument that she should be permitted to accompany Rāma into exile (2.24.2–18; 2.26.2–21), Sītā's critique of Rāma's carrying weapons during his sojourn in the guise of a forest ascetic (3.8), and Vālin's denunciation of Rāma for his having shot him while he was engaged in single combat with his brother, Sugrīva (4.17.12–45). For a discussion of these and other dharma debates in the poem, see R. Goldman 2003a.

One example of this kind of argument in the Rāmāyaṇa can be found in Lakṣmaṇa's angry outbursts in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, where he urges Rāma to resist his father's tacit compliance with Kaikeyī's demand that he be banished and instead depose the old king and seize the throne by force.[47] Another is the well-known and highly explicit critique of dharma, deference, and religion advanced by the brahman Jābāli in an effort to persuade the exiled prince to give up his adherence to the orders of the now deceased king and return to claim the Kosalan throne.[48]

But all these arguments, whether offering an incorrect interpretation of dharma or seeking to deny it altogether, have a single purpose. All serve as pūrvapakṣas, incomplete or utterly incorrect arguments, that provide opportunities for their proponents' interlocutor, Rāma himself, to correct them[49] and, in so doing, carry out his role as the narrative literature's most prominent exponent and exemplar of dharma.

Given this background, Lakṣmaṇa's attempt to "console" his grief-stricken and prostrated brother is curious. First, it seems odd that Lakṣmaṇa should seek to comfort Rāma by bringing up the same kind of arguments that the prince had so soundly refuted in the past and that had earned him, Lakṣmaṇa, his brother's rebuke on those [47] 2.18.1–15; 2.20.1–35.

[48] 2.100.
[49] In the one case in which Rāma "loses" an argument, the one where he debates with Sītā the propriety of her accompanying him to the forest, it is made clear that it is he himself who is putting forward the pūrvapakṣa in an effort to test Sītā and thus assure himself that she truly understands and is able to articulate the correct dharmic position (2.27.26–31).

earlier occasions. Most striking is that this, the last of the epic's anti-dharma speeches, is the only one to go unanswered by Rāma. For instead of the anticipated correction on Rāma's part, the poet brings in Vibhīṣaṇa, who brusquely cuts off Lakṣmaṇa, assures Rāma that Sītā could not, in fact, have been killed, and instructs Rāma to send Lakṣmaṇa out to fight Indrajit before the latter has had a chance to complete his latest abhicāra, or black magical, rite.[50]

It is not clear why Rāma fails to respond to Lakṣmaṇa's radical deconstruction of dharma and morality in favor of a virtual hymn to artha and political expediency. His silence here goes against the otherwise uniform practice of the poet and appears to let stand an argument that runs counter to the most fundamental theme of the Rāmāyaṇa and the culture of which it is one of the principal handbooks. The explanation may lie, perhaps, in what one may consider Vālmīki's penchant for a certain kind of "realism" that is in keeping with his meticulous portrayal of the avatāra as faithfully acting out the role of an "ordinary" man in maintaining Viṣṇu's strict adherence to the terms of the boon given to Rāvaṇa by Brahmā.[51] In the present context, on the very eve of the final battle in which Rāma must at long last carry out his divine mission, it may well be that the poet is especially eager to remind us one last time of Rāma's mortality and of the vulnerabilities that are its hallmarks. It would appear that he does this by carrying through his portrayal of Rāma as truly prostrated by the news of Sītā's apparent death and so unable to take in, much less respond to, his brother's provocative and subversive statements. This idea gains strong support from the fact that Rāma not only fails to react to Lakṣmaṇa's diatribe but also apparently fails to comprehend Vibhīṣaṇa's subsequent assurance that Sītā is not dead and his advice that he needs to send Lakṣmaṇa out at once to confront Indrajit. Vālmīki confirms the hero's dazed state by noting that Vibhīṣaṇa is forced to repeat his speech, the import of which Rāma has been utterly unable to grasp.

> Although Rāghava had heard those words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he could not, racked with grief as he was, clearly understand what the rākṣasa had said.

[50] 6.71.5–22.
[51] 1.14.6–1.15.6. On this critical issue, see Pollock 1991, pp. 15–54.

> But then, in the presence of the monkeys, Rāma, the conqueror of enemy citadels, regaining his composure, spoke to Vibhīṣaṇa, who sat beside him.
>
> "Vibhīṣaṇa! Lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, I would like to hear once more what you just said. Please repeat what you intended to say."
>
> When he had heard those words of Rāghava, Vibhīṣaṇa, skilled in speech, repeated what he had said.[52]

It is difficult to understand why the poet would include this otherwise pointless passage if not to demonstrate forcibly his hero's humanity. Given that Rāma has not been able to grasp the import of Vibhīṣaṇa's encouraging and exhortative words, clearly we are meant to understand that Lakṣmaṇa's words, which were framed precisely to provoke the hero's normal spirited defense of dharma, have gone utterly unheard and unheeded. Few things could more dramatically highlight Rāma's all-too-human, grief-induced stupor than his failure to respond to Lakṣmaṇa's challenge to all that Rāma stands for.

That Rāma, on the eve of the fulfillment of the mission he has undertaken on behalf of the gods and sages, must be clearly seen to be a man is again unmistakably signaled by the passage immediately after his final triumph over Rāvaṇa, where he is felicitated by the gods, who hail him as the omniscient and eternal creator of the universe.[53] In response to the gods' virtual hymn of praise, the seemingly bewildered prince replies,

> I think of myself only as a man, Rāma, the son of Daśaratha. May the Blessed Lord please tell me who I really am, to whom I belong, and why I am here.[54]

This seemingly naïve question, which elicits from Brahmā a full-fledged, seventeen-verse stotra in which Rāma is at last unambiguously revealed as the lord of the universe, Viṣṇu, and Sītā as his divine consort, Lakṣmī, puts the final seal, as it were, on this most critical point of the epic, namely, that in order to accomplish his purpose Rāma not only must act like a mere man, he must in some meaningful sense be one and must himself actually believe in his own humanity. For Vālmīki, unlike many of the influential Rāmāyaṇa authors who followed him, Rāma's humanity is taken both literally and seriously. This means that his hero, unlike those, say, of the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa and the Rāmcaritmānas, must actually suffer the physical, mental, and emotional pains common to ordinary mortals and must be unaware of his own divinity.[55] Brahmā's revelation and Rāma's recognition of his divinity is therefore appropriate only now in the closing sections of the Yuddhakāṇḍa since the divine purpose that required the hero to live with full confidence in his own humanity has now, with the death of Rāvaṇa, been accomplished.

[52] 6.72.1–4.
[53] 6.105.1–8.
[54] 6.105.10.

In making possible the revelation of Rāma's true nature, the death of Rāvaṇa thus marks, in a sense, the culmination of the kāṇḍa and, indeed, of the life mission of the epic hero. Yet there remain some important matters to be dealt with in the eleven, mostly short, chapters that follow Brahmā's hymn of praise to Rāma as the Lord Viṣṇu incarnate. Some of these are more or less formal, conventional, or ritual necessities, such as the funeral of Rāvaṇa, the lamentations of his widows, and the royal consecration ceremony of Vibhīṣaṇa.[56] Others are more or less narrative necessities, including the appearance of the shade of Daśaratha to greet Rāma and absolve Kaikeyī, the miraculous revival of Rāma's virtuous monkey allies who had been killed during the war, and, most important, the completion of the circle of the story that began with the banishment of Rāma in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa by bringing him safely back to his ancestral capital, reuniting him with his faithful and devoted brother Bharata, and, of course, describing his lavish and long-deferred consecration.[57] Aspects of several of these events and episodes are discussed in the following sections.

[55] In this respect, it is illuminating to compare Vālmīki's representation of the Rāmāvatāra not only to those of the other authors but to the characterization of the Kṛṣṇāvatāra as it is found in the Mahābhārata, the Harivaṃśa, and the Bhāgavata literature in general. Bound as he is by nothing like the conditions of Rāvaṇa's boon, Kṛṣṇa can never experience any sort of suffering nor can there be any limitation on his omniscience. Thus, for example, Duryodhana's attempt to capture Kṛṣṇa when the latter comes to him as an emissary of the Pāṇḍavas is easily countered by the avatāra's display of his divine nature as all the vedic gods and Pāṇḍava heroes are seen to issue from his body (MBh 5.129.1–16). Similarly, Kṛṣṇa repeatedly identifies himself as the supreme divinity in the great epic, most famously to Arjuna to whom he reveals, respectively, both his vibhūtis and his awesome universal form in the tenth and eleventh adhyāyas of the Bhagavadgītā.

[56] 6.99–100.

Undoubtedly the most strikingly dramatic, unexpected, and noteworthy episode to be found in the closing chapters of the Book is the complex narrative describing the reunion of Rāma with his beloved and long-suffering wife, Sītā, which occupies the four sargas from 101 through 104. The significance of this passage, its relevance to the political and social impact of the epic, and its reworking in several influential later versions of the Rāmakathā are such that the episode is dealt with at length separately in connection with the examination of the Book's portrayal of Sītā in the following section on the principal characters of the Yuddhakāṇḍa.

[57] 6.107–16.

4. The Major Characters of the Yuddhakāṇḍa

A book as lengthy and narratively complex as the Yuddhakāṇḍa would be expected to have a rather sizable cast of characters, and this expectation has not been left unfulfilled by the poet. Moreover, the nature of the narrative in which the principal antagonists, Rāma and Rāvaṇa, are each advised and assisted by a substantial number of counselors and warriors, many of whom are given significant "speaking parts," as it were, and/or accorded one or more whole chapters detailing their martial exploits, victories, or deaths, adds significantly to the bulk of the text. Indeed, the theme of this Book, in which the hosts of vānaras and rākṣasas clash by night and by day, affords the author the opportunity to back up the main champions on both sides with vast numbers of troops that make the proverbial cinematic "cast of thousands" seem more like Jones's "thin red line."[1] Thus not only are many warriors shown in action but many more are mentioned and described.[2] This tendency reaches its logical limit in the way that the text and some, notably southern, manuscripts describe truly astronomical numbers of monkeys.[3]

With this in mind, and because of space constraints, it is appropriate, we feel, to focus on only the most prominent and interesting of the many characters—humans, monkeys, and rākṣasas—that people the lengthy narrative of this kāṇḍa.

THE HUMANS

As is the case in the three kāṇḍas that precede it, the Yuddhakāṇḍa, because of its principal setting in regions outside the boundaries of significant human habitation, for most of its narrative contains a very small cast of human characters. Indeed, until the Book's final four sargas, when Rāma returns first to the ashram of the sage Bharadvāja and subsequently to Nandigrāma and Ayodhyā for his

[1] Jones 1962.
[2] Compare the elaborate enumeration and descriptions of the monkey troop leaders delivered to Rāvaṇa by his hapless spies Śuka and Sāraṇa in sargas 17–19.
[3] On this, see the notes to 6.19.4 and 6.19.32,33.

reunion with his patient brother Bharata and his long-delayed consecration as king of Kosala, its multitude of characters contains only the same three humans, Rāma, Sītā, and Lakṣmaṇa, who represent their species in the Kiṣkindha- and Sundarakāṇḍas.

These three are, of course, the central players in the entire drama of the Rāmāyaṇa, and, as such, their characterization has been discussed at length in the Introductions to the preceding volumes. Therefore, here we need only discuss briefly those aspects of their characters that may not have been brought fully into the foreground in the earlier portions of the epic.

Rāma

In the Yuddhakāṇḍa, as in all Books of the epic save only the Sundarakāṇḍa,[4] Rāma, the poem's eponymous hero, is the principal object of the poet's attention. However, because of the grand scope of the narrative, the very large number of characters who engage in debate, battle, or both with one another when Rāma is not present, and the frequent shifting of the scene from Rāma's command post to other parts of the battlefield, the council chambers, residences, and parapets of Laṅkā, and even to the far-off Himalayas, the hero's percentage of time "on camera," as it were, is, in terms relative to most of the other Books, often limited. There are, however, several groups of sargas distributed throughout the poem that place the hero squarely in the poet's field of vision.

Vālmīki's portrayal of the great hero is, for the most part, much the same as it is in the other Books. Rāma remains the stalwart, charismatic, valorous yet compassionate model of ideal human virtue that he is generally shown to be in the earlier sections of the poem.

On the other hand, the Yuddhakāṇḍa is the Book in which the avatāra's human form will finally be thrown off and his true identity as the Supreme Lord of the universe at long last revealed. Because of the terms of Rāvaṇa's boon and the constraints it places on even Rāma's understanding of his divine nature, however, the hero is prevented from achieving full self-realization until he has fulfilled the purpose for which he has taken human birth, the slaying of the arch demon. This, however, does not take place until the ninety-seventh sarga of the Book. Only after this, in sarga 105, can the gods "remind" Rāma of who he really is.

[4] On Rāma's representation in the Sundarakāṇḍa, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 18–19.

Perhaps for this reason, the poet introduces a number of scenes where the hero's humanity is highlighted most poignantly by showing him as prey to the human emotions of anger and grief and to be critically, even mortally, wounded and in need of urgent ministrations from the mighty bird Garuḍa or the monkey physician, Suṣeṇa, to save his life. Thus, at sarga 14, Rāma, confronted by the obduracy of the ocean god, Samudra, who will not permit him and his army to cross over to Laṅkā, abandons his habitual equanimity and vaunted forbearance to rage against the sea and even against those very virtues, forbearance and forgiveness, of which he is the great exemplar.

> Then Rāma, the corners of his eyes red in his rage at Samudra, said these words to Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks, who stood nearby.
>
> "Lakṣmaṇa, just see the arrogance of this ignoble Samudra, who will not manifest himself, even though I have worshiped him.
>
> "The virtues of the good—calmness, forbearance, straightforwardness, and kind words—are always taken for signs of weakness by those who lack them.
>
> "People only respect an evil, insolent person who runs about praising himself and unleashing violence on everyone.
>
> "Peaceful means can no more lead to fame or glory in this world, Lakṣmaṇa, than they can to victory in the vanguard of battle.
>
> "Now, Saumitri, you shall see the ocean, abode of sea monsters, with its waters choked with the dead bodies of those very creatures pierced by my arrows and floating everywhere.
>
> "Here and now, Lakṣmaṇa, you shall see me cut to pieces the bodies of gigantic fish, the trunks of sea elephants, and the coils of great serpents.
>
> "Now, launching a powerful assault, I shall with my arrows dry up the ocean together with its fish and sea monsters and its masses of conch and oyster shells.

> "This lord of the ocean, abode of sea monsters, thinks that because I am endowed with forbearance I am weak. To hell with forbearance for people like this!"[5]

Rāma's legendary equanimity also fails him several times in the Book when he is confronted with what appears to be the death of those most dear to him, notably his brother and inseparable companion, Lakṣmaṇa, and his beloved wife, Sītā.

The narrative presents the hero with several occasions to give way to unbearable sorrow and bitter despair when it appears that Lakṣmaṇa has been slain or mortally wounded. In sarga 39, Rāma, while still bound in the toils of Indrajit's fearsome serpent-arrows, regains consciousness to find that his brother has apparently died from his injuries. He laments bitterly, declaring that he himself cannot go on living without his brother. Notably, Rāma observes, in his profound sorrow, that the loss of Lakṣmaṇa is more grievous to him than that of Sītā herself, arguing that he can always find a woman to equal her, whereas a devoted brother like Lakṣmaṇa is irreplaceable.[6] Indeed, since Rāma now feels he must follow his brother in death, he regards the expedition to Laṅkā essentially as a failure. Warning the monkeys that in any case they cannot hope to defeat Rāvaṇa without Lakṣmaṇa, he thanks his allies and urges them to return home.[7]

Later, near the end of the battle, there is a striking reprise of this scene when Rāma, seeing Lakṣmaṇa struck down by Rāvaṇa's deadly javelin and assuming that he is dead, once more gives way to despair. He loses the will to continue fighting and once again claims he has no further interest in battle, kingship, or even Sītā herself.[8] In each case, Rāma recovers his composure and martial valor only when Lakṣmaṇa is cured of his injuries.

[5] 6.14.3–11. This episode, in its rendition by Tulsī Dās, is the setting for his famous verse about how certain things and creatures, including śūdras and women, only perform when beaten. This verse has been the subject of critique and controversy among members of the women's movement and Dalit advocacy groups in contemporary India. See Rāmcaritmānas 5.58.3: ḍhola gavara sūdra pasu nārī / sakala tāḍanā ke adhikārī //. On the towering rage of which Rāma is capable, see Pollock 1991, pp. 55–67.

[6] On this point, see R. Goldman 1980.

[7] 6.39.3–29.

[8] 6.89.1–8.

Despite Rāma's repeated lamentations for Lakṣmaṇa in which he twice appears to prize his brother more highly than his wife, the hero's greatest emotional crisis comes only when he is informed, falsely, as it turns out, that Sītā herself has been murdered at the hands of Indrajit, who has deployed his great powers of illusion to make it appear that he has committed this heinous deed. For now Rāma not only laments his loss poignantly, he actually loses, for a time, the physical and mental capacity to continue to fight or even understand fully what is going on around him. When Rāma hears of the report of Sītā's death from the trustworthy Hanumān, who has witnessed Indrajit's apparent murder of the princess, he at once loses consciousness without uttering a word.

> Upon hearing those words of his, Rāghava, fainting from grief, fell to the ground like a tree cut off at the roots.[9]

Even when Rāma is consoled by Vibhīṣaṇa, who reassures him that Rāvaṇa would have never permitted the murder of Sītā, the hero remains dazed and confused. Recognizing this, the rākṣasa urges that he rest awhile to compose himself and recoup his strength while Lakṣmaṇa takes up the battle against Indrajit.[10] Rāma listens to this sage advice, but, still too dazed and emotionally distraught to take it in, he is compelled to ask Vibhīṣaṇa to repeat it.[11] Even though Rāma has at last regained his composure, he still seems unable to plunge back into battle and so passively follows the rākṣasa's advice, sending his brother off to deal with the powerful Indrajit.[12] Prior to these passages in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, Rāma, the literature's greatest exemplar of self-control, has rarely been shown to lose his composure in this fashion.[13]

Perhaps the most striking and deeply affecting insight into the inner emotional life of Vālmīki's hero comes neither through the poet's portrayal of a man in near total control of his emotions nor through the occasional lapses in his prodigious self-control that we see from time to time. Instead, it is gained through the poet's exploration of the profound emotional turmoil Rāma must go through

[9] 6.70.10.
[10] 6.71.17–20.
[11] 6.72.1–4; see, too, pp. 39–40.
[12] 6.72.19–20.
[13] See Pollock 1991, pp. 55–67; and 3.58–62. See, too, R. Goldman 1980.

at what should be his moment of greatest happiness, his reunion with his beloved and long-suffering wife.

This reunion, much as Rāma has longed for it and suffered to achieve it, presents him with one of those painful dilemmas that the epic poets like to thrust upon their exemplary heroes—crises where they are confronted with a seemingly irresoluble conflict between public duty, or dharma, and personal loyalty.[14] In this case Rāma, determined not to compromise his reputation as a dharmic monarch, must place the political over the personal, although doing so will cause him and his innocent wife terrible anguish.[15] Here, as elsewhere in the epic, Rāma, in his effort to elicit or prove the dharmic nature of another character, will turn out to be merely testing Sītā so as to prove her virtue publicly.[16]

For the first time in the epic, the hero, so rightly admired for his emotional stability and moral certitude, is shown to be prey to seriously conflicting emotions. When Hanumān reports to him that Sītā is eager to see him, Rāma, far from responding with joy, exhibits signs of distress.

> Addressed in this fashion by Hanumān, Rāma, foremost among upholders of righteousness, was suddenly plunged into gloomy thought, and he became somewhat tearful.
>
> Heaving long, hot sighs and staring at the ground, he spoke to Vibhīṣaṇa, who stood beside him, looking like a great storm cloud.[17]

Then, when Vibhīṣaṇa informs Rāma that he has brought Sītā to him, we see the hero struggling with feelings that pull him in different directions.

[14] The classic epic example of this kind of conflict is, of course, the one that faces Arjuna in the sixth parvan of the Mahābhārata (including the Bhagavadgītā), where he must choose between his svadharma as a warrior and his love of, and loyalty to, his kinsmen.

[15] In this episode, as in the later and more controversial one in the Uttarakāṇḍa where Rāma actually banishes Sītā, the hero is, as elsewhere, striving to serve as an exemplary monarch unlike his father, Daśaratha, who allows his infatuation for a woman to compromise his performance as a dharmic ruler. See 2.10. See, too, R. Goldman 1997 and 2004; and Pollock 1986, pp. 58–73.

[16] On this issue, see Sutherland 1989; S. Goldman 2004a; and R. Goldman 2004 and 2006b.

[17] 6.102.5–6.

> But when Rāghava heard that she who had dwelt so long in the rākṣasa's house had come, three emotions—joy, sorrow, and anger—took hold of him.[18]

Only when Sītā has been publicly subjected to the humiliation of Rāma's cruel words of rejection and has undergone an ordeal by fire, and only after Rāma himself has been criticized for his actions by the god of fire, does he declare that he had, in fact, no doubts as to the princess's chastity but had acted so cruelly only to demonstrate it to the assembled multitudes. He tells Agni,

> "Unquestionably Sītā needed to be proven innocent before the three worlds, since this auspicious woman had long dwelt in Rāvaṇa's inner apartments.
>
> "For surely had I not put Jānakī to the test, the virtuous would have said of me, 'Daśaratha's son Rāma is a lustful fool.'
>
> "I know full well that Janaka's daughter Maithilī could give her heart to no other, since she is devoted to me and obeys my every thought.
>
> "But in order that the three worlds, too, should have faith in her, I, whose ultimate recourse is truth, simply stood by as Vaidehī entered the fire, eater of oblations."[19]

In this way, at the closing moments of Rāma's self-induced nescience regarding his own true nature as the Supreme Being, the poet is able to reaffirm once more that his hero's assumption of humanity is, in fact, genuine[20] while also giving a striking, if disturbing, demonstration of Rāma's unwavering adherence to the principles of rājadharma even when such adherence entails the price of immense suffering to himself and his beloved.

The focus on the vulnerability of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in the Book, however, should not blind us to the fact that, for Vālmīki, here [18] 6.102.16. See the note to this verse for a discussion of how the commentators explain the three emotions and the reasons for them.

[19] 6.106.11–14.
[20] This is made unambiguously clear in Rāma's famous statement to the gods who are lauding him as the lord of the universe, "I think of myself only as a man, Rāma, the son of Daśaratha. May the Blessed Lord please tell me who I really am, to whom I belong, and why I am here" (6.105.10).

as throughout the poem, the heroes are always understood to be aṃśāvatāras of Lord Viṣṇu. This point has been thoroughly argued in the Introduction to the Araṇyakāṇḍa[21] and so need not be argued again here at any length. Nonetheless, the notion that the divinity of Rāma is essentially a feature only of the epic's first and last Books, which provide a Vaiṣṇava theological frame for an otherwise originally secular tale, has long been a favorite subject of Rāmāyaṇa scholarship[22] and continues to be put forward even to this day.[23] Whatever may have been the textual history of the five so-called core Books of the poem, it is clear that no version of the received text is unaware of Rāma's divinity even though, in keeping with the boon of Brahmā, this particular avatāra has to function, for the most part, as if he were a mere mortal. As elsewhere, the Yuddhakāṇḍa offers a number of strong hints that even if Rāma himself declares his ignorance of his divine nature until he is reminded of it by the gods after the completion of his divine mission,[24] we, the poet's audience, must never forget this central fact.

The Vaiṣṇava nature of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa is indicated in a number of passages that strongly hint at the truth without making it clear to the heroes themselves. Thus when they are struck down by the powerful serpent-weapons of Indrajit, they are freed and restored to health and vitality by the sudden and unheralded appearance of the mighty Garuḍa.[25] The great bird is a figure intimately associated with Lord Viṣṇu as his emblem and his vāhana, and, although no explanation for his intervention is offered, the association cannot be lost on any South Asian audience. Again, when Mālyavān attempts to dissuade Rāvaṇa from his self-destructive obduracy in the face of Rāma's demands, the advice of some of his counselors, and the numerous ominous portents that confront him, the venerable rākṣasa explicitly states that several of the wiser demons are convinced that Rāma is, indeed, a manifestation of Viṣṇu, the ancient foe of the rākṣasas.[26] Then, too, when Lakṣmaṇa is struck down by Rāvaṇa, who attempts to carry his fallen foe from the [21] See Pollock 1984b; 1991, pp. 15–67.

[22] See Brockington 1984, pp. 218–25; 1998, pp. 466–72, passim.
[23] González-Reimann 2006, pp. 203–20.
[24] See 6.105.10 and notes.
[25] See 6.40.36–59.
[26] See 6.26.31 and notes. Cf. 7.6–8.

battlefield, he proves far too heavy for even the immensely powerful rākṣasa lord to lift. Yet Hanumān, well known in the Vaiṣṇava tradition as a supreme devotee of Lord Rāma, easily carries him to safety.[27]

Through episodes and allusions such as these,[28] the poet manages to allude cleverly at strategic moments in the Book to the central theological message of the poem while demonstrating time and again the emotional and physical vulnerability and abjection to which the avatāra has willingly subjected himself in the service of the gods and of dharma itself.

Sītā

More than any other figure in the epic, Sītā is rendered with extraordinary skill by the poet as a character capable of the expression of a full and finely drawn range of emotions. Although she is commonly held up as the model of the perfectly passive and subservient wife, she can be independent minded, strong-willed, and, when the situation demands it, sharp tongued.[29] Thus we have seen in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa her powerful and even cutting critique of Rāma's attempt to persuade her to stay behind in the capital when he is sent into exile.[30] In the Araṇyakāṇḍa one sees her willfulness in wheedling Rāma to pursue the illusory deer to gratify her childish whim and her somewhat darker side when, in her fear for her husband, she harshly impugns faithful Lakṣmaṇa's motives.[31] Then, too, in that Book and in the Sundarakāṇḍa she is given some fine and forceful speeches in which, despite her terror, she contemptuously lectures mighty Rāvaṇa on the error of his ways and the fearful retribution that awaits him.[32] Her emotional range, too, is shown in [27] See 6.47.104 and notes. Compare BhāgP 10.7.18–30, where the child Kṛṣṇa makes himself heavy and then bears down with his weight the whirlwind demon, Tṛṇāvarta, after which he permits himself to be picked up by the gopīs and returned to his foster mother, Yaśodhā.

[28] Compare, too, Mandodarī's lament, where, in her expression of grief, she wonders how so great a being as Rāvaṇa could have been defeated by a mere mortal (6.99.5–10).

[29] See Sutherland 1989 and S. Goldman 2001; 2003a; and 2004a.

[30] 2.24–27.

[31] 3.41,43.

[32] 3.45.28–44; 3.54.1–19; 5.19; and 5.20.12–22.

the latter Book as she oscillates from near suicidal despondency[33] to the heights of joy.[34]

The highly dramatic events of the Yuddhakāṇḍa present the poet with several opportunities to further expand upon Sītā's emotional repertoire, as it were.[35] Our first encounter with the heroine in the Yuddhakāṇḍa occurs in the twenty-second sarga, where Rāvaṇa, having failed through his earlier threats and blandishments to make the princess waver in her devotion to Rāma, resorts to sorcery and psychological torture in an attempt to accomplish his goal. In order to demoralize her, he has his courtier Vidyujjihva, apparently a specialist in magical illusion, create simulacra of Rāma's bow and severed head, which he then shows to Sītā as he tells her a completely fictitious account of how the rākṣasas have staged a successful night attack on the hero's troops. He informs her that most of the principal monkey warriors have been slain, wounded, or put to flight and that Rāma himself has been slain in his sleep by the rākṣasa champion Prahasta.[36] Taken in by this cruel deception, Sītā delivers a forceful and moving vilāpa in which she expresses her desolation and her anger, castigating first Kaikeyī as the ultimate cause for Rāma's death and the destruction of the family, Rāma for having allowed himself to be taken unawares, and, finally, herself, whom, as a surviving widow and the proximate cause of her husband's death, she likens to Kālarātri, the dark night of universal destruction. In the midst of Sītā's lamentation, however, Rāvaṇa is suddenly called away. The moment he leaves, the illusion vanishes.[37]

As elsewhere in the poem, Sītā is consoled and reassured by a friendly rākṣasī, in this case Saramā.[38] When the rākṣasī offers to carry a message to Rāma, Sītā shows that she, too, is capable of placing her excellent political instincts ahead of her emotional needs by telling Saramā that she should instead spy on Rāvaṇa's council and report back to her on his deliberations and intentions.[39]

[33] 5.24.36–49; 5.27.5–18.
[34] 5.34.3–4.
[35] See S. Goldman 2003b.
[36] 6.22.12–43.
[37] 6.23.1–38.
[38] Cf. Trijaṭā's consoling report to Sītā and her rākṣasī wardresses of her dream at 5.25.
[39] 6.25.5–11.

Shortly after this, Sītā is once more subjected to the most severe emotional shock. When Indrajit, cloaked in the invisibility his magical powers enable him to achieve, has managed to gravely wound both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in battle, Rāvaṇa, mistakenly believing his enemy to be dead, orders the rākṣasīs to take Sītā by force in the flying palace Puṣpaka over the battlefield so that she may see for herself that her husband has been slain and that she now has no choice but to marry him.[40] This situation affords the princess the opportunity to show yet another aspect of her personality. Although the text indicates that, as before, she laments piteously,[41] the tenor of her lamentation here is rather different from what we have seen at sarga 23.

For where she abandoned herself to her grief, anger, and self-condemnation on the earlier occasion, the poet takes this second opportunity to showcase her familiarity with elements in the śāstraic corpus. She remarks that all the astrologers and soothsayers in her father's court had been mistaken in foretelling that she would be a queen and she learnedly critiques the tenets of the sāmudrikaśāstra, the science of bodily signs, by noting that, although she is possessed of a significant catalog of auspicious physical characteristics, the whole science must now be shown to be false since she has, or so she thinks, been reduced to early widowhood.[42]

But not even these two incidents, in which Sītā must confront what she believes to be the death of her beloved husband and her only savior, can prepare her, or, for that matter, the audience, for the bitter blow she receives when Rāma, at the moment of their longed-for reunion, repudiates her with cutting and humiliating words before Lakṣmaṇa and the assembled monkeys and rākṣasas.

Deeply wounded and shamed by Rāma's harsh reception, Sītā gives way to tears, but not for long. Wiping her tear-stained face, she replies to her husband with calm and reasoned dignity, defending her honor, asserting her loyalty, and criticizing him for harboring feelings of misogyny. She accuses him of giving way to anger like some common man and faults him for failing to consider her own virtue and lofty birth, as well as for his disloyalty to the woman he married when she was still a child. At length, she turns to Lakṣmaṇa and instructs him to build her a pyre, since, as she says, she cannot live under the shadow of Rāma's false allegations.[43] Lakṣmaṇa sees that Rāma will not interfere and so complies with Sītā's request. She reverently circumambulates the fire and, to the horror of the onlookers, calmly enters it.[44]

[40] 6.37.5–21.
[41] 6.37.20–21; 6.38.1.
[42] 6.38.2–14.

Brahmā now arrives along with the other gods to proclaim Rāma's divinity and to announce that Sītā is, in fact, the goddess Lakṣmī.[45] The fire god, Agni, then emerges from the blazing pyre holding Sītā and testifies at length to her purity.[46] Only then does Rāma indicate that he has never actually doubted the fidelity and chastity of his beloved but only acted as he had to prove her purity to the world. He then takes her back, noting that she "is as inseparable from me as is its radiance from Sūrya, bringer of light," a statement laden with irony considering that he will banish her in the Uttarakāṇḍa.[47] Sītā is thus reunited with her lord who, it is noted, experiences happiness at the reunion.[48] Her own reaction is left to be inferred by the audience.

There is yet one more passage in the Yuddhakāṇḍa in which Sītā's character is portrayed in an interesting and positive light as that of a woman of independent mind and uncommon compassion. In sarga 101, when Hanumān has been sent to Sītā to tell her that her husband has been victorious and that her captivity is over, he begs of her only one boon. He asks her permission to avenge the torment and threats she has suffered at the hands of her rākṣasī wardresses by killing them in brutally violent ways.[49] Sītā's response is striking and illuminating in its humane, almost modernist tenor. She curtly refuses the monkey's request, arguing that the rākṣasīs were mere functionaries, following the orders of their master, and so do not [43] 6.104.1–19. These are the last words Sītā will say in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Although she will appear "on camera," as it were, several more times in its closing sargas, she will either listen silently to her husband's words or act wordlessly. See S. Goldman 2001.

[44] 6.104.2–27.
[45] 6.105.25.
[46] 6.106.1–9.
[47] 6.106.11–18. See S. Goldman 2004a.
[48] 6.106.20.
[49] 6.101.23–28.

deserve punishment. In keeping with the norms of the metaphysic of karma, she attributes her suffering to her own past misdeeds and tells Hanumān that refined people do not requite evil with evil. She concludes by observing that no one is entirely innocent, and therefore one should not mete out harsh punishment even to creatures like the rākṣasas, who take pleasure in harming people.[50]

Lakṣmaṇa

Rāma's devoted younger brother and constant companion is foregrounded in the Yuddhakāṇḍa in a number of significant passages. He is, of course, an active participant in the battle and serves, as elsewhere in the poem, as Rāma's principal, if sometimes unwilling, agent. Thus he follows Rāma's instructions to consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa as de jure king of Laṅkā prior to the onset of hostilities[51] and, as noted above, assures himself of his brother's consent before obeying Sītā's command to build her a pyre.[52]

But by far, Lakṣmaṇa's most important act in the Yuddhakāṇḍa comes at a critical juncture in the battle when Rāma, shattered by the report that Indrajit has murdered Sītā, becomes, for a time, unfit for combat. Thus it falls to Lakṣmaṇa, acting on the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa, to stand in for his brother and confront that all-but-invincible sorcerer-warrior, who is in many ways the most formidable of Rāma's demonic foes. Lakṣmaṇa's struggle with Indrajit is protracted and elaborate and occupies seven full sargas (72–78) of the Book.

One of the more noteworthy aspects of this episode is the situation that makes Lakṣmaṇa's intervention necessary, that is, Sītā's apparent murder. Shattered by the news, Rāma is unable to focus on the battle at hand. Seeing his virtuous brother's pitiable state, Lakṣmaṇa is moved to deliver a bitter and interesting diatribe against dharma itself, since, as Rāma's fate seems to show, the practice of righteousness and restraint yields no benefits. Lakṣmaṇa concludes from Rāma's despair and Rāvaṇa's apparent triumph that all that matters in this world is wealth and power, both of which his brother has foolishly abandoned in the interests of the futile practice of dharma. His speech adds another line of materialist and hedonistic discourse to the better-known critique of dharma and piety delivered by the brahman Jābāli in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa.[53] The treatment of these two speeches differ, however, in an important way. Jābāli's speech is characterized, even before it is quoted, as at variance with dharma (dharmāpetam).[54] Moreover, Rāma roundly refutes it as soon as it is uttered.[55] Lakṣmaṇa's denunciation of dharma, on the other hand, at its very inception, is described as both rational and meaningful (hetvarthasaṃhitam).[56] Then, too, unlike in the encounter with Jābāli, Rāma is in no condition to refute Lakṣmaṇa's case for materialism, and so it remains the only argument against righteousness in this most dharmic of texts that the poet lets stand without rebuttal by his righteous hero.[57]

[50] 6.101.29–37.
[51] 6.13.7–9.
[52] 6.104.17–21.

Aside from these significant words and deeds, Lakṣmaṇa's role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa is largely a passive one. He serves as a focus for the articulation of Rāma's grief, a grief that several times is diverted from its normal concentration on the abducted and seemingly murdered Sītā to expend itself on his inseparable brother and companion.

When, early on in the battle, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have been struck down and immobilized by Indrajit's deadly serpent-arrows, the former, the hardier of the two, recovers his senses first and, thinking that his brother is dead, gives way to a famous outpouring of grief[58] in which he claims to value him above even Sītā and vows to commit suicide in his sorrow at his apparent loss.

> "What do I care for Sītā or even for my life itself now that I see my brother lying defeated in battle?
>
> "Were I to search the world, I could find another woman like Sītā, but never a brother, a companion, or a warrior to equal Lakṣmaṇa.

[53] 2.100. For a detailed discussion of this passage, see pp. 36–41, and cf. Pollock 1986, pp. 34, 68.
[54] 2.100.1.
[55] 2.101.
[56] 6.70.13.
[57] On this issue, see R. Goldman 2003a.
[58] 6.39.4–21.

> "If Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of Sumitrā's joy, has indeed returned to the elements, then I shall abandon my life right before the eyes of the monkeys."[59]

This sentiment regarding Lakṣmaṇa is expressed by Rāma a second time, later in the Book, when the former, pierced by Rāvaṇa's terrible javelin, once more appears to Rāma to be dead.

> "Here is heroic Lakṣmaṇa, fallen to the ground through the power of Rāvaṇa. He is writhing like a snake, filling me with sorrow.
>
> "When I see that hero, dearer to me than life itself, drenched with blood, my mind is in such turmoil that I wonder what power I have left to fight.
>
> "For if my brother, so praiseworthy in battle and marked with auspicious signs, has truly returned to the elements, then of what use to me is pleasure or indeed life itself?
>
> "For my valor itself seems to hang its head in shame, while my bow seems to slip from my grasp. My arrows drop away, and my sight is dimmed with tears. Dreadful thoughts grow in my mind, and I wish now only for death.
>
> "...Seeing my brother Lakṣmaṇa struck down in the dust of the battlefield, I have no further use for battle, for my life, or even for Sītā herself.
>
> "Now that Lakṣmaṇa lies slain in the forefront of battle, what use have I for kingship or for life itself? There is now no longer any purpose to this war."[60]

After Rāvaṇa's death, Lakṣmaṇa plays a distinctly secondary, and largely ceremonial, role in the remainder of the Yuddhakāṇḍa. He [59] 6.39.5–7.

[60] 6.89.2–5,7–8. On this theme of Rāma's relative valuation of Lakṣmaṇa and other male associates, on the one hand, and Sītā, on the other, see R. Goldman 1980. The passage is significant in that, as indicated above, it tends to foreground one last time the human frailty and emotional vulnerability of the epic hero on the eve of the fulfillment of his avatāric mission. This is further emphasized in the description of the wounding of Lakṣmaṇa. As Rāma sees Rāvaṇa's deadly spear hurtling toward his brother, he attempts to thwart it by deploying what one assumes is a kind of supernatural power. He actually addresses the javelin:

carries out, of course, a supporting role in Rāma's consecration, but his only other significant independent act is his refusal to accept his own consecration as yuvarāja to rule jointly with Rāma, an honor which, with his usual deference to his elders, he declines and which Rāma then confers upon Bharata.[61] Here, in the Book's closing sarga, Lakṣmaṇa's words, like Sītā's, are not recorded by the poet.

Bharata

The logic of the epic narrative has, of course, driven Bharata to the margins or frame of the central story. After his active role in chastising Kaikeyī, performing the funerary rites for Daśaratha, and seeking out and arguing with Rāma over who is to serve as king, he returns to Nandigrāma, where he establishes Rāma's sandals on the throne and serves as a reluctant regent while patiently waiting for the fourteen years of his beloved brother's exile to pass.[62] All this is described in the second half of the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. Following that Book, the epic action moves away from the capital into the forest groves of Pañcavatī, the wilderness of the Daṇḍakas, the monkey kingdom of Kiṣkindhā, and finally through the regions of the far south to Laṅkā, the island stronghold of the rākṣasas. Thus the backgrounded figure of Bharata does not return to the epic stage, as it were, until the final four chapters of the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Bharata reenters the story in sarga 113 when Rāma, pausing on his return journey in the ashram of the sage Bharadvāja, sends Hanumān on

---

> But even as that javelin was hurtling toward Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma Rāghava addressed it, saying, "May Lakṣmaṇa be spared! And may you, your energy thwarted, be foiled!" (6.88.33)

But Rāma's intervention appears to have no effect, for,

> Nonetheless, that immensely brilliant weapon, flashing like the flickering tongue of a serpent king, fell with tremendous force on Lakṣmaṇa's broad chest.
>
> Then Lakṣmaṇa, his heart pierced by that javelin, so deeply embedded through Rāvaṇa's strength, fell to the ground. (6.88.34–35)

Perhaps we are to understand that, without Rāma's adjuration, the weapon would indeed have killed Lakṣmaṇa, but it is highly unusual in this text for the word of the hero or heroine to be uttered in vain.

[61] 6.116.78–79.
[62] 2.107.12–22.

ahead to convey the news of the victory in Laṅkā and the impending return of the exiles.

Rāma's instructions to the monkey hero are interesting in that they remind us one final time of the deflected political tensions that lie at the heart of the abortive succession struggle that forms the subject of the Ayodhyākāṇḍa. The first hint that Rāma may anticipate some hesitation on his brother's part to relinquish his power as regent appears in the first verse of the chapter where we learn that the hero's reaction to the sight of his home is not one of unmingled joy.

> "But once Rāghava had caught sight of Ayodhyā, he was plunged into thought. Then, after some reflection, he cast his glance upon the monkeys."[63]

The reason for Rāma's hesitation, and, indeed, for sending a messenger ahead of him, soon becomes clear. In keeping with his well-established character as someone who places family harmony above political power, Rāma wants to determine whether, as one might expect in the case of lesser men, Bharata will resent or even resist having to cede sovereignty to his older brother who has now fulfilled the terms of Kaikeyī's boon and has returned at long last to ascend his ancestral throne. These are his instructions to Hanumān:

> "Tell him: 'Having conquered the hosts of his enemies, attained unsurpassed glory, and accomplished his purpose, immensely powerful Rāma has returned with his allies.'
>
> "And whatever facial expression Bharata may adopt upon hearing this, you must report that to me fully.
>
> "Through the color of his face, his glance, and his manner of speaking, you should accurately determine everything about Bharata's state of mind and his intentions.
>
> "For whose head would not be turned by an ancestral kingdom rich in every object of desire and filled with elephants, horses, and chariots?
>
> "And should majestic Bharata, being long accustomed to it, desire the kingship for himself, then let that delight of the Raghus rule the entire earth without exception.

[63] 6.113.1.

> "Once you have determined his state of mind and his intentions, monkey, you must return quickly before we have gone very far."[64]

Surely we have here the poet's final effort to establish the renunciant and selfless character of his hero before the latter at last assumes his rightful role as the god-king.[65]

In order to finally defuse any residual hint of the kind of power struggle that forms the central theme of the Mahābhārata, it seems necessary that the self-denying and ascetic character of Bharata, too, must be fully emphasized. Any lingering doubts one might entertain on this score are dramatically put to rest by the spectacular, even hyperbolic, representation of Bharata's abjection engendered by his brother's absence. The poet describes him as he appears to Hanumān:

> A quarter of a league from Ayodhyā he spied Bharata, who was living in an ashram. Dejected and emaciated, he was clad in garments of barkcloth and black antelope skin. Wearing matted locks, his body was smeared with dirt. Tormented by the catastrophe that had befallen his brother and practicing righteousness, he engaged in asceticism, restrained and subsisting on fruits and roots. He had a mass of matted hair piled high and was clad in barkcloth and animal skins. Self-controlled and with focused mind, he was equal in blazing energy to a brahman-seer. Having placed Rāma's sandals in a position of honor, he ruled the earth, protecting the people of all four social classes from every danger. He was attended by incorruptible ministers, household priests, and attentive army chiefs, all clad in ochre garments.[66]

With the two heroic princes, both in the barkcloth and matted locks of the forest renunciant, once more acting out their respective desires to defer to the other, the audience can have no doubt as to the final quashing of any latent competition.

Bharata's meeting with Hanumān also serves another purpose. Throughout the poem, the poet has not missed one opportunity to recapitulate the events of Rāma's career. Often he uses the introduction of a new character or the reappearance of one who has been removed from the main narrative for some time to have one figure or another rehearse the major events of the epic story up to whatever point in the narrative the author has reached.[67]

[64] 6.113.12–17.
[65] On Vālmīki's characterization of Rāma as a figure who integrates the royal and the brahmanical functions, see Pollock 1986, pp. 64–73.
[66] 6.113.26–30.

The reappearance of Bharata, who has missed all his brothers' trials and adventures in the forest and in Laṅkā, affords the poet one final occasion to present yet another synopsis of the epic story. Thus Hanumān, in response to Bharata's question as to how Rāma had come to be associated with monkeys, takes the opportunity to recapitulate at some length the events of the full fourteen years from Rāma's banishment to his arrival at the hermitage of Bharadvāja.[68]

Bharata then goes forth with his entourage to meet Rāma in a kind of reprise of his elaborately described journey to Citrakūṭa in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa,[69] and an emotional reunion takes place. He then formally returns the reins of power to Rāma and only then can the two brothers, along with Lakṣmaṇa, put off their ascetic garb, bathe, and resume the trappings of royalty.[70] Following this, Bharata assumes the role of the master of ceremonies at Rāma's consecration.

After the consecration, there is an interesting, but barely noticed, episode in which Rāma, now ruling his kingdom in supreme felicity, offers to share governance with Lakṣmaṇa whom he proposes to consecrate as yuvarāja. Lakṣmaṇa declines this honor, without giving a reason, and Rāma then confers the appointment upon Bharata.[71] Neither Bharata nor the author makes any comment on this development. However, at the very end of the poem, when Rāma, in his desolation at having had to banish Lakṣmaṇa, attempts to consecrate Bharata as king, the latter once again refuses to accept sovereignty. He proposes that Rāma divide the kingdom between his sons, Lava and Kuśa, and, once this has been done, he follows his brother into the Sarayū River and thence to heaven.[72]

[67] For a brief discussion of this aspect of the poem, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 18–20.
[68] 6.114.4–45.
[69] 2.74–105.
[70] 6.116.1–17.
[71] 6.116.77–79.
[72] 7.97.2ff.

THE MONKEYS

The number of monkeys that participate in the siege and battle at Laṅkā is, of course, staggering. The poet seems to delight in recording the vast numbers of the simian divisions that form Sugrīva's mighty host.[73] However, as in the case of the rākṣasas, only a few are given "speaking parts," as it were, and, of those, still fewer emerge as figures of consequence.

Hanumān

As elsewhere in the poem and the larger narrative and devotional traditions of which it forms a part, Hanumān, despite his formal status as merely one of Sugrīva's advisers, is unquestionably the most important of the vānaras, who play so prominent a role in the epic story. Although his role in the huge and complex narrative of the Yuddhakāṇḍa is, of necessity, less central than the one which he plays in the Sundarakāṇḍa,[74] it is clear at a number of points in the Book that he is as indispensable to the effort to defeat Rāvaṇa as he was in the search for Sītā.[75]

As a consequence of his heroic feats in the Sundarakāṇḍa, Hanumān is naturally the first vānara to be mentioned in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Indeed, the opening twelve verses of the Book record Rāma's fulsome praise of the great monkey for his having flown across the mighty ocean, penetrated the fortress of Laṅkā, and found the abducted princess.[76] Then, too, as a result of his exploits in Laṅkā, Hanumān is uniquely able to provide Rāma with detailed and vital [73] On the astronomical numbers used in this connection, see the translation and notes to 6.17.16–19,27,30,34,39; 6.19.4,32; and notes.

[74] On the characterization and role of Hanumān in the Sundarakāṇḍa, see Goldman and Goldman 1994 and 1996, pp. 39–56.

[75] The significance of Hanumān to the Rāmāyaṇa, and, indeed, to the entire Hindu tradition, can be judged from the number of times the story of his childhood is repeated in the poem. It is first narrated by Jāmbavān at 4.65.8–25 and is retold at great length by the seer Agastya at 7.35–36. The Yuddhakāṇḍa also finds a place for this well-known tale when, at 6.19.9–17, the rākṣasa spy Śuka pauses, while pointing out the monkey generals to Rāvaṇa, to give a concise version. For a discussion of this narrative in the Rāmāyaṇa, see S. Goldman 1999.

[76] 6.1.1–12.

intelligence as to the layout, troop strength, and defensive fortifications of the rākṣasa capital.[77]

Shortly afterward, when Vibhīṣaṇa, having defected from his brother's side, presents himself as a valuable ally to Rāma, Hanumān, as usual, allows the other monkeys to give their various opinions before concluding the debate with a lengthy, pointed, and carefully reasoned discussion as to why it would be best to accept the rākṣasa at face value. It is his view that Rāma will act upon.[78]

It is also Hanumān who is most often called upon by Rāma to undertake special or delicate missions. Thus, later in the Book, when the war is over and Rāvaṇa has been slain, it is Hanumān who is deputed to go to the palace to bring the good news to Sītā.[79] Similarly, when Rāma has returned to the hermitage of the sage Bharadvāja, he selects Hanumān to carry the potentially disturbing news of his return to Bharata.[80]

Like several of the other monkey champions, Hanumān does his part in the great battle. He is placed in command of the forces stationed at the western gate of the citadel, where he opposes the rākṣasa defensive troops under the command of the most formidable of their warriors, Indrajit.[81] In single combat the great monkey kills such doughty opponents as Akampana[82] and Nikumbha.[83]

Hanumān's extraordinary martial power and, indeed, his superiority to all the other vānaras in this respect can, however, be clearly discerned from the account of his encounters with Rāvaṇa himself during the course of the elaborate set of confrontations detailed in sarga 47 in which the rākṣasa monarch sequentially fights with the monkeys Sugrīva, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Sudaṃṣṭra, Ṛṣabha, Jyotimukha, Nala, and Nila, before engaging with Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and Hanumān. Although Lakṣmaṇa and some of the monkey warriors are able momentarily to discomfit Rāvaṇa, all of them, save Hanumān, are put out of action by the demon. Hanumān, alone, is able to hold his own, and even when stunned by a blow of the rākṣasa's fist,

[77] 6.3.
[78] 6.11.41–59.
[79] 6.101.
[80] 6.113–14.
[81] 6.28.11–12,27.
[82] 6.44.11–29.
[83] 6.64.11–23.

manages to recover quickly.[84] When mighty Lakṣmaṇa himself is finally rendered unconscious by Rāvaṇa's javelin, the mighty demon is unable to carry him, a portion of Lord Viṣṇu, from the field.[85] Hanumān, in turn, rushes in and knocks Rāvaṇa unconscious. He then carries Lakṣmaṇa to safety and bears Rāma into battle on his back.[86]

The Yuddhakāṇḍa also contains, in full or nascent form, the episodes that, in their endlessly repeated literary and plastic representation, have given rise to the three perhaps best-known and most widely recognized iconic images of the great monkey hero.

One widely disseminated and immediately recognizable image is that of Hanumān carrying Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, each seated on one of his broad shoulders. This precise scenario does not actually occur anywhere in Vālmīki's poem. However, in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, Hanumān does carry one or the other of the heroic brothers on a few occasions. As Rāma's forces set out on their march to the sea, the prince announces that he will ride mounted on Hanumān and Lakṣmaṇa will be carried by Aṅgada.[87] Also, as noted above, Hanumān, in another context, carries the stunned Lakṣmaṇa from the battlefield when the latter is wounded by Rāvaṇa.[88]

One episode at the very end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa has provided the germ of yet another popular story and art motif centering on Hanumān. In the Book's closing sarga, in the passage where Rāma distributes rewards to those who have served him in his quest for Sītā and in the battle in Laṅkā, he gives a splendid pearl necklace to Sītā with the evident intention that she give it in turn to the one with whom she is most pleased. She gives it, naturally enough, to Hanumān, and he is described as looking resplendent as he wears it.[89] Nothing further is said about the necklace here, but the episode no doubt forms the kernel of the popular episode, widely depicted in texts, painting, performance, and poster art, in which the monkey begins to crack the pearls with his teeth in an effort to see if Sītā and [84] 6.47.65–70.

[85] 6.47.104–5.
[86] 6.47.108–18; *37–38.
[87] 6.4.15–16.
[88] 6.47.104–5. Cf. 1016* (following note to 6.47.124). Cf. 314* (at note to 6.15.27).
[89] 6.116.68–73.

Rāma are inside. For without this the jewels are meaningless to him. When this seeming ingratitude evokes indignation among the assembly, Hanumān responds by tearing open his own chest to reveal the image of the divine couple in his heart.[90]

Of all the mighty deeds of Hanumān in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and, indeed, in the entire vast corpus of Rāmāyaṇa literature, surely none is more dramatic, better known, or more widely depicted than his extraordinary feat of fetching the mountain of healing herbs from the heights of the Himalayas to the shores of Laṅkā in order to heal and revive the heroes, human and simian, felled in battle by Indrajit or Rāvaṇa. This motif of the fetching of a mountain covered with curative plants obviously exerted a powerful fascination on the author or authors of the Book as it is brought into the narrative no fewer than three times.

The first reference to this motif occurs when the monkey hosts are in despair over the fact that both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have been struck down and immobilized by the potent serpent-weapons of Indrajit. The monkey physician, Suṣeṇa, recalling that Bṛhaspati had used healing herbs along with magical spells to restore the gods, who had been struck down in their battle with the asuras, recommends that a party of monkeys, including Saṃpāti, Panasa, and Hanumān, among others, be dispatched at once to the ocean of milk, where they will find the great healing herbs growing on two mountains called Candra and Droṇa.[91] This mission, oddly enough, is never carried out, however, since, before the monkeys can depart, a sudden gust of wind heralds the arrival of the divine bird Garuḍa and the serpent-arrows flee in terror. Garuḍa's mere touch restores the wounded princes to health and vigor, thus obviating the need for the healing herbs.[92]

The next and principal occurrence of the motif is found toward the middle of the Yuddhakāṇḍa when the formidable Indrajit has once more employed the weapons he had received from Lord Brahmā to strike down Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and no fewer than 670 million monkeys, including most of their great champions. Among the principal monkey heroes, Hanumān alone is uninjured, and he and Vibhīṣaṇa search the gory battlefield by night to seek out and comfort any survivors of the massacre. At length they come upon the gravely wounded and nearly blind Jāmbavān. Vibhīṣaṇa questions him about his condition, but the ṛkṣarāja, cutting straight to the heart of the matter, responds as follows:

[90] For a learned and entertaining discussion of this episode in popular retellings of the Rāmāyaṇa story, see Lutgendorf 2007, pp. 218–20.
[91] 6.40.26–32.
[92] 6.40.33–40. This abortive episode is confused and confusing. It seems to be a kind of pastiche of elements from various epic-purāṇic myths that may have been inserted here at some point in emulation of the later versions of the story of the fetching of the mountain of herbs. See the notes to this passage for further discussion.

> "O rākṣasa, son of chaos, does the foremost of the monkeys Hanumān, in whom Añjanā and Vāyu Mātariśvan have an excellent son, still live?"
>
> When Vibhīṣaṇa heard these words of Jāmbavān, he said this: "Why do you ignore the king's sons Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and ask only about Māruti?
>
> "Noble sir, you have not shown the same extraordinary concern for King Sugrīva, Aṅgada, or even Rāghava himself, as you have for the son of Vāyu."
>
> Upon hearing the words of Vibhīṣaṇa, Jāmbavān spoke these words: "Now hear, tiger among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, why I inquired only about Māruti.
>
> "So long as Hanumān is alive, then our army will survive, even if it should be massacred. But if that hero has lost his life, then, even though we survive, we are as good as dead.
>
> "For, dear boy, if Māruti, the equal of Māruta and the rival in power of Agni Vaiśvānara still lives, only then do we have any hope of survival."[93]

This is surely the epic's most direct statement of the significance of Hanumān to the success of the mission of the Rāmāvatāra. Its specific reference soon becomes clear, however, as Jāmbavān tells Hanumān that he must fly to the Himalayas to find and fetch the great healing herbs that grow there on a certain mountain. In a kind of reprise of the monkey hero's epic leaps across the ocean in the Sundarakāṇḍa,

[93] 6.61.18–23.

the poet then gives a lengthy account of his flight, replete with a description of the crushing of the mountain from which he leaps and the many geographic and sacred landscapes over which he flies. Reaching the mountain, Hanumān is unable to find the herbs, which have rendered themselves invisible. In his impatience, he rips off the entire mountain peak and flies back with it to Laṅkā, where the aroma of its healing herbs restores the wounded and slain warriors to health and life.[94]

The fondness the poet and his audiences had for this particular episode is betrayed not only by the long and detailed treatment it is given in the poem but by the fact that it is brought back yet a third time as if "by popular demand" twenty-eight sargas farther on. When Lakṣmaṇa is again gravely wounded, this time by Rāvaṇa's javelin, Suṣeṇa instructs Hanumān to return once more to the mountain he had earlier visited on the orders of Jāmbavān to gather the potent medicinal herbs. Hanumān does so, and this time, although the herbs do not conceal themselves, he is, nonetheless, unable to identify them and so is compelled to bring back the entire peak once again. Suṣeṇa can then pluck the appropriate herb, hold it to Lakṣmaṇa's nose, and thus heal him.

Sugrīva

Sugrīva, who, as king of the monkeys and at least the nominal leader of the forces marshaled to assist Rāma in his campaign to defeat Rāvaṇa and recover Sītā, plays so significant a role in the events leading up to the discovery of Sītā and the war at Laṅkā, seems to recede somewhat into the background in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. This in no way, however, means that he is reduced to a mere "extra" or a figurehead serving as leader in name only.

In the opening sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, when Rāma praises and congratulates Hanumān on his superhuman feats in crossing the ocean, finding Sītā, and wreaking havoc among the rākṣasa forces, he is careful to state several times that the great monkey hero has accomplished these wonders in the service of Sugrīva.[95] Then, too, the monkey king is given pride of place in being recognized as the first monkey, indeed, the first character, to address Rāma in the Book, when its entire second chapter is dedicated to his elaborate speech of reassurance and exhortation to the despondent prince who, confronted by the seemingly impassable ocean, has once more given way to despair.[96]

[94] 6.61.26–68.
[95] 6.1.6–9.

Sugrīva is also moderately active in combat. He personally dispatches many powerful rākṣasas, including the formidable Virūpākṣa and Mahodara,[97] and Rāma places him, along with Jāmbavān and Vibhīṣaṇa, in command of the central encampment of the vānara forces.[98] Nonetheless, he is, despite his confident exhortation of Rāma, himself prone to despair, requiring the comforting words of Vibhīṣaṇa to keep him from utter panic and despondency.[99] Certainly it is worth noting that, despite his divine ancestry, godlike power, and prominent position, he is unable to withstand the sorcery and magical weaponry of Indrajit, a capacity that only Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa seem to possess.[100]

In the so-called vulgate text of the southern commentators, Sugrīva makes an unauthorized solo attack on Rāvaṇa, knocking off the king's crown and fighting him to the point of exhaustion. This rash deed earns him only a rebuke from Rāma.[101]

Aṅgada

Aṅgada, the son of the incomparably powerful Vālin and the monkey chosen by Rāma to serve as yuvarāja, or heir apparent, under Sugrīva, is given special mention a number of times in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. He is assigned command of the vānara attack force posted at the southern gate of Laṅkā.[102] He rallies the monkeys when they are on the point of fleeing in terror at the sight of Kumbhakarṇa.[103]

[96] 6.1.11–16; 6.2.1–21.
[97] 6.84,85.
[98] 6.28.31.
[99] 6.36.24–37.
[100] 6.60.37–40; 6.61.1–11.
[101] See notes to 6.30.26 and 6.31.1.
[102] 6.28.26.
[103] 6.54.3–7.

He, too, kills his share of noteworthy rākṣasa champions, such as Narāntaka[104] and Mahāpārśva,[105] and manages to kill Indrajit's horses and charioteer.[106]

Aṅgada also is given, or takes upon himself, one special mission of note. He is chosen by Rāma to enter Laṅkā in the role of a messenger and to present himself before Rāvaṇa to demand that he return Sītā or suffer defeat and destruction. Rāvaṇa is, predictably, enraged and orders that the monkey be captured and killed. Aṅgada, however, leaps to the pinnacle of the palace and, with his would-be captors clinging to him like insects until they fall, crushes the structure under his great weight before leaping back to his own lines.[107] The episode is strongly reminiscent of the more elaborate passage in the Sundarakāṇḍa where Hanumān allows himself to be captured and dragged before Rāvaṇa, scolds and warns the demon king, and then sets fire to Laṅkā with his flaming tail.[108]

Nala and Suṣeṇa

Among the numerous other monkeys mentioned as having played some role in the siege and war at Laṅkā, two deserve individual mention because of the special skills that set them apart from their warrior companions. The first of these is Nala, the son of the divine architect and builder, Viśvakarman. Having inherited his father's skills, he serves in the indispensable role of chief engineer of the monkey forces. Thus it is he who designs and supervises the construction of the great bridge that enables Rāma and his troops to cross the otherwise impassable sea.[109]

Suṣeṇa, as noted above, is particularly skilled as an herbalist and physician, and is the father-in-law of Sugrīva.[110] His skills are, like those of Nala, essential to the success of Rāma's mission, for it is he [104] 6.57.77–88.

[105] 6.86.5–27.
[106] 6.34.27.
[107] 6.31.48–78.
[108] 5.46–52.
[109] 6.15.8–26.
[110] 6.40.23.

who is able to identify and utilize the healing herbs that restore the dead and wounded men and monkeys to life and health.[111]

THE RĀKṢASAS

Rāvaṇa

As in the preceding Book, the great lord of the rākṣasas remains a fascinating and commanding presence here in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Whereas in the Sundarakāṇḍa Rāvaṇa is viewed either directly through the eyes of Hanumān as a magnificent creature of almost godlike power[112] or indirectly through those of Sītā as a besotted, lecherous suitor,[113] in the Yuddhakāṇḍa an even more nuanced portrait emerges. He is still, of course, the domineering tyrant and formidable warrior of the earlier Books, but here, under the pressure of the siege and the continual flow of ominous news from the battlefield, cracks in his facade of arrogance and invincibility begin to appear. Sensing, it seems, that, despite his mighty army, his seemingly impregnable fortress, and his own invincibility derived from his well-known boon, the threat to his reign and his life is real, he is shown as querulous, paranoid, depressive, and self-pitying, even admitting at one point the foolishness of having carried off Sītā. Nonetheless, despite the evil portents that attend his and his champions' sorties, the successive deaths of his most powerful and cherished kinsmen and allies, and the fact that he is bested by Rāma early on in the conflict, he persists in his pride and vainglory, [111] Suṣeṇa's medical skills are mentioned twice in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, although they are actually put into practice only once. At 6.89.9–25, he sends Hanumān on his second mission to fetch the healing herbs from the Himalayas and uses them to cure the mortally wounded Lakṣmaṇa. At 6.40.26–32, he describes the history and uses of the herbs and prepares to send a party of monkeys to the ocean of milk to collect them. However, as noted above, this mission is aborted and rendered otiose by the unexpected arrival of Garuḍa. In 6.61, Hanumān fetches the mountain of healing herbs on Jāmbavān's instructions, and the aroma of the plants revives and restores the dead and wounded men and monkeys with no further intervention on Suṣeṇa's part. Note, too, that at the end of the kāṇḍa, rather than depend on Suṣeṇa's intervention to resurrect the monkeys slain in battle, Rāma solicits a boon from Indra, who revives them through his divine power (6.108.5–11).

[112] Cf. 5.8.5–9 and 5.47.2–20.

[113] 5.16.5–28; 5.18,20. See S. Goldman 2001.

stubbornly refusing to surrender his captive and beg forgiveness for his crimes. His arrogance thus drives him inexorably onward to his own impending doom. In this, he seems to be cast by the poet as more nearly a tragic figure than any other in the vast epic and narrative literature with the possible exception of the Mahābhārata's Karṇa.

Evidence of Rāvaṇa's progressive mental and emotional disintegration abounds in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. At first the rākṣasa appears to take a rational approach to his predicament. After surveying the damage wrought in his capital by Hanumān,[114] and even before Rāma and his forces have managed to cross the sea to besiege Laṅkā, the king consults sensibly with his advisers as to how he should proceed.[115]

His generals and courtiers—flatterers, braggarts, and sycophants for the most part—reassure him that he is invincible and boast that they will easily dispatch the upstart Rāma and his band of mere monkeys.[116] Theirs is the advice, of course, that Rāvaṇa, in his vanity and folly, will follow. His weak grasp of reality and his emotional instability are immediately signaled, however, by his exchange with his righteous brother, Vibhīṣaṇa, who scoffs at the generals' advice and counsels Rāvaṇa to return Sītā both because it is the right thing to do and as an act of self-preservation.[117]

Rāvaṇa's reaction to his brother's sound advice is telling. He takes Vibhīṣaṇa's well-intentioned words as a personal attack and launches into a diatribe against kinsmen whom he sees as envious and eager for the downfall of their successful relatives.[118] His abusive words toward his brother drive the latter into his enemies' camp and only hasten and assure his own destruction.

Rāvaṇa's inability to benefit from sound counsel is demonstrated time and again in the Book. When his two hapless spies Śuka and Sāraṇa return and describe to their master the overwhelming strength of the forces opposing him after having been unmasked in their failed attempt to infiltrate the monkey army, their report definitely shakes his confidence. But at the same time, it sends him

[114] See 5.52, where the destruction of Laṅkā is described.
[115] 6.6.
[116] 6.7–8.
[117] 6.9.
[118] 6.10.1–11.

into one of his periodic rages. He reviles and dismisses them after threatening them with death for what he takes as praise of his enemies.[119]

The demon king is given yet another opportunity to reflect on the error of his ways when the venerable rākṣasa Mālyavān, his great-uncle, urges him to make peace and reminds him of the terrible portents that have arisen presaging the destruction of the rākṣasa race. He even openly states the rākṣasas' dread that Rāma is, in fact, none other than Viṣṇu.[120] But here again, Rāvaṇa remains obdurate and boastful. Flying into a rage, he reviles Mālyavān who withdraws.[121]

After the death of many of his most valorous champions, Rāvaṇa, in increasing desperation, has his troops arouse the fearsome sleeping giant, his gargantuan brother Kumbhakarṇa. The latter, after hearing of his plight first laughs at him and then, in terms similar to those used by Vibhīṣaṇa and Mālyavān, lectures him at length on the folly of his ways.[122] Rāvaṇa's response to Kumbhakarṇa's scolding is significant in that here, for the first time, the demon king acknowledges his folly and deficient policy. Although he is predictably angry with his insubordinate younger brother and rebukes him for lecturing him like some venerable elder, he continues in the following striking fashion:

> "It is useless now to keep on repeating what I failed to do then, whether from error, mental confusion, or reliance on my strength and valor.
>
> "If you truly love me, if you truly understand what it means to be a brother, or if you believe in your heart that this mission is of the utmost urgency, then you must immediately do what suits the present situation. Please remedy through your valor this catastrophic result of my unsound policy.
>
> "A true friend is one who stands by a poor wretch who has lost everything. A true kinsman is one who renders assistance to those who have gone astray."[123]

[119] 6.20.1–13.
[120] 6.26.5–33.
[121] 6.27.1–15.
[122] 6.51.1–20.
[123] 6.51.23–26.

Rāvaṇa's self-pitying tone and confession of helplessness achieve his purpose, and Kumbhakarṇa agrees to fight, adopting the same tone of braggadocio as the other rākṣasa warriors before their destruction.[124]

Aside from his alternating outbursts of fury and fits of despair, Rāvaṇa is also prone to bouts of grief over the deaths of his kinsmen who give their lives fighting in his doomed cause. Although his reaction to the deaths of many of his generals is rage,[125] this anger is often mingled with grief.[126] However, when the casualties involve those closest to him, the outpourings of sorrow are profound and moving. Thus he loses consciousness upon hearing of the death of Kumbhakarṇa, lamenting loud and long over his brother and reflecting on his foolishness in failing to heed Vibhīṣaṇa's advice.[127]

In one of the most dramatic scenes in the poem, Rāvaṇa learns of the death of his beloved son and heir, the all-but-invincible Indrajit, at the hands of Lakṣmaṇa. His wild grief and lamentation soon turn to a terrifying access of mad rage. In his desolation and frustration, he turns his fury upon poor Sītā and, in spite of the rākṣasas, who try to hold him back, rushes toward her with an upraised sword intending to kill her on the spot. At the last moment he is dissuaded from this ultimate depravity by the rākṣasa Supārśva.[128]

Finally, it should be noted that, in his pride and obdurate refusal to give up Sītā, Rāvaṇa ignores not only the sage advice of his wisest counselors and the slaughter, one by one, of his foremost warriors but also the clear evidence of his own inferiority to Rāma on the field of battle. When, in his fury at the death of Prahasta, Rāvaṇa enters the battlefield himself for the first time, his valor and martial skill are such that he wreaks havoc among the monkey troops and puts out of action such doughty warriors as Sugrīva, Nīla, and even Hanumān and Lakṣmaṇa.[129] Nonetheless, when he finally encounters Rāma

[124] 6.51.29–47.
[125] Cf., for example, his response to the news of Akampana's death at 6.45.1.
[126] As at the death of Prahasta at 6.47.3.
[127] 6.56.1–19.
[128] 6.80. It is telling that, in his final despair, Rāvaṇa should turn his frustration and rage against his victim, his passion for whom is the cause of all his woes. It is also somewhat ironic that he should intend to kill Sītā in an effort to make real her illusory slaying at Indrajit's hands at 6.68.4–30. For in consoling Rāma after this apparent murder, Vibhīṣaṇa assures him that the murder of his beloved Sītā is the one act that Rāvaṇa would never countenance (6.71.9–12).
[129] 6.47.34–107.

for the first time, it becomes clear that he has met his match. Without being so much as touched by Rāvaṇa's weapons, Rāma easily pierces his foe through the chest with an arrow and, with a second, knocks the demon king's crown from his head. He then magnanimously spares and dismisses Rāvaṇa on the grounds of the latter's exhaustion, leaving the humiliated rākṣasa to slink back to his citadel.[130]

Despite this humiliating setback, Rāvaṇa remains a formidable presence both on and off the battlefield. And, although he seems to have been so easily and rapidly bested and then dismissed by Rāma in this episode, their final battle rages furiously for several days[131] and occupies a full eight sargas (90–97) of the Book. It has thus come to be regarded in the epic and literary imagination as the unrivaled and finally incomparable standard for a heroic duel.

The outcome of the battle is, of course, predetermined, as the representative of virtue, restraint, order, and, in a word, dharma must triumph over and eliminate the incarnation of everything that is antithetical to the norms of brahmanical civilization. Nonetheless, in death, the monstrous rākṣasa monarch and "thorn in the side of the world (lokakaṇṭaka)," is given the full honors appropriate to a noble adversary and a member of brahmanical society.

Although Rāvaṇa is sometimes represented as having abducted his womenfolk by force from their homes,[132] his death is greeted with an outpouring of grief and lamentation on the part of his wives and consorts[133] as well as by his chief queen, Mandodarī.[134]

The ambivalent attitude toward Rāvaṇa, as both ruthless tyrant and reckless criminal, on the one hand, and noble warrior and exalted monarch, on the other, is, perhaps, nowhere more clearly illustrated than in the debate between Rāma and Vibhīṣaṇa over the propriety of giving the fallen king a proper vedic funeral. At the conclusion of Mandodarī's lamentation, Rāma instructs Vibhīṣaṇa to perform his brother's funeral rites in accordance with custom and [130] 6.47.127,135; 6.48.1–7.

[131] See note to 6.96.30 for a discussion of varying understandings of the length of the battle.
[132] The poem as a whole has no consistent stance on whether the women of Rāvaṇa's harem have been abducted or have come of their own free will out of their love for him. For a discussion of this issue, see notes to 5.7.65 and 66.
[133] 6.98.
[134] 6.99.1–29.

propriety. The latter at first declines to do so, citing Rāvaṇa's cruel nature, his unrighteousness, and his crimes of abducting the wives of others.[135] Rāma, however, gently rebukes Vibhīṣaṇa for his attitude, noting Rāvaṇa's valor, power, and conquest even of the gods as virtues to be set against his evil nature. He notes enigmatically that Rāvaṇa stood in the same (fraternal) relation to him (Rāma) as he (Rāvaṇa) did to his brother (Vibhīṣaṇa)[136] and that, in any case, all hostilities end with death. Vibhīṣaṇa accordingly, if grudgingly, then performs the funeral ceremony.[137]

In retrospect, a careful reading of the text of the Yuddhakāṇḍa reveals a Rāvaṇa who, if unquestionably one of world literature's grand villains, is by no means the mono-dimensional bogeyman that later and more popular versions of the epic story depict. In his towering stature, megalomania, pride, and power, vitiated only by his mad and self-destructive passion for the one thing in the universe he cannot possess, he comes as close as any figure in the epic to an approximation of a classic tragic hero.

Kumbhakarṇa

If the Yuddhakāṇḍa contains any sustained elements associated with the adbhuta and hāsya rasas, the aesthetic moods of sheer wonder and humor, then they are no doubt to be found in the remarkable nine-sarga minisaga of the awakening, the exploits, and the fall of Rāvaṇa's gargantuan younger brother, the voracious but somnolent giant Kumbhakarṇa.[138]

The elaborate account of the strenuous efforts of the rākṣasas to awaken the sleeping giant—shouting, beating drums, pounding him with all sorts of weapons and driving horses, camels, donkeys, and even elephants over his sleeping form[139]—and the fantastic account of his breakfast—vast mountains of deer, buffalo, and boar washed down with draughts of blood and a thousand jars of strong drink[140]—has an effect that is both astonishing and comical in a way

[135] 6.99.31,35.
[136] On this point, see note to 6.99.39.
[137] 6.99.3–42.
[138] 6.48–56.
[139] 6.48.20–47.
[140] 6.48.24–26,81–82.

reminiscent of the orgy of gorging and drunkenness in which the southern search party of monkeys indulges when it ravages Sugrīva's madhuvana in the Sundarakāṇḍa.[141]

If Rāvaṇa, in all his spectacular excess,[142] represents vedic civilization's vision of the radical "other" contrasted with the ideal of restraint, self-control, and deference represented by Rāma, then Kumbhakarṇa, in his vast corporeality, voracity, and violence, takes the characterization of the rākṣasa to still more hyperbolic heights. This is a figure so monstrous that his very snoring literally blows mighty warriors out of his cave.[143] His footsteps cause the earth itself to tremble as he strides along, towering above the battlements of Laṅkā.[144] As he marches forth to war, he expands his already colossal frame to the truly ridiculous dimensions of some thirty-six hundred feet in height and six hundred feet in breadth.[145] The very sight of this grotesque figure is enough to sow terror among the monkey troops, who can be kept from breaking ranks and fleeing only by virtue of Vibhīṣaṇa's spreading the false report that he is only some large mechanical man or animated scarecrow.[146] Kumbhakarṇa wreaks enormous destruction among the monkeys until he is finally slain by Rāma. But even in death the hyperbole continues as, for example, in the poet's description of the fall of the rākṣasa's severed head and body.[147]

Kumbhakarṇa's excesses of stature, appetite, and violence are matched only by the extent and profundity of his sleep, the feature for which he is perhaps best known in the popular imagination. The epic gives four accounts of the circumstances that lead to his near-permanent state of somnolence. The two in the Yuddhakāṇḍa ascribe it to a curse pronounced by Brahmā to prevent the demon from literally devouring the world,[148] while the two in the Uttarakāṇḍa attribute it to a boon the demon had received as a result of his [141] 5.59–60.

[142] See R. Goldman 2000 and S. Goldman 2004b and 2006b.
[143] 6.48.18–19.
[144] 6.48.84–87.
[145] 6.53.33–34.
[146] 6.49.31; 6.54.4–5.
[147] See pp. 24–25 and 92–94, and 6.55.124–25.
[148] 6.48.9–12; 6.49.23–27.

austerities but which, through a stratagem of the gods, he is tricked out of using to his advantage.[149]

Yet despite the utterly unrestrained hyperbole with which the poet renders the brutishness of this figure, Kumbhakarṇa, too, like his brother Rāvaṇa, is not quite monolithic in his characterization. For although he appears to be the very personification of sensual excess and mindless violence, he is, interestingly, also portrayed as deeply grounded in dharmaśāstra and nītiśāstra since, as noted above, he has the good moral sense, learning, and courage to lecture Rāvaṇa at length on the evil and error of his ways.[150]

Indrajit

Although he is not given the elaborate speeches and hence the richer characterization afforded to some of the other prominent rākṣasas, Rāvaṇa's most formidable son, Meghanāda[151] Rāvaṇi—best known in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, perhaps, by his epithet Indrajit, earned in battle with the king of the gods—is, in some ways, the most fearsome of Rāma's demonic foes.

He has already made an impressive appearance in the Sundarakāṇḍa, where he is the only one of the rākṣasa warriors able to withstand mighty Hanumān in battle and indeed to take him captive.[152] In the Yuddhakāṇḍa, too, it is clear that Indrajit is by far the most dangerous and formidable of all the rākṣasas, wreaking injury, death, and destruction upon many of the principal champions in the besieging army, including Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa themselves.

Indrajit first appears in the Book during the initial battle between the opposing armies when he engages Aṅgada in single combat. The encounter does not seem at first to be particularly unusual as, in keeping with the almost formulaic sequence of such combats, the monkey warrior succeeds in destroying the horses and chariot of his rākṣasa foe.[153] The situation soon proves to be anything but normal

[149] 7.10.31–41; 7.13.1–7.
[150] See pp. 34–36 above and 6.51.1–20.
[151] The name Meghanāda is not known to the Yuddhakāṇḍa; it apparently is first used in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.25.4). See note to 6.35.22.
[152] 5.46.1–40. It should be noted that Hanumān allows himself to be taken prisoner in deference to the weapons of Lord Brahmā that Indrajit is able to deploy.
[153] 6.33.6,18–19; 6.34.

as Indrajit, his vehicle destroyed, has recourse to his unique command of the power of magical illusion, or māyā, to render himself invisible. Shooting now under the protection of his invisibility, he is able with impunity to riddle both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with his dreadful and disabling serpent-arrows.[154]

Thus we see at the very outset of the war that Indrajit possesses the power to do what not even his monstrous uncle Kumbhakarṇa nor his seemingly invincible father can accomplish, the near-mortal wounding of both epic heroes. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are immobilized and pierced to the quick and, to all appearances, near death.[155] The heroes are rendered hors de combat for five sargas until they are at last liberated by the unheralded appearance of Garuḍa.[156]

But this is not the only time that Indrajit is able to defeat Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in battle. Some twenty chapters farther on he is sent forth once more by his father and, again cloaking himself through his unique power of invisibility, he lays low virtually the entire monkey host as well as the two Rāghavas.[157] Indrajit emerges for battle yet again after the fall of the rākṣasa warrior Makarākṣa and once more creates a cloak of invisibility from which he can safely rain hails of deadly arrows down upon Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and their allies. For some reason, however, this time he is unable to wound the heroes and, when he perceives that Rāma intends to shoot him down, he withdraws momentarily from the battlefield.[158]

Returning to the front lines almost immediately, Indrajit, perhaps feeling that his skill at arms has failed to achieve his purpose, tries his hand at a sinister form of psychological warfare. Employing his unparalleled command of the power of illusion, he conjures up a simulacrum of Sītā, which he proceeds to hack to death right before the eyes of Hanumān and his forces.[159] This bold and horrendous deception very nearly succeeds in completely demoralizing his father's foes. For, after a brief skirmish, Hanumān pulls his troops out [154] 6.34.28–30.

[155] 6.36.4–7. Indeed, Indrajit believes that he has, in fact, slain the heroic brothers and reports this to Rāvaṇa, who praises him for this feat (6.36.39–43).
[156] 6.40.33–42.
[157] 6.60.3–49.
[158] 6.67; 6.68.1.
[159] 6.68.5–30.

of action, arguing that with the apparent death of Sītā, whom they were fighting to recover, there is no longer any point to the war.[160] The news of Indrajit's apparent murder of Sītā also has a devastating effect on Rāma himself. Upon hearing Hanumān's report, Rāma faints from grief and, even after his return to consciousness, remains so stunned that he cannot return to battle for some time or even fully comprehend what is being said to him.[161] At this point Vibhīṣaṇa once more intervenes and instructs Rāma that he must send Lakṣmaṇa forth to confront and destroy Indrajit before the latter can complete the sacrifice in which he is engaged and which, we now come to fully understand, is the source of his devastating power of invisibility.[162]

For at last we are given to know the two reasons for Indrajit's power and invincibility, a deadly combination of asceticism and sacrifice, the two most empowering practices of the epic tradition. Through his austerities, Indrajit has received, as a boon from Brahmā, the knowledge and mastery over the powerful brāhma weapons, and through his repeated performances of a kind of black-magical version of the vedic yajña, he has mastered the power of making himself invisible.[163] These two assets, coupled with his native mastery of the power of illusion, a power seemingly common to many prominent rākṣasas, make him all but invincible in battle.

It is clear that, given his lethal combination of these supernatural powers, Indrajit himself is the most critical figure in the ranks of the rākṣasas defending Laṅkā, just as it emerged that Hanumān is the key figure among those besieging the city.[164] Moreover, although his powers of illusion and his mastery of the weapons of Brahmā are always with him, it appears that the magical power of invisibility, his most fearsome attribute, is acquired through, and must be constantly refreshed by, repeated performances of a peculiar sacrifice in the grove of the dark goddess Nikumbhilā.[165] This fact is heavily stressed by the poet, as we see Indrajit perform the rite fully twice in the Book—becoming invisible as the oblation is completed—and [160] 6.69.19–22.

[161] 6.70.10–6.72.3.
[162] 6.72.10–18.
[163] 6.72.12–17.
[164] 6.61.18–23.
[165] See S. Goldman 2006b.

undertake it yet a third time only to be interrupted by Lakṣmaṇa and his detachment of monkeys.[166]

Thus, in fulfilling a prophecy that Indrajit would fall to an enemy only at such time as he would be unable to complete one of his magical rites in the Nikumbhilā grove, Lakṣmaṇa eliminates, in a single stroke, the most dangerous of the rākṣasa warriors and the last major champion to stand between Rāvaṇa and his doom. The significance of this battle as well as the enormous difficulty of subduing so formidable a foe as Indrajit, even without his power of invisibility, is signaled by the poet in drawing out the account of the encounter for seven full sargas.[167] Unlike many of his elders, Indrajit is a figure almost exclusively of action. Thus his speeches are largely confined to vows of victory and battlefield taunts and boasts rather than the sometimes lengthy lectures on dharma, nīti, and strategy in which his uncles and their peers indulge. Therefore his character is more monolithic and less complex than that of many of the other rākṣasas who play prominent roles in the epic drama. Nonetheless, because of his unparalleled martial skills, he is a figure who has captured the popular imagination every bit as much as characters such as Kumbhakarṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa.[168]

Vibhīṣaṇa

Another of Rāvaṇa's younger brothers, Vibhīṣaṇa, plays an essential role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. This role, however, is radically different from that played by any other principal rākṣasa of Rāvaṇa's court. For whereas his other kinsmen and counselors encourage him in his evil ways and haughty disdain of Rāma's power, as most do, or, like Mālyavān and even Kumbhakarṇa, attempt to preach to him on righteousness and proper statecraft or warn him of his folly and his peril, all the while remaining loyal to their elder and master and laying down their lives in battle for his sake, Vibhīṣaṇa alone does not. Adhering firmly to the dictates of dharma and unable to abide the abuse his brother reserves for those who attempt to [166] 6.60.18–28; 6.67.4–15; 6.69.23–26; 6.73.13.

[167] 6.72–78.
[168] Most notably in a revisionist nineteenth-century literary reworking of the Rāmāyaṇa, the Bengali poet Michael Madhusudan Datta makes him the tragic hero of his long narrative poem, the Meghnādbadhakābya. See Seely 2004.

counsel him for his own good, Vibhīṣaṇa defects early on in the Book to the side of his brother's mortal enemies. There, as one gifted with intimate knowledge of Rāvaṇa's allies and military arrangements as well as the defenses of Laṅkā and as a powerful warrior in his own right, he contributes as much as, if not more than, anyone to the triumph of Rāma and the downfall and death of his brother.

Although Vibhīṣaṇa holds a secure and revered place in the minds of Vaiṣṇavas as one of the most exemplary of Rāmabhaktas, appearing in all kinds of courtly and popular plastic representations of Paṭṭābhiṣekarāma, his characterization in the poem is somewhat more complex than is often recognized.

No doubt Vibhīṣaṇa fits the mold of one of the most striking and theologically significant character types in the Vaiṣṇava literature, that of the virtuous, or dharmic, demon. This role is perhaps best and most famously exemplified by the asura prince Prahlāda of the epic-purāṇic myth of the Narasiṃhāvatāra, the pious demon who rejects the evil ways of his race to devote himself to the worship of the Lord.[169] But Vibhīṣaṇa is surely a close second in illustrating the possibility of salvation through devotion for even the most lowly or sinful by nature. His defection, moreover, provides an ideal opportunity for Rāma to expound eloquently his doctrine of compassion for all refugees, whether virtuous or sinful, and thus to declare that he would accept and shelter even Rāvaṇa himself should he come to him seeking refuge.[170] This speech is perhaps the earliest statement of the role of the Rāmāvatāra as above all śaraṇya, or the refuge of all beings, a doctrine that, held in common with other bhakti traditions, will become particularly central to the viśiṣṭādvaita, or Śrīvaiṣṇava school associated with Rāmānuja.[171]

Vibhīṣaṇa's role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa is, in fact, extremely significant. For at several critical junctures he assists, advises, or rallies the forces of his new friends when they are at an impasse or on the point of despair. It is he who explains to Rāma and his allies that the god of the ocean, Samudra, must be propitiated if he is to permit the army to cross his vast expanse.[172] Vibhīṣaṇa is the only one who is able to

[169] Pollock 1991, pp. 37–38, especially note 71.
[170] 6.12.9–21.
[171] See notes to 5.7.68 and 5.16.5; and Mumme 1991.
[172] 6.13.13–15.

see through the illusions of Indrajit,[173] and he is able to reassure the despairing monkeys that, although Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are bound by Indrajit's serpent-arrows, they are not, in fact, dead and will recover.[174] It is he who easily sees through the simian disguises of Rāvaṇa's spies, Śuka and Sāraṇa,[175] and captures them and their replacements.[176] Again, when the heroic brothers are struck down a second time by Indrajit, Vibhīṣaṇa alone understands that they have submitted to the power of his weapons out of their deference to Lord Brahmā.[177] He is the one who narrates the history of Kumbhakarṇa to Rāma when the giant first looms above the ramparts of Laṅkā and who, in order to calm and rally the terrified monkeys, devises the strategic falsehood that the monstrous rākṣasa is merely some large mechanical device.[178]

When Indrajit has managed to put Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and virtually all the monkey heroes out of action, only Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān have the power to resist the demon's sorcery and powerful weapons and are thus able to save the day by locating the wounded Jāmbavān on the gory battlefield.[179] Perhaps most critical of all, it is Vibhīṣaṇa alone who is able to end the despair of the monkeys and of Rāma himself by explaining that Indrajit's apparent murder of Sītā is a mere illusion, and by advising Lakṣmaṇa of the need to engage and kill the otherwise invincible rākṣasa warrior before he has time to complete yet another of his dark yajñas.[180] In these ways, when the situation is, or appears to be, hopeless, he saves the day time and again.

Finally, it is Vibhīṣaṇa to whom Rāma entrusts the very sensitive mission of bringing Sītā to him publicly for their wrought reunion, and it is he who lends Rāma the flying palace Puṣpaka to enable him to return to Ayodhyā by the end of his fourteen-year exile, thus saving Bharata from having to fulfill his vow and end his life.[181]

[173] 6.36.9–10.
[174] 6.36.26–38.
[175] 6.16.13.
[176] 6.20.22.
[177] 6.49.8–27; 6.49.31; 6.61.2–5.
[178] 6.49.8–27; 6.49.31.
[179] 6.61.5–20.
[180] 6.71.
[181] 6.102.6–33; 6.109.8–27.

Through both his actions and words, then, Vibhīṣaṇa emerges as one of the most important figures in the Book if not the entire epic.

He is also held up as the paragon of virtue and devotion to Rāma, thus acquiring a reputation he no doubt deserves. Nonetheless, one should note here that there is a certain degree of complexity, even ambiguity, in Vālmīki's portrayal of this important and intriguing figure. In the first place, even though Vibhīṣaṇa's actions are uniformly dharmic and therefore fully in keeping with the boon of perpetual righteousness he received from Brahmā,[182] it cannot be said that they are devoid of self-interest. For in exchange for his defection and aid, Rāma immediately confers the kingship of Laṅkā upon his new ally, thus making him the de jure ruler of the rākṣasas even before the war with Rāvaṇa has begun.[183] The more serious and controversial aspect of the characterization of Vibhīṣaṇa is, of course, his treacherous betrayal of his elder brother, his kinsmen, and his race. This is especially striking in the context of an epic that is one of the principal instruments in upholding its culture's absolute imperative of deference to one's elders.[184] The critique of Vibhīṣaṇa as a traitor to his family and his race is eloquently made by Indrajit,[185] and, although his uncle has the final word, defending himself on the grounds of Rāvaṇa's incorrigibly evil nature and his own commitment to dharma, something of a cloud continues to hover over Vibhīṣaṇa as witnessed by such popular proverbs on the subject of treachery as that found in Bengali, and quoted when someone wishes to denigrate someone as disloyal or a traitor to one's own, "ghore śotru bibhīṣon (a traitor in one's own house, a Vibhīṣaṇa)."

[182] 7.10.26–30.

[183] 6.13.7–9. This "field promotion" of the exiled rākṣasa is apparently somewhat provisional as Rāma ordains a formal and elaborate consecration ceremony once the war is concluded and Rāvaṇa is dead (6.100). In installing Vibhīṣaṇa on the throne in place of his deposed and slain brother, Rāma appears to be following an oft-repeated motif of both epics, that of the displaced elder. On this, see R. Goldman 1978.

[184] Rāma is, of course, the greatest exemplar of filial deference, unquestioningly obeying his father's unjust order of banishment and disinheritance at enormous personal cost. On this, see R. Goldman 1985 and Pollock 1986, pp. 54–73. Similarly Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma's other brothers unquestioningly obey him even when they find his orders disturbing. On this, see 6.104.20–22, where Lakṣmaṇa reluctantly builds a pyre for Sītā, or 7.44–46, where the brothers silently hear Rāma's command that Sītā be banished and Lakṣmaṇa unwillingly carries out the order.

[185] 6.74.11–16.

Mālyavān, Vidyujjihva, Śuka, Sāraṇa, and Śārdūla

As in the case of the vānaras, there are a number of rākṣasas who, although much less prominent than the principals discussed above, nonetheless stand in importance somewhere between them and the various demon champions whose stereotypical duels and deaths punctuate the narrative, not to mention the various "walk-ons" and innumerable "extras" who serve at Rāvaṇa's court and in his vast army. These figures are of note either because of their unusual or courageous speeches or because of some specialized function they serve.

One of those who falls into the former category is Rāvaṇa's great-uncle, the wise and venerable rākṣasa Mālyavān. Aside from his brothers, the banished defector Vibhīṣaṇa and the formidable giant Kumbhakarṇa, few of the courtiers and sycophants who surround the rākṣasa king have the temerity to speak with the frankness of Mālyavān, who, risking, and indeed provoking, his master's wrath, argues forcefully for Sītā's return and Rāma's conciliation, pointing out the obvious portents of doom that have attended every one of Rāvaṇa's moves.[186] One of the most interesting aspects of Mālyavān's speech is that he reveals that he and some like-minded rākṣasas have concluded on the basis of the signs that Rāma is, in fact, none other than the mighty Lord Viṣṇu, who has taken on the body of a man.[187] This is particularly striking in the context of the occluded nature of the Rāmāvatāra, which prevents Rāma's closest friends and allies, and even Rāma himself, from realizing his divine nature until he has accomplished his purpose in killing Rāvaṇa.[188]

In the case of the rākṣasa specialists, a few are worthy of note. One is Vidyujjihva, who appears to be particularly adept in the art of magical illusion, or māyā. The control of māyā appears to be a gift that is common to most of the major rākṣasas, including Rāvaṇa himself.[189] In the Araṇyakāṇḍa, for example, Rāvaṇa enlists the aid of the demon-ascetic Mārīca, who, apparently especially skilled in the magical arts, reluctantly turns himself into the famous golden deer

[186] 6.26.5–6.27.14.
[187] 6.26.31.
[188] On this point, see Pollock 1991, pp. 13–54.
[189] However, few of the rākṣasas said to possess this power actually employ it. See S. Goldman 2006a.

to enchant Sītā and draw Rāma away from their hermitage.[190] Rāvaṇa, too, transforms himself into a holy mendicant in order to gain Sītā's confidence.[191] It is not clear, however, to what extent we are meant to distinguish this power of shape-shifting (kāmarūpitva), common to most supernatural beings in the epic and purāṇic literature, including the vānaras of the Rāmāyaṇa, from the power of illusion that enables one to actually conjure up illusory figures from thin air.[192]

This latter power is evidenced only rarely in the epic. One example, mentioned above, is seen when Indrajit, a true master of the art of illusion, conjures up and appears to murder a simulacrum of Sītā.[193] Thus, when Rāvaṇa wishes to employ this type of illusion, he apparently requires the assistance of a specialist. One of his more sinister efforts to demoralize Sītā so as to break her spirit and bend her to his will involves his false claim that Rāma has been beheaded during the course of a night raid on his camp led by the rākṣasa general Prahasta. To convince the princess of the truth of this fiction, Rāvaṇa, who is himself described here as possessed of great powers of illusion (mahāmāya), commissions another rākṣasa, Vidyujjihva, said to be expert in the magical arts (māyāvit), to conjure up illusions of Rāma's severed head and his bow. Vidyujjihva complies and is rewarded for his skill. The grisly apparition is utterly convincing and causes Sītā to lament piteously for both her lord and her fate. Although the illusion has been created by Vidyujjihva, it seems to be sustained only by the efforts or presence of Rāvaṇa. For as soon as he is summoned away to an urgent meeting, it vanishes.[194]

One remaining specialization with which several rākṣasas are associated is that of espionage. Rāvaṇa has a number of counselors to whom he entrusts the sensitive tasks of infiltrating, undetected, the ranks of his enemies and reporting back to him on their strength and disposition.

Once Rāma and his forces have crossed the ocean and encamped on the Laṅkan shore, Rāvaṇa deputes two trusted courtiers, Śuka and Sāraṇa, to penetrate the enemy lines and bring back a thorough

[190] 3.34–40.
[191] 3.44.2–3.
[192] See pp. 25–28.
[193] 6.68.4–29.
[194] 6.22.6–6.23.38.

enumeration of their troops. The two take on the appearance of monkeys and attempt to do as they have been ordered. The vastness of the monkey hosts, however, is beyond their reckoning, and they are, in any case, immediately recognized, despite their disguise, by Vibhīṣaṇa, who seizes them and brings them before Rāma. Their capture, however, proves to be yet another opportunity for the poet to demonstrate the kindness and compassion of his hero. For Rāma, "devoted to the welfare of all beings," receives them kindly and sends them back unharmed with a message for their master.[195]

The hapless secret agents dutifully report to Rāvaṇa to tell him what happened, and they give him an elaborate description of Rāma and the monkey forces.[196] Their master, however, finding their account to be excessively laudatory, flies into a rage and dismisses them as a pair of duffers.[197] He then instructs his minister Mahodara to find him some spies who are competent in their profession.[198] Others are found and sent out, but they suffer a fate even worse than that of their discredited predecessors. Not only are they, too, immediately spotted and captured by Vibhīṣaṇa, they are badly beaten by the monkeys before they are released. Upon interrogation by Rāvaṇa, one of their number, Śārdūla, reports on their misadventures and informs his master that it is impossible, in fact, to spy on the monkeys, as they are too powerful and are under Rāma's protection.[199]

THE RĀKṢASĪS

Although the Yuddhakāṇḍa contains a few references to the fearsome rākṣasī wardresses who guard and torment Sītā in her captivity,[200] and who are so graphically described in the Sundarakāṇḍa,[201] no further scenes portray the threats, cajoling, and torment of the princess at their hands. On the other hand, it does extend and [195] 6.16.1–22.

[196] 6.17–19.
[197] 6.20.1–13.
[198] 6.20.14.
[199] 6.20.21–6.21.13.
[200] 6.25.9; 6.101.23–37.
[201] 5.20.30–35; 5.21–23; 5.25.1–3. For a discussion on why this is the case, see S. Goldman 2006b.

elaborate on a theme found in the previous Book, that of the aid and comfort extended to the long-suffering princess by a few sympathetic rākṣasīs who act against the wishes and interests of their master in order to help her.

Noteworthy among these friendly rākṣasīs is Saramā. Although she is said to have been deputed by Rāvaṇa to guard Sītā, she is described as a dear friend of the princess. When the rākṣasa king, who had been tormenting Sītā with a false account of Rāma's death and the apparition of his severed head, is called away, Saramā comforts her with assurances that Rāma and his allies could never be defeated by the rākṣasas. After informing Sītā that she has been the victim of an illusion, she predicts Rāma's victory and his happy reunion with Sītā. She even places herself at Sītā's service, offering to carry a message in secret to Rāma and agreeing to spy on her master at Sītā's behest.[202] In this way, Saramā, a figure not mentioned in the Sundarakāṇḍa, serves as a kind of female counterpart to Vibhīṣaṇa,[203] the virtuous rākṣasa, who, despite his evil birth, stands resolutely on the side of righteousness. These figures, as noted above, come to serve an important theological function as metaphors for the human sinner who can attain salvation through devotion and service to the Lord or the Goddess. They also fit in with one of the epic's overarching themes of Rāma's and Sītā's refusal to hold all the rākṣasas or the rākṣasīs collectively guilty for the sins of some among them.[204]

Saramā, moreover, is not the only rākṣasī to befriend and comfort Sītā in her affliction. Early in the war, when it appears that Indrajit has slain Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with his powerful serpent-arrows, Rāvaṇa orders a party of Sītā's wardresses to take her on an aerial survey of the battlefield in the flying palace Puṣpaka so she can see for herself that her hopes of rescue and reunion with her husband are in vain.[205] Among those sent on this mission is one Trijaṭā. This is doubtless the same elderly rākṣasī who is introduced in the Sundarakāṇḍa, where she defends Sītā from the other rākṣasa women

[202] 6.24–25.
[203] This is perhaps why a number of the commentators identify Saramā as Vibhīṣaṇa's wife. See note to 6.24.1.
[204] Cf. 6.67.36–39; 6.101.29–36. On this important theme in the Rāmāyaṇa, see R. Goldman 2006a.
[205] 6.37.

who are tormenting her and relates her prophetic dream foretelling Rāma's victory, his reunion with Sītā, and the destruction of Rāvaṇa and his allies. Trijaṭā concludes her speech by pointing out omens favorable to the princess and warning the rākṣasīs that they must cease their abuse of Sītā and propitiate her.[206]

Here, too, Trijaṭā intervenes to comfort the despairing Sītā, reassuring her that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are not dead and pointing out various signs indicating that they are still alive. She notes, among other things, that the auspicious flying palace in which they are traveling would never carry a widow and declares that Sītā's conduct and demeanor have won her over as a friend.[207]

These interventions on the part of Saramā and Trijaṭā serve not only to sustain Sītā's faith through her long ordeal but also somewhat humanize the rākṣasas, an important element in Vālmīki's construction of the epic tale and his characterization of its hero and heroine. This is made particularly clear near the end of the Book when Sītā, in response to Hanumān's request for permission to slaughter the rākṣasīs who have been tormenting her, refuses on the grounds that they were only following the order of their perverse master and that, in any case, one ought not to punish creatures for being what they are.[208]

A few other rākṣasīs and women of Rāvaṇa's court appear in the Book in fairly sympathetic roles. Thus, for example, the poet gives voice to both Mandodarī, Rāvaṇa's chief queen, and his other—unnamed and unidentified—consorts whose moving lamentations for their slain lord are quoted at length.[209]

[206] 5.25.4–38.
[207] 6.38.22–33.
[208] 6.101.29–37.
[209] 6.98–99. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 65–67.

5. Style and Structure of the Yuddhakāṇḍa

The central theme of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the climactic battle between the forces of dharma and those of adharma, a battle against an antagonist so powerful that it requires no less a figure than the Supreme Lord of the universe and the gods incarnate to defeat him, lends itself particularly well to the spectacular. The poet has not been slow to take advantage of the visual opportunities that the narrative presents in abundance.

This is evident early on in the Book where Vālmīki provides visually compelling back-to-back descriptions of the convulsive turbulence of the ocean, when Rāma, furious at the sea-god's obduracy in refusing to appear before him and grant him and his army passage, fires his blazing arrows into its depths. The poet follows this with a dramatic rendering of the construction of the bridge and the passage of the monkey hosts.[1]

> Blazing with energy, those swift and excellent arrows plunged into the waters of the sea, terrifying its great serpents.
>
> Then, along with a howling gale, there arose a huge and terrifying surge of the ocean, carrying with it sharks and sea monsters.
>
> All at once the ocean was covered with garlands of towering waves and filled with conch and oyster shells, its waves shrouded in a vaporous haze.
>
> Great serpents and the immensely powerful dānavas, who dwell in the underworld known as Pātāla, were in agony, flames shooting from their mouths and eyes.
>
> Suddenly from the ocean, king of rivers, there arose thousands of waves as tall as the Vindhya or Mandara mountains and filled with sharks and sea monsters.

[1] For a discussion of the Indo-European versions of the motif of the hero on the beach, see Slatin 2006.

> Such was the state of the ocean, the repository of all waters: its masses of waves were swirling, its rākṣasas and great serpents were terrified, and its huge crocodiles were tossed about . . .[2]
>
> There those monkeys, bulls among the hosts of tree-dwelling monkeys, resembling mountains, broke down trees and dragged them to the sea.
>
> The monkeys filled the sea with bamboo and sāla, aśvakarṇa, dhava, kuṭaja, arjuna, palmyra, tilaka, timiśa, bilvaka, saptaparṇa, flowering karṇikāra, mango, and aśoka trees.
>
> Holding aloft those tree trunks, with and without their roots, like so many flagstaffs of Indra, the foremost among the tawny monkeys carried off the trees.
>
> Heaved up violently by the boulders hurled into it, the water rose into the sky and cascaded down on all sides.
>
> Nala constructed a great bridge, ten leagues in width and one hundred in length, right through the middle of the ocean, lord of rivers and streams.
>
> Then, in the ocean, the great receptacle of waters, there arose a tumultuous sound from the boulders being hurled into it and the mountains being cast down.
>
> The bridge that Nala constructed over the ocean, abode of sea monsters, was as majestic and splendid as the path of the constellation Svātī through the heavens.
>
> Then the gods, gandharvas, perfected beings, and supreme seers gathered and hovered in the sky, eager to witness that marvel.
>
> The leaping monkeys were bounding, bellowing, and leaping. All beings gazed upon that inconceivable, seemingly impossible, and hair-raising marvel: the building of a bridge over the ocean.[3]

For a modern audience, these descriptions call to mind the increasingly sophisticated special effects of Hollywood films on classical and [2] 6.14.16–21.

[3] 6.15.15–24.

biblical themes and natural disasters.[4] Similarly the highly visual, grotesquely comic account of the rousing of Kumbhakarṇa and his rampage among the monkey troops is reminiscent of any number of modern monster films.[5]

The astute reader will have noted here and in much of the above a number of allusions to the cinematic in connection with our analysis of the Yuddhakāṇḍa. This reflects our observation that this Book, perhaps more than any other section of the Rāmāyaṇa or its sister epic, the Mahābhārata, seems to lend itself to a cinematic type of structure and framing.[6] In this respect, referring anachronistically to this modern medium may be a useful window through which to view and better appreciate the art of Vālmīki.

For the Yuddhakāṇḍa has a number of features in common with modern cinematic technique, features that have been studied by scholars in the field of film studies. Aside from the "special effects" in the highly spectacular scenes noted above, scenes that by no means are restricted to the Book or the poem, there are a number of features here that seem to call out for comparison with cinematic techniques.

One of these, discussed to some extent above, is the foregrounding and aestheticization of violence. As noted earlier, Vālmīki appears to delight in graphic descriptions of massive and sanguinary violence. This is, of course, quite appropriate to the central and defining theme of the Book, warfare. But what is noteworthy is the poet's constant effort to beautify the grisly details of the carnage that takes place on the killing fields of Laṅkā.

In so doing, Vālmīki manages to create a poetry of violence that, even as it details the horrific effects of weaponry on the bodies of men, monkeys, rākṣasas, and their mounts, and so gratifies the voyeuristic appetites of its audiences, frequently diverts the reader/auditor's eye from the sanguinary to the charming through the exploitation of an elaborate and highly conventionalized set of tropes of [4] One might cite, for example, deMille's 1956 epic, The Ten Commandments, with its massive crowd scenes and its representation of the parting of the Red Sea.

[5] These range from B movies such as Nathan Juran's 1958 The Attack of the 50 Foot Woman to films such as Merian C. Cooper and Ernest B. Schoedsack's King Kong (1933) (also Peter Jackson's 2005 remake) and Ang Lee's The Hulk (2003).

[6] See R. Dwyer 2006. See, too, S. Goldman 2003a; 2003b; and 2004a.

comparison. Thus, on the one hand, one finds many passages like the following:

> His head shattered by the crushing blow of that fist, Devāntaka, son of the rākṣasa king, all at once fell lifeless to the ground, his teeth and eyes knocked out, his tongue lolling.[7]

or

> Struck by that palm, which was like the thunderbolt of great Indra, he fell to the ground, drenched in gore and vomiting blood.[8]

On the other hand, passages such as the following are still more numerous:

> Covered with wounds, the bodies of those two great warriors were as resplendent as a śālmali and a kiṃśuka tree in full bloom in the forest before their leaves appear.[9]

> Stripped of his ears and nose and gushing blood, mighty Kumbhakarṇa looked like a mountain covered with waterfalls.[10]

> or

> The ground, covered with torrents of blood, looked as if it were covered with blossoming palāśa trees in the month of Mādhava.[11]

The poet's most elaborate and striking use of this technique of rhetorically superimposing the aesthetic upon the emetic may be seen in his extended metaphor at 6.46.25–28 in which the hideous gore of the battlefield is overlaid with the conventional description of a charming riparian landscape.[12]

The rendering of extreme violence into spectacle that so characterizes the Book's numerous battle scenes reaches its most dramatic and most "cinematic," as it were, representation in the prolonged narration of the maiming, dismemberment, and death of the giant

[7] 6.58.24.
[8] 6.84.29.
[9] 6.76.28.
[10] 6.55.70.
[11] 6.46.24.
[12] See chapter 3, above.

Kumbhakarṇa in sarga 55. The sequence[13] begins when the monkey king Sugrīva, who had been knocked unconscious and carried off by the monstrous rākṣasa, comes to his senses and rips off his adversary's ears and nose with his sharp claws and fangs. Maddened by his wounds and streaming blood "like a mountain covered with waterfalls," Kumbhakarṇa throws off Sugrīva and begins a violent rampage among the monkey troops, devouring them in huge numbers so that his body is drenched in their blood and fat. At length, Kumbhakarṇa encounters Rāma himself, and, after some inconclusive exchanges, the latter uses his divine missiles to sever, one by one, the rākṣasa's arms and feet. Despite these disabling injuries, he still manages to hurl himself upon Rāma with gaping jaws only to have his cavernous mouth filled with arrows and, at last, his huge head severed.

The complex battle with and final destruction of Kumbhakarṇa is clearly one of the most spectacular scenes in the epic. At 129 verses in the critical edition, it is by a mere six ślokas the second longest chapter in the Book and one of the longest in the entire poem. Its length and its detailed and graphic description of violence make it apparent that it was a favorite of the author and, in all likelihood, his audience as well. In its striking visual images and slow progression to the monster's final fall, it is strongly reminiscent of the detailed and highly stylized depiction of bloody violence that characterize the films of Akira Kurosawa and, after him, the post-1966 films of such American cinematic auteurs as Arthur Penn, Sam Peckinpah, Quentin Tarantino, and others.[14] In the grotesquely comical depiction of Kumbhakarṇa continuing to fight despite his gradual dismemberment, one is reminded of the parodic scene of the Black Knight in Gilliam and Jones's 1975 mock epic film, Monty Python and the Holy Grail.

[13] See pp. 24–25 and 75–77 and 6.55.65–125.

[14] The substitution of the Motion Picture Association of America's rating system in 1966 for the older Production Code, which was much more restrictive in the way violence could be represented in Hollywood films, allowed these directors and their successors to use various special effects (slow motion, squibs, latex flesh, etc.) to render bloodshed, violence, and mutilation in graphic ways that echo the poetic imagery of Vālmīki. These techniques enable the filmmaker to aestheticize visually what Penn, in a discussion of his highly influential 1967 film Bonnie and Clyde, calls the "spastic and balletic" qualities of violent death. For a discussion of these issues in the realm of film studies, see Prince 1998; 2000a; 2000b; and 2003; and Sobchack 2000.

That scenes such as these were imbibed and experienced visually as well as through oral performance is suggested by the multiplicity of their graphic representations in sculptural friezes and manuscript illustrations in premodern India. One should keep in mind the precinematic method of Indian court painters of rendering motion by depicting the same figures multiple times in the same frame at progressive stages of movement. Thus, for example, the painter of the scene of Kumbhakarṇa's death in the copiously illustrated seventeenth-century Mewar idiom, "Jagat Singh Rāmāyaṇa," depicts the progressive mutilation, dismemberment, and fall of the giant in a memorable sequence of illustrations of this type.[15]

One other quasi-cinematic aspect of the Book deserves mention. More than any of the preceding Books, which tend mainly to follow the adventures and fortunes of one central character,[16] the Yuddhakāṇḍa, by virtue of its theme, frequently shifts its perspective back and forth between the camps and councils of Rāma and Rāvaṇa, detailing the deliberations, strategies, and sorties of the opposing sides as they plan and execute their war strategies, meeting only on the field of battle. This shift of perspective is measured, regular, and evidently well thought out. Thus the Book's first five sargas place the omniscient authorial eye with Rāma and his forces, following them in their southward march from Kiṣkindhā to the northern shore of the sea. The next five take us to the council chambers of Laṅkā, where we witness the discussions between Rāvaṇa and his military and political advisers as to how to respond to the threat posed by Rāma's appearance across the water. In the next group of five sargas the poet follows Vibhīṣaṇa from Laṅkā to Rāma's encampment,

[15] British Library Add. 15297, Book 6, folios 85–89.

[16] In the first four Books, the poet's eye tends to stay very closely on Rāma and his associates, following them in their adventures and trials and only departing occasionally to narrate a story or, when necessary, briefly following a secondary character or theme. In the first case, the stories, like those told by Viśvāmitra and others in the Bālakāṇḍa or by Sugrīva in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, are narrated in Rāma's presence. In the second, the authorial eye will briefly follow a figure like Bharata during his sojourn in and travel from Rājagṛha, or revert episodically to the action in Ayodhyā after Rāma's departure, or in Laṅkā immediately before and after the abduction of Sītā. In the Sundarakāṇḍa the action is set mainly in Laṅkā, where the poet mostly follows the adventures of Hanumān and Sītā, albeit peppering his narrative with numerous retellings of the main epic story. For a discussion of this phenomenon, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 18–20.

where the monkeys debate whether to trust him, Rāma takes him in and consecrates him as king of the rākṣasas, and the monkeys, acting on the rākṣasa's advice, build a bridge and cross the ocean. This section, in turn, is followed by a passage of twelve sargas in which we return to Laṅkā to watch as Rāvaṇa sends out agents to spy on Rāma's forces, attempts to demoralize Sītā with the illusion of Rāma's head and bow, consults further with his advisers, and makes his preparations for the defense of the city. At this point we return once again, for four sargas, to Rāma's camp, where we see the hero make his preparations for the assault on Laṅkā and begin the siege.

After this the battle is joined, and much of the action takes place on and around the battlefield between the city and Rāma's main encampment, where it whipsaws rapidly and violently between the two sides and their various dueling champions. This back-and-forth pattern basically dominates the central two-thirds of the Book, until, near the very end, Rāma finally kills Rāvaṇa. Following this, the Book's culminating moment, the poet's eye remains on Rāma, with only brief departures.[17]

This stately and majestic sweep of the authorial eye back and forth between the councils and camps of the opposing warriors, although not unknown to other ancient epics,[18] is strongly reminiscent of the techniques used by the makers of modern major cinematic war epics such as Annikin, Martin, and Wicki's 1962 filmic tale of the D Day landings, The Longest Day, or Fleischer, Fukasaku, and Masuda's 1970 film depicting the events leading up to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Tora! Tora! Tora! In these films, as in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the spectator, reader, or auditor is carefully and artfully shifted from the intimacy of the war councils on each side to the chaotic and spectacular violence of the battleground.[19]

[17] As, for example, when it follows Hanumān once more to the aśoka grove to bring the good news to Sītā (sarga 101) or to Ayodhyā to report to Bharata (sargas 113–14).

[18] Compare the Iliad's shifting between the siege encampment of Agamemnon and Priam's court in Troy or the Odyssey's occasional shifting from the wanderings of Odysseus to the trials of Penelope in Ithaca.

[19] It is perhaps worth noting here that, just as Vālmīki strives to convey with his descriptions of the grotesqueness of figures such as Kumbhakarṇa or the uncanny black magic of Indrajit the otherness of the rākṣasa camp in contrast to that of Rāma, these films were among the first American war epics to insist on having the German and Japanese characters speak in their own respective languages, adding subtitles for the benefit of their audiences.

THE SHAPE OF THE YUDDHAKĀṆḌA

Like the preceding Sundarakāṇḍa, the Yuddhakāṇḍa has a distinctly annular structure.[20] Both Books can be described as more or less self-contained pieces of quest literature in which a hero sets out on a dangerous mission, accomplishes it despite obstacles and trials, and returns triumphant. In the Sundarakāṇḍa, we witness Hanumān's prodigious leap across the ocean, his daunting search for Sītā, his battles with the rākṣasas, his brief captivity, and his return leap.[21]

Although the Yuddhakāṇḍa constitutes the final movement in the larger quest-saga of the Rāmāyaṇa from the hero's exile and the loss of his wife to his recovery of Sītā and his consecration, it can also be seen as a symmetrical miniepic in its own right within the larger narrative of exile and return in which the hero crosses the seemingly impassable barrier of the ocean by miraculous means (a bridge sanctioned by the ocean god and built by monkeys), defeats his archenemy, recovers his lost wife, and once more crosses the sea by a miraculous device (the fabulous flying palace Puṣpaka).

The Book marks the completion of the central tale of Prince Rāma, taking him to the culmination of his long-deferred consecration and, perhaps more important, the fulfillment of the mission of the Rāmāvatāra. This no doubt made its ending a highly attractive and appropriate place for the addition of a traditional phalaśruti, or statement of the benefits, spiritual and material, that accrue to those who recite or hear the text. Indeed, such statements are to be found at the conclusion of the final sarga of the Book in virtually all known versions. Since phalaśrutis mark the conclusion of many of the religious texts of Hinduism, some scholars have taken this to suggest that the "original Rāmāyaṇa" must have ended with the Yuddhakāṇḍa.[22] It is a commonly held view among epic scholars that the Uttarakāṇḍa, like the Bālakāṇḍa but perhaps more so, belongs to the latest stratum of the formation of the poem.[23] This may well be [20] See S. Goldman 2003b, for a discussion of gender as a structural determinant in the Yuddhakāṇḍa.

[21] On this, see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 14–17.
[22] See, for example, Bulcke 1960, pp. 40–41 and Vaidya 1971, p. xxxi. Vaidya refers to the Yuddhakāṇḍa as "the last Kāṇḍa of the real and original Rāmāyaṇa."
[23] For a discussion of this issue, see Brockington 1998, pp. 379, 391–94.

entirely or partly true, but we do not believe that the presence across the manuscript traditions of the various versions of the phalaśruti in any way demonstrates this.

For, in addition to the issues noted above, it must be observed that the manuscript evidence for the phalaśruti is so complicated as to suggest that, whatever the relative date of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the phalaśrutis must have been still later additions, appended to the Book for reasons of piety.[24]

[24] For a discussion of the extraordinary textual complexity of the phalaśruti passages, see notes to 6.116.90.

6. Text, Translation, and Commentaries[1]

In general, the constitution of the critical edition of the Yuddhakāṇḍa follows the principles established for the other Books.[2] A discussion of these principles with special reference to the present translation is included in our Introduction to the Bālakāṇḍa[3] and so requires no further elaboration here.

It should be noted, however, that, because of the unusual length of the volume and perhaps as a consequence of some of the difficulties in its preparation alluded to by its editor,[4] the text contains a few more problematic readings and occasional typographical errors than are found in the earlier volumes. We have accordingly felt compelled to propose emendations to the critical text but have done so sparingly and only where we felt that it was absolutely necessary for comprehensibility. These have been marked with an asterisk (*) in the translation as has been our practice elsewhere. We have provided a glossary of these emendations. Our notes, however, point out numerous additional places where we have questioned the choices made by the critical editors.[5]

THE COMMENTATORS[6]

Our observations on the dating, relationships, sectarian affiliations, and so forth, of the major medieval and early modern commentators on the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa have been discussed in previous volumes.[7] Nonetheless, the Yuddhakāṇḍa, because of its theme,

[1] Portions of the following section are adapted from our Introduction to the Sundarakāṇḍa (Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 87–98), with changes and additions relevant to the present volume.
[2] Bhatt 1960, pp. xxix-xxxiv and Jhala 1966, p. xxxv.
[3] Pollock 1984a, pp. 82, 93.
[4] Vaidya 1971, pp. xxxvi–xxxvii.
[5] See, for example, notes to 6.28.37; 6.40.21; 6.41.10; 6.42.3; and passim.
[6] For a useful summary of the somewhat confused state of knowledge about the Sanskrit commentaries on the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa and a brief bibliography on the subject, see Lefeber 1994, pp. 17–28.
[7] R. Goldman 1984, pp. 114–17; Pollock 1986, pp. 75–76; Lefeber 1994, pp. 17–28; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 91–93.

presents the commentators with an unusually large number of theologically challenging situations that call on them to offer some of their most detailed exegeses and their most sharply worded critiques of one another's interpretations of these critical matters. It also allows us an opportunity to reevaluate our understanding of the commentators' relationships to one another. The most critical aspect of the Book, from the perspective of the commentators, is no doubt the type and degree of the suffering to which Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and, to some extent, Sītā are subjected.

The heroic brothers have, of course, been depicted as experiencing various degrees of mental and emotional pain in the course of their adventures from the moment of Rāma's banishment through his excruciating grief and longing brought about by the abduction of Sītā. But in none of the various violent confrontations with the powerful rākṣasas they have faced—from their first encounters as boys with Tāṭakā, Mārīca, Subāhu, and the like,[8] in the Bālakāṇḍa to their encounter with Virādha[9] and their fierce battles with the powerful demon warriors Khara, Dūṣaṇa, Triśiras, and their legions in the Araṇyakāṇḍa[10]—do the heroes seem to suffer much physically. Even when, in his encounters with the powerful and valorous rākṣasas of Janasthāna, Rāma's body is actually pierced by the hail of the demons' weapons, it appears to cause him little if any discomfort.[11]

But this is far from the case in some of the major battles of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, especially when the heroes engage with the mighty and elusive Indrajit or with Rāvaṇa himself. For, in these battles, the normal epic theme of the hero, riddled with arrows or struck with the mighty blows of fists or weapons, shaking off his seemingly devastating injuries, does not universally apply.

Thus Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are both laid low twice by Indrajit, once when they are bound and nearly slain by his serpent-arrows,[12] and then again when they and their entire army are knocked out of action during the rākṣasa's second sortie.[13] In both cases they are [8] 1.25.8–15; 1.29.10–21.

[9] 3.3.
[10] 3.19–29.
[11] 3.24.12–13; 3.27.16–17.
[12] 6.35–40.
[13] 6.60.32–49. The brothers are also riddled with arrows and bloodied by Indrajit at 6.67.32–33 although they do not lose consciousness on this occasion.

unable to recover on their own, requiring, in the first instance, the sudden appearance of Garuḍa and, in the second, the intervention of Hanumān with the mountain of healing herbs to save them.[14] Later on in the battle Lakṣmaṇa is pierced through the chest by Rāvaṇa's mighty javelin, despite Rāma's effort to divert it, and falls unconscious, drenched in blood.[15] Once again he can be saved only through the intervention of Hanumān, who is obliged to fetch the mountain of healing herbs a second time.[16]

Although passages such as these lend drama to Vālmīki's narrative and, above all, reinforce the portrayal of the avatāra as, in some meaningful sense, a real man who suffers pain, bleeds, and faints like an ordinary mortal, several of the commentators, steeped in the devotional traditions of medieval Vaiṣṇavism, have difficulty in squaring the portrayal of a figure who shares human frailty and physical vulnerability with their understanding of the avatāra as an omnipotent, omniscient, and invulnerable manifestation of the Supreme Lord. For them, incidents such as these call out for explanation, and they tend to adopt one of two possible interpretive strategies. In the first, the avatāra merely plays at being mortal, acting out the emotional and physical signs of distress so as either not to appear to transgress the terms of Brahmā's boon that make Rāvaṇa invulnerable to gods and other supernatural beings or to serve as a shining example of stoicism.

This matter is of particular concern to Govindarāja (Cg) and Śivasahāya (Cr), who, on occasion, go to considerable exegetical lengths to argue, in cases where the text shows Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa wounded and bleeding, that, as gods, they do not really have the kind of flesh and blood that mortals have. Therefore, for them, their bleeding is a product of their māyā, or illusive power, manifested like the devices of an actor in order to appear to conform to Brahmā's boon or to serve as an example of stoic endurance of suffering or of human dharmic conduct.[17] Or, as an alternative, when one of the [14] 6.40.33–42; 6.61.67.

[15] 6.88.30–39.
[16] 6.89.17–24.
[17] For a more detailed illustration of this important theological point, see note to 6.35.9, where the response of these two commentators to the description of Rāma's and Lakṣmaṇa's bleeding is discussed. See also notes to 6.35.9,17,19,20; 6.36.4–7; 6.37.19; and 6.38.7.

heroes is depicted as covered with blood, a commentator may instruct us to understand that the blood is, in fact, that of his enemy.[18]

The second interpretive strategy that some commentators resorted to is to manipulate the language in an effort to show that, in passages where violence appears to be directed against or inflicted upon the heroes, the text can or should be read in a way that modifies, or even negates, its apparent meaning. The simplest way to do this is to exploit the ambiguity that is often built into a Sanskrit utterance by resolving the sandhi, or euphonic combination, in different possible ways, breaking up nominal compounds differently, adding words, or reading words in unusual senses that are sanctioned by the kośas, or lexicons. Deploying these linguistic techniques, commentators who want to deny that Rāma or Lakṣmaṇa or both have actually been struck or injured may read a word such as "wounded" to mean "not wounded," "nearly wounded," and the like.

An example of this technique may be seen in Cr's commentary to 6.88.39. There the text appears to describe Lakṣmaṇa as "pierced by that javelin . . . and drenched in blood (śaktyā bhinnam . . . rudhirādigdham)." In keeping with his usual denial that Lakṣmaṇa is injured, Cr reads these two sequences as "not pierced by the javelin (śaktyā abhinnam)" and "not drenched with blood (rudhiraadigdham)."[19]

Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm) is particularly adept at this strategy, often suggesting that a word be added to modify the sense of a sentence, as when, for example, Rāvaṇa is shown to anticipate that Kumbhakarṇa will slaughter the two heroic princes along with the monkey army. Cm, in his gloss, adds the adverb vinā, "excluding," to reflect his interpretation that only the monkeys will be slain and not Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.[20] Similarly Cr, whose text at one point describes Lakṣmaṇa as "defeated (nirjita-)," glosses, "nearly defeated (nirjitaprāya-)."[21]

One particular strategy Cm uses extensively is to take the Sanskrit verbal root √han, "to strike, injure, kill," in the sense of "to go,

[18] See, for example, Cr's comment at 6.35.9 and 6.79.1.

[19] See note to 6.88.39.

[20] See note to 6.48.13.

[21] See note to 6.47.113. This kind of analysis is sometimes extended to Rāma's principal allies. Thus Cr rejects the apparent sense of the adjective kṛtavraṇa, "wounded," when it is applied to Hanumān at 6.47.126, glossing, "upon whom an attempt was made to inflict a wound (vraṇāya kṛtaḥ prayatno yasmiṃs tam)." He does this approach," on the authority of Naighaṇṭuka 2.14 (hanahiṃsāgatyoḥ). This device affords him fertile ground (since the root √han is naturally so common in the text) to reinterpret passages in which Rāma or Lakṣmaṇa or both are struck not only to show that they have not, in fact, been wounded but to exploit the sense of "approach" in the theological sense that so colors his reading of the poem.[22]

In utilizing these linguistic devices, several commentators have created—explicitly or implicitly—a powerful tool for the exegesis of the Rāmāyaṇa as both a martial epic and a religious text. For what is proposed here, most unequivocally and consistently by Maheśvaratīrtha, is a technique for reading the poem on two distinct levels of meaning—a surface, literal reading (prakaṭitārtha) of the tale of abduction and war and a deeper reading (vāstavārtha) that is both theologically and metaphysically significant.

In the first reading, Rāvaṇa, a supernaturally empowered and utterly evil demon king, in his uncontrollable passion, abducts the beautiful wife of a virtuous warrior prince only to be slain in the end after a prolonged and grueling war between the two antagonists and their vast armies. In the second, Rāvaṇa, in all his mad passion and virulent antagonism, is revealed in many ways as the ultimate bhakta, or devotee, of the Supreme Lord (Bhagavān) and his consort, the Goddess Śrī.[23]

The commentators' deep grounding in the medieval devotional Rāmāyaṇa texts and traditions can also color their understanding and exposition of other critical moments in the epic story. One of the most significant of these for our understanding of the receptive history of the text down to the present day has to do with the emotionally charged account of Rāma's cruel reception of Sītā when she is first brought into his presence after her release, and of the no doubt because of the legend, referred to several times in the poem, that Hanumān had received a boon so that no weapon could harm him. See note to 6.47.126. But Cr is not necessarily consistent in this respect, because at other points in the text the monkey hero is said to be wounded, and the commentator is silent.

---

[22] See, for example, note to 6.27.9. Compare notes to 6.37.9; 6.80.29; 6.81.4; and 6.91.19.

[23] See, for example, note to 6.47.91. This is a theme Cm introduced and elaborated on in his commentary to the earlier Books of the poem. Compare, for example, his efforts to bring out the vāstavārtha in his exegesis on 5.18, where he interprets Rāvaṇa's lustful advances to the captive Sītā as expressions of his deep religious devotion.

famous agniparīkṣā, or fire ordeal, she submits to in response so as to demonstrate her fidelity publicly.[24] Vālmīki's description of the anguish this event produces in the actors and spectators is one of the most intensely emotional and affecting passages in the poem, and the poet gives no hint that the sequence of events is anything other than what it appears to be.

The situation is quite different in some of the most influential and popular medieval and early modern versions of the Rāmakathā. In most popular contemporary understandings of the story there is a motif that is at least as old as the Kūrmapurāṇa and the Adhyātmarāmāyaṇa[25] and that was popularized by Tulsī Dās's immensely influential Rāmcaritmānas,[26] that Sītā herself, the great Goddess, must never be sullied by the touch of the monstrous demon king and so is never actually abducted. Instead, on the advice of the omniscient Lord Rāma, she enters the sacred fire after producing, through her divine powers of illusion, a simulacrum of herself, which is known traditionally as either Māyā (Illusion) or Chāyā (Shadow) Sītā. It is this simulacrum that is carried off and held in captivity by Rāvaṇa, while the real Sītā remains hidden in the fire until Rāvaṇa's death. In this version of the story, then, the wrenching scene of the fire ordeal is merely a convenient device that allows the false Sītā to enter the fire and the real one to emerge unscathed, thus shielding this divine secret from the public. This episode is utterly unknown to Vālmīki,[27] but several of the commentators attempt to read it back, as it were, into his poem.[28]

[24] 6.102–106.

[25] KūrmaP 2.33.112ff. and AdhyāRā 3.7; see 6.104.27; 6.106.4; and notes.

[26] Rāmcaritmānas Araṇyakāṇḍ 23.1–2; Laṅkākāṇḍ 108.1–2 [between dohas 108 and 109].

[27] Although, as indicated above, the possibility of such an illusion is well known to the poet, who shows Indrajit creating and killing just such a simulacrum of Sītā at 6.68. Indeed, scholars have argued that Vālmīki's episode provided the inspiration for the traditions of chāyāsītā. See 6.102.5; 6.104.27; and 6.106.4 and notes. See, too, note to 5.51.24. See AdhyāRā 3.7.1ff. Also see note to 3.43.34 for a discussion of Ct's treatment of the story of chāyāsītā derived from Kūrmapurāṇa 2.33.112ff. See Brockington 1984, pp. 237, 253, 282, and passim.

[28] Compare, for example, Ct's comments at 6.102.5, where the poet describes Rāma as becoming plunged in thought at Hanumān's report that Sītā, who has now been freed from captivity, wishes to see him. Ct argues that, in reality, Rāma is thinking about how he can recover the principal or real Sītā from the fire [where she was supposed to have been hiding] (vastuto mukhyasītālābho 'gneḥ kathaṃ syād iti cintātra).

One interesting bit of information to come out of the commentators' close reading of the Yuddhakāṇḍa bears on the vexed issue of the relative dating of these scholars. The question at hand is the chronological relation of Kataka Mādhavayogin (Ck), the author of the Amṛtakataka, and Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm), the author of the Tattvadīpikā. As noted by Rosalind Lefeber in her Introduction to her translation of the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa in this series, among the widely divergent opinions about the dates of the various Rāmāyaṇa commentators, two of the most generally agreed upon are those of these particular authors. She notes that "For commentator Cm there is fortunately unanimity of opinion that he wrote in the mid-sixteenth century," and "For Kataka Mādhavayogin, all editors of the critical edition agree on mid-seventeenth century; yet his dates are given as 1675–1750 by Varadacharya, who edited the complete text of his commentary for the University of Mysore edition."[29] Thus the conventional scholarly wisdom has tended to place Kataka at least one hundred years later than Maheśvaratīrtha, and the translators and editors of the present series have tended to accept this dating. However, our reading of the commentaries on the Yuddhakāṇḍa shows that this relative chronology cannot be correct. For in his commentary to the Book, Maheśvaratīrtha quotes or paraphrases Kataka by name on several occasions, just as does Nāgojibhaṭṭa, the author of the widely published Rāmāyaṇatilakaṭīkā, which virtually all authorities date to the early eighteenth century.[30]

Since either or both dates may thus be uncertain, the whole issue of the exact dating of these two commentators requires further research. Nonetheless, it is now clear that the conventional wisdom that places Maheśvaratīrtha in the mid-sixteenth century cannot possibly be correct, unless we place Kataka still earlier, which, on the basis of the evidence, seems improbable.[31]

This discussion, in turn, brings up the issue of what one might term the "lineages" of the commentators. As noted before in this series, there has been a fair amount of discussion of the sectarian and philosophical affiliations of the various scholiasts.[32] For various reasons, assigning specific schools of thought to individual commentators is difficult. What clearly appears to be the case, however, is that the major commentators seem to fall into commentarial schools or lineages even if the relative chronology of the individual commentators within a given lineage is difficult to determine. The most basic and obvious division among the major commentators on the southern recensions reflects the fundamental split that characterizes their texts.[33] Thus the commentators who work basically with one version of this text tend naturally to rely on their predecessors who have shared the same text. In this way Kataka is quoted or paraphrased frequently by Nāgojibhaṭṭa, who, in turn, is often quoted or imitated by Śivasahāya, while a similar succession characterizes the commentaries of Varadarāja, Rāmānuja, Maheśvaratīrtha, and Govindarāja. Cross-lineage comment is often harshly critical.

[29] Lefeber 1994, p. 18.
[30] Lefeber 1994, p. 18. For passages where Cm quotes Ck, see notes to 6.78.19 and the note immediately preceding the notes to 6.96.1.
[31] Cf. notes to 6.24.2,4–5, where the evidence suggests that Kataka was, in fact, familiar with, or actually consulting, the commentary of Rāmānuja.

But the lines are not unambiguous, and the affiliations are not uniformly clear. As we saw above, Maheśvaratīrtha occasionally quotes or paraphrases Kataka and aligns himself with the latter's view. Similarly Nāgoji not infrequently offers the same explanations as Maheśvaratīrtha suggests, often in the same words.

On the other hand, some commentators might be termed "independents," notably Satyatīrtha (Cs). This late commentator appears basically to follow the textual tradition of Varadarāja et al., but he does not blindly follow the interpretive tradition of either "school." Satyatīrtha is, in fact, something of a contrarian and seems not to belong to any clearly identifiable philosophical or sectarian tradition. He particularly likes to provide idiosyncratic glosses, which he arrives at by breaking up words or compounds in ways the other scholiasts have not considered or by selecting highly unusual lexical meanings for words.[34]

Although Satyatīrtha sometimes follows the interpretation of one or more of the earlier scholiasts, he is often highly critical of them. This is especially so when Nāgojibhaṭṭa follows the interpretation of Maheśvaratīrtha. In many of these cases, Satyatīrtha quotes the two "Bhaṭṭa and Tīrtha" at length and dismisses their interpretations

[32] See R. Goldman 1984, pp. 114–16 and Lefeber 1994, pp.18–19.
[33] See W. Rubin 1936 and Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 90–93.
[34] Examples abound in his commentary. For a typical example, see note to 6.13.5.

contemptuously, noting that it is "to be ignored (upekṣyam)." Sometimes he waxes ironic, likening an interpretation of Nāgojibhaṭṭa or Maheśvaratīrtha or both to that of a person who has heard the Rāmāyaṇa twelve times and yet still wants to know the relationship between Rāma and Sītā.[35]

THE ANNOTATION

A number of factors, some generic to the Rāmāyaṇa and some specific to the Yuddhakāṇḍa, have combined to require a particularly dense and extensive annotation of this Book.

First and foremost of these, of course, is the inordinate size of the text, which necessitates proportionally extensive annotation. The much greater length of the Yuddhakāṇḍa when compared to that of the other kāṇḍas also brings with it, not unexpectedly, longer and more numerous appendix passages in the critical apparatus. As in the previous volumes in this series, we have elected to provide in the annotation the translation or summary of all passages from the popular, widely known, and extensively published devanāgarī recensions of the text aligned with its southern recension. According to the editor of the critical edition of the Book, the "traditional extent" of the Yuddhakāṇḍa is a bit less than thirteen hundred verses longer than that of the critically established text.[36] Our notes, therefore, contain many hundreds of translated and annotated verses that are excised from the critical edition. In general, we have translated the reconstructed star passages given in the critical apparatus, ignoring most of the variants. However, when the variant coincides with the text of a printed edition, we have provided it. Only in cases where an individual passage of this kind runs to one hundred lines or more have we given a summary rather than a full translation.

Three other factors have contributed to the great extent of the notes. One is that, as mentioned above, the Book, in depicting the fulfillment of the mission of the Rāmāvatāra and in permitting its central hero to finally recognize his own divinity after suffering the emotional and physical ills proper to mere mortals, offers the commentators fertile ground for the theological exegesis so critical to our understanding of the poem's unparalleled significance in the religious thought of Hindu India. It was important, we felt, to place their discussions and debates before our readers to make as widely known as possible the critical early thinking associated with the religious movements that have centered their attention and devotion on the figures of Rāma and Sītā.

[35] See, for example, notes to 6.71.12 and 6.96.12.

[36] Vaidya 1971, p. xxxi. Vaidya is, no doubt, referring to the so-called vulgate or popular version of the southern text.

Another factor is the Book's many passages dealing with often obscure technical information in areas such as military science, omens, traditional physiognomy, and the like. For example, numerous weapons are listed, the exact nature of which was no longer clear even by the time of the earliest commentators. This requires some discussion. As with the previous volumes, we hope that the density of the annotation, offering as it does a complete discussion of virtually every one of the poem's numerous textual, exegetical, cultural, and rhetorical difficulties, and at least a summary of the commentarial discussions and debates these difficulties have provoked, will provide all those interested in this culminating section of the Rāmāyaṇa story an apparatus for achieving the fullest possible appreciation of it.

The third factor is that, in order to fulfill the terms of Rāma's exile to the exact date, the commentators, more than in any of the other Books, spend a great deal of time and energy rationalizing and establishing the precise chronology of the events of the kāṇḍa and of the epic as a whole. To defend their respective views, they quote in extenso passages from other versions of the Rāmāyaṇa, from well-known versions of the Rāma story, such as those found in the Padmapurāṇa, Mahābhārata, Kūrmapurāṇa, and Mādhva version of Āgniveśya. The subject is fraught with much disagreement and vituperativeness among the commentators, and so we have attempted to present all the various opinions.[37]

One final note in this connection is appropriate. Readers of the annotation will notice that in the present volume we provide the full Sanskrit text for all the comments of the commentators we quote. We apologize to those who do not read Sanskrit and may find the quotations distracting. Nonetheless, we include them in this volume because many of the sources for the commentators' texts are either unpublished or, if published, are now out of print, making it extremely difficult for Sanskrit scholars who wish to verify or challenge our understanding of these important texts to gain access to the originals.

[37] See note to 6.4.4 for a list of notes that discuss the Book's chronology.

THE TRANSLATION

In this volume, as with the other Books of the Rāmāyaṇa, our twin goals of accuracy and readability have often coexisted uneasily. In our efforts to render every word and nuance of the text as closely as possible in an alien idiom and to map the architecture of Vālmīki's verses into readable English prose, we were often forced by the highly compacted style of the epic Sanskrit to resort to a prose style less felicitous than we would have liked. The style of the original is characterized by a profusion of embedded adjectives, epithets, vocatives, participles, and gerunds that can be accurately rendered only with a plethora of relative and dependent clauses. Whereas the original poem was composed to be aesthetically pleasing and culturally syntonic for an intended audience who would imbibe it mainly aurally as it was chanted by a performer, it may become tiresome to contemporary western readers who consume the text visually from the printed page.[38] If, in our efforts to balance the desideratum of readability against our commitment to leave no element of the original untranslated, we have sometimes been driven toward an inelegant prose style, we beg the readers' indulgence. If, on the other hand, we have in some small way captured the flavor and feel of this powerful narrative, offered a glimpse of the pleasure we experienced in immersing ourselves in its depths, or provided some new insight into its power and significance, our labors will have been amply rewarded.

One of our concerns here, as in the earlier volumes, was to convey, within the limits of contemporary English diction and usage, something of the staggering lexical profusion of epic Sanskrit. The latter is far richer in synonyms, kennings, epithets, and patronymics than modern literary English. To capture at least something of the [38] For a detailed discussion of the conventions, stylistics, and difficulties of Sanskrit epic poetry and a statement on how we attempted to cope with them in rendering the Sanskrit verse into English prose, see Goldman 1984, pp. 96–117 and Pollock 1986, pp. 74–76.

flavor these features impart to the text while avoiding excessive repetitiveness or distracting footnotes, we adopted a number of conventions. When, for example, the poet deploys the extraordinary richness of his idiom in synonyms and kennings for monkeys, we translated the sense of the term by subordinating it adjectivally to the word "monkey" or another term synonymous with "monkey."

Thus terms like hari, "tawny one," plava(ṃ)ga(ma), "going by leaps," śākhāmṛga, "branch animal," piṅgākṣa, "yellow-eyed," valīmukha, "wrinkle-faced," and so on, are rendered, respectively, as "tawny monkey," "leaping monkey," "tree-dwelling monkey," "yellow-eyed monkey," and "wrinkle-faced monkey." The basic terms vānara and kapi are translated simply as "monkey," whereas terms that seem to refer to specific species of primates, such as golāṅgūla, "cow-tailed," and ṛkṣa, "injurious," are translated as "langur" and "ape," respectively.[39]

Similarly, regarding the innumerable epithets and patronymics used for the various animals, gods, humans, and demons mentioned in the text, we have generally translated them and subordinated them to the proper names that an Anglophone audience is most likely to recognize. Thus epithets like Śatakratu, "having a hundred sacrifices," Antaka, "Ender," and Daśagrīva, "Ten-necked," are rendered as "Indra of the hundred sacrifices," "Yama, the ender of all things," and "Ten-necked Rāvaṇa." Patronymics of most characters are supplemented with more familiar names or epithets. Thus Rāvaṇi, "son of Rāvaṇa," is translated as "Indrajit Rāvaṇi." But patronymics of the most major figures are generally not supplemented as the reader will easily recognize their referents. Thus names deriving from lineage or country of origin, such as Rāghava, "descendent of Raghu," or Dāśarathi, "son of Daśaratha," for Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, Māruti, "son of Māruta," or Jānakī, " daughter of Janaka," and Vaidehī, "woman of Videha," for Sītā, when applied to the most central figures of the epic, are left untranslated and without supplement.

Some epithets, when rendered literally, may strike the English ear as odd or awkward. Nowhere, perhaps, is this more so than when they contain the names of animals that serve as metaphors for the virtues of strength, valor, and virility so critical to the masculine and martial culture of the epics. The creatures that most exemplify these qualities in the Indian literary imagination are the lion, the tiger, the elephant, and, perhaps most characteristically, the bull.

[39] For a discussion of the latter term in the sense of a primate rather than (as it later came to be understood) a bear, see R. Goldman 1989.

For this reason, characters whose virtues of this kind the poet wishes to emphasize are frequently referred to with compound epithets in which they are identified metaphorically with one or another of these animals. Thus compounds such as munipuṃgava, "bull among sages," naravyāghra, "tiger among men," rākṣasarṣabha, "bull among rākṣasas," and kapikuñjara, "elephant among monkeys," abound in the text.

One could easily "flatten" these expressions by replacing the animal names with adjectives such as "mighty," "powerful," "valorous," "heroic," and so on. Indeed, one reviewer of an earlier volume criticized us precisely for not doing so. Nonetheless, given the powerful cultural value placed on these creatures and their ascribed natures, we believe it would be a disservice to the text and its readers to reduce these colorful expressions to the relative banality of such adjectives, which, in any case, themselves permeate the text. It is our hope that any jarring effect these expressions may have for readers will be more than compensated for by the sense they may conjure up of a different cultural universe.

Given the subject matter of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the text refers to numerous weapons and war regalia.[40] The exact weapon to which any given term refers is often difficult to determine. Not only do many terms refer to multiple weapons, but a number of terms refer to weapons of which we know little or nothing. We have tried to assign each term an equivalent English rendering of the weapon mentioned in the text. Thus, for example, we translate śūla as "lance," prāsa as "dart," and śakti as "javelin." Some of these terms can be rendered in English differently, and a number of the Sanskrit terms can be translated with the same English word. The word śakti, for example, when used to designate a weapon, can be rendered by such terms as "missile," "spear," "dart," "pike," or "lance," and a term like śūla, which we render as "lance," can equally well be translated as "pike," "dart," "spear," or "lance." Then again, the term prāsa can be rendered as "dart" or "barbed missile."

[40] Cf. Brockington 2006.

Of all the terms for weapons mentioned in the text, perhaps the most semantically complex is astra. We understand this term to reflect three different semantic fields in its usage in Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa. It can, in some instances, refer merely to a weapon that is thrown or shot, and in this case we translate it as "missile."[41] More commonly, however, the term does not refer specifically to a weapon but to a mantra, or magical formula, given to one of the principal characters by one of the gods or powerful sages. This mantra is invoked and then infused into a weapon or weapons that are already in the warrior's possession. In such cases we have translated the term astra as "divine weapon-spell."[42] Finally, in a number of situations the term astra refers not to the spell itself but to the weapon that has been infused with the mantra, and here we render the term as "divinely charged weapon."[43]

PREVIOUS TRANSLATIONS

Although ours is the first translation into any language of the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa as it has been reconstructed by the scholars of the Oriental Institute, Baroda, and so offers the reader a rendition of the only scientific reconstruction of the poem based on a critical analysis of all its major recensions and subrecensions, it is by no means the first translation of the poem. In a sense, the oral-performative nature of the work and the unparalleled popularity and pervasiveness of its theme have ensured that the poem has been subject to "translation" in one form or another from the moment of its earliest performances far back in the first millennium BCE. Indeed, viewed from this perspective, the vast and ever-growing body of Rāmāyaṇas that have, in many literary, plastic, and performative media, so long dominated the cultural, aesthetic, and religious life of South and Southeast Asia can be regarded as a great and unbounded essay in translation.[44] But only in quite modern times has the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa been subjected to that particular kind of mapping of a text from one language to another that we think of as true translation.

[41] E.g., 6.3.25; 6.47.127; etc.
[42] See, for example, 6.59.82,86.
[43] See, for example, 6.59.61.
[44] For an insightful discussion on this phenomenon, see Ramanujan 1992, pp. 22–49.

Since the early nineteenth century the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa, in whole or significant part, has been translated in this sense perhaps several dozen times into a number of the languages of India and Europe. Although, for historical reasons, the greatest number of such translations produced by both European and Indian scholars have been in English, a number of accurate and scholarly translations have also been produced in other languages, including Latin, French, German, Italian, and most, if not all, of the literary languages of India.

According to a maxim quoted by Ādiśaṅkarācārya, "Not even a well-trained acrobat can climb onto his own shoulders,"[45] we carefully read through several translations of the Yuddhakāṇḍa that we regard as the most accurate and scholarly and provide in our notes numerous examples of their renditions of difficult or disputed passages. Here a few words are in order about the translations we found to be the most reliable renditions of their respective versions of the poem.

All prior translations, one should recall, represent the rendition of one or another of the major recensions of the epic. In the case of the translations of the southern recension, all earlier translations, as noted above, render either the vulgate, that is, the text associated with Ct and Ck, or that associated with Cg, Cm, and Crā.

The oldest complete English translations of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa in current use are those of Griffith (1870–1873) and Dutt (1892). The former is a verse rendering, now difficult to read and, because of the constraints imposed by the choice of rhymed verse, less literal than many others. We have therefore not used it. Dutt's prose translation employs a deliberately archaic diction, delighting in such terms as "welkin" for "sky," and is thus difficult to read. It relies heavily not only on the text but on the commentary of Ct, which, as noted above, has proved to be textually inferior to the parallel text of Cg et al. It is a work of considerable scholarship but is erratic, and its renderings often appear to be wide of the mark. The prose is flowing but not quite literal, and the diction in places is archaic. The translations of Shastri (1957) and the Gita Press (1969) are slightly more modern in diction than the preceding ones. Both appear to rely largely on the text and commentary of Ct, and Shastri occasionally is influenced by Dutt's translation. The Gita Press rendering incorporates many of Ct's interpretations and glosses into the translation itself. In our opinion, the most accurate and useful modern English translation of the popular southern recension is that of Raghunathan (1982). It is based on the superior southern text of Cg and is in the main accurate and readable. It is provided with at least a modest annotation.

[45] Brahmasūtrabhāṣya 3.3.54: na hi naṭaḥ śikṣitaḥ san svaskandham adhirokṣyati. Cf. also Jacob 1907, vol. 2, p. 44.

Of the translations into European languages other than English, we have used three in particular. The first of these is Gorresio's elegant Italian translation of his own edition of the Bengal recension produced by Stamperia Reale di Francia from 1847–1870.[46] This work is of special importance for it is virtually the only translation available of a text other than the two versions of the southern commentators' text. It also includes an apparatus in the form of a modest annotation. This latter, moreover, is perhaps the only annotation to make extensive use of the northern commentator Lokanātha (Cl). Gorresio's notes served as our source for the observations of this commentator.

We have also consulted the somewhat stilted French translation of Roussel (1903), which rather routinely follows the text of Ct and, so far as we can determine, that scholiast's interpretations. One troubling feature of Roussel's translation is his tendency to leave most Sanskrit terms for classes of beings, realia, and so forth, untranslated and thereby avoid certain difficult interpretive decisions. Thus, for example, where it is important to know whether the term nāga refers to an elephant or one of the mythical dragonlike serpents of Indian myth and legend, Roussel simply keeps the Sanskrit term in his translation.

We have also paid careful attention to the contemporary French translation of the Yuddhakāṇḍa prepared and annotated by Brigitte Pagani (1999) under the direction of Madeleine Biardeau and Marie-Claude Porcher. This work appeared in print after the publication of our Sundarakāṇḍa, and therefore we were able to consult it only for the present volume. The work is based explicitly, and, we believe, unfortunately, on the so-called vulgate text associated with [46] Or so the press is identified in the translation of the Bāla- and Ayodhyākāṇḍas (1847). It is referred to variously in subsequent volumes as the Stamperia Imperiale (Araṇya-, Kiṣkindhā-, Sundara-, and Yuddhakāṇḍas) and the Stamperia Nazionale (Uttarakāṇḍa).

the Tilaka commentary of Nāgojibhaṭṭa (Ct) as it is published—albeit with the variant readings of the texts of the commentators Govindarāja (Cg) and Śivasahāya (Cr)—by the Gujarati Printing Press. As noted above, the apparatus of the critical edition (a version rejected by Biardeau et al.) as well as a careful reading of the poem clearly show the text of Ct to be inferior to that of Cg.[47] The translation is generally lucid and readable although, as suggested below, it sometimes appears overly indebted to Roussel. The translation is accompanied by a certain degree of annotation much of which is useful. It has considerably less density, however, than a text of this significance and complexity should perhaps provoke. Some of the notes also seem to wander into undocumented and occasionally less than germane cultural issues.

Our reading of the translations of the Book into European languages has brought to the fore a number of apparent connections that link several of them. Gorresio's great mid-nineteenth-century edition, translation, and annotation of the Bengal recension no doubt made a significant impression on subsequent scholarship on and translations of the Rāmāyaṇa. The work would surely have been known to Roussel. Although Roussel's early-twentieth-century translation is based on the rather different southern text of Ct, the French work in a number of places appears to have been influenced by the Italian, and not always to the benefit of the former. In fact, Roussel's translation occasionally diverges from the southern text and appears to follow a northern variant or, at any rate, Gorresio's rendition of the passage, and it is difficult to find an explanation for this other than that Roussel was influenced by Gorresio.[48]

Whereas Roussel's translation thus displays what appears to be the influence of his Italian predecessor, it has itself exerted considerable influence on some of its successors. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the 1959 translation of Hari Prasad Shastri. Shastri was a renowned Sanskrit scholar well versed in a number of European and Asian languages, and his version of the southern recension (basically Ct's), published in London in 1929 by Shanti Sadan, the Yoga and Vedanta center founded by Shastri, has long been the most accessible and readable complete English translations of the poem.

[47] For Biardeau's justification of the selection of the GPP text, see Biardeau 1999, pp. lii–lvi.

[48] For examples of this phenomenon, see notes to 6.9313; 6.98.2,21,23; 6.116.11.

However, a careful reading of the various translations cited above makes it abundantly clear that Shastri, for some reason, relied heavily on the work of Roussel, and to a lesser extent that of Dutt.[49] This is frequently evident in the choice and order of words Shastri employs, which often replicate those of Roussel's French. Moreover, it becomes painfully obvious in those cases where Roussel is clearly in error, having misread or misunderstood the text, and Shastri's translation replicates the mistake. Examples of this, alas, are far too numerous either to ascribe to coincidence or to fully list here. A few examples will have to suffice.

At 6.78.24–26, the text refers to "another arrow, the greatest of all (anyaṃ mārgaṇaśreṣṭham)." Literally this would be translated as "another excellent arrow." Roussel,[50] evidently misreading the devanāgarī character "n (न्)" of anya, "another," for a "v (व्)," mistakenly understands the missile in question to be called "the Avya." This unfortunate error is replicated by Shastri,[51] who translates this as "the Avya Weapon." The critical apparatus records no such variant.[52]

Again, at 6.3.15, Roussel appears to have misread the term pañktibhiḥ, "with rows or lines," as if it were pañcabhiḥ, "with five." He therefore translates it as "D'énormes constructions, disposées par cinq."[53] Shastri follows this erroneous reading with the even more extraordinary translation "and five great cannons" (1959, vol. 3, p. 7).[54]

Roussel's influence, not surprisingly, is also apparent in Pagani's translation. Although such cases are rather less common than in Shastri, by no means are they rare, and in several cases where Shastri has followed Roussel's questionable, even erroneous, renderings, Pagani has done so as well.

[49] For Shastri's reliance on Dutt, see, for example, notes to 6.23.19,22; 6.26.16,24, passim.
[50] Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 300.
[51] Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 265. See note to 6.78.24–26.
[52] For another particularly clear and striking example of this, see notes to 6.109.17–19. See also notes to 6.2.13; 6.3.15,20; note 2 to 177* following note to 6.11.16; 6.15.24; 6.17.16–19; 6.18.16–17; 6.20.6; 6.23.19,22; 6.26.16,24, passim.
[53] Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 6.
[54] Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 7. See, too, notes to 6.33.20; 6.34.8; 6.35.10; etc.

One example is the rendering of the vulgate passage numbered 2082* in the critical edition, which occurs after verse 6.90.4. There Roussel appears to misunderstand the appositional karmadhāraya compound vacomṛtam, "nectarlike words," literally, "speech-nectar." He renders, "cette parole des Immortels." In this he is followed both by Shastri, who translates "the words of the Immortals"[55] and by Pagani, who offers "la remarque des Immortels."[56] Once again, such frequent similarities cannot be the result of coincidence.[57]

A final word on translations into Indian languages is in order. In meeting dozens of Indian Rāmāyaṇa scholars from every part of India and examining collections in research libraries in various centers of learning, we were deeply impressed, even awed, by the enormous scholarship and energy that has gone into translations of the epic into most of the major regional languages of the country. We often had the opportunity to meet with such scholars and discuss with them difficult points of Rāmāyaṇa interpretation only to learn that they themselves had translated the great epic into Hindi, Kannada, Telugu, Marathi, or other Indian languages. Although we have read through some portions of those translations in the Indian languages we can read, we have been closed off from others by our own ignorance of the languages into which they have been rendered.

We found, moreover, that it was difficult to use Indian-language translations to resolve many of the really difficult or disputed portions of the Rāmāyaṇa text because of the enormous degree to which Sanskrit has permeated the lexica of Indian languages, both Indo-Aryan and Dravidian, especially at the level of the literary discourse typically used to translate epic Sanskrit. We soon discovered that when the interpretation of a term is difficult or is hard to isolate with precision from a cluster of possible meanings, each of which may have its partisans among the commentators, the tendency of scholars translating into Indian languages is simply to replicate the Sanskrit word in the translation. Without a dense annotation, such a procedure left us no further along in our effort to hone in on the poet's probable intention. Nonetheless, although we did not rely heavily on such translations, we often availed ourselves of the generosity of their authors and the many other scholars learned in the Rāmāyaṇa whom we have been fortunate enough to meet during our years of research in India.

[55] Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 297.
[56] Pagani 1999, p. 1148. Cf. note to 6.90.5–7.
[57] See, too, for example, notes to 6.14.11; 6.15.24; 6.20.6; 6.23.19; 6.31.61; 6.31.75; 6.31.85; 6.32.2; 6.33.2; 6.35.5; 6.38.30; 6.40.34; 6.41.35; 6.43.24; 6.44.22; 6.45.23; 6.51.22; 6.52.14; 6.55.40; 6.55.87; 6.55.127.

YUDDHAKĀṆḌA

Sarga 1

1. When Rāma had heard Hanumān's report, so faithfully rendered, he was delighted and responded in these words:

2. "Hanumān has performed an enormous feat, difficult to accomplish in this world, which no one else on the face of the earth would be able to do, even in his imagination.

3. "For apart from Garuḍa and Vāyu I know of no one other than Hanumān who could cross the vast ocean.

4–5. "The citadel of Laṅkā is well guarded by Rāvaṇa and so is unassailable by gods, dānavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, great serpents, and rākṣasas. Who, relying on his own strength, could possibly enter it and emerge alive? Who, indeed, could enter that unassailable citadel, well guarded by the rākṣasas, unless he were so endowed with might and valor as to be the equal of Hanumān?

6. "In thus putting forth his own power, which is commensurate with his valor, Hanumān has performed a truly great service for Sugrīva.

7. "A servant who, assigned a difficult task by his master, loyally carries it out is considered to be the best type of servant.

8. "A servant, given an assignment, who, even though fit and competent, fails to carry out the business of the king single-mindedly is considered to be the worst type of servant.

9. "Given this assignment, Hanumān did what he had to do without disgracing himself. What is more, Sugrīva is satisfied.

10. "The discovery of Vaidehī has preserved powerful Lakṣmaṇa, the House of Raghu, and myself from unrighteousness.

11. "But wretched as I am, it pains my heart still more that I cannot, here and now, return a commensurate favor to this bearer of good news.

12. "Yet let me give to great Hanumān this embrace, which is all the wealth I have at this time.

13. "Thus far, the search for Sītā has gone well in every regard, but now that we confront the ocean, my mind once again gives way to despair.

14. "The ocean, with its vast waters, is impossible to cross. How in the world are all the tawny monkeys going to reach its southern shore?

15. "Even though this news about Vaidehī has been reported to me, what on earth are we to do next to get the tawny monkeys to the farther shore of the ocean?"

16. When great-armed Rāma, the slayer of his foes, had spoken in this fashion to Hanumān, he was distracted by sorrow and fell to brooding.

The end of the first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 2

1. Then majestic Sugrīva spoke these words to Rāma, Daśaratha's son, who was stricken with grief, dispelling his sorrow.

2. "Why do you grieve, hero, like some other, ordinary man? Don't be like that! Abandon your grief, as an ingrate does friendship.

3. "I see no grounds for your sorrow, Rāghava, since we have received news, and we know the enemy's lair.

4. "You are resolute, learned in the śāstras, wise, and erudite. Give up this reprehensible attitude, Rāghava, as a man of resolute mind does a thought that undermines his purpose.

5. "We shall leap across the ocean infested with huge sharks, scale the battlements of Laṅkā, and slay your enemy!

6. "All the undertakings of a person who lacks resolve, who is despondent, and whose mind is overwhelmed by sorrow fail utterly; and so, he comes to grief.

7. "All the leaders of my troops of tawny monkeys are valorous and powerful. In order to please you, they are determined even to enter fire.

8–9. "I am absolutely certain of this; I can tell by their excitement. Rāghava, you must arrange it so that a bridge is constructed such that we may reach the city of the rākṣasa king, and that, through my valor, I may slay the enemy and bring back Sītā.

10. "From the very moment that we see the city of Laṅkā, set on the peak of Mount Trikūṭa, you may consider Rāvaṇa to be as good as slain in battle.

11. "As soon as a bridge to Laṅkā has been built over the ocean and the whole army has crossed over, you may claim victory.

12. "For these tawny monkeys are valorous in battle and can take on any form at will. So, your majesty, enough of this craven attitude, so destructive to all endeavors.

13. "In this world, grief saps a man's valor. But, wise Rāma, now is the time for you to resort energetically to strength, which is the proper recourse of a man who relies on valor.

14. "For surely, in the case of death or disappearance, grief vitiates all the efforts of great and valorous men like you.

15. "You are foremost among the wise and expert in the essence of all the śāstras. And, together with comrades like me, you must now defeat your enemy.

16. "For I cannot think of anyone in all the three worlds, Rāghava, who can stand before you in battle once you take your bow in hand.

17. "Entrusted to the monkeys, your mission shall not fail. Soon you shall cross the inexhaustible ocean and find Sītā.

18. "So enough of giving way to grief, lord of the earth. Unleash your anger! Passive kshatriyas fare badly; but everyone fears the impetuous.

19. "It is in order to cross the dreadful ocean, lord of rivers, that you have come here with us. You have a subtle mind, you should consider how to accomplish this.

20. "For these tawny monkeys are valorous in battle and can take on any form at will. They will smash their enemies with volleys of boulders and trees.

*21. "In one way or another, we shall reach Rāvaṇa's abode. And then, what more is to be said? You shall be completely victorious."

The end of the second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

* An asterisk (*) in the translation indicates that the verse contains a proposed emendation. See Introduction, p. 99.

Sarga 3

1. When Kākutstha had heard Sugrīva's reasonable speech and grasped its essential meaning, he concurred and then spoke to Hanumān:

2. "Whether by building a bridge or even drying up the ocean, in one way or another, I will be able to cross the sea quickly.

3–4. "Tell me, monkey, how many defenses does the fortress of Laṅkā have? The size of the army, the fortification of the gates, the defensive works of Laṅkā, and the residences of the rākṣasas: I wish to know about all of this as if I had seen it for myself.

5. "In Laṅkā you were able to reconnoiter carefully and at will. Now you must tell me everything exactly as it is, for you are in every way well qualified to do so."

6. Upon hearing Rāma's words, Hanumān, son of Māruta and foremost among the eloquent, spoke to him once more in these words:

7. "Listen, and I will tell you everything about the arrangement of the defensive works—how the city of Laṅkā is protected and how it is defended by its troops."

8–39*. When he had spoken in this fashion, the foremost of monkeys began accurately to describe the fearsome nature of the sea, the extraordinary wealth of Laṅkā, the disposition of its massive numbers of troops, and a detailed description of its mounts and vehicles.

9. "The vast city of Laṅkā is joyous and filled with crowds of happy rākṣasas. It is full of chariots and rutting elephants.

10. "It has four gateways, lofty and broad, whose gates are firmly fastened with massive iron bars.

11. "On its ramparts, there are huge and powerful devices for hurling stones. Any enemy force approaching there would be driven back by them.

12. "Around the gateways, the hosts of valorous rākṣasas have constructed hundreds of sharp, fearsome hundred-slayers made of black iron and fully deployed.

13. “Its rampart is made of gold. It is immense and impossible to scale. Its interior is studded with gemstones, coral, lapis, and pearls.

14. “All around it there are moats—deep, fearsome, and menacing—their icy waters full of crocodiles and teeming with fish.

15. “At their gates, there are four extremely long bridges equipped with many huge instruments of war crowded one upon the other.

16. “Those bridges protect the city at those points. For should hostile troops approach, they would be cast into the moats on every side by the instruments of war emplaced upon them.

17. “One bridge, in particular, is solid, strong, and extremely stable. It is adorned with many pilings and watchtowers, all made of gold.

18. “Rāvaṇa is always in full command of himself, Rāma. Always ready for battle, he is both energetic and vigilant in inspecting his troops.

19. “The citadel of Laṅkā is not to be scaled. It is inaccessible even to the gods. It is fearsome with its fourfold defenses: its rivers, mountains, forests, and defensive constructions.

20. “It is situated far off, on the other side of the vast ocean. Yet, Rāghava, the sea has no navigable passage there, for the way is all uncharted.

21. “Built on a mountaintop, the city is as inaccessible as the city of the gods. Filled with war-horses and elephants, Laṅkā is supremely difficult to conquer.

22. “Iron clubs, hundred-slayers, and various other instruments of war adorn Laṅkā, the city of evil-minded Rāvaṇa.

23. “On one side, at the western gate, ten thousand unassailable rākṣasas are stationed. They all bear lances and fight with their swords in the vanguard.

24. “On the next side, at the southern gate, a hundred thousand rākṣasas are stationed along with an army, complete with all four divisions. They, too, are unsurpassed fighters.

25. “Next, at the eastern gate, are stationed a million rākṣasas. Bearing shields and swords, they are all adept in the use of every missile.

26. "Finally, at the northern gate, ten million rākṣasas—chariot-warriors and cavalry—are stationed. They are the sons of noble families and are treated with great respect.

27. "The central encampment is garrisoned by ten million unassailable yātudhānas and an even greater number of rākṣasas.

28. "I have smashed those bridges and filled in the moats. I have burned the city of Laṅkā and leveled its ramparts.

29. "By one means or another, we shall cross the ocean, the abode of Varuṇa. Then you may regard the city of Laṅkā as destroyed by the monkeys.

30. "Here are Aṅgada, Dvivida, Mainda, Jāmbavān, Panasa, Nala, and General Nīla. What need have you for the rest of the army?

31. "For once, leaping through the air, those monkeys reach Rāvaṇa's great city with its ramparts and palaces, they will bring back Maithilī.

32. "You must at once command the entire army to that effect. You must select a propitious moment to set forth."

The end of the third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 4

1. When truly valorous Rāma of immense blazing energy had duly listened to Hanumān's speech from beginning to end, he said:

2. "I can immediately destroy Laṅkā, the city of the fearsome rākṣasa, which you have had described. This is the truth I am telling you.

3. "I wish to set forth this very moment, Sugrīva, for the sun, maker of day, has reached its zenith, and the propitious juncture called Vijaya is at hand.

4."Moreover, today is the day of the lunar asterism Uttarāphalgunī. Tomorrow the moon will enter the asterism Hasta. So let us set forth, Sugrīva, surrounded by the entire army.

5. "The omens that appear to me are auspicious. I shall slay Rāvaṇa and bring back Sītā Jānakī.

6. "For the upper lid of my eye is throbbing, foretelling, it seems, victory, the fulfillment of my desire.

7. "Let Nīla, accompanied by one hundred thousand swift monkeys, go in advance of the army to scout the way.

8. "General Nīla, you must at once lead your army by a route rich in fruit, roots, and honey and furnished with cool groves and waters.

9. "But you must be constantly vigilant and guard the roots, fruit, and water along the way against the evil rākṣasas, who might poison them.

10. "As your forest-dwelling monkeys leap all around, let them be on the lookout for enemy forces that may be hidden in hollows, swamps, and thickets.

11. "Let the mighty lions among monkeys in their hundreds and thousands lead the fearsome vanguard of the army, which resembles the surge of the sea.

12. "Let mountainlike Gaja, powerful Gavaya, and Gavākṣa march before them, like haughty bulls before their cows.

13. "Let the monkey Ṛṣabha, a bull among monkeys and a lord of the leaping monkeys, march guarding the right flank of the monkey army.

14. "And let swift Gandhamādana, as irresistible as an unrivaled war-elephant, march forth commanding the left flank of the monkey army.

15. "I myself shall go forth at the center of the army, mounted on Hanumān, like lord Indra on Airāvata, urging on the vast host.

16. "And let Lakṣmaṇa here, who resembles Yama, ender of all things, go forth on Aṅgada, like Kubera, the ruler of the yakṣas and lord of wealth, on Sārvabhauma.

17. "Let these three, Jāmbavān the mighty king of the apes, Suṣeṇa, and the monkey Vegadarśin, guard the rear."

18. When he had heard Rāghava's words, Sugrīva, that bull among monkeys and the commander of the army, gave those orders to the powerful monkeys.

19. Then all the troops of monkeys, eager for battle, leaping up, came bounding swiftly from their caves and mountaintops.

20. Thus honored by the monkey king and Lakṣmaṇa, righteous Rāma, together with his army, set out toward the south.

21. He set out surrounded by tawny monkeys resembling elephants. They numbered in the hundreds, the tens of thousands, the hundreds of thousands, and the tens of millions.

22. The vast host of tawny monkeys followed him as he set forth.

23–24. Excited and filled with joy, all the leaping monkeys, leaping outward and onward, bellowing, roaring, and howling, marched toward the south under Sugrīva's command, eating fruit and fragrant honey and carrying huge trees laden with masses of blossoms.

25. In their wild exuberance, they would carry one another about. Then they would suddenly throw down those being carried. Some would fall down, then leap up and knock the others down.

26. In the presence of Rāghava, the tawny monkeys bellowed, "We shall surely kill Rāvaṇa and all the night-roaming rākṣasas."

27. Mighty Ṛṣabha, Nīla, and Kumuda, along with many monkeys, scouted the path ahead of them.

28. In the center marched King Sugrīva, Rāma, and Lakṣmaṇa, those crushers of their foes, surrounded by many powerful and fearsome monkeys.

29. The heroic, tawny monkey Śatabali, surrounded by one hundred million troops, took over the sole supervision and protection of the entire army of tawny monkeys.

30. With their retinues of billions of monkeys, Kesarin, Panasa, Gaja, and mighty Arka each guarded one of the army's flanks.

31. Then, placing Sugrīva at their head, Suṣeṇa and Jāmbavān, surrounded by many apes, guarded the tail end of the army.

32. And that bull among monkeys, Nīla, their heroic general, foremost in leaping, moving swiftly about, guarded the army on every side.

33. The heroes Darīmukha, Prajaṅgha, Jambha, and the monkey Rabhasa moved about everywhere, urging the leaping monkeys onward.

34. As they were proceeding in this fashion, those tigers among monkeys, proud of their strength, beheld the magnificent Sahya mountains covered with trees and creepers.

35. That fearsome army of monkeys, vast as the ocean's flood, streamed onward with a mighty roar, like the ocean in its dreadful rush.

36. All those heroic elephants among monkeys who flanked Dāśarathi leapt swiftly onward, like excellent steeds spurred on.

*37. As they were being carried along by the two monkeys, the two bulls among men resembled the sun and moon in conjunction with two great planets.

38. Mounted on Aṅgada, Lakṣmaṇa, bold and learned in the traditional texts, his quest certain of success, addressed Rāma in a sweet voice:

39. "You will swiftly slay Rāvaṇa and recover Vaidehī, whom he has abducted. Then, your goals accomplished, you will return to prosperous Ayodhyā.

40. "For I perceive significant and auspicious omens in the sky and on earth, Rāghava, all of which presage the success of your quest.

41. "An auspicious breeze, favorable and pleasant, is blowing in the direction of the army's march, and birds and wild animals are calling continually with sweet voices.

42. "It is clear in all directions, and the sun, maker of day, is bright. The Bhārgava Uśanas is shining with bright rays behind you.

43. "The constellation Brahmarāśi is clear as are the Great Seers, which, shining brightly, all encircle and illuminate Dhruva, the North Star.

44. "The royal sage Triśaṅku, the foremost among the forefathers of our great Ikṣvāku lineage, is shining brightly together with his preceptor.

45. “The twin stars, the two Viśākhās, most significant of constellations for our great Ikṣvāku lineage, shine brightly, boding no ill.

46. “But the constellation of those rākṣasas, sons of chaos, Mūla, whose regent is Nirṛti, is occluded. Crossed by a nearby comet, it is eclipsed.

47. “All of this presages the destruction of the rākṣasas. For the constellations of those who are in the grip of death are always occluded by inimical planets at the hour of their doom.

48. “The water is clear and sweet; the forest is laden with fruit. Fragrant breezes blow briskly, and the trees are filled with the blossoms of the season.

49. “Arrayed in battle formations, my lord, the monkey armies are as resplendent as were the armies of the gods during the battle in which Tāraka was slain.

50. “Considering these things, noble brother, you should be pleased.” Thus did Saumitri in his delight speak, reassuring his brother.

51. Then that vast host filled with those tigers among the apes and monkeys—whose weapons were their fangs and claws—advanced, covering all the land.

52. And the dust raised by the monkeys with their fore and hind feet covered the earthly world blocking out the light of the sun.

53. Day and night the vast host of tawny monkeys marched. Under the protection of Sugrīva, the army was excited and jubilant.

54. Eager for battle, all the monkeys marched swiftly. Anxious to rescue Sītā, they did not rest anywhere, not even for a moment.

55. At length they reached the Sahya and then the Malaya mountains, dense with trees and abounding in all sorts of wild creatures.

56. Viewing the variegated woodlands and the streams and waterfalls, Rāma passed through the Sahya and Malaya ranges.

57. And the leaping monkeys broke down many trees—campakas, tilakas, mangos, aśokas, sinduvārakas, karavīras, and timiśas.

58. Intoxicated with their strength, the monkeys ate the fruits, fragrant as nectar, roots, and the blossoms of the trees.

59. The monkeys, as tawny as honey, went along happily drinking from the honeycombs, which hung down as big as bushels.

60. And so those bulls among leaping monkeys went on their way, smashing trees and trailing creepers, devastating the lofty hills.

61. Some of the monkeys, exhilarated with the honey-wine, bellowed from the trees. Others climbed up trees while still others threw themselves down.

62. Covered with those bulls among the tawny monkeys, the earth looked as if it were covered with fields of ripened winter rice.

63. Then, when great-armed Rāma, his eyes resembling blue lotuses, reached Mount Mahendra, he climbed to its summit, which was adorned with trees.

64. And when Rāma, son of Daśaratha, had climbed to the summit, he saw the ocean, the abode of waters, full of turtles and fish.

65. And so at last, having traversed the Sahya range and the great Malaya mountains, they reached the dreadful-sounding sea in good order.

66. Then, descending, Rāma, foremost of those who inspire delight, moved swiftly to a lovely grove near the shore accompanied by Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa.

67. Reaching the broad shore, whose stony surface was washed by the surging waves, Rāma spoke these words:

*68. "Sugrīva, we have reached the ocean, Varuṇa's abode. Here and now our earlier concern arises once again.

69. "Beyond this point lies only the boundless ocean, lord of rivers. Without some extraordinary measure, it is impossible to cross it.

70. "Therefore, we should camp here and begin now to deliberate as to how the monkey army might reach the farther shore."

71. Thus, upon reaching the sea, did great-armed Rāma, in his torment over the abduction of Sītā, give the order to make camp.

72. "The time has come for us to deliberate about crossing the ocean. No one is to leave his unit for any reason whatsoever, but let some of the monkey heroes go on patrol, for we must find out what hidden dangers lie before us."

73. When Sugrīva, who was accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa, had heard those words of Rāma, he had the army make camp on the densely wooded seashore.

74. Spread out along the seashore, the army seemed almost to be a second magnificent ocean, its waters tawny as honey.

75. Anxious to reach the farther shore of the great ocean, those bulls among tawny monkeys entered a grove near the shore and made camp.

76. Having reached the great ocean, the monkey army, watching it churned up by the force of the wind, was thrilled.

77. But as they gazed upon the vast and featureless ocean, abode of Varuṇa, the lair of hosts of rākṣasas, the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys gave way to despair.

78–80. For it was dreadful with its fierce sharks and crocodiles. And now, as the day waned and the night came on, the ocean, Varuṇa's lair, agitated at the rising of the moon, was covered with reflections of its orb. It was swarming with huge crocodiles as powerful as fierce gales and with whales and whale sharks. It was teeming, it appeared, with serpents, their coils flashing. It swarmed with huge creatures and was studded with all sorts of rocks. The abode of asuras, it was fathomless, unapproachable, and impossible to cross.

81. Teeming with crocodiles and the coils of great serpents, huge waves rose and fell, churned by the winds.

82. With its great sea serpents glittering, the fearsome ocean, realm of the enemies of the gods, ever as unapproachable as the underworld known as Pātāla, resembled a scattered shower of sparks.

83. The ocean looked just like the sky, the sky just like the ocean. Ocean and sky appeared indistinguishable.

84. For the waters merged into the sky and the sky into the waters. Filled with stars and gems, respectively, they both looked exactly alike.

85. Between the sky with its scudding clouds and the ocean covered with waves passing in succession, not the slightest distinction could be found.

86. Crashing ceaselessly against one another, with a terrifying roar, the waves of the ocean, lord of rivers, sounded like mighty bherī drums in battle.

87–88. And so the great monkeys gazed upon the wind-whipped sea, the abode of waters. With the roaring of its waters and of its masses of precious stones, it was as if one with the raging gale. Whipped by the wind and swarming with hordes of huge sea creatures, the ocean with its waves appeared to be leaping into the sky in fury. With its surging waves and the roar of its waters, the ocean seemed to have gone mad.

The end of the fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 5

1. Then Nīla had the army make camp on the northern shore of the ocean, in proper fashion and according to precept, in such a way that it was well ordered and secure on every side.

2. Mainda and Dvivida, those two bulls among monkeys, themselves stood picket duty to protect the army on all sides.

3. Once the army had made camp on the shore of the ocean, lord of rivers and streams, Rāma, seeing Lakṣmaṇa beside him, said these words:

4. "They say that grief diminishes with the passage of time. But bereft as I am of the sight of my beloved, mine only increases day by day.

5. "I do not suffer because my beloved is so far away, nor even because she has been abducted. This alone is the source of all my grief: her youth is slipping away.

6. "Blow, breeze, where my beloved stays. Touch her and then touch me. For the touching of our limbs now depends on you, as on the moon depends the meeting of our glances.

7. "And this, too, lodged in my heart, brings torment to my every limb, like poison once swallowed, that, as my darling was being carried off, she must have cried out to me, 'Alas, my protector!'

8. "Night and day my body is consumed by the fire of love, whose fuel is my separation from her and whose towering flames are my constant brooding on her.

9. "I shall plunge into the ocean without you, Saumitri, and rest there. For it would be hard for the flame of desire to burn me were I to sleep in its waters.

10. "And yet, even though I long for her so much, I can survive just knowing that that lady of the lovely thighs and I still share the same earth.

11. "And like a parched rice paddy drawing water from a flooded one, I live on through knowing that she lives.

12. "Oh, when shall I defeat my enemies and gaze once more upon fair-hipped Sītā, her eyes as wide as hundred-petaled lotuses, as if upon splendid Śrī herself?

13. "And when shall I once more gently raise and kiss her lotuslike face with its full and lovely lips, as a sickly person might drink a powerful tonic?

l4. "And when will her full and close-set breasts, so like the ripe palmyra fruit, be once more pressed against me, shaking as she laughs?

15. "I am the protector of that dark-eyed woman. But now, in the clutches of the rākṣasas, like a woman without a protector, she will surely find no one to rescue her.

l6. "When will she outwit the rākṣasas, evade them, and escape, like the crescent of the hare-marked autumn moon emerging from the midst of dark storm clouds?

l7. "Although Sītā is naturally slender, she must surely now be truly emaciated what with the grief and fasting attendant upon the reversal of her fortunes.

18. "When shall I bury my arrows in the breast of the lord of the rākṣasas, so that I may bring Sītā back and thus dispel the anguish of my heart?

19. "When will virtuous Sītā, who is like a daughter of the immortal gods, clasp her arms eagerly about my neck, shedding tears of joy?

20. "When shall I instantaneously cast off this dreadful sorrow over my separation from Maithilī, as one might a soiled garment?"

2l. As wise Rāma was lamenting in this fashion, the sun, the bringer of light, set, its radiance fading at the close of day.

22. Consoled by Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma performed the evening sandhyā rite, still preoccupied with lotus-eyed Sītā and overwhelmed with sorrow.

The end of the fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 6

1. Meanwhile, when the lord of the rākṣasas had inspected the dreadful and terrifying havoc that great Hanumān, the equal of Śakra, had wrought in Laṅkā, he addressed all the rākṣasas, his face downcast in humiliation.

2. "Not only has this mere monkey breached and laid waste the impregnable citadel of Laṅkā, he has found Sītā Jānakī as well.

3. "This Hanumān has smashed the domed palace, slaughtered the leading rākṣasas, and reduced the city of Laṅkā to chaos.

4. "What, pray, am I to do? Or what would be an appropriate next step? Please tell me what would be best for us to do and what would be most effective?

5. "Those who are venerable and wise say that counsel is the cornerstone of victory. Therefore, I seek your counsel, mighty warriors, with regard to Rāma.

6. "There are three types of men in this world: the highest, the lowest, and those in between. I will now set forth the merits and demerits of each of them.

7–8. "The highest type of man, they say, is he who first takes counsel with those counselors intent upon his welfare and competent in counsel, with those friends who share his goals, or with those kinsmen who wish him well, and only then initiates undertakings such that his efforts are in harmony with the will of the gods.

9. "The man who stands in between, they say, is he who reflects upon a matter by himself, who by himself directs his thoughts to righteous action, and then carries through those actions by himself.

10. "And the lowest type of man is he who, after saying, 'I will do this,' undertakes an action—regardless of its merits and demerits and without relying on the will of the gods—and then fails to carry it through.

11. "Just as men are invariably of three types: the highest, the lowest, and those in between, so also must counsel itself be of the same three types: the highest, the lowest, and that which is in between.

12. "The highest type of counsel, they say, is when counselors are consistently of one mind through insight informed by the śāstras.

13. "The counsel that is known as that which is in between, they say, is when counselors, having adopted many different opinions, subsequently reach unanimity as to how to decide a matter.

14. "The lowest type of counsel is when counselors go on debating, one after another, each defending his own position, and no conclusive argument can bring about unanimity.

15. "Therefore, you eminent counselors should agree on some excellent and appropriate counsel for me to follow. I will follow it faithfully.

16. "For Rāma will soon march on the city of Laṅkā accompanied by thousands of heroic monkeys in order to blockade us.

17. "It is quite clear that by virtue of his power, which is equal to the task, Rāghava will easily cross the ocean together with his younger brother, his troops, and his allies.

18. "This being the case and hostilities with the monkeys being imminent, you must counsel me fully concerning the well-being of the city and the army.

The end of the sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 7

1. Addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, all those mighty rākṣasas cupped their hands in reverence and replied to him:

2. "Your majesty, we have a vast army, equipped with iron clubs, javelins, broadswords, lances, and spears. Why then do you give way to despair?

3. "Inflicting massive slaughter, you subjugated Kubera, bestower of wealth, who lives on the summit of Mount Kailāsa, surrounded by many *yakṣa*s.

4. "Despite his boasting of his alliance with Maheśvara, you defeated, in your fury, that powerful world guardian in battle, lord.

5. "Slaughtering, baffling, or capturing the yakṣa hosts, you took this flying palace from the summit of Mount Kailāsa.

6. "Seeking an alliance in fear of you, the dānava lord Maya gave you his daughter to be your wife, bull among rākṣasas.

7. "And you subdued and brought under your sway the unassailable dānava lord Madhu, arrogant in his might, the bringer of joy to Kumbhīnasī.

8. "You went to the underworld known as Rasātala, great-armed hero, where you conquered the great serpents and brought Vāsuki, Takṣaka, Śaṅkha, and Jaṭin under your sway.

9–10. "Then again, lord, you waged war for a year against those powerful and indestructible dānava heroes, with their powerful boons, and relying solely on your own might, brought them under your sway, tamer of your foes. And there you also acquired many magical powers, lord of the rākṣasas.

11. "Moreover, great-armed warrior, you defeated in battle the heroic and mighty sons of Varuṇa, who were accompanied by the four divisions of their army.

12–13. "And, your majesty, you plunged into Yama's host, a veritable ocean—with the rod of Death as its great crocodile and all studded with islands in the form of śālmali trees—and you gained a great victory, warding off Death himself. All the worlds were pleased with your brilliant fighting there.

14. "This treasure-laden earth was once filled with as many heroic kshatriyas, Śakra's equal in valor, as it is with mighty trees.

15. "This Rāghava is no match for them in battle, whether in courage, virtues, or power, and yet, your majesty, you violently assaulted and slew them, virtually invincible though they were.

16. "Your majesty, it is unimaginable that any harm could come to you from such vulgar folk. You ought not entertain any such thought in your heart. You will certainly kill Rāghava."

The end of the seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 8

1. Then the heroic rākṣasa general Prahasta, who looked like a dark storm cloud, cupped his hands in reverence and spoke these words:

2. "Even the gods, dānavas, gandharvas, piśācas, great birds, and mighty serpents are unable to withstand you in battle. What then of mere monkeys?

3. "All of us were negligent and overconfident, and thus Hanumān got the better of us. But that forest-ranging monkey will not escape with his life again so long as I live.

4. "I shall rid the entire ocean-girdled earth—its mountains, woods, and forests included—of monkeys. Just command me, sir.

5. "And, night-roaming rākṣasa, I shall set a guard against that monkey, so that you shall suffer no harm whatever as a result of your transgression."

6. Next a rākṣasa named Durmukha, in a towering rage, said, "This cannot be tolerated, for it is an attack upon us all!

7. "Moreover, this attack on the part of the monkey lord constituted an outrage against the city, the inner apartments, and the majestic lord of the rākṣasas himself.

8. "This very instant I shall single-handedly repulse the monkeys, slaying them, even if they should seek refuge in the fearsome ocean, the sky, or the underworld known as Rasātala."

9. Then, in a towering rage, powerful Vajradaṃṣṭra spoke, seizing his dreadful iron club all smeared with flesh and blood.

10. "Why do you concern yourself with this contemptible and miserable Hanumān, while the formidable Rāma, Sugrīva, and Lakṣmaṇa are close at hand?

11. "This very day, with my iron club, I shall single-handedly kill Rāma, together with Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa, and then return after routing the host of tawny monkeys."

12. Then, in a towering rage, the mighty and heroic Nikumbha Kaumbhakarṇi addressed Rāvaṇa, who makes the worlds cry out.

13. "All of you gentlemen can remain here in the company of our great king. I shall single-handedly kill Rāma as well as Lakṣmaṇa."

14. Next a rākṣasa named Vajrahanu, who was like a mountain, licking his chops with his tongue, said these words in anger:

15. "You gentlemen may go about your business as you like, free from care. I shall devour all those leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys by myself.

16. "You can amuse yourselves at your leisure, without a care, and drink honey-wine. I shall single-handedly kill Sugrīva as well as Lakṣmaṇa, Aṅgada, Hanumān, and Rāma, their leader in battle."

The end of the eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 9

1–5. Then the rākṣasas Nikumbha, Rabhasa, mighty Sūryaśatru, Suptaghna, Yajñakopa, Mahāpārśva, Mahodara, unassailable Agniketu, the rākṣasa Raśmiketu, Indrajit—the mighty and immensely powerful son of Rāvaṇa—Prahasta, Virūpākṣa, the mighty Vajradaṃṣṭra, Dhūmrākṣa, Atikāya, and the rākṣasa Durmukha, seizing iron clubs, spears, darts, javelins, lances, battle-axes, bows and arrows, and broad, sharp swords, all leapt to their feet in a towering rage and, as if blazing with their fierce energy, addressed Rāvaṇa:

6. "This very day we shall kill Rāma, as well as Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa, and that contemptible Hanumān, who dared to assault Laṅkā."

7. But Vibhīṣaṇa stopped them as they all stood there, weapons in hand, and bade them be seated once again. Then, cupping his hands in reverence, he said these words:

8. "The learned have prescribed as appropriate the use of force only on those occasions where one's object cannot be achieved by means of the other three stratagems, dear brother.

9. "And, dear brother, the use of force, even when made judiciously and in accordance with the proper injunctions, succeeds only against those who are off guard, preoccupied, or stricken by misfortune.

10. "How then can you all hope to assail someone who is vigilant, intent upon victory, firm in his strength, the master of his anger, and utterly unassailable?

11. "Who could have imagined the impossible feat that Hanumān accomplished, leaping across the fearsome ocean, the lord of rivers and streams?

12. "By no means, night-roaming rākṣasas, should we rashly underestimate our foes; for their forces and valor are immeasurable.

13. "And what offense had Rāma previously committed against the king of the rākṣasas that the latter should have abducted that illustrious man's wife from Janasthāna?

14. "Even if Rāma did kill Khara, who was attacking him, in battle, still, all living creatures must strive to the limit of their strength to save their own lives.

*15. "For this reason Vaidehī constitutes a grave danger to us. She who has been abducted must be surrendered. There is no point in acting merely to provoke a quarrel.

16. "It would therefore not be appropriate for us to engage in pointless hostility with this powerful and righteous man. You must give Maithilī back to him.

17. "You must give Maithilī back to him before, with his arrows, he lays waste to our city together with its elephants, its horses, and its myriad precious things.

18. "You must give back Sītā before this vast, dreadful, and unassailable army of tawny monkeys storms our Laṅkā.

19. "If you do not of your own free will give back Rāma's beloved wife, the city of Laṅkā and all its valiant rākṣasas will surely perish.

20. "As your kinsman, I beseech you. Do as I say. What I am telling you is both salutary and beneficial. You must give Maithilī back to him.

21. "You must give Maithilī back to Dāśaratha before he unleashes for your destruction his massive and unfailing arrows, newly tipped and fletched and resembling the rays of the autumnal sun.

22. "Give up your wrath, so destructive of both happiness and righteousness. Practice righteousness, which is conducive to pleasure and fame. Calm yourself, that we may survive together with our sons and kinsmen. You must give Maithilī back to Dāśaratha."

The end of the ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 10

1. Although Vibhīṣaṇa had uttered these sound and beneficial words, Rāvaṇa, impelled as he was by his own impending doom, replied with harsh words:

2. "One can live with one's enemy, or even with an enraged venomous serpent, but never with a false friend in the service of one's foes.

3. "I know very well the nature of kinsmen all the world over, rākṣasa. Kinsmen always take pleasure in one another's hardships.

4. "If a man is a leader, competent, learned, righteous in his conduct, and valiant, rākṣasa, then his kinsmen will malign him and bring him down.

5. "Always affecting pleasure in one's company, they turn on one in times of trouble. Concealing their true feelings, vicious kinsmen are a source of danger.

6. "There are these well-known verses that were sung once upon a time in the Padmavana by some elephants who had seen some men carrying ropes to snare them. Listen to them, as I recite them.

7. "'It is not the fire, the other weapons, or the ropes that put us in danger; it is our own vicious kin intent on their own self-interest that are the real danger to us.

8. "'For no doubt, it is they who point out the means of capturing us; therefore, we know that the danger presented by one's kin is the most severe of all.'

9. "In cattle there is wealth; in a brahman, self-restraint. In women, there is fickleness; from kinsmen, danger.

10. "And that is why, dear brother, you cannot bear it, that I am respected throughout the worlds, that I have attained universal sovereignty, and that I have set my foot on the heads of my enemies.

11. "Anyone else, night-roaming rākṣasa, who had spoken such words as these, would have died that very moment. To hell with you, you disgrace to our family."

12. Addressed in this fashion with harsh words, Vibhīṣaṇa, who had spoken justly, flew up, mace in hand, along with four other rākṣasas.

13. Then, hovering in midair, majestic Vibhīṣaṇa, roused to anger, spoke these words to his brother, the lord of the rākṣasas.

14. "You are my brother, your majesty. You can say whatever you like to me, but I will not stand for these false and abusive words of yours.

15. "Those who have lost all self-control and are already under the power of death never accept judicious advice uttered by one who wishes them well, ten-headed Rāvaṇa.

16. "It is always easy enough, your majesty, to find men who will say what will please you, but it is hard to find someone who will say or listen to what is unpleasant yet beneficial.

17. "But I could not ignore one who, like a burning house on the verge of destruction, was caught in the noose of death, which carries off all creatures.

18. "I would not like to see you slain by Rāma with his sharp arrows, ornamented with gold and resembling blazing fires.

19. "For like dikes of sand, even mighty heroes, skilled in weapons, are destroyed in battle once they fall under the power of doom.

20. "So, by all means, take care of yourself and this city with all its rākṣasas. Farewell, I am leaving. May you be happy without me.

21. "Although I have tried to dissuade you, night-roaming rākṣasa, in my desire for your well-being, my words have not found favor with you. For men whose time is at hand, whose lives are at an end, never accept the beneficial advice offered by their friends."

The end of the tenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 11

1. The moment Rāvaṇa's younger brother had finished speaking these harsh words to Rāvaṇa, he went to where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were.

2. The monkey lords standing on the ground saw him there in the sky, resembling the peak of Mount Meru and blazing like lightning.

3. When Sugrīva, the wise and unassailable lord of the monkeys, had seen him and his four companions, he deliberated with the monkeys.

4. Then, when they had deliberated for a while, he spoke these excellent words to all the monkeys, Hanumān and the rest:

5. "Look! There can be no doubt that this rākṣasa armed with every weapon and accompanied by four rākṣasas is approaching in order to kill us."

6. When they had heard Sugrīva's words, all those great monkeys picked up sāla trees and boulders, and said these words:

7. "Command us at once, your majesty, to kill these evil-minded creatures. Let them fall to the ground slain, their lives cut short."

8. Now, as they were conversing with one another, Vibhīṣaṇa reached the northern shore and hovered there in the sky.

9. Seeing Sugrīva and the other monkeys, great and wise Vibhīṣaṇa, still hovering in the sky, addressed them in resounding tones.

10. "The evil rākṣasa named Rāvaṇa is lord of the rākṣasas. I am his younger brother, and I am known as Vibhīṣaṇa.

11. "He abducted Sītā from Janasthāna after killing Jaṭāyus. Now helpless and miserable, she is imprisoned and closely guarded by rākṣasa women.

12. "With various sound arguments, I repeatedly advised him, 'You must return Sītā to Rāma straightaway.'

13. "But although he was given good advice, Rāvaṇa, impelled by his own impending doom, would not accept it, any more than a dying man will take his medicine.

14. "He spoke bitter words to me and treated me contemptuously, as if I were a servant. Therefore, I have abandoned my wife and my sons, and I have come seeking refuge with Rāghava.

15. "Please inform great Rāghava, the refuge of all the worlds, at once that I, Vibhīṣaṇa, have come to him for shelter."

16. When he had heard these words, swift-striding Sugrīva in the presence of Lakṣmaṇa addressed Rāma with great agitation.

17. "The younger brother of Rāvaṇa, known as Vibhīṣaṇa, along with four other rākṣasas, has come seeking refuge with you, sir.

18. "You must realize that Rāvaṇa has sent Vibhīṣaṇa as a spy. You always know what is appropriate, but I think it would be appropriate to take him prisoner.

19. "Cloaking himself in deception, this rākṣasa comes seeking refuge with deceitful intent and with instructions to kill you, once he has gained your trust, Rāghava.

20. "He should be put to death with harsh torture together with his ministers. For he is Vibhīṣaṇa, the brother of cruel Rāvaṇa."

21. When, in his agitation, he had spoken in this fashion to eloquent Rāma, the leader of the troops, himself skilled in speech, fell silent.

22. Upon hearing these words of Sugrīva, powerful Rāma said this to Hanumān and the rest of the tawny monkeys who stood near him.

23. "What the king of the monkeys has said regarding Rāvaṇa's younger brother is quite reasonable. You, sirs, have also heard it.

24. "When it comes to difficult matters, it is appropriate that one be advised by a friend who is intelligent, virtuous, capable, and eager for one's long-term good fortune."

25. Questioned in this fashion and desiring to act for the best, each of them gave Rāma his own opinion diligently and courteously.

26. "There is nothing in the three worlds that you do not know, Rāghava. But Rāma, out of friendship, you are questioning us in order to show us honor.

27. "You are faithful to your vows, heroic, righteous, and firm in valor. You act judiciously, are learned in traditional texts, and trust your friends wholeheartedly.

28. "Therefore, let your advisers, who are wise and capable, speak in turn on this matter giving various sound arguments."

29. When they had spoken in this fashion, the tawny monkey wise Aṅgada was the first to speak to Rāghava concerning the interrogation of Vibhīṣaṇa.

30. "Since Vibhīṣaṇa has come to us from the enemy, he must be considered suspect in every way. By no means should we too hastily regard him as worthy of our trust.

31. "For treacherous people go about concealing their true intentions, only to strike when they find an opportunity. To trust him would be a great calamity.

32. "Only after reflecting on the advantages and disadvantages should one come to a decision. One should accept a person if he is virtuous, but if he is evil one should cast him out.

33. "If we find there to be a preponderance of evil in him, we should turn him away without hesitation. But if we should find a preponderance of virtue, then we ought to accept him, your majesty."

34. But then Śarabha, having reflected, said these sensible words: "You must send a spy to him at once, tiger among men.

35. “Only after we have dispatched a spy of subtle intellect, and he has conducted an investigation, would it be appropriate to accept Vibhīṣaṇa.”

36. But then wise Jāmbavān, after reflecting on the matter with an intellect steeped in the śāstras, communicated his view, which was filled with virtues and free from defects:

37. “Vibhīṣaṇa has come at the wrong time and to the wrong place from the wicked lord of the rākṣasas, who is resolute in his hostility. Therefore, he is, by all means, to be viewed with suspicion.”

38. Next, Mainda, who was eloquent and adept in discerning good and bad policy, spoke, upon reflection, these exceedingly reasonable words:

39. “This Vibhīṣaṇa ought to be interrogated gently and gradually regarding what Rāvaṇa has to say, lord of kings.”

40. “Once you have accurately determined his intentions, then, upon reflection, you can act according to whether he is good or evil, bull among men.”

41. Then the highly cultivated Hanumān, foremost of ministers, spoke the following speech, which was polished, meaningful, mellifluous, and concise:

42. “Even Bṛhaspati himself is incapable of besting you in argument, sir, for you are superior in intellect, capable, and eloquent.

43. “Rāma, it is not in order to demonstrate my skill in disputation, my desire to outshine the others, nor out of a wish to prove myself the best, or fondness for the sound of my own voice that I shall say the following truthful words. Rather, your majesty, it is because of the gravity of the situation.

44. “I see a serious problem in what your ministers have said regarding the advantages and disadvantages here: it is impossible to put it into practice.

45. “For, on the one hand, we cannot determine whether he is trustworthy unless we employ him, but, on the other hand, it seems to me that it would be a mistake to employ him too hastily.

46. "Now as to what your ministers said about the propriety of sending out spies, that strategy is unsuitable in this case, as it lacks any purpose.

47. "It has also been argued that 'Vibhīṣaṇa has come at the wrong time and to the wrong place.' Now there is something I would like to say about this as well. Consider it from my perspective.

48–49. "This is precisely the right time and place. For him to have left an evil person to come over to a virtuous one, in light of their vices and virtues, respectively, that is, having perceived the wickedness in Rāvaṇa and the heroism in you, is perfectly appropriate and in keeping with his excellent judgment.

50. "Furthermore, it has been argued that he should be interrogated by undercover agents, your majesty. Here, too, I can offer my considered opinion.

51. "Any intelligent person who is interrogated would immediately become suspicious of the questions. Thus a welcome ally, if interrogated deceitfully, would be alienated.

52. "Moreover, your majesty, even for someone who is confident in his own ability, it is impossible immediately to determine the inner feelings of a stranger simply on the basis of what he says about himself.

53. "Still, at no time while he was speaking could one observe any signs of a wicked nature. His facial expression, moreover, was composed. For these reasons, I harbor no doubts about him.

54. "A deceitful person would not approach so confidently and without hesitation. Moreover, he is well spoken. For these reasons, one should harbor no doubts about him.

55. "It is impossible to conceal one's facial expression completely, even if one tries. And it is this that inexorably betrays the hidden intentions of men.

56. "Moreover, foremost of those who know what action should be taken, an action that is undertaken promptly and energetically and that is appropriate to the time and place quickly brings success.

57–58. "He has witnessed your mighty undertaking and the vainglory of Rāvaṇa. He has also heard about the killing of Vālin and the royal consecration of Sugrīva. He seeks the kingship for himself, and, with this in mind, he has come here. Keeping all this foremost in mind, it would be appropriate to accept him.

59. "I have argued to the best of my ability that the rākṣasa is trustworthy. Having heard this, foremost among the wise, you must be the judge of what is to follow."

The end of the eleventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 12

1. Now, when Rāma, his mind composed, had heard this speech of Hanumān, son of Vāyu, that unassailable and learned man responded with his own thoughts.

2. "I, too, have something to say with regard to Vibhīṣaṇa that I would like you, devoted as you are to my welfare, to hear in its entirety.

3. "Under no circumstances would I turn away someone who had come to me in friendship, even if he had some flaw. For the virtuous would condemn such conduct."

4. When Sugrīva, lord of the leaping monkeys, had heard Rāma Kākutstha's words, he replied to him, motivated by friendship.

5. "Knower of righteousness! Crest-jewel among kings! You are mighty and firmly established in the path of virtue. What wonder is it then that you should speak so nobly!

6. "Moreover, my heart knows that Vibhīṣaṇa is virtuous, for he has been thoroughly investigated through inference and on the basis of his probable intentions.

7. "Therefore, Rāghava, let the extremely wise Vibhīṣaṇa at once become your ally on an equal basis with us."

8. When Rāma had heard these words of Sugrīva and had considered them, he replied to that bull among the tawny monkeys in exceedingly beautiful words.

9. "Whether this night-roaming rākṣasa be thoroughly evil or virtuous, is he not utterly incapable of causing me even the slightest harm?

10. "For, lord of the hosts of tawny monkeys, if I so desired, I could slaughter the piśācas, the dānavas, the yakṣas, and all the rākṣasas on earth with the tip of my finger.

11. "There is a well-known story about a dove that showed great hospitality to an enemy who had come seeking shelter. He even offered him his own flesh.

12. "And so, best of monkeys, even a dove took in his wife's abductor who had come to him. How much more so should a person such as I?

13. "Now listen to these verses, conducive to righteousness, which were chanted long ago by the great and truthful seer Kaṇḍu, son of the seer Kaṇva.

14. " 'For the sake of compassion, scorcher of your foes, one ought never slay a poor wretch who has come for refuge, begging for protection with his hands cupped in reverence, even should he be one's enemy.

15. " 'Even at the cost of his own life, a magnanimous person should save an enemy who has come for refuge from his enemies, whether he be abject or arrogant.

16. " 'Should one fail to offer this protection to the best of one's ability and the limits of one's strength, whether through fear, confusion, or greed, that would be a sin condemned by all the world.

17. " 'Moreover, if a man who has come seeking refuge should die for want of protection while the person who could have saved him merely looks on, then the former would depart from this world taking with him the latter's good works.'

18. "Thus, it is a serious transgression to fail to protect those who come seeking shelter, for it blocks the path to heaven, destroys one's reputation, and undermines one's strength and valor.

19. "So I shall fully carry out Kaṇḍu's excellent advice, for it is righteous, beneficial to one's reputation, and, at the time of one's final reward, it leads one to heaven.

20. "I always grant protection to all beings who come to me for shelter, imploring me with the words, 'I place myself in your hands.' Such is my vow.

21. "So bring him here, Sugrīva, best of tawny monkeys, for I will grant him protection whether he be Vibhīṣaṇa or Rāvaṇa himself."

22. Then, having listened to the words of Sugrīva, the lord of men quickly welcomed Vibhīṣaṇa as he had been advised by the lord of the tawny monkeys, just as Indra, smasher of citadels, might welcome Garuḍa, the king of birds.

The end of the twelfth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 13

1. Once Rāghava had granted him protection, Rāvaṇa's younger brother, bowing humbly, descended from the sky to the earth in great delight accompanied by his devoted followers.

2. Seeking refuge, righteous Vibhīṣaṇa prostrated himself at Rāma's feet along with his four rākṣasa companions.

3. Then Vibhīṣaṇa addressed Rāma with words that were righteous, fitting, timely, and delightful.

4. "I am the younger brother of Rāvaṇa, but he has humiliated me. Thus I have come for refuge to you, sir, the refuge of all beings.

5. "I have abandoned Laṅkā, my friends, and everything I own. Now, my homeland, my life, and my happiness depend on you, sir.

6. "I shall help you kill the rākṣasas and assault Laṅkā so long as breath remains in my body, and I shall penetrate their forces."

7–8. As Vibhīṣaṇa was speaking in this fashion, Rāma embraced him and, in great delight, said to Lakṣmaṇa, "Bring some water from the ocean and, with it, anoint wise Vibhīṣaṇa as king of the rākṣasas at once, since I am so pleased with him, bestower of honor."

9. Addressed in this fashion, Saumitri, acting on Rāma's instructions, anointed Vibhīṣaṇa as king there in the midst of the monkey leaders.

10. When the leaping monkeys witnessed Rāma's graciousness, they suddenly began chattering loudly, crying, "Excellent! Excellent!"

11. Then Hanumān and Sugrīva addressed Vibhīṣaṇa, saying, "How are we to cross the ocean, the imperturbable abode of Varuṇa?"

12. "Please tell us the means whereby all of us might approach the ocean, lord of streams and rivers, the abode of Varuṇa, so that we might quickly cross over together with our troops."

13. When Vibhīṣaṇa, who knew what was right, had been addressed in this fashion, he replied, saying, "King Rāghava must solicit the help of Samudra.

14. "For it was Sagara who caused the great and immeasurable ocean to be dug; therefore, the great ocean ought to carry forward the mission of his kinsman Rāma."

15. When the wise rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa had spoken in this fashion, Rāghava, righteous by nature, found what he said to be agreeable.

16. And immensely powerful and skillful Rāma smiled and, in order to honor them, said this to Lakṣmaṇa and Sugrīva, the lord of the tawny monkeys:

17. "This counsel of Vibhīṣaṇa pleases me, Lakṣmaṇa. Now, you, together with Sugrīva, should tell me if it pleases you as well.

18. "Sugrīva is always wise, and you yourself are skilled in counsel. The two of you should consider this matter and tell me what pleases you."

19. Addressed in this fashion, the two heroes, Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa, responded with these courteous words:

20. "Why, tiger among men, would the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa not please us? For, at this moment, it seems the most feasible plan, Rāghava.

21. "Without constructing a bridge across the fearsome ocean, the abode of Varuṇa, even the gods and asuras themselves, accompanied by Indra, would be incapable of reaching Laṅkā.

22. "We should properly carry out the advice of the heroic Vibhīṣaṇa. Enough of this delay. You should petition Samudra.

23. When Rāma had been addressed in this fashion, he sat down on a bed of kuśa grass that had been spread on the shore of the ocean, lord of streams and rivers, like fire, eater of oblations, installed upon an altar.

The end of the thirteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 14

1. Three nights passed and still Rāma, keeping strictly to his vow, lay there on a bed of kuśa grass spread on the ground.

2. But although Rāma had worshiped him attentively and properly, Sāgara, being obdurate, would not manifest himself.

3. Then Rāma, the corners of his eyes red in his rage at Samudra, said these words to Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks, who stood nearby.

4. "Lakṣmaṇa, just see the arrogance of this ignoble Samudra, who will not manifest himself, even though I have worshiped him.

5. "The virtues of the good—calmness, forbearance, straightforwardness, and kind words—are always taken for signs of weakness by those who lack them.

6. "People only respect an evil, insolent person who runs about praising himself and unleashing violence on everyone.

7. "Peaceful means can no more lead to fame or glory in this world, Lakṣmaṇa, than they can to victory in the vanguard of battle.

8. "Now, Saumitri, you shall see the ocean, abode of sea monsters, with its waters choked with the dead bodies of those very creatures pierced by my arrows and floating everywhere.

9. "Here and now, Lakṣmaṇa, you shall see me cut to pieces the bodies of gigantic fish, the trunks of sea elephants, and the coils of great serpents.

10. "Now, launching a powerful assault, I shall with my arrows dry up the ocean together with its fish and sea monsters and its masses of conch and oyster shells.

11. "This lord of the ocean, abode of sea monsters, thinks that, because I am endowed with forbearance, I am weak. To hell with forbearance for people like this!

12. "Fetch my bow, Saumitri, and my arrows, which are like venomous serpents, for now in my fury I shall convulse the imperturbable ocean.

13. "With my arrows, I shall cause the wave-crested ocean, the abode of Varuṇa, which always keeps within its bounds, to overflow them violently."

14. When he had spoken in this fashion, unassailable Rāma, bow in hand and eyes flashing with anger, resembled the blazing fire at the end of a cosmic age.

15. Bending his fearsome bow, he made the world quake with his arrows. He let fly his dreadful shafts as does Indra of the hundred sacrifices, his thunderbolts.

16. Blazing with energy, those swift and excellent arrows plunged into the waters of the sea, terrifying its great serpents.

17. Then, along with a howling gale, there arose a huge and terrifying surge of the ocean, carrying with it sharks and sea monsters.

18. All at once the ocean was covered with garlands of towering waves and filled with conch and oyster shells, its waves shrouded in a vaporous haze.

19. Great serpents and the immensely powerful dānavas, who dwell in the underworld known as Pātāla, were in agony, flames shooting from their mouths and eyes.

20. Suddenly from the ocean, king of rivers, there arose thousands of waves as tall as the Vindhya or Mandara mountains and filled with sharks and sea monsters.

21. Such was the state of the ocean, the repository of all waters: its masses of waves were swirling, its rākṣasas and great serpents were terrified, and its huge crocodiles were tossed about.

The end of the fourteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 15

1. Then Samudra Sāgara himself arose from the midst of the sea. Rising together with great serpents, flames shooting from their mouths, he resembled the sun, bringer of day, rising from the great mountain Meru.

2. His complexion was that of polished lapis and he was adorned with jāmbūnada gold. His garlands and robes were red and his eyes were like lotus petals.

3. Mighty Sāgara first hailed Rāghava, who stood arrow in hand. Then, cupping his hands in reverence, he approached and said:

4. "All the elements, gentle Rāghava—earth, air, ether, water, and fire—must abide by their respective natures. They must follow the eternal path.

5. "It is thus my inherent nature to be fathomless and impossible to cross. I tell you that it would violate that nature for me to become shallow.

6. "Nor would I for any reason, prince, whether desire, greed, or fear, make solid my waters, abounding with crocodiles and sharks.

7. "I shall, however, devise some means that I can tolerate whereby the sea monsters will not attack while the army is crossing, Rāma.

8. "Here, gentle Rāma, is the majestic son of Viśvakarman, Nala by name. He is the equal of Viśvakarman and has been granted a boon by his father.

9. "This highly energetic monkey must construct a bridge over me. I shall support it, for he is just like his father."

10. When the ocean, that receptacle of waters, had spoken in this fashion, he vanished. Then the mighty Nala, foremost among the monkeys, stood up and said these words to Rāma:

11. "The ocean, that great receptacle of waters, has told you the truth. Relying upon my father's skill, I shall build a bridge across the wide ocean, abode of Varuṇa.

12. "Once, on Mount Mandara, Viśvakarman granted my mother a boon. I am the equal of Viśvakarman, for I am his legitimate son.

13. "But I could not proclaim my own virtues without being called upon. Very well, let the bulls among monkeys construct a bridge this very day."

14. Then, with Rāma's permission, all the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys rushed excitedly into the great forest by the hundreds and the thousands.

15. There those monkeys, bulls among the hosts of tree-dwelling monkeys, resembling mountains, broke down trees and dragged them to the sea.

16–17. The monkeys filled the sea with bamboo and sāla, aśvakarṇa, dhava, kuṭaja, arjuna, palmyra, tilaka, timiśa, bilvaka, saptaparṇa, flowering karṇikāra, mango, and aśoka trees.

18. Holding aloft those tree trunks, with and without their roots, like so many flagstaffs of Indra, the foremost among the tawny monkeys carried off the trees.

19. Heaved up violently by the boulders hurled into it, the water rose into the sky and cascaded down on all sides.

20. Nala constructed a great bridge, ten leagues in width and one hundred in length, right through the middle of the ocean, lord of rivers and streams.

21. Then, in the ocean, the great receptacle of waters, there arose a tumultuous sound from the boulders being hurled into it and the mountains being cast down.

22. The bridge that Nala constructed over the ocean, abode of sea monsters, was as majestic and splendid as the path of the constellation Svātī through the heavens.

23. Then the gods, gandharvas, perfected beings, and supreme seers gathered and hovered in the sky, eager to witness that marvel.

24. The leaping monkeys were bounding, bellowing, and leaping. All beings gazed upon that inconceivable, seemingly impossible, and hair-raising marvel: the building of a bridge over the ocean.

25. And so, constructing that bridge over the sea, those hundreds of billions of immensely powerful monkeys reached the farther shore of the ocean, the great receptacle of the waters.

26. Broad, well-built, majestic, smooth-surfaced, and beautifully proportioned, the great bridge resembled a dividing line in the midst of the ocean.

27. Then, mace in hand, Vibhīṣaṇa, together with his ministers, took up his position on the farther shore of the sea in order to ward off the enemy.

28. Carrying his bow, righteous and majestic Rāma marched at the head of the army, accompanied by Sugrīva.

29. Some of the leaping monkeys marched down the center of the bridge, while others moved along the edges; some dove into the water, while others could find no space in which to march. Still others, moving through the sky, flew like great birds.

30. As it crossed, the terrifying army of tawny monkeys drowned out with its loud roar the terrifying roar rising from the ocean.

31. Once the army of monkeys had crossed by means of Nala's bridge, it made camp, together with its king, on the shore in a spot well provided with roots, fruits, and fresh water.

32. When the gods, along with the perfected beings and celestial bards, had witnessed that marvelous and seemingly impossible feat of Rāma Rāghava, they approached him in the company of the great seers and anointed him, one after the other, with holy water.

33. "May you conquer your enemies, lord of men, and long may you rule the earth and the seas." With various auspicious blessings such as this, they did homage to Rāma, who was honored by gods and men.

The end of the fifteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 16

1. When Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, had crossed the ocean with his army, majestic Rāvaṇa addressed two of his ministers, Śuka and Sāraṇa:

2. "A whole host of monkeys has crossed the impassable ocean, and Rāma has done something unprecedented in building a bridge across the sea.

3. "I would never have believed that a bridge could be built over the ocean. Nonetheless, I must now obtain an accurate count of the monkey army.

4–7. "You two gentlemen must infiltrate the monkey army undetected. There you must accurately determine its size and strength, who the leaders of the leaping monkeys are, which counselors are most highly regarded by Rāma and Sugrīva, which ones lead the way, and which of the leaping monkeys are truly heroic. You must also find out how the bridge was constructed over the ocean, that great body of water, and how the great monkeys are bivouacked. In addition, you must determine the resolve, strength, and weaponry of Rāma and heroic Lakṣmaṇa.

8. "Who is the commander of these immensely powerful monkeys? When you have accurately determined all of this, you must return swiftly."

9. When Śuka and Sāraṇa had been instructed in this fashion, those two heroic rākṣasas took on the form of tawny monkeys and infiltrated the monkey army.

10. But Śuka and Sāraṇa were unable to count that hair-raising and inconceivably vast host of monkeys.

11. For it filled the mountaintops, caverns, and caves, as well as the shores of the sea, the forests, and the parklands.

12. On every side that vast army was raising a terrifying din. Part of it was crossing the ocean, part had already crossed, while yet another part remained anxious to do so. Part had already made camp, while another was in the process of doing so.

13. Then immensely powerful Vibhīṣaṇa recognized Śuka and Sāraṇa, even though they were disguised. He seized them and then reported to Rāma, saying, "Conqueror of enemy citadels, two spies have come from Laṅkā."

14. When they saw Rāma, they began to tremble and despaired of their lives. Terrified, cupping their hands in supplication, they addressed him with these words:

15. "The two of us have come here, kind sir, delight of the Raghus, because we were dispatched by Rāvaṇa in order to gather intelligence about your entire army."

16. When Daśaratha's son Rāma, who was devoted to the welfare of all beings, had heard this speech of theirs, he smiled and said these words:

17. "If you have finished inspecting the entire army and have carefully examined us, and if you have carried out your mission as you were instructed, then you may return as you please.

18. "And you two must enter the city of Laṅkā and there address these words of mine exactly as I tell you to the king of the rākṣasas, younger brother of Kubera, the bestower of wealth.

19. "'Now, together with your army and your kinsmen, you may demonstrate as you please the valor on which you relied when you carried off my Sītā.

20. "'But tomorrow at the proper moment you shall see the city of Laṅkā, along with its gates and ramparts as well as the rākṣasa army, destroyed by me with my arrows.

21. "'Muster your forces, Rāvaṇa! For tomorrow at the proper moment I shall unleash my dreadful wrath upon you, just as Vāsava, the wielder of the vajra, did upon the dānavas.'"

22. When Śuka and Sāraṇa had been instructed in this fashion, the two rākṣasas returned to the city of Laṅkā and addressed the lord of the rākṣasas:

23. "Lord of the rākṣasas, we were captured by Vibhīṣaṇa, and, although we deserved to die, righteous Rāma of immeasurable power released us the moment he saw us.

24–26. "Those four bulls among warriors—majestic Rāma Dāśarathi, Lakṣmaṇa, Vibhīṣaṇa, and the powerful Sugrīva, whose valor equals that of great Indra—are as heroic, skilled in weaponry, and firm in their valor as the divine guardians of the worlds. Since they are assembled in one place, they themselves are capable of uprooting the city of Laṅkā with its ramparts and gates and hurling it far away, even without all these monkeys.

27. "Rāma's appearance and weapons are such that he will be able to lay waste the city of Laṅkā all by himself, even without those other three.

28. "And the army, protected by Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and Sugrīva, seemed as if it were completely unassailable even by all the gods and asuras.

29. "Moreover, this army consists of great forest-dwelling monkeys, who are wildly excited and eager for battle. So enough of this hostility! You must make peace. You must return Maithilī to Daśaratha's son."

The end of the sixteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 17

1. When King Rāvaṇa had heard the sound words that Sāraṇa had courageously uttered, he replied to him:

2. "Even if the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas should assault me, I would not give up Sītā, not for fear of all the worlds.

3. "Now you, my good man, are terrified because the tawny monkeys got the better of you. So now you think it would be best to give back Sītā. But what rival can possibly get the better of me in battle?"

4. When majestic Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, had uttered these harsh words, he ascended to the top of his snow-white palace, many tālas in height, in his desire to see for himself.

5. Accompanied by his two spies, Rāvaṇa, beside himself with rage, gazed about him at the ocean, the mountains, and the forests and saw that the land was completely covered with leaping monkeys.

6. As King Rāvaṇa gazed upon that vast army of monkeys, boundless and innumerable, he questioned Sāraṇa:

7. "Which among these monkey leaders are heroic? Which are very powerful? Which ones, filled with great energy, always lead the way in battle?"

8. "Which ones' advice does Sugrīva heed? And who are the leaders of the troop leaders? You must tell me all of this, Sāraṇa. Who are the leaders of the leaping monkeys?"

9. Upon hearing these words of the rākṣasa lord, who was questioning him, Sāraṇa, familiar with the leaders of the forest-dwelling monkeys, began to describe them.

10–12. "That monkey who stands bellowing before Laṅkā, surrounded by a hundred thousand troop leaders, and whose mighty roaring makes all of Laṅkā with its ramparts and gateways, its mountains, forests, and groves tremble, is the heroic troop leader named Nīla. He stands at the head of the army of great Sugrīva, lord of all the tree-dwelling monkeys.

13–15. "That powerful one, stretching out his forelegs and stalking the earth on his hind legs, ever showing his fangs toward Laṅkā in his rage, the one who resembles a mountain peak, who is the color of lotus filaments, and who, furious, lashes his tail repeatedly, the sound of which makes, so it seems, the ten directions resound, he is known as Aṅgada, and he has been consecrated heir apparent by the monkey king Sugrīva. He is summoning you to battle.

16–19. "And those bulls among tawny monkeys who are bracing their limbs, roaring and bellowing, leaping up and showing their fangs in rage are dreadful, fierce, of fierce valor, and impossible to withstand. Their number is ten billion eight hundred thousand. They are the heroic denizens of the sandalwood forest. The one whom they follow is the powerful silver-hued Śveta. Dreadful in his valor, he is eager for battle and expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces. This wise and heroic monkey is famed throughout the three worlds.

20. "After reporting to Sugrīva, that monkey is now moving swiftly to marshal the monkey army, urging his troops onward.

21–22ab. "And that monkey, who used to roam the charming mountain on the banks of the Gomatī, Mount Saṃkocana, covered with every sort of tree, is the troop leader called Kumuda. He once ruled a kingdom there.

22cd–24. "And that one, over there, commanding one hundred million troops, the fur on whose long tail—red, yellow, black, and white—sticks out so far in all directions, is the mettlesome and furious Caṇḍa, dreadful in his actions. He is eager for battle and expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces.

25–26. "And the tawny one with the long mane over there, your majesty, who looks like a lion and glares fixedly at Laṅkā as if to scorch it with his gaze is the troop leader named Rambha, who always haunts the Vindhya, Kṛṣṇagiri, and the beautiful Sahya mountains.

27. "Three billion leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys follow him as his entourage in order to crush Laṅkā with their tremendous power.

28–29. "And that one, pricking up his ears and showing his fangs again and again, is the fearless and immensely powerful troop leader Śarabha. He has no fear of death and never flees an opposing host. He, your majesty, haunts the charming Sālveya mountains.

30. "He commands a full four million powerful troop leaders, known as the Vihāras, your majesty.

31–33. "Now, that huge one standing in the midst of monkey heroes, like Vāsava in the midst of the gods, who seems to block out the sky like a storm cloud, is Panasa, the terrifying troop leader of the tree-dwelling monkey lords, who are eager for battle. One can hear his mighty bellowing like the roaring of bherī drums, and none can withstand him in battle. He dwells on that splendid mountain Pāriyātra.

34. "Five million troop leaders, each with his separate troop, form the entourage of that leader among troop leaders.

35–37ab. "The one who stands there like a second Sāgara as an ornament to the fearsome and surging army encamped upon the seashore and who resembles Mount Dardara is the troop leader Vinata. He roams about drinking from the river Parṇāśā, foremost of rivers. His army consists of six million leaping monkeys.

37cd. "The one challenging you to battle is the troop leader Krathana.

38. "The one who is the color of red clay is the powerful monkey known as Gavaya. Expanding his body, he advances toward you in a rage.

39. "His entourage consists of seven million, and he expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces.

40. "These, then, are the dreadful and powerful troop leaders and leaders of troop leaders whom none can withstand. They are numberless and can take on any form at will."

The end of the seventeenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 18

1. "And now, as you survey them, I shall describe to you those troop leaders, who will engage in acts of valor, risking their lives for Rāghava's sake.

2–3. "The one on whose tail the glossy, bristling fur—red, yellow, black, and white, glistening like the rays of the sun—sticks out so far in all directions as it drags across the ground, is the troop leader called Hara, dreadful in his actions.

4. "Hundreds and thousands follow in his train, wielding trees. Banding together, they are intent upon scaling the ramparts of Laṅkā.

5. "Together with his ten billion immensely powerful monkeys, he is eager to defeat you in battle, conqueror of enemy citadels.

6–8. "The heroes you see standing before you, like great black clouds, dark as collyrium, of true valor in battle, and, with claws and fangs for weapons, are terrifying and fierce in their anger. As numberless and indistinguishable as grains of sand on the far shore of the sea, they are utterly savage apes, denizens of the mountains, hill country, and rivers, your majesty. They are advancing toward you.

9–10. "That one, with the dreadful eyes and fearsome looks, your majesty, is the lord of all the apes, the troop leader Dhūmra. Standing in their midst, he looks like Parjanya surrounded on all sides by storm clouds. He dwells on that foremost of mountains Ṛkṣavant, where he drinks the waters of the Narmadā.

11–12. "And there, as huge as a mountain, is his younger brother, the great troop leader among troop leaders, Jāmbavān. He looks just like his brother but surpasses him in valor. Although peaceful by nature and obedient to his superiors, he is unyielding in battle.

13. "Wise Jāmbavān rendered great assistance to Śakra during the wars of the gods and asuras and has thus received many boons.

14–15. "In his army there are many enormous, shaggy apes of fiery energy, who resemble rākṣasas and piśācas and have no fear of death. They scale the mountain peaks and hurl down boulders as vast as huge clouds.

16–17. "And standing there, watched by all the monkeys, is that troop leader among troop leaders, your majesty, the mighty lord of the tawny monkeys, Rambha, who with his troops serves thousand-eyed Indra. Although he is standing still, in his eagerness that troop leader appears to be leaping about.

18–19. "And that one who, when he moves, rubs his flanks against a mountain standing a league away and who, when he stretches his body upward, reaches a league in height, is known as Saṃnādana, the grandfather of the monkeys. His form is unsurpassed among creatures that move on four feet.

20a–d. "This wise troop leader among troop leaders once fought a battle with Śakra himself and yet was not defeated.

20ef–23. "Now that one, whose valor when he goes forth in battle is the equal of Śakra's, is the troop leader Krathana, who never boasts on the battlefield. He was fathered long ago by Agni of the black path on a gandharva maiden in order to assist the gods, the inhabitants of heaven, in their wars with the asuras. This majestic and powerful bull among monkeys dwells on the king of lordly mountains—frequented by many kinnaras—which always serves as the delightful pleasure garden of your brother, King Vaiśravaṇa Kubera, and on which he disports himself among jambū trees, O lord of the rākṣasas.

24. "He has come here surrounded by ten billion monkeys. He is eager for battle and expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces.

25–28. "And the one upon whom ten million attend is the troop leader Pramāthin, your majesty, impossible to withstand. Keeping in mind the ancient hostility between the elephants and monkeys, he haunts the banks of the Ganges, terrifying the leaders of the elephant herds. As troop leader, commander, and general of the tawny monkeys, he moves along the Ganges River, the daughter of the Himalaya, sleeping in mountain caves. Resorting to Mount Uśīrabīja, the equal of Mount Mandara, that foremost of monkeys takes his pleasure, as does Śakra himself in heaven.

29–30ab. "And what you see there, like a cloud raised by the wind, where that great column of dust is swirling copiously, are the dreadful and immensely powerful black-faced langurs.

30cd–31. "Having witnessed the construction of the bridge, ten million of them follow their troop leader, the swift langur Gavākṣa, as his entourage in order to crush Laṅkā with their tremendous power.

32–34. "And there, your majesty, is the foremost among the foremost monkeys, the troop leader Kesarin, who disports himself on the lovely golden mountain whose peaks the great seers never abandon. It is there where the trees, swarming with bees, bear fruit to gratify every desire. He roams about that mountain, the color of which is equal to that of the sun and through the radiance of which the beasts and birds take on that color.

35. "Of the sixty thousand mountains, the most beautiful are the golden mountains. This foremost of mountains stands among them, as do you, blameless one, among the rākṣasas.

36. "These monkeys—tawny, white, red-faced, honey-yellow—with sharp fangs and claws for weapons, dwell on that highest of mountains.

37. "Like lions with their four great fangs, as unassailable as tigers, they are all as fierce as Agni Vaiśvānara or like venomous serpents inflamed with anger.

38. "With their long tails arching upward, they resemble rutting elephants. They look like huge mountains, and their roar is like that of mighty storm clouds.

39. "Their mighty commander, standing there in their midst, is renowned throughout the earth, your majesty, by the name Śatabalin. He is eager for battle and expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces.

40. "And there are Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Nala, and the monkey Nīla, each of them surrounded by one hundred million troops.

41. "And there are yet other swift and formidable monkeys, inhabitants of the Vindhya mountains, who because of their vast numbers are impossible to count.

42. "All of them, your majesty, are enormously powerful. All of them possess bodies that resemble huge mountains. All of them are capable of instantly covering the earth with the mountains they have shattered."

The end of the eighteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 19

1. Then, after Śuka had listened to Sāraṇa's speech, he looked out over the whole army and addressed these words to Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas:

2–3. "Those monkeys—resembling great rutting elephants, banyan trees along the Ganges, or sāla trees in the Himalayas—whom you see taking up their positions are powerful and impossible to withstand, your majesty. They can take on any form at will, and they are like the daityas and the dānavas. Their valor is that of the gods in battle.

4. "There are tens of billions of them—times nine, times five, and times seven, and there are quadrillions and septillions more.

5. "They are Sugrīva's followers and Kiṣkindhā is their home. They are tawny monkeys born of the gods and gandharvas, and they are able to take on any form at will.

6. "Those two youthful monkeys whom you see standing there looking like gods are Mainda and Dvivida. No one is their equal in battle.

7. "With Brahmā's blessing they have partaken of the nectar of immortality, and they thus expect to crush Laṅkā with their tremendous power in battle.

8. "And those two whom you see standing beside them, looking like mountains, are Sumukha and Vimukha. They are the sons of Mṛtyu, and they are just like their father.

9–10. "Now the monkey you see standing over there, like an elephant in rut, is the same one who has already come to Laṅkā and sought out Vaidehī and yourself, lord. Look at him! You have seen this monkey before and he has now returned. If angered, he could make the ocean itself tremble with his strength.

11. "He is the eldest son of Kesarin, but he is called the son of the wind god. He is known as Hanumān, and it is he who leapt over the ocean.

12. "Foremost among tawny monkeys, he is endowed with strength and beauty and can take on any form at will. His advance can no more be checked than that of the ever-moving lord, the wind god.

13–15. "They say that once, when he was a child, he grew hungry and, seeing the sun rising, he swooped down a distance of three thousand leagues, thinking in the arrogance of his strength, 'I shall devour the sun, so that my hunger shall not return.' But, failing to reach that divinity, who is beyond the reach of even the gods, seers, and dānavas, he fell upon the mountain from behind which the sun rises.

16. "One of that monkey's jaws was slightly broken as he fell on the stone surface. And since this toughened his jaw [hanu], he came to be known as Hanumān, he of the powerful jaw.

17. "I can accurately identify this tawny monkey on the basis of this authoritative account. His strength, beauty, and power are impossible to describe. With his tremendous power, he expects to crush Laṅkā all by himself.

18–21. "And the dark, lotus-eyed hero next to him is Rāma, the great chariot-warrior of the Ikṣvākus, famed for his valor throughout the world. His righteousness never wavers, nor does he ever transgress it. Foremost among those who know the vedas, he knows the vedas and Brahmā's divine weapon-spell as well. With his arrows he might rend the heavens and shatter the mountains. His wrath is like that of Mṛtyu, and his valor like that of Śakra. Sītā, whom you abducted from Janasthāna, is his wife; and so, your majesty, he is advancing upon you in order to give battle.

22–23. "And standing to his right—the one with a complexion as radiant as pure jāmbūnada gold, a broad chest, reddened eyes, and dark, curling hair—is his brother Lakṣmaṇa, as dear to him as life itself. He is skillful in statecraft and in battle, and he is adept in all the śāstras.

24. "Implacable, invincible, victorious, valorous, intelligent, and powerful, he is Rāma's right arm, like another life breath constantly moving outside his body.

25. "He would give his own life for Rāghava's sake, and he expects to slaughter all the rākṣasas in battle.

26. "And the one standing on Rāma's left, surrounded by a group of rākṣasas, is none other than King Vibhīṣaṇa.

27. "He was consecrated as king of Laṅkā by the majestic king of kings. And, in his rage, he, too, is advancing toward you for battle.

28. "The one whom you see standing in their midst, as unshakeable as a mountain, is Sugrīva, the unconquered lord of all the leaders of the tree-dwelling monkeys.

29. "In power, glory, intelligence, knowledge, and lineage, he outshines the other monkeys, as does Himalaya all other mountains.

30. "With his principal troop leaders, he dwells in the densely forested and inaccessible cavern Kiṣkindhā, which is hidden in a mountain fastness.

31. "He is the one whose necklace of a hundred golden lotuses shines so brightly; for Lakṣmī herself, coveted by gods and men, resides in it.

32. "Sugrīva acquired that necklace along with Tārā and the everlasting kingship of the monkeys through Rāma, who had slain Vālin.

33. "And thus Sugrīva, the lord of the monkeys, is advancing upon you for battle accompanied by one hundred trillion, ten billion troops.

34. "Now that you have seen this army that has come here like some baleful planet, your majesty, you must exert yourself to the utmost so that you may be victorious and not suffer defeat at the hands of your enemies."

The end of the nineteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 20

1–3. Rāvaṇa looked out upon the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys. He saw Vibhīṣaṇa—his own brother—standing at Rāma's side, immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa, the right arm of Rāma, and Sugrīva of terrifying valor, the king of all the monkeys, just as they had been described by Śuka. He was somewhat shaken at heart, yet, flaring up with anger, he reviled the heroic Śuka and Sāraṇa when they had finished their report.

4. Enraged, his voice choked with anger, he spoke harsh words to Śuka and Sāraṇa, who stood there humbly, hanging their heads.

5. "It is utterly inappropriate for a king's ministers, dependents after all, to utter words that are displeasing to him when he is able to punish or imprison them.

6. "How fitting it is that the two of you should at so inopportune a moment heap praises upon my enemies who have approached in such a menacing fashion to make war upon me!

7. "Clearly your attendance upon your teachers, parents, and elders was to no purpose, since you have failed to learn the essence of the science of politics, which should govern your conduct.

8. "Or even if you had once learned it, you failed to fully comprehend it. You carry your education as mere mental baggage. With imbeciles such as you for ministers, it is only through sheer luck that I have retained my hold on the kingdom.

9. "Have you no fear of death that you say such harsh words to me, your sovereign, whose tongue metes out rewards and punishments.

10. "Trees touched by a forest fire may survive, but those whose offences have incurred the wrath of the king cannot.

11. "I would have slain you two wretches, who dare to praise my enemies, had not my rage been softened by your previous acts of service.

12. "Go! Get out of my sight! Remembering your past acts of service, I do not wish to kill you. Nevertheless, you two ingrates, who have turned away from my affections, are as good as dead to me."

13. When Śuka and Sāraṇa had been addressed in this fashion, they were humiliated. Then, saluting Rāvaṇa with invocations of victory, they withdrew.

14. Next, ten-necked Rāvaṇa spoke to Mahodara, who stood near him, saying, "Hurry up and get me some spies who really understand the science of politics."

15. Then spies, hastening at the king's command, approached him. They attended upon him with hands cupped in reverence, glorifying him with blessings of victory.

16. Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, then addressed these words to those spies, who were reliable, heroic, devoted, and utterly fearless.

17. "Go forth from here and find out Rāma's plans. Find out also who have allied themselves with him out of affection and are privy to his counsel.

18. "When does he sleep? When does he wake? What else is he planning to do? Come back when you have ascertained all of this accurately and completely.

19. "For an enemy whose intentions are discovered by a spy is easily attacked and destroyed in battle by clever kings."

20. Enthusiastically saying, "So be it," to the lord of the rākṣasas, the spies reverently circumambulated him and went off to where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were.

21. Departing, they concealed themselves near Mount Suvela, where they spied upon Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who were in the company of Sugrīva and Vibhīṣaṇa.

22. But, as it happened, the rākṣasas who were there were spotted by Vibhīṣaṇa, the righteous lord of the rākṣasas, and captured.

23. Beaten by swift and valorous monkeys, they returned to Laṅkā, dazed and breathing hard.

24. Then, approaching ten-necked Rāvaṇa, those mighty night-roaming rākṣasas, spies accustomed to serving in foreign lands, reported to him regarding the terrifying army encamped near Mount Suvela.

The end of the twentieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 21

1. Then the spies informed the lord of Laṅkā that Rāghava, along with an unassailable army, was encamped near Mount Suvela.

2. When Rāvaṇa had heard from his spies that Rāma had come with a vast army, he became somewhat agitated, and he spoke these words to Śārdūla:

3. "You look pale, night-roaming rākṣasa, and you seem despondent. You haven't by any chance fallen into the clutches of our enraged enemies?"

4. Questioned in this fashion, Śārdūla, stupefied with fear, faintly spoke these words to that tiger among rākṣasas:

5. "It is impossible to spy upon those bulls among monkeys, your majesty. For they are valiant, powerful, and under the protection of Rāghava.

6. "It is impossible even to speak with them. There is no question of interrogating them. For the paths on every side are guarded by monkeys the size of mountains.

7. "The moment I entered, I was recognized. Before I even had a chance to observe the army, I was violently seized by many monkeys and badly wounded.

8. "Fiercely pummeled with knees, fists, teeth, and palms, I was paraded about by those tawny monkeys, who are both powerful and relentless.

9. "When I had been paraded all around, I was taken to Rāma's headquarters, stupefied, my senses reeling, my entire body covered with blood.

10. "Belabored by the tawny monkeys and pleading with my hands cupped in supplication, I was spared by Rāghava. Truly, I am lucky to be alive.

11. "Rāma has filled in the vast ocean with mountains and boulders and now stands at the very gates of Laṅkā, heavily armed.

12. "After releasing me, that immensely powerful warrior arranged his troops in the garuḍa formation, and now, completely surrounded by tawny monkeys, he is advancing on Laṅkā.

13. "Soon he will reach the outer walls, and so you must quickly do one of two things: you must either return Sītā to him at once or offer fierce battle."

14. When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, had heard those grave words of Śārdūla, he was stricken at heart, but he replied:

15. "Even if the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas should assault me, I would not give up Sītā, not for fear of all the worlds."

16. Having spoken in this fashion, the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa continued speaking: "You, sir, have spied upon this army. Which of the leaping monkeys in it are truly heroes?

17. "What are they like? What are the powers of these unassailable monkeys? Whose sons and grandsons are they? Tell me truthfully, rākṣasa.

18. "Once I know their strengths and weaknesses, I shall take appropriate action. A person wishing to engage in battle must first take account of the opposing forces."

19. When the chief spy, Śārdūla, had been addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, he began to speak the following words in Rāvaṇa's presence:

20. "To begin with, your majesty, there is the son—utterly invincible in battle—of Ṛkṣarajas. Then there is Jāmbavān the renowned son of Gadgada.

21. “There is also the other son of Gadgada. And, in addition, there is the son of the guru of Indra of the hundred sacrifices. It is his son who single-handedly slaughtered the rākṣasas.

22. “Then there is righteous and powerful Suṣeṇa, the son of Dharma, and, your majesty, the gracious monkey Dadhimukha, the son of Soma.

23. “Then there are Sumukha, Durmukha, and the monkey Vegadarśin. Surely self-existent Brahmā created death in the form of these monkeys.

24. “General Nīla over there is himself the son of Agni, bearer of oblations, and the son of Anila, over here, is famed as Hanumān.

25. “That young, powerful, and unassailable Aṅgada is the grandson of Śakra, while powerful Mainda and Dvivida are both sons of the Aśvins.

26. “Those five sons of Vaivasvata, who themselves are like Kāla, the ender of all things, are Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śarabha, and Gandhamādana.

27. “Śveta and Jyotirmukha are both the sons of Sūrya, bringer of light, while the leaping monkey Hemakūṭa is the son of Varuṇa.

28. “That foremost among leaping monkeys is heroic Nala, son of Viśvakarman, while swift and valorous Sudurdhara is the son of the Vasus.

29. “There are one hundred million of these majestic and heroic monkeys, who are all the sons of gods and are lusting for battle. I am unable to describe the rest.

30. “And that youth whose build is that of a lion is the son of Daśaratha. He is the one who slew Dūṣaṇa, Khara, and Triśiras.

31. “There is no one on earth who is equal to Rāma in valor; for he slew Virādha and Kabandha, who was like Yama, the ender of all things.

32. “No man on earth is able to recount the virtues of Rāma, who slew all the rākṣasas in Janasthāna.

33. "And there also is righteous Lakṣmaṇa, resembling a bull elephant. Once having come into the range of his arrows, not even Vāsava himself could survive.

34. "And there is your brother Vibhīṣaṇa, foremost among the rākṣasas, who, having received the city of Laṅkā, is devoted to Rāghava's cause.

35. "In this way I have described to you the entire monkey army, which is encamped upon Mount Suvela. You, sir, must now decide what is to be done next."

The end of the twenty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 22

1. Meanwhile, in Laṅkā, the spies reported to the king that Rāghava, along with an unassailable army, was encamped near Mount Suvela.

2. When Rāvaṇa had heard from his spies that Rāma had come with a vast army, he became somewhat agitated, and he spoke these words to his ministers:

3. "Rākṣasas! Let all my counselors assemble, focusing their thoughts. The time has come for us to take counsel."

4. Upon hearing that command of his, the counselors hurriedly approached. Then he took counsel with his rākṣasa ministers.

5. After taking counsel with them as to what was appropriate for them to do next, the unassailable Rāvaṇa dismissed his ministers and entered his own residence.

6. Then, summoning an immensely powerful rākṣasa named Vidyujjihva, a master of illusion, Rāvaṇa, himself a great master of illusion, went to where Maithilī was.

7. The lord of the rākṣasas addressed Vidyujjihva, master of illusion, saying, "Let us delude Sītā, Janaka's daughter, with an illusion.

8. "Night-roaming rākṣasa, you must come to me bearing Rāghava's head along with his great bow and arrows—all fashioned through the power of illusion."

9. When he had been addressed in this fashion, the night-roaming rākṣasa Vidyujjihva responded, "So be it." The king was pleased with him and presented him with a piece of jewelry.

10. Entering the aśoka grove, the immensely powerful younger brother of Kubera, bestower of wealth, saw Sītā seated on the bare earth, her face lowered, overcome with sorrow, although she did not deserve it.

11. Seated there in the aśoka grove, thinking only of her lord, she was closely surrounded by horrible rākṣasa women.

12. Approaching Sītā and calling out to her in feigned delight, he arrogantly addressed these words to the daughter of Janaka.

13. "I have just now slain in battle your husband, Rāghava, the slayer of Khara, about whom you are wont to speak so boastfully.

14. "I have completely undermined your grounds for refusing me and have crushed your pride. As a result of your catastrophic loss, Sītā, you will have to become my wife.

15. "Your merit is exhausted and your purpose has failed, you foolish woman, who think yourself so clever. Now you shall hear about your husband's death, Sītā, which was as dreadful as the slaying of Vṛtra.

16. "Rāghava had come to our shores surrounded by a vast army led by the lord of the monkeys in a futile effort to kill me.

17. "When he reached the southern shore of the sea, Rāma made camp with his vast army just as the sun was going down.

18. "Then, in the middle of the night, my spies approached that army as it slept peacefully, exhausted from its long march, and spied upon it.

19. "Then, in the night, on that very spot where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa lay, Rāma's army was slaughtered by my own vast army led by Prahasta.

20–21. "Over and over again, the rākṣasas raised their weapons—spears, iron clubs, swords, small discuses, staves heavy with iron, streams of arrows, lances, shining mallets and war hammers, clubs, iron cudgels, darts, large discuses, and cudgels—and let them fall upon the monkeys.

22. "Then murderous, deft-handed Prahasta with his huge sword completely severed the head of Rāma, who lay sleeping.

23. "Vibhīṣaṇa tried to flee, but, as it happened, he was captured. Then Lakṣmaṇa and all the leaping monkeys were driven off in all directions.

24. "Sugrīva, lord of the leaping monkeys, lies there with a broken neck. Hanumān, too, lies there, slain by the rākṣasas, his jaw smashed.

25. "Then Jāmbavān, as he leapt up in battle, was stricken at the knees. Pierced by many spears, he was cut down like a tree.

26. "Those two bulls among monkeys, Mainda and Dvivida, were also cut down, gasping and wailing, drenched in their own blood.

27. "Cut through the middle with a sword, Panasa, destroyer of his enemies, fell thunderously to the ground like a jackfruit.

28. "Pierced by many iron arrows, Darīmukha lies in a pit, while the hugely powerful Kumuda, struck by arrows, is moaning.

29. "Aṅgada has been attacked and felled by the rākṣasas, who pierced him with many arrows. Adorned with his armlets, he lies on the ground vomiting blood.

30. "Some of the tawny monkeys, scattered like clouds driven by the force of the wind, are lying about, trampled by elephants, while others have been crushed by row upon row of chariots.

31. "Others have fled in terror, being harried from the rear, pursued by the rākṣasas, like great elephants by lions.

32. "Some have thrown themselves into the ocean, others have taken refuge in the sky. Apes and monkeys, all mixed together, have scampered up trees.

33. "On the shores of the sea, in the mountains, and in the forests, many of the yellow-eyed monkeys have been slaughtered by innumerable evil-eyed rākṣasas.

34. "In this way your husband, along with his army, was killed by my forces. Here, I have had them bring you his head, dripping with blood and covered with dust."

35. Then unassailable Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, addressed a rākṣasa woman, so that Sītā could hear him.

36. "Go and fetch Vidyujjihva, that rākṣasa of cruel deeds, the very one who has brought the head of Rāghava from the battlefield."

37. Then Vidyujjihva, grasping the head along with the bow, presented himself before Rāvaṇa, bowing his head in reverence.

38. Then King Rāvaṇa addressed the long-tongued rākṣasa, Vidyujjihva, who stood close beside him.

39. "Place the head of Dāśarathi before Sītā at once. Let the wretched woman clearly see her husband's final state."

40. Addressed in this fashion, the rākṣasa placed that beautiful head before Sītā and swiftly withdrew.

41. But Rāvaṇa threw down the great and shining bow that was famed throughout the three worlds and said this to Sītā:

42. "Here is the bow of your precious Rāma, complete with its bowstring. It was brought here by Prahasta after he slew that human during the night.

43. When he and Vidyujjihva had flung that head and bow upon the ground, Rāvaṇa said to the glorious daughter of the king of Videha, "You must obey me."

The end of the twenty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 23

1–3. Sītā stared at the head and at that magnificent bow. Recalling the alliance with Sugrīva that had been mentioned by Hanumān and seeing those eyes and that facial complexion that were so like those of her husband—his hair, his forehead, and his splendid crest-jewel—she recognized all those familiar things and was stricken with grief. Shrieking like an osprey, she reviled Kaikeyī:

4. “I hope you are satisfied now, Kaikeyī! The delight of our family has been slain. You malicious creature! You have destroyed our entire family.

5. “In what way did noble Rāma offend Kaikeyī such that she had him exiled from his home to the forest in the barkcloth garments of an ascetic?”

6. When Vaidehī, trembling, had spoken in this fashion, that wretched young woman fell to the ground like a plantain tree that has been cut down.

7. After a moment, she heaved a sigh and regained consciousness. Then the large-eyed woman kissed that head and broke into lamentation.

8. “Alas, great-armed hero, I am undone! For I have pledged myself to one who followed the code of the warrior. I have now been made a widow and so must share this, your final state.

9. “When a husband dies first, they say it is because of the wife’s lack of virtue. But even though my conduct has been exemplary, you, who were so virtuous, departed before me.

10. “While I, having gone from one sorrow to another, am sunk in an ocean of grief, you, who were trying to rescue me, have now been slain.

11. “And, Rāghava, my mother-in-law Kausalyā, bereft of you, her son, is now like a loving cow bereft of her calf.

12. “Your valor was beyond imagination, Rāghava! And yet, the words of those who foretold a long life for you have proven false, for your life has been cut short.

13. “Or did your wisdom fail you, even though you were so wise? For Kāla, who creates all beings, leads them inevitably to destruction.

14. “How could you, so learned in the science of politics, so knowledgeable about and skillful at strategies for averting disaster, have fallen prey to an unforeseen death?

15. “Having fallen into my clutches—I who am the fierce and pitiless Kālarātri, the dark night of universal destruction—you, a lotus-eyed hero, have been thus cut down and carried off.

16. “Abandoning me to my misery, great-armed bull among men, you lie in the embrace of the earth, as if she were a beautiful and beloved woman.

17. “And this, hero, is your gold-inlaid bow, so dear to me, which you and I always worshiped so assiduously with fragrances and garlands.

18. “Surely, blameless hero, you have now been reunited in heaven with my father-in-law, your father, Daśaratha, and with your other ancestors as well.

19. “You have become a shining star in the heavens through the great and pleasing deed that you performed, but thus you now ignore your own lineage, the holy race of royal seers.

20. “Why do you not look at me, your majesty? Why will you not speak to me? It is I, your lifelong companion, whom you took as your wife when I was but a girl and you yourself a mere boy.

21. “ ‘I will be with you forever.’ That is what you promised when you took my hand in marriage, Kākutstha. So please recall that to mind and take me, full of sorrow, with you.

22. “Why have you abandoned me and gone away, resourceful hero? You have departed from this world to the next, leaving me here, full of sorrow.

23. “Your body was once accustomed to only the finest things and embraced by me alone. Now, surely, it is being dragged and torn apart by beasts of prey.

24. “You performed the vedic rites—the Agniṣṭoma and the rest—with ample fees for the officiants. How is it then that you will be denied the purificatory rite of cremation in the sacred fire?

25. “Kausalyā, sorrowfully longing, will now have to question only Lakṣmaṇa, who, alone among the three of us who set out in exile, will return.

26. "And since she will ask him, he will surely have to tell her about the slaughter of the forces of your ally and your own murder in the night by the rākṣasas.

27. "When she hears that you have been murdered in your sleep and that I am living in the rākṣasa's household, she will die of a broken heart, Rāghava.

28. "But enough of this! Please, Rāvaṇa, let me throw myself upon Rāma's body at once. Do this one truly fine thing: reunite a husband and wife.

29. "Join my head with his head, and my body with his body, Rāvaṇa, and I shall follow the path of my great husband. I do not wish to live for even another moment, wicked woman that I am.

30. "Once, in my father's house, I heard from some brahmans learned in the vedas that women to whom their husbands are dear gain auspicious worlds.

31. "What recourse is left for me without him who was possessed of forbearance, self-restraint, renunciation, truth, righteousness, gratitude, and nonviolence toward all creatures?"

32. Thus did that large-eyed lady, the daughter of Janaka, burning with sorrow, lament as she gazed there upon her husband's head and bow.

33. As Sītā was lamenting bitterly in this fashion, a rākṣasa sentry approached his master, hands cupped in reverence.

34. After saluting and propitiating Rāvaṇa with the words, "May my lord be victorious," he reported that General Prahasta had arrived.

35. "Prahasta has presented himself with all your ministers. The matter appears to be rather urgent. Therefore, kindly grant them an audience."

36. When ten-necked Rāvaṇa had heard the rākṣasa's message, he left the aśoka grove to grant an audience to his counselors.

37. Deliberating with his counselors as to how he should proceed, he entered his council hall and there, knowing full well the martial valor of Rāma, laid his plans.

38. But no sooner had Rāvaṇa departed than that head and splendid bow vanished.

39. Nonetheless, the lord of the rākṣasas went on deliberating with his counselors, fearsome in their valor, as to what action he should take with regard to Rāma.

40. Then Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, who looked like Kāla himself, addressed all the commanders of his troops assembled before him, eager to act on his behalf.

41. "Assemble the troops at once with the loud beating of bherī drums sharply struck with drumsticks, but do not tell them why."

42. Then the commanders of the troops, receiving those instructions, said, "So be it." Assembling each his own vast host, they reported to their lord, who was so eager for battle, that they were assembled.

The end of the twenty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 24

1. Meanwhile, a certain rākṣasa woman named Saramā, a dear friend of her beloved Sītā Vaidehī, seeing that she was utterly confused, came quickly to her side.

2. For, as she had been instructed by Rāvaṇa to protect Sītā, who was under guard, and because she was compassionate and firm in her vows, she had become Sītā's friend.

3. Saramā saw that her friend, who had now arisen covered with dirt, like a mare that had been rolling in the dust, was completely bewildered.

4–5. Firm in her vows, she consoled Sītā out of love for her friend. "Timorous lady, in my love for you, my friend, I overcame my fear of Rāvaṇa, and, concealing myself in a deserted thicket, I overheard everything Rāvaṇa said to you and what you said to him in return. For, wide-eyed lady, I would gladly die for your sake.

6. "Then, when the overlord of the rākṣasas had departed, Maithilī, I followed after him and learned the whole reason for his agitation.

7. "It would be impossible to slay the ever-vigilant Rāma in his sleep. Indeed, no one can kill that tiger among men.

8. "Nor would it be possible to kill the monkeys, who use trees as weapons. For they are as fully protected by Rāma as are the divinities by Indra, bull among the gods.

9–11. "Majestic Rāghava, destroyer of his foes, could not have been slain, Sītā. For his arms are long and muscular and his chest is massive. He is majestic and fierce in valor. He is righteous and powerfully built, a bowman famed throughout the world. Along with his brother Lakṣmaṇa, that courageous hero always protects himself and others. Skillful, deeply learned in the science of statecraft, and of inconceivable strength and valor, he slaughters the hosts of enemy soldiers.

12. "This was just an illusion, perpetrated upon you by that savage master of illusion, whose every thought and deed is reprehensible and who is inimical to all creatures.

13. "Put all your grieving behind you. Happiness awaits you. Surely Lakṣmī herself is smiling upon you. Now hear the good news, which will delight you.

14. "Rāma has crossed the ocean with an army of monkeys. And now, having reached the southern shore, he is encamped.

15. "I myself have seen Kākutstha, who has practically accomplished his mission. Right now, he is standing with Lakṣmaṇa on the seashore guarded by his massed forces.

16. "And those swift-footed rākṣasas whom Rāvaṇa had dispatched brought back the news that Rāghava has crossed the ocean.

17. "Hearing that news, wide-eyed lady, Rāvaṇa, the overlord of the rākṣasas, took counsel with all his ministers."

18. Now, while the rākṣasa woman Saramā was speaking in this fashion, she and Sītā heard the dreadful sound of the troops fully preparing themselves for war.

19. When Saramā heard the deafening sound of the bherī drums resounding with the strokes of the drumsticks, she spoke to Sītā in a sweet voice.

20. "That, timid woman, is the terrifying sound of the bherī drum, a call to arms. Listen to its deep sound so like the rumble of storm clouds.

21. "Rutting war-elephants are being made ready, while chariot-horses are being yoked. Everywhere armed foot soldiers are forming their ranks.

22. "The royal highways are filled with rushing, roaring soldiers, amazing in their appearance, just as the ocean is filled with rushing, roaring torrents of water.

23–24. "Just look at the multicolored radiance arising from the rākṣasas' shining weapons, shields, armor, chariots, horses, elephants, and ornaments as they glitter. It looks like a blazing forest fire in the hot season.

25. "Listen to the clanging of the bells and the rumbling of the chariots. Listen to the neighing of the war-horses, like the blaring of trumpets.

26. "These are the frenzied preparations—tumultuous and hair-raising—of the followers of the rākṣasa lord, their weapons held aloft.

27. "Good fortune will favor you, dispelling your sorrow. But fear of Rāma has come upon the rākṣasas, lotus-petal-eyed woman, as fear of Vāsava overcame the daityas.

28. "When your inconceivably valorous husband, who has subdued his anger, has defeated and slain Rāvaṇa in battle, he will surely take you back.

29. "Together with Lakṣmaṇa, your husband will defeat the rākṣasas, just as that slayer of his foes, Vāsava, together with Viṣṇu, did his enemies.

30. "Soon Rāma will come, and I shall see you seated upon his lap, your enemy slain and all your wishes fulfilled.

31. "Lovely lady, once you are reunited and in his tight embrace, you will shed tears of joy on the chest of that broad-chested hero.

32. "Soon, Sītā, my lady, mighty Rāma will unbind the braid—falling to your waist—that you have worn these many months.

33. "Once you see his face, my lady, which is like the full moon newly risen, you will abandon these tears born of your sorrow, as a female serpent sheds her skin.

34. "Very soon, Maithilī, Rāma will slay Rāvaṇa in battle. Then he, who deserves happiness, will enjoy complete happiness together with you, his beloved.

35. "Once you are reunited with Rāma, you will rejoice with that great man, just as the earth does with its ample crops when watered with copious rains.

36. "My lady, you must take refuge with Sūrya, bringer of day and sustainer of all creatures, who, like a horse, moves swiftly in his orbit, circumambulating the foremost of mountains."

The end of the twenty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 25

1. Thus, with her words, did Saramā bring new life to the confused and suffering Sītā, as do the heavens to the earth with their rains.

2. Then, as a friend desiring what was best for her friend and, with a good sense of timing, she smiled and spoke these timely words:

3. "Dark-eyed lady, I can go and return unseen in order to give Rāma a message from you, informing him that you are safe.

4. "For when I traverse the unsupported sky, neither Pavana nor even Garuḍa himself is able to follow my path."

5. As Saramā was speaking in this fashion, Sītā replied to her in a voice that was sweet, soft, and tinged with her recent sorrow.

6. "You are capable of going to the heavens or even to the underworld known as Rasātala. I know that for my sake you could accomplish even the impossible.

7. "But if your mind is set on doing me a favor, you should go to Rāvaṇa as I wish to know what he is doing now.

8. "For that cruel and wicked Rāvaṇa, who makes his enemies cry out, is a master of illusion. He robbed me of my senses, as does wine the moment you drink it.

9. "He has the terrifying rākṣasa women, who constantly stand guard over me, menace and threaten me incessantly.

10. "I am fearful and apprehensive and have no peace of mind. I tremble in fear of him, here in the aśoka grove.

11. "If you can report to me everything that he may have discussed or decided, then that would be the greatest favor you could do for me."

12. As Sītā was speaking in this fashion, the soft-spoken Saramā, caressing her, replied in words choked with tears.

13. "If that is what you wish, Jānakī, I shall go, and you shall see me when I return after learning your enemy's plans."

14. When she had spoken in this fashion, she proceeded from there to the presence of the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa and eavesdropped on his deliberations with his counselors.

15. Once she had heard and familiarized herself with the evil-minded rākṣasa's decisions, she then swiftly returned once more to the aśoka grove.

16. She reentered the grove, where she saw Janaka's daughter waiting for her and looking like the goddess Śrī, robbed of her lotus.

17. When soft-spoken Saramā had returned, Sītā embraced her affectionately and offered her a seat.

18. "Once you are comfortably seated, please report to me accurately everything that the cruel and wicked Rāvaṇa has decided."

19. Addressed in this fashion by the tremulous Sītā, Saramā reported to her all of Rāvaṇa's deliberations with his counselors.

20. "The rākṣasa lord was given earnest advice to release you by his own mother and his elder counselor Aviddha, who said:

21. " 'You must give back Maithilī to the lord of men with full honor. His amazing deeds in Janasthāna should be sufficient evidence for you.

22. " 'Then, too, there was Hanumān's leaping of the ocean, his finding Sītā, and his slaughter of the rākṣasas in battle. What mere human on earth could have brought all this about?'

23. "Although his aged counselors and his mother argued with him in this vein at length, he can no more bear to give you up than can a miser his money.

24. "He will not give you up, Maithilī, unless he dies in battle. For such is the fixed resolve of that cruel rākṣasa and his ministers.

25. "That, indeed, is the unwavering resolve he has formed, befuddled as he is by his impending doom. He will have to be completely crushed in battle through the slaughter of the rākṣasas and himself. Intimidation alone cannot force him to release you.

26. "But, with his sharp arrows, Rāma will completely destroy Rāvaṇa in battle, and then, dark-eyed lady, he will take you back to Ayodhyā."

27. At that very moment, the din of the bherī drums and conches of the entire army was heard, causing the ground to shake.

28. And when, there in Laṅkā, the servants of the rākṣasa king heard the din of the monkey army, their spirits failed them. Their energies were sapped by despair, and they foresaw no good arising from the crimes of their king.

The end of the twenty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 26

1. Thus, to the mingled sound of conches and bherī drums, did great-armed Rāma Rāghava, the conqueror of enemy citadels, draw near.

2. Now, when Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, heard that tumultuous sound, he fell to brooding for a while, before turning to his ministers.

3. Then mighty Rāvaṇa, addressing all his ministers, spoke so that the entire assembly hall resounded:

4. "Gentlemen, I have listened to what you have said concerning Rāma's crossing of the ocean, his valor, and the size of his army. But I know that you, sirs, are also truly valorous in battle."

5. Then, after listening to his words, a very wise rākṣasa named Mālyavān, the paternal uncle of Rāvaṇa's mother, began to speak:

6. "Your majesty, a king who is well versed in the traditional branches of learning and who acts in accordance with sound policy will long exercise sovereignty and bring his foes under his power.

7. "And if he makes peace or war with his enemies at the appropriate times and strengthens his own side, he will thus enjoy broader sovereignty.

8. "A king who is weaker than his rival or equal to him in strength should sue for peace. Only one who is stronger should make war, but even he must never underestimate his enemy.

9. "Therefore, Rāvaṇa, I would recommend making peace with Rāma. You should give him back Sītā on whose account we are so heavily besieged.

10. "All the gods, seers, and gandharvas desire Rāma's victory. Therefore, you should not oppose him. You should choose to make peace with him.

11. "The blessed Grandfather Brahmā created two races: that of the gods and that of the asuras, who had recourse to righteousness and unrighteousness, respectively.

12. "For righteousness is said to be the way of the great gods, Rāvaṇa, while unrighteousness is the way of the asuras and the rākṣasas.

13. "For they say that when righteousness eclipses unrighteousness, that ushers in the golden age, known as the Kṛta. But when unrighteousness eclipses righteousness, that brings on the degenerate Tiṣya Age.

14. "In rampaging through the worlds, you trampled glorious righteousness and embraced unrighteousness instead. It is for that reason that your enemies have grown more powerful than we.

15. “Grown strong through your reckless actions, the serpent of unrighteousness is devouring us; while righteousness, which the deities revere, strengthens the forces of the gods.

16. “Doing whatever you pleased in your addiction to sensuality, you have caused great suffering to the firelike seers. Their power is as irresistible as a blazing fire.

17. “Their minds are purified through their austerities, and they are devoted to the furtherance of righteousness. These twice-born brahmans constantly perform all the different principal sacrificial rites.

18. “Reciting the vedas aloud, they pour oblations into the sacrificial fire according to the ritual injunctions. Thwarting the rākṣasas, they chant the vedic mantras because of which all the rākṣasas scatter in all directions like thunderclouds in the hot season.

19. “And, spreading in all ten directions, the smoke arising from the Agnihotra rites of those firelike seers saps the energy of the rākṣasas.

20. “Moreover the fierce austerities that those sages, firm in their vows, practiced in their various holy places torment the rākṣasas.

21. “And, observing many different, dreadful omens, I foresee the destruction of all the rākṣasas.

22. “Thundering deafeningly, dreadful and terrifying storm clouds drench all of Laṅkā with hot blood.

23. “Teardrops fall from our weeping mounts, while our battle flags, dusty and discolored, do not shine as brightly as once they did.

24. “Beasts of prey, jackals, and vultures keep pouring into Laṅkā, shrieking horrendously as they form into packs.

25. “Dark women with deathly white teeth appear before us in dreams laughing wildly, speaking menacingly, and looting houses.

26. “Dogs are devouring the bali offerings in house after house. Cows are giving birth to donkeys, while rats are mating with mongooses.

27. “Cats are mating with tigers, pigs with dogs, kinnaras are mating with rākṣasas and even with humans.

28. "White doves with red feet flutter through the sky impelled by doom and presaging the destruction of the rākṣasas.

29. "Screeching, 'cīcīkūcī,' domesticated śārikas are flying about, even though they are tethered. Although once tamed, they have become aggressive.

30. "Death himself, in the form of a terrifying and hideous bald man, all yellow and black, peers into everyone's houses at all hours. These and other evil omens continue to appear.

31. "We truly believe that Rāma is none other than Viṣṇu, who has taken the body of a man. For this Rāghava, so firm in his valor, is surely no ordinary human.

32. "Therefore, Rāvaṇa, you should make peace with Rāma, the king of men, who built that utterly extraordinary bridge across the ocean."

33. When mighty and supremely valorous Mālyavān had spoken these words there among those foremost counselors and had judged the intentions of the rākṣasa overlord, he fell silent, watching Rāvaṇa closely.

The end of the twenty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 27

1. But ten-faced Rāvaṇa, evil-minded as he was and driven by his doom, could not abide the words of Mālyavān, although they had been uttered for his own good.

2. Overwhelmed with anger, he replied to Mālyavān, knitting his brows on his forehead and rolling his eyes in rage:

3. "I shall not listen to these harmful words you have so harshly uttered, thinking them to be beneficial. For you are, in effect, siding with my enemies.

4. "What makes you think that this wretched human Rāma, who lives alone in the wilderness, abandoned by his own father, and has been forced to rely on monkeys, is so formidable?

5. "And what makes you think that I, the lord of the rākṣasas and the terror of the gods, who am in no way lacking in valor, am so weak?

6. "I suspect that you have addressed me so harshly out of resentment of my prowess, sympathy for my enemies, or at the prompting of my foes.

7. "For, unless he were prompted by an enemy, what wise man learned in the śāstras would dare speak so harshly to a powerful man of high station?

8. "Besides, after taking Sītā—who, but for the lotus, resembles the goddess Śrī—from the forest, why would I give her back for fear of Rāghava?

9. "In a few short days, you will see me slay Rāghava along with Sugrīva, Lakṣmaṇa, and their tens of millions of monkeys.

10. "Even the gods themselves dare not stand before Rāvaṇa in single combat. Whom, then, should he fear in battle?

11. "I might be cut in two, but never would I bow down to anyone. This is an innate fault of mine; and it is impossible to overcome one's nature.

12. "Even if, somehow or other, Rāma actually built a bridge over the ocean, what is so miraculous about this that it should fill you with fear?

13. "And I swear to you truthfully that now that Rāma has crossed the ocean with his army of monkeys, he shall not return alive."

14. Now, when Mālyavān saw that Rāvaṇa was speaking with such agitation and was so angry, he was humiliated and made no reply.

15. Then, after praising the king in the customary fashion with prayers for victory, Mālyavān took his leave and returned to his own dwelling.

16. But as for the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa, he went on taking counsel and deliberating with his counselors before ordering an unparalleled defense of Laṅkā.

17. He assigned the rākṣasa Prahasta to the eastern gate, and immensely powerful Mahāpārśva and Mahodara to the southern gate.

18. He assigned his son Indrajit, the great master of illusion, to the western gate, in the company of many rākṣasas.

19. Then, after assigning Śuka and Sāraṇa to the northern gate, he told his counselors, "I shall be there myself."

20. He then stationed the immensely powerful and valorous rākṣasa Virūpākṣa in the central encampment along with many rākṣasas.

21. Thus did that bull among rākṣasas complete his arrangements in Laṅkā. Then, being under the power of fate, he considered himself to have accomplished his objective.

22. After he had ordered these elaborate arrangements for the city and dismissed his counselors, he entered his vast and luxurious inner apartments, honored by his hosts of counselors with prayers for victory.

The end of the twenty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 28

1–3. Meanwhile, having entered enemy territory, Rāma the king of men, Sugrīva the king of the monkeys, the monkey Hanumān son of Vāyu, Jāmbavān the king of the apes, the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa, Aṅgada son of Vālin, Saumitri, the monkey Śarabha, Suṣeṇa and his sons, as well as Mainda, Dvivida, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Kumuda, Nala, and Panasa took counsel together, saying:

4. "There lies the citadel of Laṅkā, ruled by Rāvaṇa. It is not to be conquered even by the immortal gods along with the asuras, great serpents, and gandharvas.

5. "It is time to take counsel and formulate a plan, keeping the success of our mission foremost in mind. For this is the principal stronghold of Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas."

6. As they were speaking in this fashion, Vibhīṣaṇa, Rāvaṇa's younger brother, addressed to them a speech rich in meaning and free from all vulgarity.

7. "My counselors, Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa, have gone to the city of Laṅkā and returned.

8. "Turning themselves into birds, they infiltrated the enemy's army. Then, once they had observed the defensive preparations that have been put in place, they all reported back.

9. "Now listen to me, Rāma, as I describe to you faithfully the entire defensive preparations of evil-minded Rāvaṇa, just as they have reported it.

10. "Prahasta with his army is stationed at the eastern gate, while the immensely powerful Mahāpārśva and Mahodara are at the southern gate.

11–12. "Rāvaṇa's son Indrajit—accompanied by heroes armed with various weapons and by many rākṣasas bearing spears, swords, and bows, and wielding lances and war hammers—is stationed at the western gate. He has with him many thousands of rākṣasas with weapons in hand.

13. "Rāvaṇa himself, focused and supremely confident and accompanied by many rākṣasas, has taken up his position at the northern gate of the city.

14. "And Virūpākṣa, along with still more rākṣasas and a force armed with lances, swords, and bows, is stationed in the central encampment.

15. "Once they had surveyed those garrisons, arranged in that fashion, all my ministers returned as quickly as possible.

16. "In the city there are one thousand elephants, ten thousand chariots, twenty thousand horses, and more than ten million rākṣasas.

17. "Those night-roaming rākṣasas—valorous, powerful, and fierce in battle—are at all times the handpicked guard of the rākṣasa king.

18. "And, in order to give battle, an entourage of one million attends upon each one of those rākṣasas here, lord of the people."

19. After Vibhīṣaṇa had delivered his account of the activities in Laṅkā as they had been reported by his counselors, he made these concluding comments to Rāma, whose eyes were like lotus petals:

20–21. "When Rāvaṇa went to war against Kubera, Rāma, six million rākṣasas—the equals of evil-minded Rāvaṇa in valor, strength, energy, power, dignity, and pride—marched forth.

22. "Please do not be angry with me over this. I am trying to rouse your fury for battle, not alarm you. For, with your valor, you are able to defeat even the gods.

23. "Once you have arrayed the monkey forces for battle, you, sir, surrounded by this great host with its four divisions, will utterly destroy Rāvaṇa."

24. When Vibhīṣaṇa, the younger brother of Rāvaṇa, had spoken in this fashion, Rāghava uttered these words in order to repulse his enemies:

25. "Let that bull among monkeys, Nīla, surrounded by many monkeys, confront Prahasta at Laṅkā's eastern gate.

26. "And let Vālin's son, Aṅgada, accompanied by a large force, attack Mahāpārśva and Mahodara at the southern gate.

27. "Meanwhile, let the son of Pavana, Hanumān, of boundless vitality, accompanied by many monkeys, force and breach the western gate.

28–29. "I am determined to kill the lord of the rākṣasas myself. For that lowly wretch, whose power derives from the gift of a boon, takes delight in harming the hosts of daityas and dānavas as well as the great seers, as he rampages through all the worlds oppressing all creatures.

30. "Thus, together with Saumitri, I shall force and breach the northern gate of the city, where Rāvaṇa is stationed with his forces.

31. "Let the powerful king of the monkeys, Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, king of the apes, and Vibhīṣaṇa, the younger brother of the rākṣasa lord, take up their positions at the central encampment.

32. "Let none of the monkeys take on human form in battle. For this shall be our mark of recognition for the monkey army in battle.

33–34. "The monkey form itself will be the sign of recognition for our own forces. Only the seven of us—my friend Vibhīṣaṇa with his four companions, and I myself, together with my immensely powerful brother Lakṣmaṇa—will, in human form, confront our enemies."

35. When resolute Rāma had spoken in this fashion to Vibhīṣaṇa in order to secure the success of their mission, he resolved purposefully to ascend Mount Suvela.

36. Then, covering the land with his vast army, wise and great Rāma marched on Laṅkā in great excitement, determined to slay his enemy.

The end of the twenty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 29

1–2. Once Rāma, who was accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa, had made up his mind to climb Mount Suvela, he spoke in sweet and polished tones to Sugrīva and to the devoted and righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, the night-roaming rākṣasa, who was skillful both in counsel and in action:

3. "Let us all straightaway climb this great mountain Suvela, abounding in hundreds of minerals. For we shall camp there tonight.

4–5. "There we shall survey Laṅkā, the abode of that rākṣasa, the evil-minded wretch who stole away my wife to his own undoing. He has no regard for righteousness, proper conduct, or his own high lineage. And so, in his vile rākṣasa nature, he has done this contemptible thing.

6. "For at the mere mention of that vilest of rākṣasas, my anger blazes up, and, because of the transgression of that lowly wretch, I shall have to witness the slaughter of the rākṣasas.

7. "A single person acting under the power of the noose of Kāla has committed this crime; and because of this despicable offense an entire race must perish."

8. Speaking in this fashion, Rāma, filled with rage toward Rāvaṇa, ascended Mount Suvela with its lovely slopes to make camp there.

9. Behind him came Lakṣmaṇa, ever vigilant, holding his bow and arrows, intent on deeds of great valor.

10–11. Behind him climbed Sugrīva with his counselors and Vibhīṣaṇa as well as Hanumān, Aṅgada, Nīla, Mainda, Dvivida, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śarabha, Gandhamādana, Panasa, Kumuda, Hara, and the troop leader Rambha.

12. These and many other swift monkeys, denizens of the mountains, swarmed up Mount Suvela by the hundred, leaping with the speed of the wind to where Rāghava was.

13. When, after a short time, they had scaled the mountain from all sides, they saw, perched as they were on its summit, a city that seemed to be suspended in the sky.

14. And the leaders of the monkey troops gazed upon splendid Laṅkā, adorned with magnificent gates and ramparts and filled with rākṣasas.

15. There the foremost monkeys saw what appeared to be a second rampart made up of those dark night-roaming rākṣasas who were stationed at the base of the city wall.

16. When the monkeys saw those rākṣasas, so eager for battle, they all bellowed loudly, as Rāma stood watching.

17. Then, reddened at twilight, the sun set and night came on, illumined by the full moon.

18. Then Rāma, the commander of the forces of the tawny monkeys, received and honored by Vibhīṣaṇa, settled in at his leisure on the summit of Mount Suvela. He was accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa and surrounded by the hosts of the monkey troop leaders.

The end of the twenty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 30

1–2. After passing the night on Mount Suvela, those heroic bulls among the tawny monkeys gazed upon the parks and woodlands of Laṅkā. They were level, hospitable, pleasant, broad, long, and charming to look upon. Gazing upon them, the monkeys were wonderstruck.

3–5. The city of Laṅkā was filled with trees: campaka, aśoka, puṃnāga, sāla, and palmyra. It was screened by groves of tamāla trees and surrounded by rows of nāga trees. Indeed, with its celestial trees of every kind entwined with creepers and bursting with blossoms on every side—hintālas, arjunas, nīpas, flowering saptaparṇas, tilakas, karṇikāras, and pāṭalas—it was as lovely as Indra's city of Amarāvatī.

6–7. Replete with varicolored blossoms, red and tender leaf-buds, dark lawns, and variegated groves, those trees wore their fragrant and enticing flowers and fruit, as people do their jewelry.

8. They looked just like the Caitraratha gardens. Delightful and resembling the Nandana groves, those parklands—charming in every season and filled with bees—were ravishing.

9. It was filled with birds—natyūhas, koyaṣṭibhakas, and dancing peacocks. The sweet notes of the cuckoo could be heard across the rushing woodland streams.

10–12. In great excitement and delight, the heroic tawny monkeys, who could take on any form at will, entered those parks and woodlands. These were swarming with bees and filled with birds, constantly enflamed with passion. Cuckoos flocked in their groves, which resounded with the songs of birds. They were filled with the song of drongos and were swarming with bees. They echoed with the song of koṇālakas and resounded with the cries of sārasa cranes.

13. And as those immensely powerful monkeys entered, a breeze, fragrant from its contact with the blossoms, began to blow.

14–15. But with the permission of Sugrīva, some of the troop leaders, notable for their deafening roars, separated themselves from the troops of heroic tawny monkeys and marched toward many-bannered Laṅkā, terrifying birds, frightening deer and elephants, and shaking Laṅkā itself with their roaring.

16. Those immensely swift monkeys crushed the earth under their feet, while clouds of dust rose up suddenly, kicked up by their feet.

17. Frightened by the noise, bears, lions, boar, buffalo, elephants, and deer fled in all ten directions, terrified.

18–20. There, reaching into the sky, stood one of the lofty summits of Mount Trikūṭa. Covered on all sides with flowers, it seemed to be made of gold. It was bright and lovely to behold, and its breadth was a hundred leagues. It was beautiful, grand, and majestic and impossible for even the birds to reach. It was impossible for men to scale, even in their imagination, let alone in reality. And there, on that peak, stood Laṅkā, under the protection of Rāvaṇa.

21. The citadel was adorned with ramparts of gold and silver and with lofty gateway towers resembling white clouds.

22. Indeed, Laṅkā was as magnificently adorned by its palaces and mansions as are the heavens, Viṣṇu's middle step, with clouds at summer's end.

23. In the city could be seen a palace adorned with a thousand columns, which, seeming to scrape the sky, resembled the peak of Mount Kailāsa.

24. It was the domed palace of the rākṣasa lord, and it was the ornament of the city. It was constantly guarded by a full complement of a hundred rākṣasas.

25. Thus did Lakṣmaṇa's fortunate elder brother, Rāma, whose objective had been thus far achieved, first gaze, together with the monkeys, upon Rāvaṇa's opulent citadel.

26. Rāma and his vast army looked out upon the city. It was glittering with gems, abounding with defensive works, and adorned with rows of palaces. Its mighty gates were studded with great defensive engines.

The end of the thirtieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 31

1. Now, at this juncture, observing various portents, Lakṣmaṇa's elder brother addressed these words to fortunate Lakṣmaṇa:

2. "Lakṣmaṇa, let us secure these cool lakes and woodlands abounding in fruit. We shall make camp here, dividing this massive army into companies and marshaling it in formation.

3. "I see signs of a horrendous universal catastrophe near at hand, presaging the annihilation of the heroic apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas.

4. "Winds blow fiercely and the earth trembles. The hilltops shake, and the mountains crumble.

5. "Frightful and terrible clouds, resembling beasts of prey and thundering ominously, pour down fierce torrents mingled with drops of blood.

6. "The evening sky, the color of red sandalpaste, is deeply ominous. A blazing ball of fire plummets from the sun.

7. "Dreadful beasts and birds of ill omen, mournful and with mournful voices, howl at the sun, engendering intense fear.

8. "At night the moon glows dully, emitting a dark and reddish glare, just as it might at the end of the world.

9. "A faint but menacing corona, crimson and inauspicious, encircles the orb of the sun, while a dark spot is visible on its surface, Lakṣmaṇa.

10. "And look, Lakṣmaṇa! The constellations themselves look strange. All of this that appears to us seems to presage the destruction of the world.

11. "Crows, kites, and vultures are spiraling downward, while jackals emit loud and inauspicious howls.

12. "Therefore, surrounded on all sides by tawny monkeys, we should, this very day, swiftly and without delay attack that citadel, which is protected by Rāvaṇa."

13. As that mighty hero, Lakṣmaṇa's elder brother, was speaking in this fashion to Lakṣmaṇa, he swiftly descended from the mountain peak.

14. And when righteous Rāghava had descended from the mountain, he inspected his troops, who were not to be vanquished by their enemies.

15. Together with Sugrīva, Rāghava, who was a master of timing, prepared the vast army of the monkey king and, at the proper moment, sent them into battle.

16. Then, when the time was right, that great-armed hero, armed with his bow and surrounded by his vast army, led the march toward the citadel of Laṅkā.

17. Vibhīṣaṇa, Sugrīva, Hanumān, Jāmbavān, Nala, the king of the apes, Nīla, and Lakṣmaṇa all followed him.

18. Behind them, a vast army of apes and forest-dwelling monkeys, covering a huge swath of land, followed Rāghava.

19. By the hundred, those monkeys, resembling elephants and able to drive off their foes, seized mountain peaks and full-grown trees.

20. In a short time, the two brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, subduers of their foes, reached Laṅkā, the citadel of Rāvaṇa.

21. Garlanded with pennants, adorned with parks and groves, it was lovely with its splendid ramparts. But with its lofty walls and gateways, it seemed impregnable.

22. Urged on by Rāma's words, the forest-dwelling monkeys, following orders, closely besieged the city, which was unassailable even by the gods.

23. Armed with his bow and accompanied by his younger brother, Rāma both guarded and blockaded Laṅkā's northern gate, which was as lofty as a mountain peak.

24–25. Thus did Rāma, the heroic son of Daśaratha, followed by Lakṣmaṇa, approach the northern gate, where Rāvaṇa was stationed, and begin his siege of the city of Laṅkā, which was guarded by Rāvaṇa. For none other than Rāma was capable of guarding that gate.

26. For, with Rāvaṇa stationed there, it was as fearsome as the ocean guarded by Varuṇa. It struck terror into the hearts of the weak. It was guarded on every side by terrifying and well-armed rākṣasas, just as is the underworld known as Pātāla by the dānavas.

27. And Rāma saw arrayed there many and various stores of weapons and armor belonging to the warriors.

28. Meanwhile, the powerful general Nīla of the army of tawny monkeys approached the eastern gate and took up his position there together with Mainda and Dvivida.

29. The very powerful Aṅgada took up his post at the southern gate, along with Ṛṣabha, Gavākṣa, Gaja, and Gavaya.

30. The mighty monkey Hanumān, accompanied by Pramāthin, Praghasa, and other heroes, guarded the western gate.

31. Meanwhile, Sugrīva stationed himself in the central encampment along with all the foremost among the tawny monkeys, who were as swift as Suparṇa or the wind.

32. And thus, at the place where Sugrīva had stationed himself, three hundred and sixty million illustrious leaders of the monkey troops were encamped, pressing their siege.

33. Acting on Rāma's orders, Lakṣmaṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa posted the tawny monkeys by the tens of millions at each of the gates.

34. Meanwhile, Sugrīva and Jāmbavān, accompanied by many troops, took up their position in the central encampment, a little to the west of Rāma's post.

35. Seizing trees and mountaintops, those tigers among monkeys, whose fangs were like those of tigers, held their positions, eager for battle.

36. All of them held their tails erect. All were armed with fangs and claws. All were flexing their variegated limbs. And all their faces were contorted.

37. Some of them were as powerful as ten elephants, and others yet ten times stronger than that, while some were equal in strength to a thousand elephants.

38. Some of them were as powerful as an ogha of elephants, others were a hundred times as powerful as that. Some of the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys had strength beyond measure.

39. The host of those monkey warriors was as variegated and awe inspiring as a swarm of locusts.

40. The ground seemed to be completely filled with the monkeys who were encamped before Laṅkā, while the sky was as if covered with those who were still converging on the city.

41. A hundred divisions each of one hundred thousand apes and forest-dwelling monkeys stationed themselves at the gates of Laṅkā, while still more of them swarmed in from every side to fight.

42. The mountain was completely covered on every side by all those leaping monkeys. Meanwhile, an additional ten million marched upon the city.

43. And thus Laṅkā was blockaded on every side by powerful, tree-wielding monkeys, so that not even the wind could enter.

44. Suddenly besieged by monkeys who resembled great clouds and who were equal to Śakra in valor, the rākṣasas were dumbfounded.

45. From that huge mass of troops as it marched forth, a deafening roar arose, which was like the sound that might arise from the waters if the ocean itself were to be shattered.

46. That deafening sound shook all of Laṅkā together with its ramparts, gateways, hills, parks, and woodlands.

47. Under the protection of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa along with Sugrīva, the army was completely unassailable even by all the gods and asuras.

48–49. When Rāghava had deployed his army in this fashion for the destruction of the rākṣasas, he once again took counsel with his counselors and arrived at a decision. Fully conversant with the sequential application of the various stratagems and of their consequences, he was eager to move on to the next stage. Abiding by the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa, he called to mind the protocol of kings. Summoning Vālin's son, Aṅgada, he said this:

50. "Abandoning fear and free from anxiety, my good monkey, you must leap into the city of Laṅkā. Approaching ten-necked Rāvaṇa, you are to address him in my words as follows:

51–53. "'You have lost your royal majesty, your lordship is at an end. You have lost your wits and doomed yourself. Since, night-roaming rākṣasa, in your delusion and pride you have committed crimes against the seers, gods, gandharvas, apsarases, great serpents, yakṣas, and kings, surely your arrogance, born of the boon of self-existent Brahmā, will today be humbled. For, tormented by the abduction of my wife and bearing the rod of punishment against you, I have encamped at the gates of Laṅkā to inflict that punishment upon you.

54. "'Once I have killed you, rākṣasa, you shall attain the realm of the gods, the great seers, and all the royal seers.

55. "'Now show me the strength, wretched rākṣasa, with which you carried Sītā off after first luring me away with an illusion.

56. "'Unless you hand Maithilī over to me and come to me for refuge, I shall rid the earth of rākṣasas with my keen arrows.

57. "'The foremost of rākṣasas, righteous-minded Vibhīṣaṇa, has come over to me. Endowed with majesty, he shall obtain the secure and unchallenged lordship of Laṅkā.

58. "'For since you are unrighteous, unrestrained, wicked, and surround yourself with fools, you cannot possibly continue to enjoy your kingship for even another moment.

59. "'So gather up your fortitude and, relying on your valor, fight, rākṣasa! Then, slain by my arrows in battle, you shall be purified.

60. "'Even if you were to take the form of a bird, swift as thought, and fly through the three worlds, once you came within the range of my sight, you would not escape alive.

61. "'Let me tell you something for your own good: prepare yourself for the next world. Take a good long look at Laṅkā. Your life is in my hands.'"

62. When Tārā's son, Aṅgada, had been addressed in this fashion by Rāma, tireless in action, he leapt into the sky and sped on his way, like Agni, bearer of oblations, incarnate.

63. Reaching Rāvaṇa's palace in an instant, the majestic monkey spied Rāvaṇa, calmly seated with his ministers.

64. Landing a short distance from him, that bull among tawny monkeys, Aṅgada, with his golden armlets, stood there like a blazing fire.

65. After first identifying himself in his own words, he then repeated that entire excellent speech of Rāma to Rāvaṇa and his ministers, neither adding nor omitting anything.

66. "I am a messenger of Rāma, the Lord of Kosala, tireless in action. I am called Aṅgada, son of Vālin, perhaps you have heard of me.

67. "Rāma Rāghava, the bringer of joy to Kausalyā, says this to you: 'Savage, lowest of men, come out and fight.

68. "'I am going to kill you along with your counselors, sons, friends, and all your kinsmen. Once you have been slain, the three worlds will be free of your menace.

69. "'This very day I shall pluck you out, thorn that you are in the side of the seers and foe of the gods, dānavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, great serpents, and rākṣasas.

70. "'If you do not give back Vaidehī, after first begging her forgiveness and falling at my feet, then, once you have been killed, the kingship shall be Vibhīṣaṇa's.'"

71. As that bull among tawny monkeys was uttering these harsh words, the lord of the host of night-roaming rākṣasas was transported with rage.

72. His eyes red with rage, he then repeatedly commanded his ministers, "Seize this fool and kill him!"

73. Upon hearing Rāvaṇa's words, four dreadful night-roaming rākṣasas, whose energy was like that of a blazing fire, seized Aṅgada.

74. Tārā's heroic son freely allowed himself to be captured in order to demonstrate his power before the hosts of the yātudhānas.

75. Then Aṅgada leapt to the top of the palace, which resembled a mountain peak, carrying with him those rākṣasas who clung to his arms like locusts.

76. Shaken loose by his speed, all four rākṣasas fell from the sky to the ground right before the eyes of the rākṣasa lord.

77. And then, as he landed upon the pinnacle of the palace, lofty as a mountain peak, it crumbled right before the eyes of ten-necked Rāvaṇa.

78. When he had smashed the pinnacle of the palace, he loudly proclaimed his own name, and then, letting out a great roar, he flew off through the sky.

79. Rāvaṇa flew into a towering rage at the assault on his palace. But, foreseeing his own destruction, he fell to sighing.

80. But as for Rāma—eager to slay his enemy—he advanced for battle in the company of many leaping monkeys, who roared in their excitement.

81–82. At Sugrīva's command the tawny monkey Suṣeṇa—immensely powerful, unassailable, and resembling a mountain peak—surrounded by many monkeys, who could take on any form at will, made a tour of all four city gates, much as the moon passes through the lunar mansions.

83–84. When the rākṣasas saw those hundreds of battalions of forest-dwelling monkeys laying siege to Laṅkā and stretching all the way to the sea, some of them were amazed, some were terrified, while others were filled with excitement because of their fervor for battle.

85. Since the entire area between the ramparts and the moat was covered with monkeys, the disheartened rākṣasas gazed upon what appeared to be a wall of monkeys.

86. In the midst of that terrifying and tumultuous uproar in the rākṣasa capital, the rākṣasas took up their mighty weapons and raced about, like the fierce winds at the end of a cosmic age.

The end of the thirty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 32

1. Then the rākṣasas went straightaway to Rāvaṇa's palace and reported to him that Rāma and the monkeys had laid siege to the city.

2. When the night-roaming rākṣasa heard that the city was besieged, he grew furious. After first doubling his defensive arrangements, he climbed up to the terrace of the palace.

3. He saw that Laṅkā, together with its hills, parks, and woodlands, was surrounded on all sides by countless troops of tawny monkeys, eager for battle.

4. Seeing the entire land swallowed up by monkeys, he fell to brooding, thinking, "How can they be destroyed?"

5. After brooding for a long time, Rāvaṇa drew upon his fortitude and gazed wide-eyed at Rāghava and the troops of tawny monkeys.

6. As the rākṣasa lord stood watching, the armies, division after division, began to scale the walls of Laṅkā in order to accomplish Rāghava's most cherished desire.

7. Willing to lay down their lives for Rāma's sake, the red-faced monkeys, shimmering like gold, advanced upon Laṅkā armed with sāla and palmyra trees as well as boulders.

8. Those leaping monkeys smashed the lofty tops of palaces and gateway arches with trees, mountaintops, and even their fists.

9. With earth, mountaintops, grass, and timber, the monkeys filled in the moats, which had held clear water.

10. Then other troop leaders with their troops that numbered in the thousands, tens of millions, and billions scaled the walls of Laṅkā.

11–12. Like great bull elephants, the leaping monkeys advanced upon Laṅkā, jumping back and forth, roaring, crushing golden archways, and smashing towers that resembled the peaks of Mount Kailāsa.

13–14. Those leaping monkeys, who could take on any form at will, hurled themselves upon the ramparts of Laṅkā, roaring and shouting, "Victory to supremely powerful Rāma and mighty Lakṣmaṇa! Victory to King Sugrīva, who is protected by Rāghava!"

15. Vīrabāhu, Subāhu, and the forest-ranging Nala, leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys, made a breach in the rampart and stationed themselves there.

16. At that juncture, they established a bridgehead.

17. Accompanied by a hundred million tawny monkeys, all with a victorious air, mighty Kumuda stationed himself at the eastern gate, blockading it.

18. The powerful and valorous monkey Śatabali proceeded with two hundred million troops to the southern gate and took up his post there, blockading it.

19. Tārā's father, the powerful tawny monkey Suṣeṇa, proceeded to the western gate with six hundred million troops and took up his post there, blockading it.

20. Together with Saumitri, mighty Rāma himself and Sugrīva, lord of the tawny monkeys, approached the northern gate and took up their posts, blockading it.

21. At Rāma's side stood the huge langur Gavākṣa. Enormously powerful, mighty, and dreadful to look upon, he was accompanied by ten million troops.

22. Also at Rāma's side stood valorous Dhūmra, crusher of his foes, accompanied by ten million apes of terrifying speed.

23. There, too, accompanied by his ministers, stood immensely powerful and valorous Vibhīṣaṇa, girded for war, his mace in hand.

24. Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śarabha, and Gandhamādana patrolled swiftly on all sides, guarding the army of tawny monkeys.

25. Then Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, his mind suffused with rage, ordered all of his forces to make an immediate sortie.

26. Urged on by Rāvaṇa, his troops rushed forth in great excitement, like the waves of the great ocean when, at the appointed time, it is filled to overflowing.

27. At that juncture, a horrific battle ensued between the rākṣasas and the monkeys, just like the one long ago between the gods and the asuras.

28. The dreadful rākṣasas slaughtered the monkeys with blazing maces, lances, javelins, and battle-axes, boasting of their valorous deeds.

29. Similarly, the huge and swift monkeys slaughtered the rākṣasas with trees, mountaintops, claws, and teeth.

30. Meanwhile, other dreadful rākṣasas positioned on the rampart hewed the monkeys on the ground with short javelins, swords, and lances.

31. But the leaping monkeys on the ground were enraged and, leaping up, hurled down the rākṣasas stationed on the ramparts.

32. That tumultuous conflict of the rākṣasas and monkeys, in which the ground grew thick with flesh and blood, was something unimaginable.

The end of the thirty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 33

1. As those great monkeys continued to fight, a terrible rage against their army arose among the rākṣasas.

2–3. Those tigers among rākṣasas sallied forth, causing the ten directions to resound. They were rākṣasas of dreadful deeds, eager for Rāvaṇa's victory. They had golden-plumed horses, banners that resembled flames of fire, chariots resplendent as the sun, and exquisite armor.

4. And the vast host of monkeys, who also desired victory, hurled itself upon the army of the rākṣasas, who could take on any form at will.

5. At this juncture, as they hurled themselves at one another, the monkeys and the rākṣasas engaged in single combat.

6. The rākṣasa Indrajit fought with Aṅgada, Vālin's son, just as long ago the immensely powerful asura Andhaka fought with three-eyed Śiva.

7. Saṃpāti, ever irresistible in battle, fought with Prajaṅgha, while the monkey Hanumān engaged Jambumālin.

8. In a towering rage, Rāvaṇa's younger brother, the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa, closed in combat with Mitraghna, of blazing speed.

9. Mighty Gaja fought with the rākṣasa Tapana, and powerful Nīla with Nikumbha.

10. The lord of the monkeys, Sugrīva, engaged with Praghasa, while majestic Lakṣmaṇa closed in battle with Virūpākṣa.

11. Rāma engaged with the irresistible Agniketu, the rākṣasa Raśmiketu, Suptaghna, and Yajñakopa.

12. Two of the leading monkeys engaged with a pair of particularly dreadful rākṣasas: Mainda with Vajramuṣṭi and Dvivida with Aśaniprabha.

13. The heroic and dreadful rākṣasa Pratapana, irresistible in battle, engaged in combat with Nala, of blazing speed.

14. The son of Dharma, the great and powerful monkey known as Suṣeṇa, fought with Vidyunmālin.

15. And many other fearsome monkeys engaged in single combat in various ways with many other rākṣasas.

16. The great battle that took place there between the heroic rākṣasas and monkeys, both desirous of victory, was tumultuous and hair-raising.

17. From the bodies of the tawny monkeys and rākṣasas flowed gushing rivers of blood, with hair in place of weeds and carrying logjams of corpses.

18. In a rage, Indrajit struck the heroic Aṅgada, breaker of enemy ranks, with his mace, just as Indra of the hundred sacrifices might with his thunderbolt.

19. And in that combat, the swift monkey, majestic Aṅgada, smashed Indrajit's gilded chariot together with its horses and charioteer.

20. Prajaṅgha shot Saṃpāti with three arrows; but he, in turn, struck Prajaṅgha with an aśvakarṇa tree in the vanguard of battle.

21. In that battle, immensely powerful Jambumālin, furious, mounted his chariot and, with a javelin he kept there, struck Hanumān in the middle of the chest.

22. But Hanumān, the son of Māruta, leapt upon Jambumālin's chariot and, with a blow of his hand, swiftly destroyed it together with that rākṣasa.

23. Then Gaja, his body pierced by the sharp arrows of the dexterous rākṣasa Tapana, smashed him with a mountain peak held in his fist.

24. Sugrīva, overlord of the monkeys, then killed Praghasa, who seemed almost to be devouring the troops, smashing him to pieces with a saptaparṇa tree.

25. After tormenting the fearsome-looking rākṣasa Virūpākṣa with a hail of arrows, Lakṣmaṇa killed him with a single shaft.

26. The irresistible Agniketu, the rākṣasa Raśmiketu, Suptaghna, and Yajñakopa all pierced Rāma with their arrows.

27. But, with four fearsome arrows resembling tongues of flame, Rāma, enraged, lopped off the heads of all four of them in battle.

28. In combat Mainda smashed Vajramuṣṭi with his fist so that, along with his chariot and horses, he crashed down to the earth, like the lofty tower of a citadel.

29. Then Dvivida, whose blows were like that of Indra's vajra or thunderbolt, struck Aśaniprabha with a mountain peak right before the eyes of all the rākṣasas.

30. But, in the battle, with arrows that resembled thunderbolts, Aśaniprabha, in turn, riddled the monkey lord Dvivida, who used trees as weapons.

31. And, in turn, with a sāla tree, Dvivida, his body bristling with arrows and beside himself with rage, crushed Aśaniprabha, along with his horses and chariot.

32. Then, in battle, Nikumbha pierced Nīla, whose dark luster was like that of a mass of collyrium, with sharp arrows, just as the bright-rayed sun pierces a dark cloud with its beams.

33. Next, that dexterous night-roaming rākṣasa Nikumbha once again riddled Nīla in combat with a hundred arrows and laughed.

34. But Nīla, like Viṣṇu in battle, cut off the heads of Nikumbha and his charioteer in combat with a discus taken from their chariot.

35. Mounted in his chariot, Vidyunmālin struck Suṣeṇa with gold-inlaid arrows and roared repeatedly.

36. Then, seeing him mounted in his chariot, that foremost among monkeys Suṣeṇa quickly smashed the chariot with a huge mountain peak.

37. But the night-roaming rākṣasa Vidyunmālin, who was endowed with great speed, swiftly leapt from his chariot and, mace in hand, made a stand on the ground.

38. Then, suffused with rage, Suṣeṇa, that bull among the tawny monkeys, seized an enormous boulder and charged at the night-roaming rākṣasa.

39. With his mace, the night-roaming rākṣasa Vidyunmālin swiftly struck Suṣeṇa, foremost of tawny monkeys, who was rushing toward him, in the chest.

40. But that best of leaping monkeys paid no heed to that terrible blow of the mace, and in that great battle, he hurled the boulder down upon Vidyunmālin's chest.

41. Struck by the blow of that boulder, the night-roaming rākṣasa Vidyunmālin fell lifeless to the earth, his chest crushed.

42. In this fashion, the valorous monkeys slaughtered the valorous night-roaming rākṣasas in single combat, just as the gods, dwellers in heaven, slaughtered the daityas.

43–44. With its crescent-headed arrows, swords, maces, javelins, iron cudgels, spears, broken chariots, butchered war-horses, slaughtered rutting elephants, monkeys, and rākṣasas, and shattered wheels, axles, and yokes lying on the ground, the battlefield, haunted by packs of jackals, was a place of horror.

45. And in that tumultuous conflict, which was comparable to the battle of the gods and the asuras, headless corpses of monkeys and rākṣasas leapt about in every direction.

46. As they were being torn to pieces by the bulls among the tawny monkeys, the night-roaming rākṣasas, their limbs smeared with blood, swiftly hurled themselves into battle once again, anxious now for the sun, maker of day, to set.

The end of the thirty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 34

1. As the monkeys and rākṣasas continued to fight, the sun set and a deadly night came on.

2. Then ensued a clash by night between those terrifying monkeys and rākṣasas, locked in their mutual hostility, all of them eager for victory.

3. In that terrible darkness they slaughtered one another in battle: the tawny monkeys crying, "Are you a rākṣasa?" and the rākṣasas crying, "Are you a monkey?"

4. "Kill!" "Rend" "Come on!" "What, running away?" Such were the tumultuous cries that were heard in that darkness.

5. With their golden armor, in the darkness, the swarthy rākṣasas looked like great mountains with thickets of luminescent herbs.

6. Beside themselves with fury, the swift rākṣasas raced about in that impenetrable darkness, devouring the monkeys.

7. But the monkeys hurled themselves upon the rākṣasas' golden-plumed horses and their banners that resembled flames of fire and, in a terrifying rage, tore them to pieces with their sharp fangs.

8. Beside themselves with fury, they dragged about elephants with their riders and chariots bedecked with flags and banners, slashing at them with their fangs.

9. Meanwhile, with arrows that resembled venomous serpents, Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma cut down the foremost among the rākṣasas, whom they could make out but dimly in the darkness.

10. The thick dust raised by the horses' hooves and chariot wheels blocked up the eyes and ears of the warriors.

11. And there, as that terrible, hair-raising battle proceeded in this fashion, swift rivers with blood for water began to flow.

12. And there arose an astonishing sound of battle drums—bherīs, mṛdaṅgas, and paṇavas—mingled with sounds of conch and flute.

13. A very horrifying clamor arose from the clash of arms and from the rākṣasas and monkeys, screaming as they were struck down.

14. Strewn with weapons, as if with floral offerings, and thick with mud that oozed blood, the battleground was impassable, transformed beyond all recognition.

15. Like Kālarātrī, the dark night of universal destruction, which no living thing can escape, that dreadful night was devastating to both the rākṣasas and the tawny monkeys.

16. Then, in that terrible darkness, the frenzied rākṣasas attacked Rāma with hails of arrows.

17. And the uproar that they made as they rushed upon him, roaring in fury, was like the sound of the upheaval of the seven seas at the time of universal destruction.

18–19. But in the blink of an eye, with six sharp arrows, like flames of fire, Rāma struck six of those night-roaming rākṣasas: unassailable Yajñaśatru, Mahāpārśva, Mahodara, the giant Vajradaṃṣṭra, and both Śuka and Sāraṇa.

20. Pierced in every vital point by Rāma with his hail of arrows, they crawled away from the battle, barely clinging to life.

21. Then mighty Rāma illuminated all directions with his arrows, which, with their shafts adorned with gold, resembled flames of fire.

22. As for the remaining rākṣasa heroes who stood their ground before Rāma, they, too, were destroyed, like moths entering a flame.

23. With thousands of arrows flying, their feathers fletched with gold, the night was as lovely as an autumnal evening sparkling with fireflies.

24. The bellowing of the rākṣasas and the roaring of the tawny monkeys made that dreadful night more dreadful still.

25. As that deafening sound increased on every side, Mount Trikūṭa, with its many echoing caverns, seemed almost to shout in reply.

26. Huge langurs, as black as the darkness itself, crushed night-roaming rākṣasas in their arms, rending them with their fangs.

27. At this point Aṅgada threw himself into the battle in order to destroy his enemy. He swiftly slew the charioteer and horses of Indrajit Rāvaṇi.

28. His horses and charioteer slain by Aṅgada, Indrajit, who possessed great powers of illusion, vanished on the spot.

29. The evil Indrajit Rāvaṇi, a hero ruthless in battle, possessed a boon from Brahmā. Seething with rage, he concealed himself; and, unseen, he loosed sharp arrows, blazing like lightning bolts.

30. In a rage, the rākṣasa pierced Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in every part of their bodies with dreadful arrows in the form of great serpents.

The end of the thirty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 35

1. Eager to find out where Indrajit had gone, the valorous and exceedingly mighty Prince Rāma ordered ten leaders of the monkey troops to search for him.

2–3. That scorcher of his foes gave his command to the two sons of Suṣeṇa, that bull among monkeys Nīla, Aṅgada, son of Vālin, swift Śarabha, Vinata, Jāmbavān, mighty Sānuprastha, Ṛṣabha, and Ṛṣabhaskandha.

4. In great excitement, those tawny monkeys ripped up fearsome trees as they all flung themselves into the sky, searching the ten directions.

5. But Indrajit Rāvaṇi, expert in divine weapon-spells, used the greatest of such weapon-spells to halt the swift movement of those swift monkeys with arrows that were swifter still.

6. Pierced and mutilated by his iron arrows, those tawny monkeys of terrifying speed could not discern him, obscured as he was by darkness, as is the sun by clouds.

7. Indrajit Rāvaṇi, victorious in battle, completely overwhelmed Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with arrows that pierced every vital point.

8. In his fury Indrajit riddled the heroic brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, with great serpents that had turned into arrows. Their bodies were thus thickly covered with arrows that had not a hair's breadth between them.

9. From their wounds, the pathways of blood, the blood flowed copiously so that they both resembled kiṃśuka trees covered with their bright red blossoms.

10. Then, as hard to discern as a scattered mass of collyrium, Indrajit Rāvaṇi, his eyes rimmed with red, addressed the two brothers in these words:

11. "Not even Śakra himself, the lord of the thirty gods, can see me or attack me when I fight unseen. How much less could the two of you?

12. "Rāghavas! In my towering rage, I shall send you both—tightly bound in my web of heron-fletched arrows—to the abode of Yama."

13. When he had spoken in this fashion to the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who understood righteousness, he pierced them with sharp arrows, as he exulted and roared.

14. As obscure as a scattered mass of collyrium, he drew his great bow and again and again let fly terrifying arrows in that great conflict.

15. Roaring repeatedly, that hero, who knew the vital points, sank sharp arrows into the vitals of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.

16. In the blink of an eye, the two of them were so tightly bound in the bonds of those arrows there in the forefront of the battle that they could not even see.

17. Then, pierced with arrows and darts and wounded in every limb, the two of them trembled, like two of great Indra's banners cut loose from their sustaining cords.

18. Weakened by the piercing of their vitals, those two great archers, heroic lords of the earth, staggered and fell to the earth.

19. Their every limb constricted by arrows, suffering and in great agony, the two heroes lay upon the battlefield, a hero's bed, spattered with blood.

*20. There was not a finger's breadth between the wounds that covered their bodies. There was no part of their bodies down to their very fingertips that had not been wounded and immobilized by straight-flying arrows.

21. Struck down by that fierce rākṣasa, who could take on any form at will, they both poured forth their blood copiously, as two fountains might their water.

22. Rāma fell first, pierced to the vitals with arrows by the raging Indrajit, who had once defeated Śakra.

23. He riddled him with iron arrows, half-iron arrows, crescent-headed arrows, and arrows with heads like folded palms, calves' teeth, lions' fangs, and razors.

24. Rāma lay there on the battlefield, a hero's bed, clutching his gilded, thrice-curved bow, now unstrung, its grip shattered.

25. Seeing Rāma, that bull among men, fallen there in the midst of that hail of arrows, Lakṣmaṇa despaired of his own life.

26. And the monkeys, headed by Hanumān, the son of Vāyu gathered and stood surrounding the two fallen heroes, who lay in bondage. In their affliction, they, too, became deeply despondent.

The end of the thirty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 36

1. Then the forest-dwelling monkeys, glancing nervously at the earth and the sky, gazed upon the two brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who were riddled with arrows.

2. When the rākṣasa had accomplished his task and ceased his onslaught, like the god Indra after pouring down the rains, Vibhīṣaṇa arrived at that spot together with Sugrīva.

3. Nīla, Dvivida, Mainda, Suṣeṇa, Sumukha, and Aṅgada, together with Hanumān, began at once to mourn the two Rāghavas.

4–7. As the monkeys, along with Vibhīṣaṇa, gazed upon the two fallen Rāghavas, ensnared in a web of arrows, they were all shaken to their depths. For both heroes were motionless, barely breathing, and drenched in gouts of blood. Lying on beds of arrows, they were immobilized, tightly bound with webs of arrows. Their labored breathing was like the hissing of snakes; they barely moved for their strength had all but left them. Their bodies drenched in streams of blood, they resembled flagstaffs of burnished gold. Surrounded by the troop leaders, whose eyes were filled with tears, the two heroes lay there on the battlefield, a hero's bed, barely moving.

8. Although the monkeys scanned the sky and all directions, they could not see Indrajit Rāvaṇi, who had concealed himself in the battle with his powers of illusion.

9. But Vibhīṣaṇa, in looking about, was able, through his own magical powers, to discern his brother's son, who stood there, concealed by his powers of illusion.

10. Vibhīṣaṇa was thus able to see that hero, unequaled in his feats and unrivaled in battle, who had concealed himself through the gift of a boon.

11. But Indrajit, as he observed his handiwork and the two heroes lying there, was supremely pleased with himself, and he spoke as follows to the delight of all the rākṣasas, sons of chaos:

12. "The two mighty brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, slayers of Khara and Dūṣaṇa, have been struck down by my arrows.

13. "Not even all the gods and asuras together, along with the hosts of seers, can free these two from the bonds of my arrows.

14–15. "I have put an end to the menace they posed, which could have destroyed us all. It is because of them that the three watches of the night now pass without my father—consumed as he was by anxiety—so much as touching his bed. And it is because of them that the whole city of Laṅkā has become as turbulent as a river in the rainy season.

16. "All the valorous deeds of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and all the forest-dwelling monkeys have proven to be as fruitless as rain clouds in autumn."

17. When he had spoken in this fashion to all the rākṣasas who stood beside him, Rāvaṇi began once more to assail all the monkey troop leaders.

18. Once he had afflicted them with torrents of arrows and terrified the monkeys, the great-armed hero laughed and said this:

19. "Look, rākṣasas, at those two brothers, whom I have bound with the terrible bonds of my arrows right in front of their troops!"

20. Addressed in this fashion, the rākṣasas, treacherous fighters all, were greatly amazed and gratified by that feat.

21. Thinking, "Rāma has been slain!" those rākṣasas, who resembled storm clouds, uttered a great roar and honored Rāvaṇi.

22. Seeing both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa motionless on the ground and scarcely breathing, he assumed that they had been killed.

23. Filled with delight, Indrajit, victorious in battle, entered the citadel of Laṅkā to the delight of all the rākṣasas, sons of chaos.

24. When Sugrīva saw that the bodies of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were riddled with arrows in each and every limb, terror seized him.

25. Then Vibhīṣaṇa addressed the monkey king, who was terrified and dejected, his face covered with tears and his eyes suffused with sorrow.

26. "Enough of this faintheartedness, Sugrīva! Hold back this flood of tears! Battles are often like this. Victory is far from certain.

27. "If there is any remnant of good fortune left to us, hero, the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa will regain consciousness.

28. "So pull yourself together, monkey, and thus encourage me, who am without any recourse. Those who are devoted to the true path of righteousness have no fear of death."

29. When he had spoken in this fashion, Vibhīṣaṇa dipped his hand in water and, with it, wiped Sugrīva's lovely eyes.

30. Once he had wiped the wise monkey king's face, he calmly spoke these timely words:

31. "This is not the time to give way to despair, greatest of monkey kings. Moreover, at this inopportune moment, excessive tenderness could prove fatal.

32. "Therefore, you must abandon despair, which undermines all endeavors. You must think about what would be best for these troops under Rāma's leadership.

33. "Rather, you should stand guard over Rāma until he regains consciousness. Once the two Kākutsthas have regained consciousness, they will dispel our fear.

34. "This is nothing to Rāma; nor is he about to die. For that vital glow, which is never found in the dead, is not deserting him.

35. "So you must console yourself and rally your forces, while I regroup all the troops.

36. "For, bull among tawny monkeys, these tawny monkeys, filled with alarm, their eyes wide with terror, are spreading rumors from ear to ear.

37. "But once the tawny monkeys see me rushing about to encourage the army, they will cast aside their fear, as one would a used garland."

38. Once that foremost of rākṣasas Vibhīṣaṇa had reassured Sugrīva, he set about rallying the terrified monkey army.

39. But as for Indrajit, that great master of illusion, he entered the city of Laṅkā, surrounded by all his troops, and presented himself before his father.

40. Hands cupped in reverence, he respectfully greeted his father, Rāvaṇa, who was seated there, and told him the good news that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa had been slain.

41. When Rāvaṇa heard that his two enemies had been felled, he leapt up in great delight and embraced his son, right in the midst of the rākṣasas.

42. Delighted at heart, he kissed him on the head before questioning him. Indrajit then reported everything, just as it had happened, to his father, who was questioning him.

43. His heart flooded with a great access of joy upon hearing the words of that great chariot-warrior, he cast aside the anxiety that Dāśarathi had caused and, in great delight, praised his son.

The end of the thirty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 37

1. Once Indrajit, the son of Rāvaṇa, had returned to Laṅkā, his mission accomplished, the bulls among monkeys, in great distress, surrounded Rāghava to protect him.

2–4. Then those monkeys—Hanumān, Aṅgada, Nīla, Suṣeṇa, Kumuda, Nala, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śarabha, Gandhamādana, Jāmbavān, Ṛṣabha, Sunda, Rambha, Śatabali, and Pṛthu—put their troops in battle formation and, maintaining a watch on all sides, armed themselves with trees. Scanning all directions, above as well as on every side, they thought at the mere stirring of the grass that the rākṣasas had come.

5. Meanwhile, in great delight, Rāvaṇa, having dismissed his son Indrajit, summoned the rākṣasa women who were guarding Sītā.

6. Those rākṣasa women, together with Trijaṭā, attended upon him at his command. Then, in great delight, the lord of the rākṣasas addressed those rākṣasa women.

7. "You are to tell Vaidehī that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa have been slain by Indrajit. Then take her in the flying palace Puṣpaka and show her the two of them, slain on the battlefield.

8. "That husband of hers, relying on whom she stubbornly spurned me, has been destroyed, along with his brother, in the vanguard of battle.

9. "Now Sītā Maithilī, free from anxiety, longing, and hope, and adorned with all manner of jewelry, will surely come to me.

*10. "Seeing that Rāma, along with Lakṣmaṇa, has succumbed to the power of Kāla in battle and finding no alternative, she will have her hopes finally dashed this very day."

11. Upon hearing those words of evil-minded Rāvaṇa, the rākṣasa women said, "So be it," and went off to where the flying palace Puṣpaka was.

12. Then, in compliance with Rāvaṇa's command, the rākṣasa women took the flying palace Puṣpaka and fetched Maithilī, who was in the aśoka grove.

13. The rākṣasa women seized Sītā, who was lost in sorrow for her husband, and forced her into the flying palace Puṣpaka.

14. Once Rāvaṇa had seen to it that Sītā had been taken aboard the flying palace Puṣpaka along with Trijaṭā, he had Laṅkā festooned with flags and banners.

15. And, in great delight, the lord of the rākṣasas had the following proclamation made throughout Laṅkā: "Indrajit has slain Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa in battle!"

16. Meanwhile, Sītā, traveling with Trijaṭā in the flying palace, saw that practically the entire monkey army had been annihilated.

17. And she saw that the flesh-eating rākṣasas were delighted at heart, while the monkeys standing beside Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were afflicted with sorrow.

18. Then Sītā spied both Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma lying unconscious on their beds of arrows, riddled with arrows.

19. Their armor was shattered and their bows had slipped from their grasp. Their every limb riddled with arrows, the two heroes looked like two pillars of arrows fallen to the ground.

20. When Sītā saw the two heroic brothers, those bulls among men, she was overwhelmed with terrible grief, and she lamented piteously.

21. Seeing those two brothers, who were equal in power to the gods, Sītā, overwhelmed with tears and sorrow, assumed that they were dead. Stricken with grief, she uttered these words.

The end of the thirty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 38

1. When Sītā, drawn with grief, saw that her husband as well as mighty Lakṣmaṇa had been struck down, she lamented piteously and profusely:

*2. "Those scholars who know the science of bodily signs said that I would bear sons and never be a widow. Now that Rāma has been slain, it is clear that all those wise men spoke falsely.

*3. "And they said that I would be the chief queen of a king who performed the rites of royalty, the wife of a great patron of sacrifices. Now that Rāma has been slain, it is clear that all those wise men spoke falsely.

*4. "And although they told me, 'You shall be the wife of a heroic king and very fortunate,' now that Rāma has been slain, it is clear that all those wise men spoke falsely.

*5. "And as for those astrologers who foretold in my presence that I should enjoy good fortune, now that Rāma has been slain, it is clear that all those wise men spoke falsely.

6. "And here, on my feet, are those lotus marks, whereby it is said women come to be consecrated for sovereignty together with their royal husbands.

7. "Nor, though I search for them, do I find on my body those inauspicious signs whereby unfortunate women become widows. Indeed, the signs on my body are meaningless.

8. "In the science of bodily signs, the lotus marks of women are said to be infallible. But now that Rāma has been slain, they have proven false for me.

9. "My hair is fine, even, and dark. My eyebrows do not meet. My legs are smooth and tapering, and my teeth are closely set.

10. "And my temples, eyes, hands, feet, ankles, and thighs are nicely developed. My nails are rounded and glossy. My fingers and toes are well proportioned.

11. "My breasts, their nipples sunken, are full and closely set. My navel is deep with sloping sides. My chest and sides are nicely developed.

12. "My complexion has the radiance of a jewel. My body hair is fine. Since I stand so firmly on my feet—all twelve points making contact—they said that I was possessed of auspicious signs.

13. "My hands and feet are of excellent color, without gaps, and marked with the auspicious sign of a whole barleycorn. Those who know the science of the bodily signs of girls said of me, 'She has that faint smile.'

14. "The brahman astrologers foretold that I should be consecrated for sovereignty together with my husband. Now that has all proven false.

15. "After scouring Janasthāna and finding out what had become of me, the two brothers crossed the imperturbable ocean only to be slain in a petty skirmish.

16. "Didn't the two Rāghavas obtain the divine weapon-spells of Varuṇa, Agni, Indra, and Vāyu, as well as the divine Brahmaśiras weapon-spell?

17. "My two protectors, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who are comparable to Vāsava himself, have been slain in battle by an invisible foe through the power of illusion. Now there is no one to protect me.

18. "For in battle no enemy whom Rāghava could see would have escaped with his life, even were he as swift as thought itself.

19. "Since Rāma and his brother lie slain in battle, I see that nothing is beyond the power of Kāla and that it is impossible to avert one's destiny.

20. "I do not grieve for my slain husband and Lakṣmaṇa, nor for myself and my mother, as much as for my poor mother-in-law.

21. "For she must be constantly thinking, 'Oh, when will I see Rāma, his vow completed, return together with Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa?' "

22. But as Sītā was lamenting in this fashion, the rākṣasa woman Trijaṭā said to her, "Do not despair, my lady, for your husband still lives.

23. "And I shall give you powerful and convincing reasons, my lady, why the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa must be alive.

24. "For if their leader had been slain in battle, his troops' faces would not be so suffused with anger and animated with excitement.

25. "Moreover, Vaidehī, if those two heroes had really lost their lives, this celestial flying palace, which goes by the name of Puṣpaka, would not be carrying you.

26. "Then, too, when its heroic leader is slain, an army, dispirited and irresolute, drifts aimlessly across the battlefield, like a rudderless vessel on the water.

27. "But this army is neither confused nor despondent. On the contrary, it is moving swiftly to protect the two Kākutsthas, who have been defeated in battle by the power of illusion.

28. "You should be reassured by these signs, which presage happiness. You must realize that the Kākutsthas have not been slain. I tell you this out of affection.

29. "I have never uttered a falsehood, nor will I ever. Through your virtuous conduct and pleasant demeanor, you have found a place in my heart.

30. "These two could never be defeated in battle even by the gods and asuras together with Indra. I have told you this on the basis of my observation of their faces.

31. "And observe carefully, Maithilī, the most important sign of all: although they are both unconscious, their vital glow has not left them.

32. "For, invariably, when men have lost their vital spark and breath of life, a terrible change is apparent in their faces.

33. "So, daughter of Janaka, you must give up your grief, pain, and delusion on account of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. For it is not possible that they could have been killed this day."

34. When Sītā Maithilī, who was like a daughter of the gods, had heard these words of Trijaṭā, she cupped her hands in reverence and said this: "May it be so."

35. Trijaṭā then turned around the flying palace Puṣpaka, swift as thought, and took the despondent Sītā back to Laṅkā.

36. When Sītā, together with Trijaṭā, had descended from the flying palace Puṣpaka, the rākṣasa women took her straight back to the aśoka grove.

37. Sītā entered the rākṣasa lord's pleasure ground with its many groves of trees. And there, brooding about the king's sons whom she had just seen, she sank into the most profound despair.

The end of the thirty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 39

1–2. Meanwhile, overcome with grief, all the mighty monkey leaders, including Sugrīva, stood surrounding the two great sons of Daśaratha. As the two of them lay there drenched in blood, bound with the terrible bonds of arrows, their labored breathing was like the hissing of great serpents.

3. At that moment, because he was so hardy and through the exertion of his strength, powerful Rāma regained consciousness, though he remained bound by the arrows.

4. But then, when he saw that his brother was stricken—deeply wounded, covered with blood, his face deathly—he began to lament in his desolation.

5. "What do I care for Sītā or even for my life itself now that I see my brother lying defeated in battle?

6. "Were I to search the world, I could find another woman like Sītā, but never a brother, a companion, or a warrior to equal Lakṣmaṇa.

7. "If Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of Sumitrā's joy, has indeed returned to the elements, then I shall abandon my life right before the eyes of the monkeys.

8. "Whatever shall I tell Kausalyā, and what shall I tell mother Kaikeyī? And how shall I tell mother Sumitrā, longing for the sight of her son?

9. "And how shall I console Sumitrā, trembling and shrieking like an osprey at the loss of her darling son, if I should return without him?

10. "And how shall I tell Śatrughna and the illustrious Bharata, if I were to go back again without him with whom I went to the forest?

11. "Alas! I shall not be able to endure the reproaches of Sumitrā. I shall abandon my body right here, for I cannot bear to go on living.

12. "Damn me, an ignoble evildoer, on whose account Lakṣmaṇa lies fallen on a bed of arrows, his life breaths ebbing.

13. "You always used to comfort me, Lakṣmaṇa, when I was downcast. But now, your life breaths ebbing, you can no longer even speak to me in my pain.

14. "That hero, who struck down so many rākṣasas in combat on the field of battle, now lies on the very same field, struck down by his foes.

15. "Lying on this bed of arrows, covered with his own blood, and bound in a web of arrows, he looks like the sun, bringer of light, as it sets.

16. "His vitals pierced with arrows, he can no longer see. And, although he cannot speak, the expression of his eyes betrays his torment.

17. "Just as that glorious hero followed me as I went to the forest, so will I now follow him to the abode of Yama.

18. "He always cherished his family, and he was ever devoted to me. But now through my failed tactics—ignoble as I am—he has been reduced to this state.

19. "I cannot recall heroic Lakṣmaṇa ever uttering a harsh or unpleasant word, even when he was enraged.

20. "Lakṣmaṇa, who could loose five hundred arrows in one swift motion, thus surpassed even Kārtavīrya himself in archery.

21. "He who, with his divine weapon-spells, could destroy the divine weapon-spells of even great Śakra and who deserves the most costly bed now lies stricken on the bare earth.

22. "In that I have failed to make Vibhīṣaṇa the king of the rākṣasas, there is no doubt that what has proven to be my idle boast will torment me.

23. "And you, King Sugrīva, should return home this very instant, for once mighty Rāvaṇa realizes that you no longer have me to assist you, he will attack.

24. "Placing Aṅgada in the lead, you, together with your troops and allies, must once again cross the ocean by that very same bridge.

25. "Hanumān accomplished feats in battle impossible for others to accomplish. I am also well pleased with the king of the apes and the overlord of the langurs.

26. "Aṅgada accomplished great deeds as did Mainda and Dvivida, while Kesarin and Saṃpāti fought fearsome battles in the war.

27. "Gavaya, Gavākṣa, Śarabha, Gaja, and the other tawny monkeys fought on my behalf, heedless of their lives.

28. "Truly, Sugrīva, it is impossible for men to evade their fate. Nonetheless, Sugrīva, scorcher of your foes, in your anxiety lest you transgress righteousness, you did everything that was possible for a friend or ally to do.

29. "Bulls among monkeys! You have discharged the obligations of friendship. I therefore give you all leave. You may depart as you please."

30. As those tawny-eyed monkeys listened to Rāma's lament, they began to weep.

31. Meanwhile, Vibhīṣaṇa, having prevented all the troops from fleeing, rushed back, mace in hand, to where Rāghava lay.

32. But when the monkeys saw him rushing toward them, like a mass of black collyrium, they all fled, thinking that he was Indrajit Rāvaṇi.

The end of the thirty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 40

1. Then the mighty and powerful king of the tawny monkeys asked: "Why is the army fleeing wildly, like a ship driven to and fro by contrary winds at sea?"

2–3. Hearing Sugrīva's words, Vālin's son, Aṅgada, replied: "Can't you see that the two great heroes, the sons of Daśaratha, Rāma and mighty Lakṣmaṇa, are lying on beds of arrows, drenched with blood and tightly bound with webs of arrows?"

4. Then Sugrīva, lord of the monkeys, responded to his son, Aṅgada: "I do not doubt that that is one reason. Still, there must be some other cause for their alarm.

5. "For the tawny monkeys, their faces downcast, have dropped their weapons and are fleeing in all directions, their eyes wide with terror.

6. "They have no sense of shame before one another; nor do they look back. They drag one another out of their way and leap over the fallen."

7. At that very moment, the hero Vibhīṣaṇa, mace in hand, hailed Sugrīva and then stared at Rāghava.

8. Perceiving that it was Vibhīṣaṇa, who was the cause of the monkeys' terror, Sugrīva said to Jāmbavān, the king of the apes, who was close at hand:

9. "It is Vibhīṣaṇa who has come. Upon seeing him, these bulls among monkeys are fleeing in terror, fearing that it was Rāvaṇa's son.

10. "You must stop them, for, in their terror, they are running off in all directions as fast as they can. Tell them that it is only Vibhīṣaṇa who has come."

11. Addressed in this fashion by Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, the king of the apes, turned back the monkeys from their flight and reassured them.

12. When the monkeys heard the words of the king of the apes and saw that it was indeed Vibhīṣaṇa, they all abandoned their fear and returned.

13. But as for righteous Vibhīṣaṇa, when he saw the bodies of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa riddled with arrows, he became deeply distraught.

14. Wiping their eyes with a hand moistened with water, he wept and lamented, his heart overwhelmed with sorrow.

15. "These two powerful and brave warriors, delighting in battle, have been reduced to this condition by those treacherous warriors, the rākṣasas.

16. "With his crooked rākṣasa mind, my brother's evil and unworthy son has tricked these two whose valor was untainted by guile.

17. "Drenched with blood, they lie sleeping on the ground. Completely riddled with arrows, they look like two hedgehogs.

18. "These bulls among men, upon whose might I had pinned my hopes for royal consecration, now both lie sleeping on the point of death.

19. "Though still living, I am now as good as dead, my hopes of kingship dashed. Meanwhile, my enemy, Rāvaṇa, has accomplished his vow and has had his wish fulfilled."

20. As Vibhīṣaṇa was lamenting in this fashion, powerful Sugrīva, king of the tawny monkeys, embraced him and said this:

21. "Knower of righteousness, you shall obtain kingship over Laṅkā. Of this there can be no doubt. Rāvaṇa and his son will not retain the kingship here.

22. "Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa are both merely pinioned by arrows. Once they shake off their stupor, they will surely kill Rāvaṇa and all his troops in battle."

23. When he had consoled and reassured the rākṣasa in this fashion, he spoke to his father-in-law, Suṣeṇa, who stood at his side.

24. "Take the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, tamers of their foes, once they have regained consciousness, and, together with the heroic troops of tawny monkeys, go back to Kiṣkindhā.

25. "But as for me, I shall slay Rāvaṇa along with his son and his kinsmen and bring back Maithilī, just as Śakra did Śrī when she was lost."

26–27. When Suṣeṇa had heard this speech of the lord of the monkeys, he spoke these words: "I have heard about a great and terrible battle between the gods and the asuras. At that time, the dānavas, who were expert in the use of arrows, concealed themselves and thus repeatedly struck down the gods although they, too, were skilled in weaponry.

28. "Then although they were afflicted, unconscious, or dead, Bṛhaspati restored them with healing herbs and with magical spells replete with mantras.

29. "Therefore, let Saṃpāti, Panasa, and the other monkeys go with all possible speed to the ocean of milk to bring back those healing herbs.

30. "Those tawny monkeys will recognize the two powerful healing herbs that grow on the mountains there, the divine saṃjīvakaraṇī, restorer of life, and the viśalyā, healer of arrow wounds, which was created by the gods.

31. "In that great ocean, there are two mountains called Candra and Droṇa. There, where the nectar of immortality was churned forth, is where those two supreme herbs of healing are to be found.

32. "Those two supreme herbs of healing were planted on the mountains there by the gods. So, king, let Hanumān, son of Vāyu, go there."

33. Just at that moment there arose a wind hurling up the water in the ocean, driving away the lightning-streaked clouds, and seeming almost to shake the very mountains.

34. That powerful wind, driven by a pair of wings, snapped the branches of all the island's great trees and sent them flying, roots and all, into the salt sea.

35. The hooded serpents who dwelt there were terrified and the great sea serpents swiftly plunged deep into the salt sea.

36. Then, a moment later, all the monkeys spied immensely powerful Garuḍa Vainateya as radiant as fire.

37. And when those great serpents, who had assumed the form of arrows and who had bound fast those two virtuous and immensely powerful men, saw him coming, they fled in all directions.

38. Then Suparṇa, spying the Kākutsthas, greeted them and stroked their faces, as lustrous as the moon, with both his hands.

39. No sooner had Vainateya touched them than their wounds healed over and their bodies immediately became smooth and lustrous once more.

40. And their cardinal virtues—courage, prowess, strength, vigor, and fortitude, as well as their insight, intelligence, and memory—returned to them with redoubled force.

41. Helping the two delighted heroes, equals of Vāsava, to their feet, Garuḍa embraced them. Rāma then said this:

42. "Through your grace, sir, we have overcome the great calamity wrought here by Rāvaṇi and have been swiftly restored to our full strength.

43. "On meeting you, my heart is as soothed as if I had met my father, Daśaratha, or my grandfather, Aja.

44. "You are endowed with beauty and adorned with heavenly garlands and unguents. You wear spotless garments and are adorned with heavenly ornaments. Who are you, sir?"

45. Then mighty and powerful Vainateya, king of the birds, delighted at heart, his eyes lighting up with joy, said to him:

46. "I am Garutmān, Kākutstha, your dear comrade, your second life breath outside your body. I have come here to the aid of you both.

47–48. "Neither the powerful asuras nor the mighty dānavas, not even the gods and gandharvas with Indra of the hundred sacrifices at their head, would have been able to loose this terrible bondage of arrows effected by cruel Indrajit through the power of illusion.

49. "Through the rākṣasa's power of illusion, those great serpents, the sons of Kadrū, sharp fanged and fiercely venomous, had become arrows and fastened themselves upon you.

50. "Along with your brother Lakṣmaṇa, a slayer of enemies in battle, you have been fortunate, righteous Rāma, true in your valor.

51. "For as soon as I heard what had happened, I came at once, in great haste, out of my affection for you both and to honor my friendship.

52. "Now that you have been freed from the very dreadful bondage of those arrows, you must both be constantly on your guard.

53. "By their very nature all rākṣasas are treacherous fighters in battle. On the other hand, the strength of pure-hearted heroes, such as yourselves, lies in the fact that they are honorable.

54. "Therefore, you two should not trust rākṣasas on the battlefield. This very example serves to show that rākṣasas are always treacherous."

55. When mighty Suparṇa had addressed Rāma in this fashion, he embraced him with the affection befitting a friend and began to take his leave.

56. "Rāghava, my righteous friend, compassionate even to your enemies, I should like to take leave of you, for I shall now depart just as I came.

57. "Once you have slaughtered the male population of Laṅkā with your waves of arrows, sparing only the children and the aged, and have slain your enemy Rāvaṇa, you shall surely recover Sītā."

58–59. When mighty Suparṇa, swift in flight, had spoken these words in this fashion and had healed Rāma of his wounds there in the midst of the forest-dwelling monkeys, he reverently circled and embraced him. Then, hurling himself into the sky like Pavana, Suparṇa departed.

60. Seeing that the two Rāghavas were healed of their wounds, the leaders of the monkey troops unleashed lionlike roars and lashed their tails.

61. They beat the bherī drums and made the mṛdaṅgas resound. They blew their conches and frolicked about happily just as before.

62. The valiant monkeys, who used trees as their weapons, clapped their upper arms again and again. Ripping up trees of various kinds, they took their stand there by the hundreds of thousands.

63. Emitting mighty roars and terrifying the night-roaming rākṣasas, the leaping monkeys advanced upon the gates of Laṅkā, eager for battle.

64. The terrifying and tumultuous roar that arose from those leaders of the troops of the tree-dwelling monkeys was like the frightful rumbling of the thundering storm clouds in the dead of night at summer's end.

The end of the fortieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 41

1. Then Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas heard the tumultuous sound of the swift monkeys as they roared.

2. Upon hearing that mighty uproar with its deep and joyous resonance, he spoke these words in the midst of his ministers:

3–4. "From this tremendous uproar, arising from these many excited monkeys, roaring like thunderclouds, it is clear beyond a doubt that they are experiencing tremendous joy. Indeed, the ocean itself, abode of Varuṇa, is agitated by their loud cries.

5. "Granted, the two brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, have been bound fast with sharp arrows; nonetheless, this great uproar causes me concern."

6. Having addressed these words to his counselors, the lord of the rākṣasas then spoke to the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, who stood at their posts all around him.

7. "Find out at once why all these forest-dwelling monkeys are rejoicing at a time when they ought to be grieving."

8. Addressed by him in this fashion, they climbed the ramparts in great agitation and surveyed the army that was under the protection of great Sugrīva.

9. When those rākṣasas saw the two illustrious Rāghavas standing there, freed from the terrible bondage of arrows, their hearts sank.

10. Terrified at heart and with faces downcast, they all descended from the ramparts and presented themselves before the rākṣasa lord.

11. Their dismay evident in their faces, the night-roaming rākṣasas, skilled in speech, broke the bad news to Rāvaṇa faithfully and accurately.

12–13. "Indrajit had bound the two brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, with bonds of arrows so that their arms were immobilized. But just now, on the battlefield, we saw those two, powerful as lordly elephants, freed from the bondage of arrows, like two elephants who have broken their chains."

14. When the mighty lord of the rākṣasas had heard those words of theirs, he was overwhelmed with anxiety and grief. With downcast face, he said:

15–16. "In combat, Indrajit had struck down and bound those two with fearsome and unfailing arrows. Resembling venomous serpents and brilliant as the sun, they were given to him as a boon. If, having once been subject to such bondage by weapons, my two enemies are now free, then I see that my entire army is in peril.

17. "Those arrows, as powerful as the great serpent Vāsuki, which used to steal away the lives of my enemies in battle, have now been rendered useless."

18. Having spoken in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, hissing like a serpent in his rage, addressed a rākṣasa called Dhūmrākṣa there in the midst of the rākṣasas.

19. "Take a large force of rākṣasas, fearsome in their deeds, and go forth to slaughter Rāma together with the monkeys."

20. Addressed in this fashion by the wise lord of the rākṣasas, Dhūmrākṣa made his obeisance and, in great excitement, left the king's residence.

21. As he passed through the palace gates, he ordered the officer in charge of the garrison, "Mobilize the troops at once! What use is delay to one eager to fight?"

22. When the officer in charge of the garrison, the leader of his troops, had heard Dhūmrākṣa's words, he quickly mobilized his troops following the command of Rāvaṇa.

23. Those mighty and terrifying night-roaming rākṣasas fastened on their war bells and, roaring loudly in their great excitement, surrounded Dhūmrākṣa.

24–25. They wielded various weapons. In their hands they held lances and war hammers. Roaring like thunderclouds, those terrible rākṣasas marched forth vigorously armed with maces, spears, staves, iron cudgels, iron clubs, short javelins, crescent-headed arrows, darts, and battle-axes.

26–27. Unassailable as tigers, those tigers among rākṣasas sallied forth. Some wore armor and rode in chariots adorned with banners, inlaid with fretworks of gold, and drawn by donkeys with faces of many different kinds. Others rode extremely swift horses and lordly elephants intoxicated with rut.

28. With harsh cries, Dhūmrākṣa then mounted a heavenly chariot yoked to donkeys, which had the faces of wolves and lions and were adorned with gold.

29. Laughing, the mighty Dhūmrākṣa, surrounded by rākṣasas, proceeded to the western gate, where the troop leader Hanumān was stationed.

30. But as that very terrible and fearsome looking rākṣasa proceeded, savage birds of ill omen appeared in the sky, blocking his path.

31. A very fearsome vulture alighted on the top of his chariot, while long lines of carrion birds perched on the edge of his battle standard.

32. A huge, headless corpse, ghastly pale and drenched with blood, lay on the earth in Dhūmrākṣa's path, emitting discordant sounds.

33. It rained blood and the earth shook. The wind blew in an unfavorable direction with a thunderous roar. Shrouded in a flood of darkness, the directions were no longer visible.

34. Seeing those very gruesome portents that had appeared, bringing terror to the rākṣasas, Dhūmrākṣa himself was shaken.

35. As that mighty and very fearsome rākṣasa, eager for battle, marched forth, surrounded by many night-roaming rākṣasas, he gazed upon the army under the protection of Rāghava's arms, which, with its many monkeys, resembled an ocean.

The end of the forty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 42

1. When the monkeys saw the rākṣasa Dhūmrākṣa marching forth with his fearsome cries, they all roared in their excitement, eager for battle.

2. Then a frenzied battle broke out between the tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas, who slaughtered one another—the former with terrifying trees, the latter with lances and war hammers.

3. The rākṣasas cut down the fearsome monkeys on all sides, while the monkeys smashed the rākṣasas to the ground with trees.

4. And the rākṣasas, in their fury, pierced the monkeys with sharp and fearsome-looking arrows, fletched with heron feathers and flying true.

5–6. Although they were wounded by the rākṣasas with fearsome maces, spears, mallets, and war hammers, various and dreadful iron clubs, and sharp tridents, the very powerful monkeys, their fervor aroused by their indignation, fearlessly accomplished great feats.

7. Their limbs pierced with arrows and their bodies pierced with lances, the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys seized trees and boulders.

8. Bellowing and calling out their names, the tawny monkeys, fearsome in their speed, annihilated the fearsome rākṣasas on every side.

9–10. It was an amazing and horrific battle that took place between the monkeys and the rākṣasas. With a victorious air, the monkeys annihilated some of the rākṣasas with various boulders and trees with many branches. Other rākṣasas, accustomed to drinking blood, now spewed it from their mouths.

11. Some had their flanks ripped open, others were beaten to a shapeless mass with trees; still others were pulverized by boulders, while some were rent with fangs.

12–860. The ground was littered with torn and broken banners, slain donkeys, shattered chariots, fallen night-roaming rākṣasas, lordly elephants that resembled mountains, and, together with their riders, war-horses that had been crushed with mountain peaks by the forest-dwelling monkeys.

13. The rākṣasas had their faces ripped open by the sharp claws of the swift monkeys, who leapt at them again and again, fearsome in their valor.

14. Their faces pale, their hair flying wildly about, the rākṣasas fell to the ground again and again, fainting from the smell of blood.

15. But some of the rākṣasas, fearsome in their valor, attacked the tawny monkeys with their open hands, which struck like thunderbolts.

16. But as they rushed swiftly onward, they were struck down by the monkeys—who were swifter still—with fists, feet, fangs, and trees.

17. Seeing his forces put to flight, that bull among rākṣasas, Dhūmrākṣa, in a rage, began to slaughter those monkeys, who were eager for battle.

18. Some of the monkeys, wounded with darts, gushed blood, while others, smashed by war hammers, fell to the ground.

19. Some were wounded with iron clubs, others were slashed with short javelins. Still others, struck down by spears, staggered and breathed their last.

20. Some of the forest-dwelling monkeys were knocked to the ground, drenched in blood; still others, fleeing the battle, were slaughtered by the furious rākṣasas.

21. Some of them lay on one side, their chests ripped open; still others were ripped open by tridents so that their entrails spilled forth.

22. With its hosts of tawny monkeys and rākṣasas, its abundance of weapons, and masses of boulders and trees, that great battle looked truly frightening.

23. With the twanging of bowstrings in place of the sweet sound of the lute, the gasps of the dying for the beating of time, and the faint cries of the wounded in place of singing, the battle resembled a musical recital.

24. And as for Dhūmrākṣa, he stood laughing in the forefront of the battle, bow in hand, as he scattered the monkeys in all directions with showers of arrows.

25. When Māruti saw that the army was being harassed and tormented by Dhūmrākṣa, he seized an enormous boulder and rushed at him in a rage.

26. Equal in might to his father, his eyes now doubly red with rage, he hurled that boulder at Dhūmrākṣa's chariot.

27. When Dhūmrākṣa saw that boulder hurtling toward him, he grabbed his mace in great agitation and, quickly leaping from his chariot, took his stand on the ground.

28. As it fell to the ground, the boulder smashed his chariot along with its wheels, poles, horses, flagstaffs, and bows.

29. After smashing his chariot, Hanumān, son of Māruta, began to slaughter the rākṣasas with trees—trunks, branches, and all.

30. Some of the rākṣasas, crushed by trees, their heads smashed, lay on the ground, drenched in blood.

31. When he had put the rākṣasa army to flight, Hanumān, son of Māruta, seized a mountain peak and charged straight at Dhūmrākṣa.

32. With a roar, mighty Dhūmrākṣa seized his mace and charged violently toward Hanumān as the latter ran toward him.

33. Then, in a fury, Dhūmrākṣa forcefully brought his mace, with its numerous spikes, down upon Hanumān's skull.

34. Struck with that fearsome-looking mace, the monkey, who had the strength of Māruta, shrugged off that blow and brought the mountain peak down on the middle of Dhūmrākṣa's head.

35. Struck by that mountain peak, his every limb buckling, he fell violently to the ground, like a shattered mountain.

36. When the surviving night-roaming rākṣasas saw that Dhūmrākṣa had been slain, they were terrified. They fled back to Laṅkā with the leaping monkeys still slaughtering them.

37. When the great son of Pavana had slain his enemy and sent rivers of blood flowing in all directions, he succumbed to the fatigue born from slaughtering his enemies. Then, honored by the monkeys, he experienced great joy.

The end of the forty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 43

1. When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, heard that Dhūmrākṣa had been slain, he said this to the officer in charge of the garrison, who stood before him with his hands cupped in reverence:

2. "Let unassailable rākṣasas of fearsome valor go forth led by Akampana, skilled in the use of every weapon."

3. Then, at the urging of the officer in charge of the garrison, fearsome-looking rākṣasa leaders, with fearsome eyes and bearing all kinds of weapons, marched forth.

4. Wearing earrings of burnished gold, Akampana mounted a huge chariot and set forth, surrounded by fearsome rākṣasas.

5. He was incapable of being shaken in a great battle, even by the gods themselves. Thus he was called Akampana, the unshakeable, and, in their midst, he was like the sun in blazing energy.

6. But as he raced forth filled with fury in his eagerness to fight, the horses drawing his chariot were seized with a lethargy that had no apparent cause.

7. Though normally he delighted in battle, his left eye now began to twitch, his face took on a sickly hue, and his voice began to crack.

8. Although the weather had been clear, the sky grew dark and a harsh wind blew. Fierce birds and beasts all uttered fearsome cries.

9. But, ignoring these ominous signs, Akampana, whose shoulders were as massive as a lion's and whose stride was that of a tiger, proceeded toward the battleground.

10. And as the rākṣasa marched forth with his rākṣasas, he uttered a roar so mighty that it seemed to make the ocean itself tremble.

11. Terrified by that sound, the vast army of monkeys, armed with trees and boulders, arrayed itself for battle.

12. Then an extremely violent battle broke out between the monkeys and the rākṣasas, who were prepared to lay down their lives for the sake of Rāma and Rāvaṇa, respectively.

13. The tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas were all exceedingly powerful heroes, all as huge as mountains. And they were eager to slaughter one another.

14. As those swift warriors roared in battle and bellowed at one another in their fury, a tremendous din arose.

15. The red dust, thick and terrible, kicked up by the rākṣasas and tawny monkeys, obscured the ten directions.

16. Enveloped in that dust, as pale as floating silk, the opposing forces could not see one another on the battlefield.

17. Because of that dust, neither flag nor banner, armor nor horse, weapon nor chariot was visible.

18. A tremendous din could be heard as they roared and raced about in that tumultuous battle, though nothing at all could be seen.

19. In their towering fury, tawny monkeys killed tawny monkeys in battle, while rākṣasas slaughtered rākṣasas in the darkness.

20. And as the monkeys and rākṣasas slaughtered friend and foe alike, they drenched the earth with blood, making it slick with mud.

21. The gouts of blood that were spattered all around settled the dust, and the ground was littered with dead bodies.

22. With speed and power, the tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas slaughtered one another with trees, javelins, boulders, darts, maces, iron clubs, and cudgels of iron.

23. Fighting with their arms, which resembled iron clubs, the tawny monkeys, fearsome in their deeds and huge as mountains, slaughtered the rākṣasas in battle.

24. For their part, the furious rākṣasas, with darts and iron cudgels in hand, slaughtered the monkeys there with their pitiless weapons.

25. But, counterattacking, the tawny monkeys bravely seized those weapons from them and smashed the rākṣasas with huge trees and enormous boulders.

26. At that juncture, the heroic tawny monkeys Kumuda, Nala, and Mainda, in a towering rage, charged with unparalleled speed.

27. And, as if in play, those immensely swift leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys wrought tremendous slaughter with their trees in the front ranks of the rākṣasa army.

The end of the forty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 44

1. When he witnessed the immense feat accomplished by the foremost among the monkeys, Akampana gave vent to a savage fury in the midst of the battle.

2. Seeing that feat of his enemies, he was beside himself with rage. Brandishing his mighty bow, he said these words to his charioteer:

3. "Charioteer! Drive the chariot at once to where so many monkeys are slaughtering so many rākṣasas in battle.

4. "For there, armed with trees and boulders, mighty monkeys with fearsome bodies stand facing me.

5. "It appears that they have crushed the entire rākṣasa army, and therefore I wish to exterminate these boastful warriors."

6. Then, in his chariot, whose horses were whipped to a gallop, Akampana, foremost of chariot-warriors, in his fury, assailed the tawny monkeys with a hail of arrows.

7. The monkeys were unable to stand before him in battle, much less to fight. Routed by Akampana's arrows, every last one of them fled.

8. Now, when mighty Hanumān saw that his kin had come under the power of Akampana and, indeed, the power of death, he rushed over.

9. When the heroic leaders of the troops of leaping monkeys saw that great leaping monkey, they all gathered together around him in the battle.

10. When the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys saw Hanumān take his stand there, they recovered their strength, placing their trust in that powerful warrior.

11. But as Hanumān, who looked like a mountain, took his stand there, Akampana pelted him with arrows, just as great Indra might with torrents of rain.

12. Paying no heed to the hail of sharp arrows falling on his body, the mighty monkey set his mind on killing Akampana.

13. Laughing, Hanumān, the immensely powerful son of Māruta, charged that rākṣasa. As he did so, he shook the very earth, or so it seemed.

14. Roaring and blazing with energy, he took on a form that was as irresistible as a blazing fire.

15. Realizing that he had no weapon, that bull among tawny monkeys, in a transport of rage, swiftly ripped up a mountain by its roots.

16. Grasping that huge mountain in one hand, mighty Māruti swung it about, uttering a tremendous roar.

17. With it, he rushed upon the rākṣasa lord Akampana, just as Indra, smasher of citadels, with his vajra, rushed upon Namuci in battle.

18. But when Akampana saw that mountain peak held aloft, he smashed it to pieces from afar with huge half-moon-headed arrows.

19. Seeing the mountaintop shattered in midair by the rākṣasa's arrows and fallen in pieces, Hanumān was beside himself with rage.

20. Filled with rage and pride, the tawny monkey raced over to an aśvakarṇa tree, as tall as a mighty mountain, and swiftly tore it up by the roots.

21. Seizing that aśvakarṇa tree with its vast trunk, Hanumān, blazing with splendor, swung it about in battle, laughing in supreme delight.

22. Racing onward with tremendous speed and breaking down trees in his haste, Hanumān, in a towering rage, tore up the earth with the pounding of his feet.

23. Wise Hanumān then smashed elephants along with their riders, chariot-warriors together with their chariots, and the rākṣasa foot soldiers as well.

24. When the rākṣasas spied Hanumān, enraged and wreaking slaughter on the battlefield like Yama himself, the ender of all things, they fled in all directions.

25. Seeing the enraged Hanumān rushing onward and terrifying the rākṣasas, heroic Akampana flew into a rage and roared.

26. Akampana then pierced immensely powerful Hanumān with fourteen sharp arrows that tore through his body.

27. Riddled in this fashion with many volleys of arrows, heroic Hanumān resembled a densely forested mountain.

28. Then, ripping up yet another tree and exerting unsurpassed force, he quickly struck the rākṣasa lord Akampana on the head.

29. Struck with that tree by the wise monkey lord in his wrath, the rākṣasa fell and died.

30. When the rākṣasas saw the rākṣasa lord Akampana lying on the ground slain, they all trembled, like trees in an earthquake.

31. Terrified and defeated, the rākṣasas all dropped their weapons and fled to Laṅkā, pursued by the monkeys.

32. Their hair flying, their pride shattered, their limbs running with sweat, they fled panicked in defeat, gasping for breath.

33. Trampling one another and glancing behind them again and again in their terror, they entered the city in total disarray.

34. Once the rākṣasas had entered Laṅkā, all the immensely powerful tawny monkeys gathered and honored Hanumān.

35. And, for his part, Hanumān, endowed with strength, in great delight graciously honored all the tawny monkeys according to their merit.

36. With a victorious air the tawny monkeys roared at the top of their lungs and dragged about those rākṣasas who were still alive.

37. In encountering and slaughtering the rākṣasas, the great monkey Māruti achieved as much heroic glory as did Viṣṇu in slaying the great, terrible, and mighty asura, destroyer of his foes, in the vanguard of the hosts.

38. Then the hosts of the gods, Rāma himself, and the exceedingly powerful Lakṣmaṇa, as well as mighty Vibhīṣaṇa, and the leaping monkeys, headed by Sugrīva, honored that monkey.

The end of the forty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 45

1. When the lord of the rākṣasas heard about the slaying of Akampana, he was enraged. His face somewhat downcast, he looked at his ministers.

2. He brooded for a while, and then, after taking counsel with his counselors, he made a tour of the city of Laṅkā in order to inspect all its military encampments.

3. He saw that the city of Laṅkā was protected by hosts of rākṣasas, surrounded by military encampments, and garlanded with flags and banners.

4. Perceiving that the city was besieged, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, angrily spoke at that critical moment to Prahasta, who was skilled in warfare.

5. "You are skilled in warfare. I can see no means other than war to free this city, which is hard-pressed and closely besieged.

6. "Only Kumbhakarṇa, you—the general of my army—Indrajit, Nikumbha, or I would be capable of bearing such a burden.

7. "So you must take the troops from here and, placing them under your command, march forth swiftly for victory, to where all the forest-dwelling monkeys are.

8. "In the face of your sortie, the irresolute army of tawny monkeys, hearing the roar of the roaring lords of the rākṣasas, will surely flee.

9. "For monkeys are irresolute, undisciplined, and fickle-minded. They will no more be able to withstand your roaring than are elephants the roaring of lions.

10. "Once the army has fled, Rāma, along with Saumitri, powerless and lacking support, will fall into your hands, Prahasta.

11. "We risk a great calamity, and victory is far from certain in this matter. So tell me what you think is best for us, whether I find it agreeable or not."

12. Addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, Prahasta, the general of the army, said this to the lord of the rākṣasas, just as Uśanas might to the lord of the asuras:

13. "We discussed this earlier, your majesty, together with your able counselors. We debated the matter with due consideration for one another.

14. "I concluded that our well-being could be assured only through the return of Sītā. I foresaw that, if she were not returned, it would mean war, and that is exactly what has come upon us.

15. "You have always honored me with gifts, tokens of respect, and all manner of kind words. Would I not now, at such a critical moment, do what pleases you?

16. "For I do not care for my life, my sons, my wives, or my wealth. Just watch me as I strive to sacrifice my life for your sake in battle."

17. When Prahasta, the general of the army, had addressed his master, Rāvaṇa, in this fashion, he said this to the troop commanders who stood before him: "Assemble a large force of rākṣasas for me at once.

18. "Once I have slain the forest-dwelling monkeys on the battlefield today with the crushing force of those thunderbolts that are my arrows, the carrion birds may eat of their flesh to their heart's content."

19. Addressed in this fashion by Prahasta, the troop commanders, making haste, mustered their forces at the rākṣasa's palace.

20. Within the hour Laṅkā was filled with rākṣasa heroes who, armed with every sort of sharp weapon, resembled elephants.

21. As they gratified the sacred fire, eater of oblations, and made obeisance to the brahmans, a fragrant breeze began to blow, bearing the aroma of clarified butter.

22. Prepared for battle and in great excitement, they took garlands of various kinds that had been consecrated with sacred spells and adorned themselves with them.

23. When they saw their king, Rāvaṇa, the rākṣasas, clad in armor and armed with their bows, leapt up swiftly and encircled Prahasta.

24. Then, taking leave of the king, Prahasta bid them beat the fearsome bherī drum as he mounted a celestial chariot well equipped for war.

25. Yoked to the swiftest of horses and driven by a skilled charioteer, it rumbled like a great storm cloud and blazed with the brilliance of the moon and sun.

26. With its serpent banners it was irresistible. It had a splendid fender and was beautiful in every part. It was covered with a fretwork of gold and seemed almost to be laughing with its splendor.

27. Then, once he had received his orders from Rāvaṇa, Prahasta mounted that chariot and, surrounded by his vast army, drove swiftly out of Laṅkā.

28. As the general of the armies sallied forth, the rumble of war drums, like that of thunderclouds, and the sound of conches could be heard.

29. In the vanguard, preceding Prahasta, marched huge rākṣasas with terrifying forms, uttering dreadful cries.

30. And so, surrounded by that vast and dreadful army in military array and resembling a herd of elephants, he sallied forth from the eastern gate.

31. As Prahasta went forth swiftly in anger, surrounded by that army whose vast multitude was like the ocean, he resembled Kāla, the ender of all things.

32. As he and the roaring rākṣasas set forth, their clamor caused all the creatures of Laṅkā to utter unnatural cries.

33. Rising into the cloudless sky, birds that feed on flesh and blood wheeled in clockwise circles around his chariot.

34. Dreadful jackals howled, belching forth flames of fire.

35. A blazing meteor fell from the sky, and a harsh wind blew. The heavenly bodies, occluding one another, were no longer visible.

926*–36. And over the rākṣasa's chariot, harshly thundering clouds poured down blood, drenching his followers. Meanwhile, a vulture, facing to the south, perched on the top of his flagstaff.

37. Although his charioteer was of the sūta caste and was a skilled driver of horses, his whip repeatedly slipped from his hand as he plunged into battle.

38. And the extraordinary and radiant splendor that he displayed as he set forth vanished in an instant, while his horses stumbled on the level ground.

39. As Prahasta, famed for his strength and valor, marched forth, the monkey army advanced upon him for battle, armed with various weapons.

40. Then a tumultuous sound arose from the tawny monkeys as they broke off trees and seized heavy boulders.

41. Both armies—that of the hosts of rākṣasas and that of the forest-dwelling monkeys—were in a frenzy of excitement. They were swift, capable, and intent upon slaughtering one another. As they hurled their challenges at one another, one could hear a tremendous din.

42. Then the evil-minded Prahasta hurled himself upon the army of the monkey king. He plunged into that fast-moving host, as a moth, intent upon death, plunges into the fire.

The end of the forty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 46

1–2. The vast army of roaring monkeys, powerful and infuriated, watched as Prahasta—huge, terrifying, of terrifying valor, and surrounded by rākṣasas—marched forth, bellowing.

3–4. As the rākṣasas, eager for victory, hurled themselves upon the monkeys, the swords, javelins, broadswords, arrows, lances, cudgels, maces, iron clubs, darts, various battle-axes, and splendid bows they had taken up glittered.

5. Bounding toward them, the bulls among monkeys, eager for battle, seized flowering trees and boulders that were long and broad.

6. As the two vast forces clashed with each other, the one side raining stones, the other arrows, a huge battle broke out between them.

7. Numerous rākṣasas slaughtered numerous leaders of the monkey troops in battle, while numerous monkeys slaughtered numerous rākṣasas.

8. Some of the monkeys were rent with lances, others by discuses. Some were struck with iron clubs, while others were hacked with battle-axes.

9. Still others fell to the ground, robbed of their life breaths, while some, ensnared in the continuous volley of arrows, were pierced to the heart.

10. Some, cut in two with swords, fell to the ground, twitching. Still other monkeys were pierced by rākṣasas through their flanks with lances.

11. But as for the monkeys, in their fury, they crushed hordes of rākṣasas to the ground on every side with trees and mountain peaks.

12. Struck violently with fists and open hands, whose palms had the force of thunderbolts, the rākṣasas, their teeth and eyes knocked out, vomited blood from their mouths.

13. A tumultuous sound—the cries of those screaming in their affliction and the lionlike roars of those who were bellowing—arose from the tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas in battle.

14. Rolling their eyes in rage, the pitiless monkeys and rākṣasas, following the path of heroes, fearlessly performed great feats.

15. Prahasta's companions, Narāntaka, Kumbhahanu, Mahānāda, and Samunnata, all slaughtered forest-dwelling monkeys.

16. But as they launched their swift attack, slaughtering the monkeys, Dvivida killed one of them, Narāntaka, with a mountain peak.

17. Then the nimble-handed monkey Durmukha ripped up a huge tree by the roots and, with it, killed the rākṣasa Samunnata.

18. Next, powerful Jāmbavān, in a towering rage, seized a huge boulder and brought it down upon Mahānāda's chest.

19. Then the mighty rākṣasa Kumbhahanu, confronted by Tāra, was struck on the head with a tree and so died.

20. Unable to endure this deed, Prahasta, mounted in his chariot, bow in hand, began a fearsome slaughter of the forest-dwelling monkeys.

21. Then both armies swirled about like a maelstrom, and from them arose a sound like that of the immeasurable ocean when it is agitated.

22. Skilled in combat, the furious Prahasta massacred the monkeys in that great battle with an immense torrent of arrows.

23. Heaped up with the corpses of monkeys and rākṣasas, as if covered with fallen mountains, the earth looked ghastly.

24. The ground, covered with torrents of blood, looked as if it were covered with blossoming palāśa trees in the month of Mādhava.

25–28. Indeed, the battleground resembled a river. Masses of slain heroes formed its banks, and shattered weapons, its great trees. Torrents of blood made up its broad waters, and the ocean to which it flowed was Yama. Livers and spleens made up its deep mud, scattered entrails its waterweeds. Severed heads and trunks made up its fish, pieces of limbs, its grass. It was crowded with vultures in place of flocks of haṃsas, and it was swarming with adjutant storks instead of sārasa cranes. It was covered with fat in place of foam, and the cries of the wounded took the place of its gurgling. It was not to be forded by the faint of heart. Truly, it resembled a river at the end of the rains, swarming with haṃsas and sārasa cranes.

29. Such was the river, all but impossible to cross, that the rākṣasas and the foremost of the monkeys forded, as might the leaders of elephant herds, a lotus pond covered with lotus pollen.

30. Then Nīla spied Prahasta, who, mounted in his chariot and loosing torrents of arrows, was rapidly slaughtering the leaping monkeys.

31. Ripping up a tree by its roots, the great monkey struck the supremely unassailable Prahasta, who was attacking him.

32. Struck by that tree, that bull among rākṣasas was enraged, and, roaring, he loosed hails of arrows upon the lord of the army of the leaping monkeys.

33–34. Unable to deflect it, he shut his eyes and withstood it. Just as a prize bull might withstand a sudden autumnal squall, so did Nīla, his eyes tightly closed, endure with fortitude Prahasta's dreadful hail of arrows, so difficult to withstand.

35. Enraged by that hail of arrows, Nīla killed Prahasta's horses, swift as thought, with a huge sāla tree.

36. Stripped of his bow by him, Prahasta, the general of the army, seized a dreadful cudgel and leapt down from his chariot.

37. Enraged, the two swift leaders of their armies, their bodies smeared with blood, stood there, like two bull elephants in rut.

38. Slashing at each other with their razor-sharp fangs, they looked like a lion and a tiger and, indeed, moved just like them.

39. Seeing victory within their grasp, those two heroes, who never turned back from battle, were as eager to gain glory as were Vṛtra and Vāsava.

40. Then, making a supreme effort, Prahasta struck Nīla on the forehead with his cudgel, so that his blood gushed forth.

41. His body smeared with blood, the great monkey seized an enormous tree and, in a rage, hurled it at Prahasta's chest.

42. Disregarding that blow, the mighty rākṣasa seized his huge cudgel and charged at the mighty leaping monkey Nīla.

43. Seeing Prahasta rushing furiously toward him with terrifying force, the swift and great monkey seized a huge boulder.

44. In that battle, Nīla then swiftly brought the boulder down upon the head of the cudgel-warrior Prahasta, who was eager for combat.

45. Hurled by that foremost of monkeys, that huge and terrible boulder shattered Prahasta's head into many pieces.

46. Prahasta fell suddenly to the ground, like a tree cut off at the roots—stripped of life, stripped of splendor, stripped of strength, and stripped of his senses.

47. Blood gushed copiously from his shattered head, as well as from his body, like a cataract from a mountain.

48. When Prahasta had been slain by Nīla, his great and unshakeable army of rākṣasas, who were now despondent, returned to Laṅkā.

49. Once their general had been slain, they were no more able to hold their lines than would water upon reaching a shattered dam.

50. With the leader of their army slain, the rākṣasas became dispirited. Proceeding to the palace of the rākṣasa lord, they stood silently, brooding.

51. Then the immensely powerful and victorious troop leader Nīla joined Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Being praised for the feat he had accomplished, he was greatly delighted.

The end of the forty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 47

1. When Prahasta, the protector of the rākṣasa forces, was slain in battle by Nīla, bull among leaping monkeys, the army of the rākṣasa king, equal in force to the ocean and armed with fearsome weapons, fled.

2. They went and reported to the lord of the rākṣasas that his general had been slain by Nīla, the son of Agni, the purifier. No sooner had the lord of the rākṣasas heard their words than he gave way to anger.

3. Upon hearing that Prahasta had been slain in battle, he was grief stricken, and his mind was suffused with rage. He addressed the principal warriors of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, just as Indra might the principal warriors of the immortal gods.

4. "One ought not underestimate an enemy who has destroyed the guardian of my army—the destroyer of the army of Indra—along with his followers and elephants.

5. "Therefore, without further deliberation, I myself will proceed to that extraordinary battlefront for the sake of victory and for the destruction of my enemies.

6. "I shall this very day with a hail of arrows consume that army of monkeys, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa included, as with blazing fires one might a forest."

7. When he had spoken in this fashion, the enemy of the king of the immortal gods mounted a chariot yoked to a team of superb horses. It was as luminous as fire, and it glowed, blazing with splendor.

8. Then, to the sounds of conches and bherī and paṭaha drums and to the clapping of arms, war shouts, and lionlike roars, the foremost of rākṣasa lords went forth, honored with auspicious hymns of praise.

9. Surrounded by the foremost of the rākṣasa lords, flesh-eaters whose bodies resembled mountains or clouds and whose eyes blazed like fire, he resembled Rudra, lord of the immortal gods, surrounded by his malignant spirits.

10. Then, racing swiftly forth from the city, the immensely powerful rākṣasa spied the formidable army of monkeys. It was well prepared, armed with trees and boulders, and was roaring like the mighty ocean or a thundercloud.

11. Closely followed by his army, Rāma, whose arms resembled serpent lords and whose majesty was immense, spied the exceedingly wrathful rākṣasa host and addressed Vibhīṣaṇa, foremost among those who bear weapons:

12. "Who is in command of this unassailable army with its various flags, banners, and weapons, its darts, swords, lances, bows, and discuses, its war-elephants as huge as Himalaya, lord of mountains, and its fearless warriors?"

13. And when Vibhīṣaṇa, who was equal in valor to Śakra, had heard those words of Rāma, he described for him the splendid army of those great bulls among the rākṣasas.

14. "Your majesty, know that that huge rākṣasa, whose face is as red as the newly risen sun and who approaches mounted on an elephant's back, making its head tremble, is Akampana.

15. "The one who is mounted in a chariot and whose banner bears the king of beasts, he who brandishes a bow that resembles the bow of Śakra, and who, with his fierce and protuberant fangs, resembles an elephant, is called Indrajit, preeminent by virtue of a boon.

16. "And that immensely powerful bowman and superb chariot-warrior, who, with his gigantic body, resembles the Vindhya mountain, Western mountain, or Mount Mahendra, and who is twanging a bow of unparalleled size, is called Atikāya.

17. "And that huge hero, his eyes as red as the newly risen sun, who bellows harshly as he sits astride an elephant, its bells clanging, is called Mahodara.

18. "And the one mounted on a horse, which, with its trappings bright with gold, resembles a mountain shrouded in evening clouds, and who holds aloft a dart haloed with light, is Piśāca, equal in power to a thunderbolt.

19. "And mounted upon a lordly and mountainous bull, he who comes grasping a keen lance that flashes like lightning, its power surpassing that of the thunderbolt, is the illustrious Triśiras.

20. "And there we see Kumbha, his form like that of a storm cloud, his chest broad, muscular, and splendid. His banner bears the king of serpents, and he is utterly intent, brandishing and twanging his bow.

21. "And the one who comes holding a blazing, smoking iron club, studded with diamonds and jāmbūnada gold, is the standard-bearer of the rākṣasa hosts, Nikumbha, of wondrous and fearsome deeds.

22. "And that huge warrior who appears mounted on a chariot—equipped with masses of bows, swords, and arrows, decked with banners, and blazing like fire—is Narāntaka, who can battle even mountain peaks.

23–24. "And over there, where that fine white umbrella with its slender ribs is gleaming like the moon, that is where the great overlord of the rākṣasas, he who crushes the pride of even the gods, has appeared. Surrounded by his servants, whose faces are those of tigers, camels, elephant lords, and the king of beasts—all rolling their eyes—he resembles Rudra, surrounded by his malignant spirits.

25. "He wears a crown, and, with his face adorned with swinging earrings and his body as fearsome as that of an elephant lord or the Vindhya mountain, that overlord of the rākṣasas, who crushes the pride of great Indra and Vaivasvata, shines like the sun."

26. Then Rāma replied to Vibhīṣaṇa, subduer of his foes, "Ah! How resplendent is Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, with his tremendous blazing energy!

27. "Rāvaṇa is as hard to gaze upon as is the sun with its shining rays. Yet I can clearly make out his form, haloed with blazing energy.

28. "Not even the heroes among the gods and dānavas could possess a brightly shining form like that of the lord of the rākṣasas.

29. "And all the warriors of that immensely powerful rākṣasa bear blazing weapons. They all look like mountains, and they can all give battle even to mountains.

30. "Surrounded by those blazing warriors, fearsome in their valor, the king of the rākṣasas looks like Yama, the ender of all things, surrounded by fierce malignant spirits in bodily form."

31. When he had spoken in this fashion, mighty Rāma took up his bow, drew forth a splendid arrow, and, accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa, took his stand.

32. Meanwhile, the great overlord of the rākṣasas addressed his powerful rākṣasas: "You are to remain calm and free from care at the city gates and the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares."

33. Then, when he had summarily dismissed them and they had departed according to their orders, he clove through the flood of that ocean of monkeys, as might a great fish cleave the brimming waters of the sea.

34. When Sugrīva, lord of the tawny monkeys, spied the rākṣasa lord racing suddenly toward him in battle with blazing bow and arrows, he tore off a huge mountain peak and charged at him.

35. Seizing that mountain peak, whose slopes were thick with trees, he hurled it at the night-roaming rākṣasa. But the latter, seeing it hurtling suddenly toward him, shattered it with arrows fletched with burnished gold.

36. Once that mountain peak, with huge and splendid trees on its slopes, had fallen, shattered, to the ground, the lord of the rākṣasa folk took up an arrow that resembled a huge serpent. It looked like Yama, the ender of all things.

37. In a rage he grasped that arrow, whose force was equal to that of the wind or great Indra's thunderbolt and whose brilliance was that of a fire shooting out sparks. Then he loosed it in order to kill Sugrīva.

38. Loosed by Rāvaṇa's arm, the sharp-tipped arrow, whose appearance was like that of Śakra's thunderbolt, struck Sugrīva with full force, piercing him, just as the fearsome javelin hurled by Guha once pierced Mount Krauñca.

39. Agonized by that arrow, his mind reeling, the hero fell to the earth groaning. But when the yātudhānas saw him fallen senseless to the ground in battle, they roared with delight.

40. But then the immense monkeys Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Sudaṃṣṭra, Ṛṣabha, Jyotimukha, and Nala took up boulders and charged the lord of the rākṣasas.

41. But the overlord of the rākṣasas warded off their blows with swarms of sharp-tipped arrows. He then pierced the monkey lords with masses of arrows, whose feathers were adorned with jāmbūnada gold.

42. Pierced by the arrows of that enemy of the thirty gods, the fearsome monkey lords fell to the ground. Then he completely covered the fierce monkey army with masses of arrows.

43. Afflicted by Rāvaṇa's arrows, their heroic leaders fallen, and riven by the dart of fear, the tree-dwelling monkeys, wailing loudly, sought refuge with Rāma, the refuge of all.

44. At once, the mighty bowman, great Rāma, took up his bow and came running, but Lakṣmaṇa accosted him and, his hands cupped in reverence, spoke these deeply significant words:

*45. "Granted, my noble lord, you are perfectly capable of killing this evil-minded rākṣasa. Nonetheless, I should kill this despicable creature. Just grant me permission, my lord."

46. Rāma of true valor and tremendous power replied to him: "Go, Lakṣmaṇa. You must exert yourself to the fullest in battle.

47. "For Rāvaṇa is enormously powerful and astonishingly valorous in battle. There is no doubt that, once his fury is aroused, it is impossible even for all the three worlds together to withstand him.

48. "You must seek out his weak points and defend your own. Stay focused and strive to protect yourself with your eye as well as your bow."

49. Upon hearing those words of Rāma Rāghava, Saumitri embraced him. Then, after doing him honor and respectfully saluting him, he went off to battle.

50. He whose arms resembled the trunks of elephants gazed upon Rāvaṇa, who, with his blazing, fearsome bow held high, was covering the monkeys—their bodies torn and scattered—with a massive hail of arrows.

51. But when the immensely powerful Hanumān, son of Māruta, spied Rāvaṇa, he charged toward him, evading those masses of arrows.

52. Reaching his chariot, wise Hanumān raised his right arm and, menacing Rāvaṇa, spoke these words:

53. "Because of your invulnerability, you vanquished the gods, dānavas, gandharvas, and yakṣas, along with the rākṣasas. But you should fear the monkeys.

54. "This upraised right hand of mine, with its five fingers, will drive the living spirit from your body where it has long dwelt."

55. When Rāvaṇa, of fearsome valor, heard those words of Hanumān, he spoke these words, his eyes red with rage:

56. "Then strike quickly and without hesitation and so acquire eternal fame. Once I have thus determined your prowess, I will destroy you, monkey."

57. When the son of Vāyu heard those words of Rāvaṇa, he said these words: "Please keep in mind that, on an earlier occasion, I struck down your son Akṣa."

58. Addressed in this fashion, the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa, mighty lord of the rākṣasas, struck the son of Anila on the chest with the palm of his hand.

59. Struck by him with the palm of his hand, he staggered back and forth. Then, infuriated, he struck that enemy of the immortal gods with the palm of his own hand.

60. When that great monkey had struck him with the palm of his hand, ten-necked Rāvaṇa shook like a mountain during an earthquake.

61. Seeing Rāvaṇa slapped down in this fashion in battle, the seers, monkeys, perfected beings, gods, and asuras cheered.

62. Steadying himself, the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa spoke these words: "Well done, monkey! Your strength makes you a praiseworthy opponent for me."

63. But when Māruti was addressed in this fashion by Rāvaṇa, he said these words: "Since you are still alive, Rāvaṇa, then I say to hell with my strength!

64. "But why bother praising me? Now strike once again, fool! Then my fist shall lead you to the abode of Yama." At these words of Māruti, Rāvaṇa's anger blazed up once more.

65. His eyes reddened, the mighty rākṣasa energetically raised his right fist and brought it down with force on the monkey's chest. Struck once again on his broad chest, Hanumān staggered.

66. Seeing that mighty Hanumān was stunned, the great chariot-warrior raced swiftly in his chariot toward Nīla.

67. With his fearsome arrows that resembled serpents and pierced the vitals of his foes, he tormented Nīla, lord of the army of tawny monkeys.

68. Hard-pressed by that stream of arrows, Nīla, lord of the monkey army, with one hand, hurled a mountain peak at the overlord of the rākṣasas.

69–70. Meanwhile, wise and powerful Hanumān, now recovered and eager for battle, saw that Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, was engaged in battle with Nīla. Angrily he said, "It is not appropriate to attack someone who is locked in battle with another."

71. Meanwhile, powerful Rāvaṇa smashed that peak with seven sharp-tipped arrows so that it fell, shattered.

72. Seeing the mountain peak shattered, Nīla, the lord of the army of tawny monkeys, slayer of enemy heroes, flared up with anger, like the fire at the end of time.

73. In that battle, Nīla then hurled aśvakarṇas, dhavas, sālas, mangos in full bloom, and various other trees as well.

74. But Rāvaṇa splintered those trees as they came toward him. He then deluged Nīla, the son of Agni, the purifier, with a very fearsome hail of arrows.

75. But, inundated by that hail of arrows, like a great mountain by a storm cloud, he shrunk his body and alighted on the tip of Rāvaṇa's flagstaff.

76. Seeing the son of Agni, the purifier, perched on the tip of his flagstaff, Rāvaṇa flared up in anger. Nīla then roared.

77. When Lakṣmaṇa, Hanumān, and Rāma saw that tawny monkey first on the tip of Rāvaṇa's flagstaff, next on the point of his bow, and then on the top of his crown, they were amazed.

78. Even the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa himself was astonished at the monkey's swiftness. He then invoked the wondrous and blazing divine weapon-spell of Agni.

79. Then the leaping monkeys, observing that Rāvaṇa was baffled in combat by Nīla's swiftness, chattered in delight as they watched intently.

80. Enraged by the screeching of the monkeys, his mind utterly confused, Rāvaṇa could do nothing.

81. Taking up an arrow charged with the divine weapon-spell of Agni, the night-roaming rākṣasa Rāvaṇa fixed his glance on Nīla, who was perched on the head of his flagstaff.

82. Then Rāvaṇa, the powerful lord of the rākṣasas, spoke: "Your swiftness derives from this extraordinary trickery of yours, monkey.

83–84. "Now try to save your life, if you can, monkey. You seem to appear in many different forms. Nonetheless, this arrow, loosed by me and charged with a divine weapon-spell, will rob you of your life, even as you seek to save it."

85. When he had spoken in this fashion, great-armed Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, nocked the arrow and, with that divinely charged weapon, struck the lord of the army.

86. Struck in the chest and burnt by that arrow charged with the divine weapon-spell, Nīla fell at once to the ground.

87. Although he had fallen to the ground on his knees, nonetheless, because he was endowed with his father's divine power as well as his own blazing energy, he was not killed.

88. Seeing that the monkey had lost consciousness, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, still eager for battle, raced toward Saumitri in his chariot that thundered like a storm cloud.

89. His spirit undaunted, Saumitri addressed Rāvaṇa, who was twanging his immeasurable bow: "Come after me, lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas! You shouldn't be fighting with monkeys."

90. Hearing his words and the fearsome resonant twanging of his bowstring, the rākṣasa king confronted Saumitri where he stood and spoke these wrathful words:

91. "How fortunate for me, Rāghava, that you, headed for destruction, your wits disordered, have come into my sight. This very moment, stricken by my streams of arrows, you shall depart for the land of death."

92. As Rāvaṇa was bellowing in this fashion, exposing the white tips of his fangs, Lakṣmaṇa, undaunted, replied: "The truly powerful do not bellow, your majesty. Foremost of evildoers, you are merely boasting.

93. "I know all about your courage, lord of the rākṣasas, your strength, your valor, and your prowess. Here I stand bow and arrows in hand. Come on! What is the use of this vain boasting?"

94. The overlord of the rākṣasas was furious at being spoken to in this fashion, and he loosed seven beautifully fletched arrows. But Lakṣmaṇa cut them to pieces with arrows whose tips and edges were honed and whose fletching was adorned with gold.

95. When the lord of Laṅkā saw them suddenly cut to pieces, like serpent lords whose coils are cloven, he gave way to anger and loosed still other sharp arrows.

96. But Rāma's younger brother released from his bow a fierce shower of arrows. With these arrows—razor-tipped, half-moon-headed, finely barbed, and crescent-headed—he calmly cut Rāvaṇa's arrows to pieces.

97. Then, swiftly fitting to his bow sharp-tipped arrows, whose luster was that of blazing fire and whose impact was equal to that of great Indra's vajra or the thunderbolt, Lakṣmaṇa released them in an effort to kill the overlord of the rākṣasas.

98. But the lord of the rākṣasas cut them to pieces. Then, when he had done so, he struck Lakṣmaṇa in the forehead with an arrow given to him by self-existent Brahmā—its luster equal to that of the fire at the end of time.

99. Tormented by Rāvaṇa's arrow, Lakṣmaṇa staggered and slackened his grip on his bow. Then, regaining consciousness with difficulty, he cut to pieces the bow of that enemy of Indra, lord of the thirty gods.

100. Then, with three sharp-tipped arrows, Dāśarathi struck him whose bow was shattered. Tormented by those arrows, the king staggered but with difficulty regained consciousness.

101. Tormented by arrows, his limbs bathed in sweat, drenched in blood, his bow shattered, the immensely powerful enemy of the gods then, in that battle, seized a javelin he had been given by self-existent Brahmā.

102. The lord of the rākṣasa kingdom then swiftly hurled that blazing lance at Saumitri. Terrifying the monkey armies, it resembled a smokeless fire.

103. As it flew toward him, the younger brother of Bharata struck it with divinely charged weapons and with arrows that blazed like sacrificial fires. Nonetheless, the javelin plunged deep into Dāśarathi's broad chest.

104. Wounded in the breast by the javelin of Brahmā, Saumitri recalled that he himself was an inconceivable portion of Viṣṇu.

105. Then, although he grasped Saumitri, humbler of the dānavas' pride, with both his arms, that thorn in the side of the gods was unable to budge him.

106. With his two arms, he was able to lift the Himalayas, Mount Mandara, Mount Meru, or even the three worlds along with the immortal gods; yet, in that battle, he could not lift Bharata's younger brother.

107. When Rāvaṇa saw that Lakṣmaṇa, who was a portion of Viṣṇu in a human body, was unconscious, he was astonished.

108. At this juncture, Hanumān, son of Vāyu, enraged, rushed at Rāvaṇa. In his rage, he struck him on the chest with a fist like adamant.

109. The blow of that fist made Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, slump to his knees on the floor of his chariot. He swayed for a moment and collapsed.

110. Seeing Rāvaṇa of fearsome valor unconscious in battle, the seers, monkeys, and gods, together with Vāsava, cheered.

111. But powerful Hanumān picked up Lakṣmaṇa, who had been wounded by Rāvaṇa, in both his arms and carried him to Rāghava.

112. For, on account of the affection and supreme devotion of the son of Vāyu, Lakṣmaṇa became light for that monkey, even though he could not be budged by his enemies.

113. Meanwhile, the javelin extracted itself from Saumitri, who was unconquerable in battle, and returned to its place in Rāvaṇa's chariot.

114. But powerful Rāvaṇa, regaining consciousness in that great battle, took up sharp arrows and grasped a great bow.

115. And Lakṣmaṇa, destroyer of his foes, recalling that he himself was an inconceivable portion of Viṣṇu, was freed of that dart and restored to health.

116. Meanwhile, when Rāghava saw that the great heroes of that vast host of monkeys had been struck down in battle, he raced toward Rāvaṇa.

117. But Hanumān, intercepting him, spoke these words: "You should climb on my back and punish this rākṣasa."

118. When Rāghava heard the words uttered by Hanumān, son of Vāyu, that hero immediately climbed up on the great monkey. Then the overlord of men gazed upon Rāvaṇa mounted on his chariot in battle.

119. Keeping him in sight, immensely powerful Rāghava raced toward him, as did the wrathful Viṣṇu, his weapon raised, toward Vairocana.

120. He made his bowstring resound sharply with a sound like the crash of a thunderbolt. Then, in a deep voice, he addressed the lord of the rākṣasas:

121. "Stay where you are! For after doing me such an injury, tiger among rākṣasas, where can you go to escape me?

122. "If you were to fly for refuge to Indra, Vaivasvata, Sūrya, bringer of light, self-existent Brahmā, Agni Vaiśvānara, or even Śiva, bringer of auspiciousness—even if you were to flee to the ten directions—still, no matter where you might go, you would not escape me now.

123. "And he whom you struck with your javelin this day will soon return in his desire to cause you sorrow. This very day he will bring death to you in battle, king of the rākṣasa hosts, and to your sons and wives as well."

124. Upon hearing Rāghava's words, the rākṣasa lord struck the great monkey with sharp arrows that were like the flames of the fire at the end of time.

125. But since he was endowed with innate blazing energy, that blazing energy only increased as he was struck with those arrows by the rākṣasa in battle.

126. But immensely powerful Rāma, seeing that that tiger among leaping monkeys had been wounded by Rāvaṇa, was overwhelmed with rage.

127. Advancing toward Rāvaṇa's chariot, Rāma cut it to pieces with his well-fletched arrows along with its wheels, horses, banners, umbrella, and great flagstaff, as well as its charioteer, missiles, lances, and swords.

128. Then he swiftly struck that enemy of Indra on his broad and beautiful chest with an arrow that resembled Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt, just as Lord Indra himself might strike Mount Meru with his vajra.

129. That heroic king, who had neither trembled nor staggered at the blows of Indra's vajra or of thunderbolts, now, struck by Rāma's arrow, was sorely afflicted. He staggered and dropped his bow.

130. Perceiving that the overlord of the rākṣasas was dazed, magnanimous Rāma took up a blazing, half-moon-headed arrow and, with it, swiftly cut off his crown, which shone like the sun.

131. Then, in the midst of the battle, Rāma addressed the lord of the rākṣasas, who, with the top of his crown severed, had lost his royal splendor and resembled a serpent robbed of its venom or a darkened sun, its rays extinguished.

132. "You have performed great and fearsome deeds and struck down my heroic warriors. Still, recognizing that you are exhausted from all that, I shall not bring you under the sway of death with my arrows."

133. Addressed in this fashion, the king, wounded with arrows, his pride and excitement crushed, his bow cut to pieces, his horses and charioteer slain, and his great crown cut off, quickly entered Laṅkā.

134. Once the mighty lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas, the enemy of the dānavas and the gods, had returned to Laṅkā, Rāma, along with Lakṣmaṇa, removed those darts from the tawny monkeys in the forefront of the great battle.

135. When the enemy of Indra, lord of the thirty gods, had been humbled, the gods and the asuras, the hosts of creatures, the guardians of the directions, and the denizens of the deep, along with the seers, the great serpents, and the creatures of land and water, rejoiced.

The end of the forty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 48

1. Now, when the king, afflicted by the fear of Rāma's arrows, his pride humbled, reentered the citadel of Laṅkā, he was nearly insensible with agitation.

2. For great Rāghava had vanquished the king, as might a lion, an elephant or Garuḍa, a serpent.

3. Remembering Rāghava's arrows that, like the staff of Brahmā, blazed with the brilliance of lightning, the lord of the rākṣasas shuddered.

4. Seated on his magnificent heavenly golden throne, Rāvaṇa gazed at the rākṣasas and said these words:

5. "Since I, who am the equal of great Indra, have been defeated by a mere human, it is clear that the supreme austerities I performed have all been in vain.

6. "And those frightening words of Brahmā, 'Know that you still must fear humans,' have now come back to haunt me, for they have proven true.

7. "For although I obtained invulnerability with respect to the gods, dānavas, gandharvas, yakṣas, rākṣasas, and great serpents, I did not request it with respect to humans.

8. "Bearing this in mind, you must exert yourselves. Let rākṣasas be stationed on top of the gateways at the main thoroughfares.

9. "And you must awaken the incomparably profound Kumbhakarṇa, crusher of the pride of the gods and dānavas, who has been overcome by Brahmā's curse."

10. Realizing that Prahasta had been slain and he himself defeated, mighty Rāvaṇa dispatched a fearsome army of rākṣasas.

11. "Exert yourselves at the gateways! Ascend the ramparts! Kumbhakarṇa, who is overwhelmed by sleep, must be awakened!

12. "That rākṣasa sleeps for six, seven, eight, even nine months at a time. Nonetheless, you must awaken mighty Kumbhakarṇa immediately.

13. "For that great-armed warrior, greatest of all the rākṣasas, will quickly slaughter the monkeys and the two princes in battle.

14. "Addicted to this vulgar pleasure, Kumbhakarṇa sleeps all the time in a stupor. But once Kumbhakarṇa is awakened, my grief at being humiliated by Rāma in that terrible battle will be banished.

15. "For of what use to me is that hero, whose strength is equal to that of Śakra, if he can be of no assistance to me when I am in such trouble?"

16. Upon hearing those words of the rākṣasa lord, the rākṣasas proceeded in great agitation to the residence of Kumbhakarṇa.

17. As instructed by Rāvaṇa, those eaters of flesh and blood gathered perfumes, garlands, and food and went on their way hurriedly.

18–19. As they passed through the huge gates into Kumbhakarṇa's lovely cavern, which extended a league on every side and was redolent with every fragrance, the immensely powerful rākṣasas were driven back by the force of his breath. Nonetheless, retaining their footing with difficulty, they managed to enter the cavern with effort.

20. Once they had entered that charming and splendid cavern, its floors inlaid with gold, they spied that tiger among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, sleeping. He was fearsome to behold.

21. All together they began to rouse grotesque Kumbhakarṇa, who lay sleeping in the midst of his long sleep, like some crumbled mountain.

22–23. They stared at the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa, tiger among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, as he lay there, his body hairs bristling, hissing like a great serpent, and terrifying them with his stertorous breathing. With his fearsome nostrils and his huge mouth as wide as the underworld Pātāla, he was fearsome to behold.

24. Then those mighty rākṣasas placed before Kumbhakarṇa a supremely gratifying heap of meats as huge as Mount Meru.

25. Those tigers among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, set down massive quantities of deer, buffalo, and boar—an astonishing heap of food.

26. Then those foes of the thirty gods placed before Kumbhakarṇa pots of blood and strong drink of various kinds.

27. And they smeared that scorcher of his foes with costly sandal-paste and covered him with heavenly garlands and fragrant perfumes.

28. The yātudhānas released fragrant incense and sang the praises of that scorcher of his foes, roaring loudly in their thousands, like storm clouds.

29. They sounded conches, whose luster was like that of the hare-marked moon, and they roared tumultuously all together in their impatience.

30. Those night-roaming rākṣasas roared, clapped their upper arms, and shook him. Thus they made a huge commotion in order to awaken Kumbhakarṇa.

31. Upon hearing that din—the sound of conches and bherī and paṭaha drums, along with the clapping of the upper arms, the shouting, and the lionlike roars—the birds, who were flying in all directions and soaring into the heavens, suddenly came crashing down.

32. When the huge, sleeping Kumbhakarṇa was still not awakened by those cacophonous sounds, all the rākṣasa troops took up bludgeons, cudgels, and maces.

33. Then, with mountain peaks, cudgels, maces, trees, war hammers, and their palms and fists, those huge rākṣasas began to belabor Kumbhakarṇa as he slept there comfortably on the ground.

34. However, because of the wind caused by the rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa's stertorous breathing, the rākṣasas, although powerful, were unable to remain standing before him.

35. Then those rākṣasas of fearsome valor, ten thousand strong, all together loudly sounded their mṛdaṅga, paṇava, and bherī drums, along with many conches and jugs, right in front of him.

36. Roaring and beating him, they tried to rouse him as he lay there, like a mass of collyrium. But he was oblivious to it all.

37. When they were still unable to wake him, they resorted to more drastic and more violent efforts.

38. With staves, whips, and goads, they drove horses, camels, donkeys, and elephants over him, and they sounded conches and bherī and mṛdaṅga drums with all their might.

39. They struck his limbs with great bundles of sticks, war hammers, and cudgels, wielded with all their might.

40. That tremendous din filled all of Laṅkā together with its surrounding woods and mountains. But still he did not awaken.

41. Next, they incessantly and simultaneously beat a thousand bherī drums with drumsticks of refined gold, all around him.

42. But when in that profound slumber brought about by the power of the curse he still did not awaken, the night-roaming rākṣasas became furious.

43. All those rākṣasas of fearsome valor were in a towering rage. Some of them, in their effort to awaken the rākṣasa, actually assaulted him.

44. Some beat bherī drums, while others raised a tremendous racket. Some of them tore out his hair, while others bit his ears. Nonetheless, Kumbhakarṇa, plunged in his profound slumber, did not stir.

45. Other powerful rākṣasas, armed with mallets and war hammers, brought them down on his head, chest, and limbs.

46. Even though that huge rākṣasa was hammered all over with hundred-slayers tied to ropes and straps, he still did not awaken.

47. But, finally, when they made a thousand elephants trample across his body, Kumbhakarṇa, aware of a slight sensation, at last awoke.

48. Ignoring the tremendous blows of mountaintops and trees that were being hurled down upon him, he suddenly leapt up at the violent interruption of his sleep, yawning and oppressed by fear and hunger.

49. Stretching wide his arms, which were as strong as mountain peaks and resembled two mountain peaks or great serpents, that night-roaming rākṣasa yawned grotesquely, opening his mouth, which was like the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea.

50. And as he yawned prodigiously, his mouth, as wide as the underworld Pātāla, resembled the sun, maker of day, risen over the summit of Mount Meru.

51. Yawning, the enormously powerful night-roaming rākṣasa was at last fully awake. His breath was like a gale from the mountains.

52. As Kumbhakarṇa arose, his appearance was like that of a drenching storm cloud crossed by cranes at summer's end.

53. His enormous eyes, which resembled blazing fires and whose luster was like that of lightning, looked like two great blazing planets.

54. Since he was hungry, he ate the meat. And since he was thirsty, he drank the blood. Then that foe of Śakra drank wine and a pot of marrow.

55. At last, when the night-roaming rākṣasas reckoned that he was sated, they approached him and surrounded him on every side with their heads bowed.

56. First that bull among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, reassured the rākṣasas, sons of chaos. Then, astonished at having been awakened, he said this to the rākṣasas:

*57. "Why have you gentlemen put so much effort into waking me? I trust that all is well with the king and that no danger of any kind presents itself.

58. "On the other hand, some great danger from enemies must surely have presented itself, on account of which you gentlemen have so urgently awakened me.

59. "I shall this very day eliminate the danger to the king of the rākṣasas. I shall cast down great Indra or smash Anala, god of fire.

60. "For no one would have awakened me so violently from my slumber for some trivial reason. So now tell me truthfully the reason for awakening me."

61. Then Yūpākṣa, a minister of the king, cupping his hands in reverence, replied to that tamer of his foes, Kumbhakarṇa, who was speaking so agitatedly in this fashion.

62. "The gods have never presented us with any danger, nor have we been presented with any danger from the daityas or dānavas such as now presents itself to us from a man, your highness.

63. "Laṅkā is surrounded by monkeys who look like mountains. A catastrophic danger from Rāma, inflamed at the abduction of Sītā, now confronts us.

64. "Earlier, a single monkey burned down the great citadel and slaughtered Prince Akṣa along with his troops and elephants.

65. "Even the lord of the rākṣasas himself, Rāvaṇa Paulastya, the thorn in the side of the gods, was dismissed in battle by Rāma, whose splendor is that of the sun, with the words, 'You are as good as dead.'

66. "What neither the gods nor the daityas and dānavas could do to the king has been done to him by Rāma, who then released him, sparing his life."

67. When Kumbhakarṇa had heard these words of Yūpākṣa and had learned of his brother's defeat in battle, he opened his eyes wide and said this to him:

68. "This very day, Yūpākṣa, I shall slaughter in battle the entire army of tawny monkeys along with Lakṣmaṇa and Rāghava. Only then will I go to see Rāvaṇa.

69. "I shall sate the rākṣasas with the flesh and blood of the tawny monkeys, and then I shall drink the blood of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa all by myself."

70. Upon hearing those arrogant words of which the defects were magnified by anger, Mahodara, one of the principal warriors of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, cupped his hands in reverence and said these words:

71. "Only after you have heard Rāvaṇa's words and carefully considered the advantages and disadvantages of any action should you attempt to conquer our enemies in battle, great-armed warrior."

72. Upon hearing these words of Mahodara, the mighty and enormously powerful Kumbhakarṇa prepared to set forth, surrounded by rākṣasas.

73. Once they had awakened Kumbhakarṇa, fearsome in eye, form, and valor, the rākṣasas went in haste to the palace of ten-necked Rāvaṇa.

74. When they arrived there, all those night-roaming rākṣasas, joining their cupped palms in reverence, addressed ten-necked Rāvaṇa as he sat on his splendid throne.

75. "Your brother Kumbhakarṇa is awake, bull among rākṣasas. How should he proceed? Should he sally forth directly or will you first see him here?"

76. Delighted, Rāvaṇa replied to those rākṣasas who had come there, "I wish to see him here, duly honored."

77. Saying, "So be it," all those rākṣasas went back again and, as instructed by Rāvaṇa, said these words to Kumbhakarṇa:

78. "The king, that bull among all the rākṣasas, wishes to see you. So set your mind on going and bring delight to your brother."

79. Upon receiving his brother's command, mighty and unassailable Kumbhakarṇa said, "So be it," and leapt up from his bed.

80. In high spirits, he rinsed his mouth, bathed, and adorned himself splendidly. As he was thirsty, he urgently sent for invigorating drink.

81. Then, hastening on his account, the rākṣasas, at Rāvaṇa's command, quickly brought intoxicating drink and various kinds of food.

82. After first drinking a thousand jars, he made ready to go.

83. Filled with energy and strength, exhilarated, and slightly intoxicated, Kumbhakarṇa, in his frenzy, resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end.

84. As Kumbhakarṇa made his way toward his brother's palace, accompanied by an army of rākṣasas, his footsteps shook the very earth.

85. As he went on his way, Kumbhakarṇa flooded the royal highway with light through his own bodily radiance, as does the thousand-rayed sun the earth with its beams. Encircled with a garland of hands cupped in reverence, he resembled Indra of the hundred sacrifices on his way to the abode of self-existent Brahmā.

86–87. Seeing him, so huge and extraordinary, diademed and tall as a mountain peak, as if matching the sun itself with his innate splendor, the forest-dwelling monkeys were stricken with fear and fled in all directions. Some ran for refuge to Rāma, the refuge of all, while others, in their panic, fell down. Some, in their panic, fled in all directions, while others, stricken with fear, simply lay on the ground.

The end of the forty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 49

1–2. Huge, diademed Kumbhakarṇa looked like a mountain. Seeing him striding along as did Lord Nārāyaṇa long ago through the heavens, mighty and immensely powerful Rāma took up his bow and stared at him.

3. But when the great army of monkeys spied Kumbhakarṇa, who, adorned with his golden armlets, looked like a storm cloud charged with rain, it broke and ran once more.

4. When he saw his army on the run and the rākṣasa looming above him, Rāma, in his amazement, said this to Vibhīṣaṇa:

5. "Who is that tawny-eyed, diademed hero, who looks like a mountain and looms over Laṅkā, like a storm cloud laced with lightning?

6. "From here he looks like some great and solitary banner raised high above the earth. At the sight of him all the monkeys are scattering every which way.

7. "Tell me, who is this enormous creature? Is he a rākṣasa or an asura? I have never seen a creature like him before."

8. Thus questioned by Prince Rāma Kākutstha, tireless in action, wise Vibhīṣaṇa said this to him:

9. "That is Kumbhakarṇa, the valorous son of Viśravas, who defeated both Vaivasvata and Vāsava in battle.

10. "In battle, Rāghava, he has crushed thousands of gods, dānavas, yakṣas, great serpents, flesh-eating demons, gandharvas, vidyādharas, and kinnaras.

11. "The thirty gods themselves were unable to kill him, mistakenly thinking that mighty Kumbhakarṇa with his dreadful eyes and lance in hand was, in fact, Kāla himself.

12. "For mighty Kumbhakarṇa is powerful by nature, while the power of the other rākṣasa lords derives from the gift of boons.

13. "No sooner had this huge rākṣasa been born than, tormented by hunger, he devoured many thousands of living beings.

14. "As they were being devoured, the creatures, stricken with terror, ran for refuge to Śakra and reported the matter to him.

15. "In a rage, great Indra, the wielder of the sharp vajra, struck Kumbhakarṇa with it. Struck by Śakra's vajra, the huge rākṣasa staggered and roared loudly in his rage.

16. "Upon hearing the roars of wise Kumbhakarṇa, who was roaring loudly, the earth, already terrified, became still more so.

17. "And, in his rage at great Indra, mighty Kumbhakarṇa tore out one of Airāvata's tusks and, with it, struck Vāsava on the chest.

18. "Wounded by Kumbhakarṇa's blow, Vāsava staggered. Then all at once the gods, brahman-seers, and dānavas despaired.

19. "Śakra then proceeded with all creatures to the abode of self-existent Brahmā, lord of creatures, where they told him about Kumbhakarṇa's vicious nature, his devouring of creatures, and his assaulting the gods.

20. "'If he continues to devour creatures in this fashion, the whole world will be empty within no time.'

21. "When Brahmā, grandfather of all the worlds, had heard those words of Vāsava, he sent for the rākṣasas and fixed his gaze on Kumbhakarṇa.

22. "When Brahmā, lord of creatures, saw Kumbhakarṇa, he was frightened. Fixing him with his glance, self-existent Brahmā took a deep breath and said this:

23. "'Undoubtedly, you were created by Paulastya for the destruction of the world. Therefore, you shall sleep from this day forward as if you were dead.' That very instant, overcome by Brahmā's curse, he collapsed right in front of the Lord.

24. "Then, profoundly agitated, Rāvaṇa spoke these words, 'You are cutting down a full-grown golden tree, just as it is about to bear fruit.

25. " 'It is not right, lord of creatures, to curse one's own grandson in this fashion. Since your words may never prove false, there is no doubt but that he will sleep. Still, you should set some time limit to his sleeping and waking.'

26. "Upon hearing Rāvaṇa's words, self-existent Brahmā said this: 'He shall sleep for six months and wake for but a single day.

27. " 'But on that one day, this ravening hero will roam the earth with gaping mouth, devouring all creatures, like a raging conflagration.'

28. "But now, King Rāvaṇa, in a desperate situation and terrified of your valor, has had Kumbhakarṇa awakened.

29. "That hero of terrifying valor has emerged from his lair. Soon, in a towering rage, he will race about, devouring the monkeys.

30. "At the mere sight of Kumbhakarṇa, the tawny monkeys have fled. How then will the monkeys stand up to him when he is in the fury of battle?

31. "Let's tell all the monkeys that he is just some giant mechanical man. Once they accept that, they will lose their fear of him."

32. Upon hearing Vibhīṣaṇa's reasonable and encouraging words, Rāghava addressed Nīla, the general of the army.

33. "Go, Nīla Pāvaki! Put all the troops into battle formation and take up your post. Seize control of the gateways, thoroughfares, and bridges of Laṅkā.

34. "Let all the monkeys collect mountain peaks, trees, and boulders and take up their posts, well armed and boulders in hand."

35. Thus instructed by Rāghava, Nīla, that elephant among monkeys and general of the hosts of tawny monkeys, gave his orders accordingly to the monkey troops.

36. Then, Gavākṣa, Śarabha, Hanumān, Aṅgada, and Nala, who themselves resembled mountains, seized mountain peaks and approached the gateways.

37. With boulders held aloft and trees in their hands, the formidable army of monkeys resembled a vast and formidable mass of huge storm clouds, looming up against a mountain.

The end of the forty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 50

1. Meanwhile, that tiger among the rākṣasas, whose valor was tremendous, proceeded along the majestic royal highway, groggy with sleep and drink.

2. As that supremely invincible warrior continued on his way, he was surrounded by thousands of rākṣasas and strewn with showers of blossoms raining from the houses along his route.

3. At length he spied the vast and beautiful mansion of the rākṣasa lord, which, covered with a fretwork of gold, blazed with the radiance of the sun.

4. Then he entered the dwelling of the rākṣasa lord, as might the sun a mass of clouds. There, just as Śakra might behold the self-existent Brahmā seated on his throne, he beheld from afar his elder brother seated on his.

5. Now that he had arrived at his brother's house and had entered its innermost chamber, he spied his elder seated dejectedly in the flying palace Puṣpaka.

6. But when ten-necked Rāvaṇa saw that Kumbhakarṇa had arrived, he quickly sat up in great excitement and had him ushered into his presence.

7. Immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa made his obeisance at the feet of his brother, who sat upon his throne, and said, "What task must I perform?" Then, springing up in great delight, Rāvaṇa embraced him.

8. When he had been embraced by his brother and duly welcomed, Kumbhakarṇa took a superb, splendid, and heavenly seat.

9. Immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa settled himself on his seat. Then, his eyes red with rage, he said these words to Rāvaṇa:

10. "Why have you put such effort into waking me, your majesty? Tell me. Who are you afraid of? Who will become a ghost this very day?"

11. His eyes rolling slightly, Rāvaṇa spoke these words to his angry brother Kumbhakarṇa, who sat beside him:

12. "As of today, you have been asleep for a very long time, mighty warrior. Since you were resting comfortably, you do not know of the danger Rāma poses to me.

13. "This powerful Rāma Dāśarathi has crossed the ocean with Sugrīva and an army and is cutting us off at the roots.

14. "Just look at the woods and parklands of Laṅkā! He has turned them all into one big sea of monkeys after easily coming here via a causeway.

15. "The very foremost among the rākṣasas have been slaughtered in battle by the monkeys. But never do I see the destruction of the monkeys in battle.

16. "You must understand that I have exhausted all my resources. You must save the city of Laṅkā in which only the children and the aged remain.

17. "Great-armed warrior, you must accomplish this most formidable task for your brother's sake. I have never before spoken in this fashion to anyone, scorcher of your foes. For, my brother, I have placed my love and my fullest confidence in you.

18. "Many times, bull among rākṣasas, in our wars with the gods and asuras, you faced off against them and defeated them in battle. For there is not to be found among all living beings any one as mighty as you.

19. "You must do me this supreme favor and service. You, who love battle and love your kinsmen, must, according to your pleasure, scatter the army of our enemies with your own blazing energy, just as a strong gale might spring up to scatter the clouds of autumn."

The end of the fiftieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 51

1. When Kumbhakarṇa had heard the lamentation of the king of the rākṣasas, he laughed and then said these words:

2. "Since you paid no heed to those who had your welfare at heart, you have now met with that very calamity that we foresaw earlier, at the council of ministers.

3. "You are suffering the immediate consequences of your wicked deed, just as evildoers suffer an instant descent into their respective hells.

4. "You carried out this action, your majesty, without first reflecting upon it. In the sheer arrogance of your strength, you did not consider the consequences.

5. "A person who, relying upon his royal authority, does later what ought to be done first, and first what ought to be done later, has no comprehension of the distinction between sound and unsound policy.

6. "Actions that are performed in inverted order, without reference to the proper time and place, are harmful, just as are offerings of food to impious persons.

7. "A king who perceives the fivefold application of the three types of action after coming to a decision with his ministers remains on the proper path.

8. "So does a king who desires to reach a decision in conformance with the texts on polity, who pays heed to his ministers, and who recognizes his true friends by virtue of his own intelligence.

9. "A man should pursue all three human ends—righteousness, profit, and pleasure—at their proper times, lord of the rākṣasas, either all at once or two at a time.

10. "And a king or one exercising royal power who learns which among these three is foremost and yet does not take it to heart finds all his great learning to be in vain.

11–12. "But, foremost among rākṣasas, the self-possessed monarch should consult with his ministers concerning the timely use of bribery, conciliation, sowing dissension, coercive force, or any combination of these means, as well as the proper and improper ways of applying them. He who does so and practices righteousness, profit, and pleasure at their appropriate times never comes to grief in this world.

13. "And the king who, together with ministers who understand the true nature of things and have his interests at heart, deliberates over what he ought and ought not do in this world in order to achieve a beneficial result thrives.

14. "There are some men—dumb brutes, in fact—utterly ignorant of the import of the śāstras, who, once they are brought into discussions of policy, wish to speak out of sheer arrogance.

15. "One should not follow the pernicious advice of those who are ignorant of the śāstras, and unfamiliar with the treatises on statecraft, and simply eager to enhance their own positions.

16. "And those men who undermine all undertakings by foolishly uttering in their insolence pernicious advice that only seems beneficial should, after careful examination, be excluded from discussions of policy.

17. "For in this world some counselors, acting in concert with cunning enemies, persuade their master to engage in self-destructive actions, thus bringing him to ruin.

18. "When it comes to evaluating counsel, a master must, through a full investigation, determine which of his ministers are, in fact, enemies who are posing as friends although they have actually been suborned.

19. "For his enemies find the weak points of a rash king who suddenly rushes into undertakings, just as birds plunge into the gap in the Krauñca mountain.

20. "And so a king who underestimates his enemy and fails to protect himself meets with calamities and falls from his lofty state."

21. But when ten-necked Rāvaṇa had heard Kumbhakarṇa's speech, he knit his brows in anger and said this to him in a rage:

22. "How dare you lecture me like some venerable elder or preceptor? Why waste your effort on words like this? You must do what suits the present situation.

23. "It is useless now to keep on repeating what I failed to do then, whether from error, mental confusion, or reliance on my strength and valor.

24–25. "If you truly love me, if you truly understand what it means to be a brother, or if you believe in your heart that this mission is of the utmost urgency, then you must immediately do what suits the present situation. Please remedy through your valor this catastrophic result of my unsound policy.

26. "A true friend is one who stands by a poor wretch who has lost everything. A true kinsman is one who renders assistance to those who have gone astray."

27. As Rāvaṇa was speaking these firm and harsh words in this fashion, Kumbhakarṇa, thinking, "He is angry!" addressed him softly and soothingly.

28. Recognizing that his brother was extremely agitated, Kumbhakarṇa now spoke softly, soothing him.

29. "Enough of this agonizing, foremost king of the rākṣasas! You must put aside your anger and regain your composure.

30. "You need not give way to despondency as long as I am alive, your majesty. I will destroy him on whose account you are so anguished.

31. "Regardless of your mood, my bond of kinship and brotherly affection forced me to offer beneficial advice, your majesty.

32. "What is appropriate for a loving kinsman to do in the present circumstances is to slaughter your enemies. Now watch, as I do just that in battle.

33. "This very day, great-armed warrior, you shall see the hosts of tawny monkeys fleeing, once I have slain Rāma and his brother in the forefront of battle.

34. "This very day, you shall be happy, great-armed warrior, while Sītā will be desolated upon seeing me bring Rāma's head back from the battle.

35. "This very day, all the rākṣasas in Laṅkā whose kinsmen have been slain shall witness the most welcome death of Rāma.

36. "This very day, through the destruction of the enemy in battle, I shall wipe away the tears of those afflicted with grief on account of the slaughter of their kinsmen.

37. "This very day, you shall see the lord of the leaping monkeys, Sugrīva—huge as a mountain—torn to pieces in battle, like a storm cloud when the sun breaks through.

38. "You should not send out anyone else to fight, warrior of unequaled valor. I myself will slaughter your enemies, mighty king.

39. "I shall fight them, whether they be Śakra, Yama, Agni the purifier, Māruta, or even Varuṇa and Kubera.

40. "For even Indra himself, the smasher of citadels, would be terrified of me—with my sharp fangs and my body the size of a mountain—when I roar, holding aloft my keen lance.

41. "Or even were I to cast my weapon aside and swiftly trample our enemies, not one of them, if he valued his life, would be able to stand and face me.

42. "Not with a javelin, not with a mace, not with a sword, nor with keen arrows, but with my own two hands I shall, in my fury, slay even Indra himself, the wielder of the vajra.

43. "Even should Rāghava withstand the impact of my fist this day, then a hail of arrows will drink his blood.

44. "Why are you oppressed by anxiety while I am here, your majesty? I stand poised to sally forth for the destruction of your foes.

45. "Give up this fear of Rāma, your majesty. I shall slay Rāghava in battle as well as Lakṣmaṇa and mighty Sugrīva. For I wish to confer upon you great and extraordinary renown.

46. "I am off to bring you pleasure, the greatest of all pleasures, through the slaughter of Dāśarathi. Once I have slain Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa, I shall devour all the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys.

47. "So enjoy yourself to your heart's content. Drink fine wines. Attend to your duties and banish all cares. Once I have, this very day, sent Rāma to the abode of Yama, Sītā will at long last submit to your will."

The end of the fifty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 52

1. Now when Mahodara had heard those words uttered by huge, powerful Kumbhakarṇa with his immense arms, he said this:

2. "Although you were born in a noble family, Kumbhakarṇa, you are presumptuous and have a vulgar mind. You are arrogant and incapable of understanding what is to be done in any situation.

3. "It is not the case that the king does not understand sound and unsound policy, Kumbhakarṇa. But you, presumptuous in your childishness, just like to prattle.

4. "He is quite familiar with the distinctions of place and time; and he knows all about stasis, increase, and diminution both of himself and his enemies, bull among rākṣasas.

5. "For what wise man would engage in an action such as could only be performed by a vulgar-minded man of brute strength who does not honor his elders?

6. "And as for righteousness, profit, and pleasure, which you claim can be practiced separately, you lack the capacity to understand them as they truly are.

7. "For action alone is the motivating force behind all things. And in this world, even the most wicked actions may bear excellent fruit.

8. "Righteousness and sound policy may yield excellent results, but so may their opposites. Still, unrighteousness and unsound policy may also yield results that are calamitous.

9. "Men engage in actions with reference to this world and the next. So a person who indulges in pleasure may still attain excellent consequences.

10. "The king set his heart on this deed, and we all approved it. And besides, what is wrong with the use of violence against an enemy?

11. "Furthermore, as to your rationale for going forth to battle on your own, I shall explain to you why that is both inappropriate and harmful.

12. "How can you single-handedly defeat that very same Rāghava who earlier slaughtered so many immensely powerful rākṣasas in Janasthāna?

13. "You can see throughout the city all those mighty rākṣasas whom he earlier defeated in Janasthāna. They are still terrified to this day.

14. "In your ignorance you wish to rouse Daśaratha's son Rāma, who is like a raging lion, as one might rouse a sleeping serpent.

15. "For who can possibly assail him who is as irresistible as death, unassailable in his wrath, and ever blazing with energy?

16. "Our whole army would be in danger if it faced this enemy. Therefore, I do not approve of your going there alone.

17. "Who, moreover, lacking all resources, could hope, like some common fool, to subdue an enemy who possesses a wealth of resources and is determined to lay down his life?

18. "How, best of rākṣasas, can you possibly hope to fight someone who has no peer among men, but is equal to Indra or Vivasvant?"

19. Having spoken in this fashion to the enraged Kumbhakarṇa, Mahodara then, in the midst of the rākṣasas, addressed Rāvaṇa, who caused the world to cry out.

20. "Since you already have Vaidehī, why do you go on talking? Sītā will submit to your wishes whenever you desire.

21. "I have devised a ruse whereby Sītā will come to you. If it appeals to your way of thinking, lord of the rākṣasas, then hear me out.

22. "Have it proclaimed that these five—Dvijihva, Saṃhrādin, Kumbhakarṇa, Vitardana, and I—are going forth to kill Rāma.

23. "Then we will go out and engage Rāma in fierce battle. If we should defeat your enemies, then we shall have no further need of such a ruse.

24. "If, on the other hand, when we have finished the battle, our enemy should survive, then we shall adopt the ruse that I have devised in my mind.

25. "Our bodies rent by sharp arrows marked with Rāma's name, we shall return from the battle, covered with blood.

26. "Announcing, 'We have devoured Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa,' we shall reverently clasp your feet. You must then reward us to our heart's content.

27. "Then, your majesty, you must have the following proclaimed throughout the city from elephant-back: 'Rāma has been slain along with his brother and his troops!'

28–29. "Then, feigning the greatest delight, subduer of your foes, you must cause your attendants to be given delicacies, servants, various desirable things, and wealth. Also have your heroic warriors given garlands, garments, and unguents. Your soldiers should be given copious drink, and you yourself must drink, feigning delight.

30ab–1138–30cdef. "Once this vicious rumor, 'The rākṣasas have devoured Rāma along with his companions!' has been heard and spread everywhere, you must go to Sītā privately and comfort her with consoling words. Then you should seduce her with wealth, grain, jewels, and various desirable things.

31. "By means of this deception, your majesty, which will give rise to fear and grief, Sītā, believing her husband dead, will come under your sway, unwilling though she may be.

32. "For once she grasps that her beloved husband is dead, she will come under your sway in her despair and feminine frailty.

33. "Previously she was raised in comfort, and though that is what she deserves, she has been racked with suffering. Once she realizes that her comfort is dependent upon you, she will, by all means, come to you.

34. "In my view this is the best policy. It would be catastrophic for you to confront Rāma. Don't be so anxious. If you remain here without fighting, you will surely gain great happiness.

35. "And so, conquering one's enemies without a fight, without the loss of one's army, and without placing oneself in danger, lord of the people, one can long enjoy fame, great merit, majesty, and glory, lord of the earth!"

The end of the fifty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 53

1. When Kumbhakarṇa had been addressed in this fashion, he first reviled Mahodara and then addressed his brother Rāvaṇa, foremost of the rākṣasas.

2. "In killing that evil-minded Rāma this very day, I shall remove a terrible danger to you. With your enemy out of the way, may you be content.

3. "True heroes do not boast in vain, like empty clouds thundering. Watch now as my boasts are proven true by my feats in battle.

4. "True heroes do not tolerate insult, nor do they indulge in self-praise. But, without swaggering, they perform seemingly impossible feats.

*5. "It was through heeding the advice of cowards like you, Mahodara, ignorant fools, who think that they are wise, that the king has been brought to such a sorry state.

6. "It is people like you—cowards in battle and sycophants of the king, saying only what he wants to hear—that have constantly subverted this undertaking.

7. "Moreover, in counseling the king in the guise of friendship, you have acted, in fact, like an enemy. For Laṅkā has been virtually emptied save for the king, the treasury has been drained, and the army decimated.

8. "In order to remedy your unsound policy, I shall this very day go forth to war, fully prepared to defeat the enemy in battle."

9. When wise Kumbhakarṇa had spoken these words in this fashion, the lord of the rākṣasas, laughing, replied in these words:

10. "There is no doubt that Mahodara is terrified of Rāma. That's why the idea of battle does not appeal to him, dear boy so skillful in battle.

11. "I have no one who can equal you in loyalty and in strength. So go forth, Kumbhakarṇa, for the slaughter of our enemy and for victory!"

12. That slayer of his enemies swiftly seized his sharp lance. It was made entirely of black iron, but it glittered with ornaments of burnished gold.

13. The equal of Indra's thunderbolt, it was fearsome and as heavy as the vajra. It was a killer of gods, dānavas, gandharvas, yakṣas, and kinnaras.

14. It was adorned with massive garlands of red blossoms and stained red with the blood of his enemies. It spewed forth its inner fire. Seizing that sharp lance, the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa spoke these words to Rāvaṇa:

15. "Let your vast army stay here. I shall go forth alone. This very day, in my rage and ravenous hunger, I shall devour the monkeys!"

16. Upon hearing Kumbhakarṇa's speech, Rāvaṇa uttered these words: "You had best go forth accompanied by soldiers armed with lances and war hammers.

17. "For those great monkeys are swift and determined. They would surely kill you with their fangs should you be alone or caught off guard.

18. "Therefore you had best go forth accompanied by unassailable soldiers. You must annihilate the entire enemy force, which is such a menace to the rākṣasas."

19. Then, rising from his throne, immensely powerful Rāvaṇa bound upon Kumbhakarṇa's head a chaplet with a jewel at its center.

20. And he fastened upon great Kumbhakarṇa armlets, rings, a necklace of pearls that shone like the hare-marked moon, and other fine ornaments.

21. And Rāvaṇa hung upon him fragrant and celestial garlands of blossoms and placed magnificent earrings on his ears.

22. Wearing his golden bracelets and armlets and adorned with golden necklaces and other ornaments, huge-eared Kumbhakarṇa resembled a fire blazing up with oblations.

23. With his great black sword belt, he was as resplendent as Mount Mandara girded with the great serpent when the nectar of immortality was churned forth.

24. Girding on his impenetrable golden armor, which could withstand any blow and, blazing with its own luster, glittered like lightning, he resembled the king of the mountains, shrouded in clouds at sunset.

25. His body adorned with every ornament and lance in his hand, the rākṣasa resembled Nārāyaṇa when he had resolved to take his three strides.

26. He embraced his brother and reverently circumambulated him. Then, bowing his head to him, the immensely powerful warrior set forth. Rāvaṇa sent him off with auspicious blessings.

27. Chariot-warriors accompanied that great hero, himself the foremost of chariot-warriors, to the blare of conches and the beating of war drums. They were accompanied in turn by well-armed soldiers, elephants, horses, and chariots that rumbled like storm clouds.

28. They followed the fearsome and immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa on serpents, camels, donkeys, horses, lions, elephants, and various other beasts and birds.

29. Strewn with showers of blossoms, a parasol held above him, and his sharp lance in hand, that foe of gods and dānavas went forth, intoxicated with strong drink and frenzied with the smell of blood.

30. Behind him, making a huge uproar, came many fearsome and immensely powerful rākṣasa foot soldiers. They had fearsome eyes and held weapons in their hands.

31–32. With their red eyes and their huge bodies, they looked like masses of black collyrium. They brandished lances, swords, keen battle-axes, iron clubs many fathoms long, maces, cudgels, huge trunks of palmyra trees, and slings that were not to be withstood.

33. Then taking on a different form—horrific and hair-raising—the highly energetic and immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa marched forth.

34. He was now a hundred bow lengths wide and six hundred tall. Terrifying, his eyes as big as cartwheels, he looked like a huge mountain.

35. Resembling a scorched mountain, the huge Kumbhakarṇa, with his enormous mouth, arranged the rākṣasas in battle order. Then, laughing, he said this:

36. "This very day in my wrath I shall burn up the troops of the monkey leaders, one after another, just as a fire would so many moths.

37. "Granted, these forest-ranging monkeys have done me no harm. In fact, their kind is an ornament to the city parks of folks like us.

38. "However, it is Rāghava, along with Lakṣmaṇa, who is the root cause of the blockade of our city. Once he is killed, all of them will be destroyed, and I am going to kill him in battle."

39. As Kumbhakarṇa was speaking in this fashion, the rākṣasas sent up an extremely dreadful roar that seemed to make the very ocean tremble.

40. But as wise Kumbhakarṇa marched swiftly forth, dreadful omens appeared on every side.

41. Extremely dreadful clouds thundered, shedding meteors and lightning bolts, while the earth, together with its seas and forests, trembled.

42. Dreadful looking jackals howled, their mouths emitting flames, while birds wheeled in clockwise circles.

43. As he marched along the road, a vulture perched upon his lance. His left eye throbbed and his left arm trembled.

44. A blazing meteor crashed down with a horrific sound. The sun grew dim, and an ill wind began to blow.

45. But driven by the power of fate, Kumbhakarṇa marched on, heedless of the great and hair-raising portents that had appeared.

46. Stepping over the ramparts, that hero, who resembled a mountain, gazed upon the extraordinary monkey army, which looked like a mass of clouds.

47. And like clouds driven by the wind, the monkeys fled in all directions when they saw the foremost of the rākṣasas, who looked like a mountain.

48. Seeing that immensely fierce monkey army fleeing in all directions, like a scattered mass of clouds, Kumbhakarṇa, who resembled a cloud, in his joy roared thunderously like a cloud.

49. Upon hearing his dreadful roaring, which was like the rumbling of a rain-charged cloud in the sky, many of the leaping monkeys fell to the ground, like sāla trees cut off at the roots.

50. Great Kumbhakarṇa marched forth wielding a huge iron club for the destruction of his enemies. He looked like Lord Yama, with his servants and his rod, at the end of a cosmic age. Thus he inspired a paralyzing fear in the ranks of the monkeys.

The end of the fifty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 54

1. Kumbhakarṇa let loose a mighty roar that caused the ocean to resound, producing, as it were, thunderclaps and shattering, so it seemed, the very mountains.

2. When the monkeys saw him approaching, with his terrible eyes—he whom not even magnanimous Indra, Yama, or Varuṇa could kill—they scattered.

3. Seeing them scatter, Aṅgada, Vālin's son, addressed Nala, Nīla, Gavākṣa, and the immensely powerful Kumuda.

4. "Where are you going in such an access of panic, like vulgar tawny monkeys, forgetting who you are, your heroic deeds, and your noble lineage?

5. "Enough of this, gentle friends! Turn back! Why are you trying to save yourselves? This is no rākṣasa capable of fighting. It is just some huge scarecrow.

6. "With our valor we shall smash this huge scarecrow towering amid the rākṣasas. Turn back, leaping monkeys!"

7. When the tawny monkeys, with some difficulty, had been reassured, they regrouped here and there. Then, with trees and boulders in hand, they advanced toward the battlefield.

8. Turning back in a rage, the immensely powerful forest-dwelling monkeys, like wildly enraged bull elephants in rut, struck Kumbhakarṇa with lofty mountain peaks and boulders.

9. Although he was struck with trees, their branches in blossom, he was not shaken. Falling on his limbs, the boulders shattered into hundreds of pieces, while the trees, their branches in blossom, fell to the ground, splintered.

10. In a towering rage, he exerted himself mightily and wrought havoc upon the armies of the immensely powerful monkeys, just as a fire that has flared up might wreak havoc in a forest.

11. Hurled down, many of the bulls among monkeys lay there, drenched with blood, like crimson-blossomed trees that have fallen.

12. Leaping and running, the monkeys did not watch where they were going. Some fell into the sea, while others took to the sky.

13. As they were being slaughtered by the immensely powerful rākṣasa, those heroes fled along the same path by which they had crossed the ocean.

14. Some, their faces dejected through fear, fled down to the shore. Some apes climbed trees, while others fled to the mountain.

15. Some of them plunged into the sea, while others took refuge in caves. Some of the leaping monkeys sank down; none of them stood their ground.

16. Seeing that the monkeys had broken ranks, Aṅgada said this: "Turn back, leaping monkeys! Stand fast! Let us fight!

17. "If you break ranks, I can see no safe place for you, even should you circle the earth itself. Turn back, all of you! Why are you trying to save yourselves?

18. "Nothing can hinder your progress and your valor. But if you flee weaponless, your wives will mock you. But though you will have survived, that will be like death to you.

19. "Surely you were all born in long and great lineages. If, abandoning your valor, you flee in fear, you will certainly become contemptible.

20. "Where have they gone now, your great and lofty boasts that we heard before in the public assembly?

21. "When someone survives but is subject to censure, tales of his cowardice are bandied about. So follow the path that is fit for honorable men; abandon your fear.

22. "If, our life spans being short, we should lie slain upon the earth, then, since we would have died in battle, we would attain the world of Brahmā, so difficult to reach. But if we should slay the enemy in battle, we would attain glory.

23. "In any case, once Kumbhakarṇa sees Kākutstha, he will no more escape with his life than would a moth that flies into a blazing fire.

24. "If we who are so renowned should save our lives by fleeing, our reputations would be destroyed, since we, who are so many, would have been routed by a single warrior."

25. As heroic Aṅgada of the golden armlets was speaking in this fashion, the monkeys, still fleeing, responded to him in words that are to be condemned by the brave.

26. "The rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa has wrought terrible slaughter among us. This is no time to stand our ground. We value our lives; so we're getting out of here."

27. Having said this much, all the monkey troop leaders, keeping their eyes on the advancing rākṣasa, so terrible with his terrible eyes, fled in all directions.

28. But, with soothing and respectful words, Aṅgada managed to get those heroic, wrinkle-faced monkeys to turn back, even as they fled.

29. Then Ṛṣabha, Śarabha, Mainda, Dhūmra, Nīla, Kumuda, Suṣeṇa, Gavākṣa, Rambha, and Tāra, led by Dvivida, Panasa, and Hanumān, the son of Vāyu, swiftly turned and headed back to the battlefield.

The end of the fifty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 55

1. And so, when those gigantic monkeys had heard Aṅgada's words, they turned back, eager for battle, resigning themselves to death.

2. At the words of Aṅgada, the wrinkle-faced monkeys were calmed, infused with courage, and incited to valor.

3. Then, marching forward in great excitement and resigned to death, the monkeys fought furiously, heedless of their lives.

4. Holding aloft trees and huge mountain peaks, those gigantic monkeys charged swiftly at Kumbhakarṇa.

5. But the valiant and colossal Kumbhakarṇa raised his mace and, in a towering rage, struck at his enemies, sending them flying in all directions.

6. Struck down by Kumbhakarṇa, the monkeys lay sprawled on the ground in groups of seven and eight hundred, and even in groups of thousands.

7. He raced about sweeping up groups of monkeys—sixteen, eight, ten, twenty, and thirty at a time—in his two arms and devouring them, just as Garuḍa, in his towering rage, devours the great serpents.

8. Hovering in the sky, Hanumān rained down mountain peaks and many different kinds of trees on Kumbhakarṇa's head.

9. But, with his lance, mighty Kumbhakarṇa shattered the mountain peaks and deflected the cascade of trees.

10. Then, grasping his keen lance, he raced toward the fearsome army of tawny monkeys. But Hanumān, seizing a mountain, stood directly in the path of the charging Kumbhakarṇa.

11. With it, the enraged monkey forcefully struck Kumbhakarṇa, whose body was as fearsome as a great mountain. Overwhelmed by that blow, the blood-splattered rākṣasa staggered, his limbs moistened with fat.

12. Brandishing his lance, which glittered like lightning and resembled a mountain, its highest peak in flames, he struck Māruti full in the chest, just as Guha struck Mount Krauñca with his fearsome javelin.

13. His mighty chest pierced by the lance, Hanumān was dazed and vomited blood from his mouth. There, in that great battle, he loosed a horrendous cry that was like the thundering of the clouds at the end of a cosmic age.

14. Then the rākṣasa hosts, seeing him afflicted, were suddenly delighted and sent up a cheer. But the monkeys themselves were afflicted, and, overwhelmed with fear of Kumbhakarṇa, they fled in the midst of battle.

15. Nīla then hurled a mountaintop at wise Kumbhakarṇa; but the latter, seeing it rushing toward him, struck it with his fist.

16. Struck by his fist, the mountaintop shattered and fell to the earth, shooting forth sparks and flames.

17. Then five tigers among monkeys—Ṛṣabha, Śarabha, Nīla, Gavākṣa, and Gandhamādana—rushed Kumbhakarṇa.

18. Those immensely powerful monkeys battered gigantic Kumbhakarṇa on all sides with mountains and trees and with their palms, feet, and fists.

19. But those blows felt like mere caresses to him, and he was not shaken in the least. He crushed swift Ṛṣabha with both arms.

20. Crushed in Kumbhakarṇa's arms, the fearsome Ṛṣabha, bull among monkeys, collapsed, blood oozing from his mouth.

21. Then, in battle, Kumbhakarṇa, Indra's foe, struck Śarabha with his fist, Nīla with his knee, and Gavākṣa with the palm of his hand.

22. Shaken by the blows they had been dealt, dazed, and spattered with blood, they fell to the ground, like kiṃśuka trees that have been cut down.

23. When those great monkey leaders had fallen, thousands of monkeys rushed Kumbhakarṇa.

24. And all those mighty bulls among leaping monkeys, who resembled mountains, began to bite him as they jumped and climbed up upon him, as if he were a mountain.

25. Those bulls among leaping monkeys struck at the gigantic Kumbhakarṇa with their claws, fangs, fists, and knees.

26. Covered with those thousands of monkeys, that tiger among rākṣasas, who already resembled a mountain, now looked like one overgrown with trees.

27. Then the mighty rākṣasa seized all those monkeys in his arms and devoured them, just as Garuḍa, in his rage, devours the great serpents.

28. Kumbhakarṇa crammed the monkeys into his mouth—as wide as the underworld Pātāla—until they came out of his nose and ears.

29. As he devoured those tawny monkeys in his towering rage, the furious rākṣasa chief, who looked like a mountain, routed the entire monkey host.

30. Drenching the earth with blood and flesh, the frenzied rākṣasa rampaged through the ranks of the tawny monkeys like the fire at the end of time.

31. In that battle, with his lance in hand, powerful Kumbhakarṇa resembled Śakra, vajra in hand, or Yama, ender of all things, with his noose in hand.

32. Kumbhakarṇa raged through the monkey ranks like Agni, the purifier, blazing through the dry woodlands in the summer.

33. Then, their troops decimated and their leaders slain, the monkeys, trembling with fear, cried out loudly and discordantly as they were slaughtered.

34. With so many of them being slaughtered by Kumbhakarṇa, the monkeys fled to Rāghava for refuge, shaken and despairing.

35. But the heroic lord of the monkeys, Sugrīva, seeing mighty Kumbhakarṇa rushing toward him, sprang up.

36. The great monkey tore off a mountain peak and, brandishing it, charged swiftly at mighty Kumbhakarṇa.

37. When Kumbhakarṇa, his every limb unscathed, saw that leaping monkey rushing toward him, he stopped and faced the monkey lord.

38. Seeing Kumbhakarṇa standing there devouring huge monkeys, his body smeared with their blood, Sugrīva said these words:

39. "You have struck down heroes; you have performed an impossibly difficult feat. You have devoured our troops and have gained the highest renown.

40. "But you should leave the monkey army alone. What have you to do with common soldiers? Now try to withstand a single blow of this mountain of mine, rākṣasa."

41. When the tiger among rākṣasas, Kumbhakarṇa, had heard that speech of the king of the tawny monkeys—a speech that showed his strength and fortitude—he uttered these words:

42. "You are the grandson of Prajāpati and the son of Ṛkṣarajas, and you are endowed with learning and valor. That is why you boast so, monkey."

43. When Sugrīva had heard these words of Kumbhakarṇa, he hefted the mountain and hurled it violently. He struck Kumbhakarṇa in the chest with that mountain, which was like Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt.

44. But the mountain peak shattered violently against his broad chest. At that, the leaping monkeys immediately grew despondent, while the hosts of rākṣasas roared with delight.

45. Kumbhakarṇa was furious at being struck by that mountain peak. He opened his mouth and bellowed with rage. Hefting his lance, which glittered like lightning, he hurled it in order to kill the lord of the apes and tawny monkeys.

46. But Hanumān, son of Anila, swiftly leaping up, caught in both hands the sharp gold-corded lance, hurled by Kumbhakarṇa's arm, and quickly broke it.

47. Placing that immense lance, made of black iron and weighing many tons, across his knee, that bull among leaping monkeys snapped it in great excitement.

48. When the great rākṣasa lord saw that his lance was broken, he was enraged. Tearing off the summit of Laṅkā's Mount Malaya, he closed with Sugrīva and struck him with it.

49. Struck with that mountain peak in battle, the lord of the monkeys fell senseless to the ground. Seeing him fallen senseless to the ground in battle, the yātudhānas roared in delight.

50. Then Kumbhakarṇa rushed upon the lord of the monkeys, whose valor was fierce and wondrous. Seizing Sugrīva, he carried him off, as a violent wind might a cloud.

51. Moving through the battle, holding aloft Sugrīva, who resembled a huge cloud, Kumbhakarṇa, whose form rivaled that of Mount Meru, now resembled Mount Meru with a new, fearsome peak soaring above it.

52. The hero Kumbhakarṇa, holding Sugrīva aloft, proceeded on his way, as the rākṣasa lords sang his praises in the battle. He heard the cries of those who dwelt in heaven, home of the thirty gods, who were astonished at the capture of the king of the leaping monkeys.

53. Then, as Indra's foe, whose valor was that of Indra, was carrying off the lord of tawny monkeys, the equal of Indra himself, he reflected, "With this one out of the way, the entire army, Rāghava included, is as good as gone."

54–55. When wise Hanumān, son of Māruta, saw that the monkey army had fled in all directions and that the monkey Sugrīva had been taken by Kumbhakarṇa, he reflected, "What am I to do now that Sugrīva has been captured in this way?

56. "By all means, I shall do what is proper for me to do. I shall become like a mountain and crush the rākṣasa.

57. "Once I have slain mighty Kumbhakarṇa in battle, smashing his body with my fists, and freed the king of the monkeys, all the leaping monkeys shall rejoice.

58. "On the other hand, the king will surely free himself as he would even were he to be captured by the thirty gods together with the asuras and great serpents.

59. "I believe that because he was struck down in battle by Kumbhakarṇa with the blow of a mountain, the lord of the monkeys must not yet have regained consciousness.

60. "After a while, when he has regained consciousness, he will do what is best for himself and the monkeys in this great battle.

61. "On the other hand, if I were to free great Sugrīva, it would incur his most severe displeasure, as his reputation would be forever tarnished.

62. "Therefore, I shall wait awhile until our king's valor is recouped. Meanwhile, I shall rally the scattered army of the monkeys."

63. After reflecting in this fashion, Hanumān, son of Māruta, once more halted the flight of the vast monkey army.

64. Meanwhile, Kumbhakarṇa entered Laṅkā carrying the huge tawny monkey, who was still twitching. As he did so, he was strewn with showers of splendid blossoms by those standing on the palaces and at the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares.

65. Then, still held in the arms of the much stronger rākṣasa, the great monkey somehow regained consciousness. Gazing about him again and again at the city's royal highway, he fell to thinking.

*66. "Since I have been captured in this fashion, how in the world can I now strike back? I must perform such a feat as will be both desirable and beneficial for the tawny monkeys."

67. Suddenly grasping the foe of Indra, lord of the immortal gods, with his fingertips, the king of the tawny monkeys rent his ears with his claws and his nose with his fangs. Then he slashed Kumbhakarṇa along his flanks.

68. Bruised and wounded by him, robbed of his ears and nose, his body drenched in blood, Kumbhakarṇa was in a towering rage. Flinging Sugrīva off, he smashed him to the ground.

69. Smashed to the ground with terrible force and beaten all the while by the rākṣasas, the foes of the gods, Sugrīva, jumping up, flew swiftly into the sky and once more joined Rāma.

70. Stripped of his ears and nose and gushing blood, mighty Kumbhakarṇa looked like a mountain covered with waterfalls.

71. Then the great rākṣasa Kumbhakarṇa, rushing swiftly from the city, began to devour that fierce monkey army, as the blazing fire at the end of a cosmic age devours all creatures.

72. Ravenous and craving blood and flesh, Kumbhakarṇa plunged into the fierce monkey army and, in his madness, began to devour rākṣasas, tawny monkeys, piśācas, and apes in battle.

73. With one hand he seized monkeys in his rage—one, two, three, or more—and swiftly hurled them into his mouth, together with rākṣasas.

74. Streaming with blood and fat and pounded with the peaks of lordly mountains, the mighty rākṣasa devoured the monkeys. As they were being devoured, the tawny monkeys ran to Rāma for shelter.

75. At that moment, Sumitrā's son Lakṣmaṇa, destroyer of enemy armies and conqueror of enemy citadels, entered the fight in a rage.

76. Valiant Lakṣmaṇa sunk seven arrows into Kumbhakarṇa's body. Then he took up some more and let them fly.

77. But mighty Kumbhakarṇa bypassed Saumitri and raced directly toward Rāma, seeming as he did so to tear up the very earth.

78. Then Rāma Dāśarathi, invoking the divine weapon-spell of Rudra, loosed sharp arrows at Kumbhakarṇa's breast.

79. As he ran about violently in a rage, wounded by Rāma, flames mixed with blazing coals poured from his mouth.

80. As those arrows, fletched with peacock feathers, sank into his chest, his massive mace slipped from his hand and fell to the ground.

81. When the immensely powerful rākṣasa realized that he had no weapons left, he wrought tremendous slaughter with his fists and his feet.

82. Drenched with blood, his body pierced all over with arrows, he poured forth blood, as a mountain does its waterfalls.

83. Suffused with fierce rage and covered with blood, he raced about devouring monkeys, rākṣasas, and apes.

84. At this point, righteous Lakṣmaṇa, who was intent upon killing Kumbhakarṇa and who had been weighing many methods of doing so, spoke to Rāma.

85. "He cannot distinguish between monkeys and rākṣasas. Intoxicated with the smell of blood, he is devouring his allies and his enemies alike.

86. "Very well, let the bulls among monkeys swarm all over him so that the principal troop leaders may take their stand all around him.

87. "Then, after some time, that evil-minded rākṣasa, falling to the ground, crushed by that heavy burden, will not kill any more of the leaping monkeys."

88. When the leaping monkeys had heard those words of the wise prince, they swarmed upon Kumbhakarṇa in great excitement.

89. But Kumbhakarṇa was enraged at being swarmed all over by the leaping monkeys, and he shook them off violently, as a vicious elephant might riders mounted on his back.

90. Seeing them shaken off, Rāma, thinking, "This rākṣasa is infuriated," took up his splendid bow and sprang toward him.

91. Rāma, his splendid quiver of arrows fastened on him, took up his fearsome, tautly strung bow, variegated with burnished gold and resembling a serpent. He sprang forward, rallying the tawny monkeys.

92. Accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa and surrounded by the monkey troops, invincible and mighty Rāma continued to advance.

93–96. He gazed upon great and mighty Kumbhakarṇa, the diademed tamer of his foes, whose every limb was drenched with blood. Rushing upon them all in a mad fury, that rākṣasa was like one of the great elephants that support the earth. Furious and surrounded by rākṣasas, he was hunting down the tawny monkeys. Adorned with golden armlets, he resembled the Vindhya mountain or Mount Mandara. He spewed blood from his mouth, like a towering storm cloud pouring rain. Drenched with blood, he lapped it up with his tongue. Crushing the monkey hosts, he resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end.

97. As he gazed upon that foremost of the rākṣasas, whose splendor was that of a blazing fire, the bull among men twanged his bowstring.

98. Enraged at the sound of his bow and unable to endure it, that bull among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, charged at Rāghava.

99. Then, as the mountainous Kumbhakarṇa, his arms like the splendid coils of the king of great serpents, rushed toward him in battle, like a storm cloud driven by the wind, Rāma addressed him.

100. "Don't lose heart now, lord of the rākṣasas! Know, foe of Śakra, that it is I, Rāma, who stand before you, wielding my bow. You are about to die."

101. When Kumbhakarṇa realized, "It's Rāma!" he laughed with a hideous sound that caused the hearts of all the forest-dwelling monkeys to sink.

102. With a fearsome and hideous laugh that was like the thundering of storm clouds, immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa said these words to Rāghava:

103. "You should know that I am no Virādha, Kabandha, Khara, Vālin, or Mārīca. It is I, Kumbhakarṇa, who have come.

104. "Gaze upon my huge and fearsome war hammer, all made of black iron. In the past, I defeated the gods and dānavas with it.

105. "Nor should you treat me contemptuously, thinking, 'He has lost his ears and nose!' For the loss of my ears and nose causes me not the slightest discomfort.

106. "Now, tiger among the Ikṣvākus, you should demonstrate your puny strength against my limbs. Then, once I have witnessed your manliness and valor, I will devour you."

107. Upon hearing these words of Kumbhakarṇa, Rāma let fly beautifully fletched arrows. Though they struck him with the impact of a thunderbolt, that enemy of the gods was neither shaken nor harmed.

108. Those same arrows—like thunderbolts—that had pierced the great sāla trees and slain Vālin, bull among monkeys, could not wound Kumbhakarṇa's body.

109. That foe of great Indra, however, absorbed those arrows with his body, as one might drink a trickle of water. For, in whirling his war hammer with its fierce impact, he had blunted the impact of Rāma's arrows.

110. Then, covered with blood, the rākṣasa, a terror to the vast hosts of the gods, whirling his war hammer with its fierce impact, put the army of tawny monkeys to flight.

111. Then, taking up the excellent divine weapon-spell of Vāyu, Rāma loosed it at that night-roaming rākṣasa and, with it, took off his arm that held the war hammer. His arm severed, Kumbhakarṇa roared deafeningly.

112. Severed by Rāghava's arrow, that arm of his, which was like a mountain peak and was still holding the war hammer, fell upon the army of the king of the tawny monkeys, wreaking carnage among the monkey troops.

113. The monkeys who had survived that carnage were routed and fled in despair to the edge of the battlefield. From there, their bodies trembling, they watched the fearsome duel between the rākṣasa lord and the lord of men.

114. His arm severed by the divinely charged weapon, Kumbhakarṇa tore up a tree with his hand and rushed in battle at the lord of men, like some huge and lordly mountain whose peak had been severed.

115. But, with an arrow variegated with jāmbūnada gold and charged with the divine weapon-spell of Indra, Rāma cut off Kumbhakarṇa's upraised arm, which resembled the coils of a great serpent and held the sāla tree.

116. Kumbhakarṇa's severed arm, resembling a mountain, fell to the ground, where, thrashing about, it crushed trees, mountains, rocks, monkeys, and rākṣasas.

117. Seeing Kumbhakarṇa, his arms severed, rushing suddenly upon him and roaring, Rāma took up two sharp half-moon-headed arrows and, with them, cut off the rākṣasa's feet in battle.

118. His arms and feet severed, Kumbhakarṇa opened wide his mouth, which was like the mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea. Bellowing, he hurled himself suddenly upon Rāma, like Rāhu, demon of the eclipse, upon the moon in the heavens.

119. But Rāma filled Kumbhakarṇa's mouth with sharp arrows, their fletching bound with gold. His mouth full, Kumbhakarṇa was unable to speak. With great effort, he moaned and lost consciousness.

120. Then Rāma took up the arrow of Indra, sharp, beautifully fletched and perfect. It shone like the rays of the sun. It had the speed of Māruta, and it resembled the staff of Brahmā or Kāla, the ender of all things.

121. Its fletching was gorgeous with diamonds and jāmbūnada gold, and it shone like the blazing sun or fire. It had the striking power of great Indra's vajra or a thunderbolt; and Rāma loosed it at the night-roaming rākṣasa.

122. Set in motion by Rāghava's arm, the arrow sped on its way, lighting up the ten directions with its inherent splendor. Its appearance was as brilliant as that of Agni Vaiśvānara, undimmed by smoke, and its power was equal to that of mighty Śakra's thunderbolt.

123. With it, Rāma severed the rākṣasa lord's head—huge as a mountain peak, its fangs bared, and its gorgeous earrings swinging wildly—just as, long ago, Indra, smasher of citadels, severed the head of Vṛtra.

124. Struck off by Rāma's arrow, the rākṣasa's head, which resembled a mountain, fell. It smashed the gates of the buildings on the main thoroughfares and knocked down the lofty rampart.

125. Finally, the enormous rākṣasa, who looked like Himalaya, fell into the sea, abode of waters. There he crushed crocodiles, shoals of huge fish, and serpents before he entered the earth.

126. When Kumbhakarṇa, that mighty foe of brahmans and gods, was slain in battle, the earth shook and all the mountains trembled, while the gods in delight raised a tumultuous cheer.

127. The divine seers, great seers, great serpents, gods, the spirits of the departed, the great birds, and guhyakas, together with the troops of yakṣas and gandharvas, hovering in the sky, were delighted by Rāma's valor.

128. Those countless monkeys, their faces like blooming lotuses, were overjoyed, and they paid honor to Rāghava, who had achieved his objective in having slain an unassailable enemy of such fearsome power.

129. Once Bharata's older brother had slain in combat Kumbhakarṇa, crusher of the hosts of the gods, whose efforts had never before been thwarted in great battles, he rejoiced, as did Indra, the lord of the immortal gods, when he had slain the great asura Vṛtra.

The end of the fifty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 56

1. When the rākṣasas saw that Kumbhakarṇa had been slain by great Rāghava, they reported it to Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas.

2. Upon hearing that the immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa had been slain in battle, Rāvaṇa was stricken with grief. He lost consciousness and collapsed.

3. Hearing that their paternal uncle had been slain, Devāntaka, Narāntaka, Triśiras, and Atikāya were stricken with grief and wept.

4. When Mahodara and Mahāpārśva heard that their brother had been slain by Rāma, tireless in action, they were overwhelmed with grief.

5. Then Rāvaṇa, bull among rākṣasas, regained consciousness with difficulty. Despondent at the slaying of Kumbhakarṇa, he began to lament.

6. "Alas, Kumbhakarṇa, mighty and valorous crusher of your enemies' pride! After single-handedly scorching the army of our foe, where have you gone, abandoning me?

7. "Now I am truly lost, since my right arm, relying on which I feared neither the gods nor the asuras, has now fallen.

8. "How could such a hero, a crusher of the pride of the gods and dānavas, who was like the fire at the end of time, have been slain today in battle by Rāghava?

9. "How can it be that you, whom the blow of even Indra's vajra could never harm, now sleep on the ground, mangled by Rāma's arrows.

10. "Seeing you struck down in battle, the hosts of gods, hovering in the sky together with the seers, are shouting in delight.

11. "Undoubtedly, the leaping monkeys, in their excitement, will seize the opportunity and scale the unbreachable gates of Laṅkā from every side.

12. "I have no further use for kingship, and what good is Sītā to me now? Without Kumbhakarṇa, I can take no pleasure in life.

13. "If I should fail to kill in battle Rāghava, my brother's killer, then, surely death would be better for me than this pointless existence.

14. "I shall go this very day to the place where my younger brother has gone. For I cannot bear to live a single moment without my brothers.

15. "The gods will surely laugh when they see me, who have done them great injury. But how, Kumbhakarṇa, shall I vanquish Indra now that you have been slain?

16. "This has befallen me, because, in my folly, I failed to heed the beneficial advice of great Vibhīṣaṇa.

17. "Since Kumbhakarṇa and Prahasta suffered such cruel deaths, the words of Vibhīṣaṇa have put me to shame.

18. "Now, I have experienced the grievous fruit of my action in that I drove out majestic and righteous Vibhīṣaṇa."

19. Thus piteously lamenting for Kumbhakarṇa in many ways, ten-faced Rāvaṇa was shaken to his innermost core. Realizing that his younger brother, the foe of Indra, had been slain, he collapsed in profound distress.

The end of the fifty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 57

1. After listening to the lamentations of evil-minded Rāvaṇa, who was lamenting in his burning grief, Triśiras spoke these words:

2. "True enough, our dear and immensely valorous uncle, middlemost among you three brothers, has been slain. Nonetheless, your majesty, true men do not lament as you have done.

3. "Surely you are a match for all the three worlds, lord. Why then do you feel sorry for yourself in this fashion, like some ordinary person?

4. "Brahmā has given you a javelin, armor, a bow and arrow, and a chariot rumbling like a thundercloud and yoked to a thousand donkeys.

5. "Time and again, even when unarmed, you have slain the gods and the dānavas. Now, equipped with all your weapons, you must slay Rāghava.

6. "Or rather remain here, great king. I myself shall go forth to battle. I shall exterminate your enemies, just as does Garuḍa the great serpents.

7. "Struck down by me this very day in battle, Rāma shall be laid low, just as was Śambara by Indra, king of the gods, and Naraka by Viṣṇu."

8. When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, had heard those words of Triśiras, he felt—impelled as he was by his own impending doom—that he had obtained a new lease on life.

9. And when Devāntaka, Narāntaka, and powerful Atikāya had heard the words of Triśiras, they were filled with eagerness for battle.

10. Then those heroic sons of Rāvaṇa, bulls among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, equal in valor to mighty Śakra himself, cried out, "I'll go! I'll go!"

11. All of them could fly through the air. All of them were skilled in magical illusion. All of them had crushed the pride of the thirty gods. All of them were ferocious in battle.

12. All were provided with troops and divinely charged weapons. All had gained wide renown. None had ever been known to suffer defeat in battle.

13. All those heroes were expert in the use of divine weapon-spells. All were adept in combat. All were endowed with higher knowledge. All had obtained boons.

14. Surrounded by his sons, whose brilliance equaled that of the sun and who had crushed the strength of their enemies, the king resembled magnanimous Indra surrounded by the immortal gods, destroyers of the pride of the great dānavas.

15. He embraced his sons and adorned them with ornaments. Then, invoking the highest blessings, he sent them off to battle.

16. Rāvaṇa also dispatched his two brothers Mahodara and Mahāpārśva to guard the princes in battle.

17. Taking respectful leave of great Rāvaṇa, who made his enemies cry out, and reverently circling him, those gigantic warriors set forth.

18. Those six immensely powerful and prominent rākṣasas, sons of chaos, anointed themselves with all protective herbs and fragrances and then set forth, eager for battle.

19. Mahodara mounted an elephant named Sudarśana, born in the lineage of Airāvata and resembling a black storm cloud.

20. Mounted upon that elephant, which was equipped with every weapon and adorned with quivers, he was as splendid as Sūrya, impeller of all creatures, perched on the summit of the western mountain.

21. Triśiras, Rāvaṇa's son, mounted a splendid chariot, which was yoked to magnificent horses and laden with every sort of weapon.

22. Mounted in his chariot, bow in hand, Triśiras was as resplendent as a storm cloud charged with lightning and meteors, flashing fire, and traversed by a rainbow.

23. Mounted on that splendid chariot, Triśiras, with his three diadems, was as splendid as Himalaya, lord of mountains, with his three golden peaks.

24. Next, Atikāya, foremost of all bowmen and a powerful son of the rākṣasa lord, mounted his splendid chariot.

25. It had a magnificent axle and wheels and was splendidly yoked. It had a fine frame and yoke pole. It glittered with quivers and bows, and it was laden with darts, swords, and iron clubs.

26. With his glittering diadem, variegated with gold, and his ornaments, Atikāya was as resplendent as Mount Meru illuminated by the rays of the shining sun.

27. Standing in that chariot, surrounded by those tigers among the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, the mighty son of the king was as resplendent as Indra, vajra in hand, surrounded by the immortal gods.

28. Narāntaka then mounted a huge white horse. Swift as thought and adorned with gold, it resembled Uccaiḥśravas himself.

29. Taking up a dart that was like a meteor, Narāntaka was as resplendent as powerful Guha when he has taken up his javelin amid his enemies in battle.

30. Taking up an iron club studded with diamonds, Devāntaka looked like the very image of Viṣṇu when he had seized the mountain with both arms.

31. Taking up his mace, powerful and heroic Mahāpārśva resembled Kubera himself in battle, mace in hand,

32. As they set forth surrounded by incomparable troops, those great warriors were like the gods in Amarāvatī, surrounded by incomparable troops.

33. They were followed by great rākṣasas with splendid weapons, mounted on elephants and horses and riding on chariots that rumbled like storm clouds.

34. Endowed with splendor, those great princes, diademed and radiant as the sun, looked like blazing planets in the sky.

35. The white row of parasols held above them, resembling a bank of autumnal clouds, looked like a line of haṃsas in the sky.

36. Eager for battle, the heroes marched forth, grimly resolved, for they had determined either to conquer their enemies or die.

37. As those great warriors, ferocious in battle, marched forth, they bellowed, roared, and loosed arrows in their frenzy.

38. The earth itself seemed to shake from the sounds of their roaring and the slapping of their arms, while the lion roars of the rākṣasas seemed almost to shatter the sky.

39. As they marched forth, in great delight, the mighty rākṣasa lords spied the monkey army with its upraised boulders and trees.

40. The great tawny monkeys, too, spied the army of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos. It was crowded with elephants, horses, and chariots, and it resounded with the jingling of hundreds of little bells.

41. It looked like a black storm cloud, and it bristled with huge weapons. It was filled on every side with rākṣasas, sons of chaos, resplendent as blazing fires or the sun.

42. Watching the approaching army, the leaping monkeys, perceiving their opportunity, raised huge mountains and roared again and again.

43. Hearing the resounding cries of the monkey troop leaders, the mighty hosts of rākṣasas, unable to endure the fierce enthusiasm of their enemies, roared more frightfully still.

44. As they plunged into the fearsome rākṣasa army, the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys, resembling mountains with lofty summits, stormed about with upraised boulders.

45. Armed with trees and boulders, the leaping monkeys stormed through the rākṣasa troops in a rage, some leaping into the air, others remaining on the ground.

46. Then, though they were kept at bay by torrents of arrows, the tawny monkeys, fearsome in their valor, unleashed a stupendous hail of trees, rocks, and mountains.

47. Both the rākṣasas and the monkeys uttered leonine roars in the battle. And the leaping monkeys crushed the yātudhānas with boulders.

48–49. In a rage some of the leaping monkeys slew in battle heroes, clad in armor and adornments and mounted on chariots, elephants, and horses, while others, leaping up violently, slaughtered the yātudhānas. Those bulls among rākṣasas, their eyes knocked out by fists and falling mountain peaks, fled, fell, and shrieked.

50. In a short while, the ground was covered with boulders and swords dropped by the tawny monkeys and rākṣasas, and it was drenched with blood.

51. Crushers of their foes, the rākṣasas, who looked like shattered mountains, hurled their broken lances; but these were repulsed by the monkeys.

52. Night-roaming rākṣasas slaughtered monkeys with monkeys, while monkeys slaughtered rākṣasas with rākṣasas.

53. Snatching away the tawny monkeys' boulders, the rākṣasas slaughtered them, while the monkeys, stripping away the rākṣasas' weapons, slaughtered them.

54. Smashing one another with boulders, lances, and missiles, the monkeys and rākṣasas roared like lions in battle as they slaughtered one another.

55. Struck down by the monkeys, their mail and armor pierced, the rākṣasas oozed blood, as trees do their vital sap.

56. In that battle, some of the monkeys smashed chariot with chariot, elephant with elephant, and horse with horse.

57. But the rākṣasas cut down the trees and boulders of the monkey lords with sharp arrows—horseshoe-headed, half-moon-headed, and crescent-headed.

58. With the monkeys and rākṣasas slain in battle, and with all the shattered mountaintops and splintered trees, the ground became impassable.

59. When the wrinkle-faced monkeys showed their excitement in that tumultuous battle and the rākṣasas were being struck down, the great seers and the hosts of gods cheered.

60. But then Narāntaka, mounting a horse as swift as Māruta, and seizing a sharp javelin, plunged into the army of the monkey king, as might a fish into the vast ocean.

61. That hero pierced seven hundred monkeys with his glittering dart. In an instant, that great foe of Indra single-handedly decimated the army of those bulls among tawny monkeys.

62. The vidyādharas and great seers watched that great warrior as, mounted on horseback, he rampaged through the troops of tawny monkeys.

63. One could mark his path, mired in flesh and blood and littered with the monkeys—huge as mountains—who had fallen.

64. No sooner would the bulls among leaping monkeys resolve to attack him than Narāntaka would attack and pierce them.

65. Raising his blazing dart in the midst of the battle, Narāntaka consumed the troops of tawny monkeys, as fire might the forests.

66. No sooner would the forest-dwelling monkeys uproot trees and boulders than they would fall, struck down by that dart, like mountains riven by a thunderbolt.

67. In that battle, mighty Narāntaka rampaged in all directions, like the wind in the rainy season, leveling everything in his path.

68. Those heroes were unable to flee, or stand their ground, or even stir in any direction. For that mighty warrior pierced them all, whether they leapt, ran, or stood still.

69. Pierced by that lone warrior, who, with his dart as brilliant as the sun, was like Yama, the ender of all things, the monkey troops fell to the ground.

70. Unable to withstand the blows of that dart, which had the crushing force of a thunderbolt, the monkeys wailed loudly.

71. As they fell, the bodies of the heroes among the tawny monkeys resembled mountains falling as their tall summits were shattered by thunderbolts.

*72. Meanwhile, those great monkey leaders who had earlier been struck down by Kumbhakarṇa, now fully recovered, approached Sugrīva.

73. Gazing about him, Sugrīva saw the army of tawny monkeys fleeing in all directions, terrified in their fear of Narāntaka.

74. As he watched the fleeing army, he spied Narāntaka, mounted on horseback and heading toward him, holding his dart.

75. Then immensely powerful Sugrīva, overlord of the monkeys, addressed heroic Prince Aṅgada, who was equal in valor to Śakra.

76. "Hero, you must advance against that rākṣasa, the one mounted on horseback, who has been terrorizing the army of tawny monkeys. And you must swiftly kill him."

77. Upon hearing these words of his lord, Aṅgada burst forth from that host—so like a cloud—as does the many-rayed sun from a host of clouds.

78. Adorned with his golden armlets and resembling a dense mass of stone, Aṅgada, foremost of the tawny monkeys, was as resplendent as a mountain laced with shining ore.

79. Armed only with his claws and fangs and lacking any other weapon, Vālin's immensely powerful son confronted Narāntaka and spoke these words:

80. "Stop! Why bother with such common tawny monkeys? Hurl your dart swiftly against this chest of mine, as hard to the touch as adamant."

81. Upon hearing Aṅgada's words, Narāntaka, biting his lips with his teeth and hissing like a serpent, flew into a rage.

82. Then he brandished his blazing dart and suddenly loosed it against Aṅgada. But it shattered against the adamantine chest of Vālin's son and fell to the ground.

83. Then, glancing at that shattered dart, which now resembled the coils of a serpent torn to pieces by Suparṇa, Vālin's son raised his palm and, with it, struck Narāntaka's horse on the head.

84. At that blow of his palm, the horse, which looked like a mountain, collapsed to the ground, its head shattered, its feet driven into the earth, the pupils of its eyes burst, and its tongue lolling out.

85. When immensely powerful Narāntaka saw that his horse had fallen, slain, he was beside himself with rage. He raised his fist and, with it, struck Vālin's son on the head in battle.

86. His head split open by that fist, Aṅgada poured forth great gouts of scalding blood. For a moment he flared up in anger, then fainted. Regaining consciousness, he was astonished.

87. Then Vālin's great son Aṅgada clenched his fist, which resembled a mountain peak and the impact of which was equal to that of a thunderbolt, and brought it down upon Narāntaka's chest.

88. His chest shattered by the impact of that fist and his body drenched with blood, Narāntaka, like a mountain shattered by the force of a thunderbolt, fell to the ground vomiting flames.

89. When that most eminent of heroes, Narāntaka, had thus been slain in battle by Vālin's son, the foremost among the thirty gods, hovering in the sky, along with the forest-dwelling monkeys gave a mighty cheer.

90. When Aṅgada, that warrior of extraordinary might and valor, had performed this nearly impossible feat of valor—cheering the heart of Rāma—he was somewhat astonished, but was filled once more with energy for battle.

The end of the fifty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 58

1. When those bulls among the rākṣasas, sons of chaos—Devāntaka, Trimūrdhan Paulastya, and Mahodara—saw that Narāntaka had been slain, they began to wail.

2. Then mighty Mahodara, mounted upon a magnificent bull elephant as huge as a cloud, charged at Aṅgada, Vālin's immensely powerful son.

3. And mighty Devāntaka, too, anguished at the slaughter of his brother, took up a blazing iron club and rushed toward Aṅgada.

4. The heroic Triśiras, mounted on a chariot as radiant as the sun and yoked to splendid horses, also raced toward Vālin's son.

5. Attacked by those three lords of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, crushers of the pride of the gods, Aṅgada tore up a tree with huge branches.

6. Just as Śakra hurls his blazing thunderbolt, so did heroic Aṅgada violently hurl that huge tree with its huge branches at Devāntaka.

7. But Triśiras cut it to pieces with arrows like venomous serpents. Then Aṅgada, seeing the tree splintered, leapt up into the sky.

8. From there, that elephant among monkeys rained down trees and boulders. But Triśiras, in a towering rage, cut them to pieces with his sharp arrows.

9. And Surāntaka as well smashed those trees with the tip of his iron club, while Triśiras assaulted heroic Aṅgada with arrows.

10. Mahodara, too, in a towering rage, charged at Vālin's son on his elephant and hit him on the chest with iron cudgels that struck with the force of thunderbolts.

11. Meanwhile, in a towering rage, swift Devāntaka confronted Aṅgada and, after striking him with an iron club, swiftly withdrew.

12. But although the son of Vālin was assaulted simultaneously by those three formidable rākṣasas, sons of chaos, that immensely powerful and valorous warrior remained unshaken.

13. Leaping up, he struck Mahodara's great elephant violently with his open hand. Its eyes knocked out, the bull elephant trumpeted loudly.

14. Then, ripping out one of its tusks, the immensely powerful son of Vālin rushed upon Devāntaka in battle and struck him with it.

15. Swaying with every limb like a tree buffeted by the wind, Devāntaka spewed blood the color of lac from his mouth.

16. Then, recovering with difficulty, powerful and mighty Devāntaka brandished his dreadful iron club and once more struck Aṅgada.

17. Struck with that iron club, the son of the lord of the monkeys sank to his knees on the ground but then leapt up once more.

18. But as the son of the lord of the tawny monkeys sprang up, Triśiras struck him in the forehead with three dreadful arrows that resembled venomous serpents.

19. When Hanumān and Nīla realized that Aṅgada had been surrounded by three of the bulls among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, they ran to his aid.

20. Then Nīla hurled a mountaintop at Triśiras. But that wise son of Rāvaṇa shattered it with sharp arrows.

21. Pierced by hundreds of arrows, its stony surface shredded, the mountaintop fell, shooting forth sparks and flames.

22. Then, upon witnessing that explosion with delight, Devāntaka, with his iron club, rushed toward Hanumān, son of Māruta, in battle.

23. But Hanumān, son of Māruta, leapt upon the charging Devāntaka and struck him on the head with his fist, which had the force of a thunderbolt.

24. His head shattered by the crushing blow of that fist, Devāntaka, son of the rākṣasa king, all at once fell lifeless to the ground, his teeth and eyes knocked out, his tongue lolling.

25. When mighty Devāntaka, foremost of rākṣasa warriors and foe of the gods, had been slain in battle, Trimūrdhan, enraged, loosed a fierce shower of sharp-tipped arrows at Nīla's chest.

26. Deluged by those torrents of arrows and pierced in every limb, Nīla, the guardian of the monkey troops, was slack limbed and immobilized by mighty Triśiras.

27. But then, regaining consciousness, Nīla ripped up a mountain along with its masses of trees, and, springing up with huge and terrible speed, he struck Mahodara on the head with it.

28. Crushed together with his elephant by the mountain as it fell, Mahodara was mortally wounded and fell lifeless to the ground, like a mountain struck by a thunderbolt.

29. When Triśiras saw that his paternal uncle had been slain, he took up his bow and, in a towering rage, riddled Hanumān with sharp arrows.

30. But, in a rage, Hanumān sprang up and tore the horses of Triśiras to pieces with his claws, just as a lion, king of beasts, might a mighty elephant.

31. Then, seizing his javelin, Triśiras, son of Rāvaṇa, hurled it at the son of Anila, just as Yama, ender of all things, unleashes Kālarātri, the dark night of universal destruction.

32. But the tiger among tawny monkeys caught that javelin, which had been hurled, as it flew unimpeded, like a blazing meteor hurtling through the sky. He broke it and roared.

33. When the hosts of monkeys saw that Hanumān had broken that fearsome-looking javelin, they were delighted, and they roared thunderously like storm clouds.

34. Then Triśiras, foremost among the rākṣasas, raised his sword and, in his rage, buried it in the chest of the monkey lord.

35. Although he was injured by that sword stroke, mighty Hanumān, son of Māruta, struck Trimūrdhan on the chest with his open hand.

36. When Hanumān struck him with his open hand, immensely powerful Triśiras let his garments slip from his hands, and he fell to the ground unconscious.

37. And as Triśiras fell, the great monkey, who looked like a mountain, grabbed his sword and roared, terrifying all the rākṣasas, sons of chaos.

38. Then that night-roaming rākṣasa, unable to bear that sound, sprang up and struck Hanumān with his fist.

39. The great monkey was angered by the blow of that fist, and, in a rage, he seized that bull among rākṣasas by the crown.

40. Then, with Triśiras's own sharp sword, the furious son of Anila cut off his heads—with their diadems and earrings—just as did Śakra the heads of Tvaṣṭṛ's son.

41. Like so many stars fallen from the path of the sun, those heads of Indra's foe, huge as mountains, with their gaping orifices and their eyes blazing like Agni Vaiśvānara, fell to the ground.

42. When Hanumān, whose valor was equal to that of Śakra, had slain Triśiras, foe of the gods, the leaping monkeys cheered, the earth trembled, and the rākṣasas fled in all directions.

43–44. Once the extremely irascible and mighty Mahāpārśva saw that Triśiras had been slain as well as Mahodara and the unassailable warriors Devāntaka and Narāntaka, he flew into a rage and seized his splendid, blazing mace made of solid iron.

45–46. It was encircled with bands of gold and smeared with flesh and blood. Reddened with the blood of his enemies, it shone with splendor. Adorned with red garlands, its tip blazing with energy, it could terrify even the mighty elephants Airāvata, Mahāpadma, and Sārvabhauma.

47. Grasping that mace in a towering rage, mighty Mahāpārśva hurled himself upon the tawny monkeys, like the blazing fire at the end of a cosmic age.

48. But the mighty monkey Ṛṣabha sprang up and, confronting Mahāpārśva, Rāvaṇa's younger brother, took a stand before him.

49. Seeing that monkey, huge as a mountain, standing before him, Mahāpārśva, in a rage, struck him on the chest with that mace, which was like a thunderbolt.

50. Struck by him with that mace, the bull among monkeys was rocked. His chest split open, he gushed forth gouts of blood.

51. Regaining consciousness after a long time, Ṛṣabha, bull among monkeys, his lips quivering in his rage, glared at Mahāpārśva.

52. Seizing that fearsome mace and whirling it round and round, he struck Mahāpārśva Mattānīka with it in the forefront of the battle.

53. Mangled by his own mace, his teeth and eyes knocked loose, Mahāpārśva collapsed, like a mountain struck by a thunderbolt.

54. Once Rāvaṇa's brother had been slain, the army of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, which resembled an ocean, dropped its weapons and ran for its life, like an ocean scattering in all directions.

The end of the fifty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 59

1–3. Immensely powerful Atikāya, that mountainous crusher of the pride of gods and dānavas, saw that his thunderous and hair-raising army had been devastated. And, seeing that his brothers, whose valor was equal to that of Śakra, had been slain in battle together with his two paternal uncles, the brothers Mahodara and Mahāpārśva, bulls among rākṣasas, that warrior, who had been granted boons by Brahmā, flew into a rage in the midst of battle.

4. Mounting his chariot, which blazed with the brilliance of a thousand suns, that foe of Śakra hurtled toward the monkeys.

5. Loudly twanging his great bow, Atikāya, adorned with a diadem and burnished earrings, proclaimed his name and roared loudly.

6. With his leonine roar, the proclamation of his name, and the fearsome sound of his bowstring, he terrified the monkeys.

7. Gazing upon his gigantic form, which was like that of Viṣṇu when he traversed the three worlds, all the monkeys were stricken with terror and fled in the ten directions.

8. Confronted by Atikāya, their wits addled, the monkeys sought refuge in battle with Lakṣmaṇa's older brother, the refuge of all.

9. Then Kākutstha gazed from afar at Atikāya, huge as a mountain, who stood mounted in his chariot, bow in hand, roaring like a black storm cloud.

10. Observing that gigantic warrior, Rāghava was astonished. After reassuring the monkeys, he said to Vibhīṣaṇa:

11. "Who is that mountainous warrior—armed with a bow and with the gaze of a lion—mounted in that huge chariot yoked to a thousand horses?

12. "Surrounded with his sharp lances and his formidable and glittering darts and iron cudgels, he resembles Maheśvara surrounded by his malignant spirits.

13. "Surrounded with his glittering chariot-javelins, which resemble the tongues of Kāla, he looks like a storm cloud surrounded by streaks of lightning.

14. "His well-strung bows with their golden facing illuminate his splendid chariot on every side, as does the rainbow, Śakra's bow, the heavens.

15. "Who is this tiger among rākṣasas, the foremost among chariot-warriors, who approaches on a chariot as radiant as the sun, illuminating the battlefield?

16. "Illuminating the ten directions with arrows that have the brilliance of the sun's rays and, with the emblem of Rāhu, demon of the eclipse, waving from his flagstaff, he looks resplendent.

17. "And his thrice-curved bow with golden facing, ornamented and reverberating like a thundercloud, is as resplendent as the rainbow, the bow of Indra of the hundred sacrifices.

18. "His great chariot is furnished with flags and banners and has a fine frame. It is manned by four grooms and rumbles with the thunder of a storm cloud.

19. "There are thirty-eight quivers mounted on his chariot, along with fearsome bows, their bowstrings yellow with gold.

20. "And in his chariot there are two swords, one on each side. Clearly visible, their blades are fifteen feet in length and their hilts, six. They beautify both sides.

21. "With a red garland hung about his neck and his huge mouth like that of Kāla, that dark warrior, steadfast and huge as a great mountain, looks like the sun rising above a storm cloud.

22. "His arms girded with golden armlets, he is as resplendent as Himalaya, greatest of mountains, with its tall twin peaks.

23. "With its two earrings, that radiant face of his resembles the orb of the full moon passing between the twin stars of the constellation Punarvasu.

24. "Tell me, great-armed hero, about that outstanding rākṣasa at the sight of whom all the monkeys have fled in all directions, overcome with fear."

25. When immensely powerful Vibhīṣaṇa had been questioned in this fashion by Prince Rāma Rāghava of immeasurable power, he said to him:

26. "The immensely powerful and enormously energetic king, ten-necked Rāvaṇa of fearsome deeds, is the younger brother of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa and is the overlord of the rākṣasas.

27. "He had a mighty son, the equal in battle of Rāvaṇa himself, respectful of his elders, deeply learned, and foremost of those who know all the divine weapon-spells.

28. "He is highly regarded for his skill on horseback, chariot, and elephant, with the sword, the bow, and the noose, in the arts of sowing dissension, conciliation, and bribery, as well as in statecraft and counsel.

29. "He is known as Atikāya, Dhānyamālinī's son. Relying on his arm, Laṅkā remains secure.

30. "His mind focused, he propitiated Brahmā by means of his austerities. Thus he acquired divine weapon-spells and conquered his enemies.

31. "And self-existent Brahmā granted him that suit of armor and that chariot, radiant as the sun, as well as invulnerability to the gods and asuras.

32. "He has defeated hundreds of gods and dānavas, protected the rākṣasas, and slaughtered the yakṣas.

33–34. "For he is Atikāya, the wise and mighty son of Rāvaṇa. He is a bull among rākṣasas and the crusher of the pride of the gods and dānavas. With his arrows he stopped wise Indra's vajra in its course and repelled in battle the noose of Varuṇa, monarch of the waters.

35. "Therefore, bull among men, you must quickly exert yourself against him before he annihilates the monkey troops with his arrows."

36. Then mighty Atikāya, plunging into the hosts of tawny monkeys, twanged his bow and roared again and again.

37. Seeing that foremost of chariot-warriors, fearsome to behold, mounted on his chariot, the great and preeminent leaping monkeys hurled themselves upon him.

38. Armed with trees and mountain peaks, Kumuda, Dvivida, Mainda, Nīla, and Śarabha, acting as one, hurled themselves upon him.

39. But immensely powerful Atikāya, foremost among those skilled in the use of divine weapon-spells, cut their trees and rocks to pieces with his gold-ornamented arrows.

40. Then that mighty night-roaming rākṣasa with his fearsome body, facing those tawny monkeys, pierced them all in battle with arrows made of solid iron.

41. Wounded by that hail of arrows, pierced in every limb, the leaping monkeys were unable to fight back against Atikāya in that great battle.

42. The rākṣasa terrified the army of heroic tawny monkeys, just as a raging lion in the full flush of youth might a herd of deer.

43. But there in the midst of the army of tawny monkeys, that rākṣasa lord would not strike any that did not resist. Then, armed with bow and quiver, he approached Rāma and arrogantly spoke these words:

44. "Here I stand, mounted in my chariot, bow and arrow in hand; but I will not fight any ordinary foe. Let whomever has the ability coupled with resolve quickly give me battle here and now."

45. Now Saumitri, slayer of his foes, overheard those words of Atikāya as he was speaking. He could not abide them, and he flew into a rage. Leaping up, he seized his bow with a contemptuous smile.

46. Leaping up in a rage, Saumitri drew an arrow from his quiver and bent his great bow right in front of Atikāya.

47. The fearsome sound of Lakṣmaṇa's bowstring could be heard, filling the earth, the mountains, the sky, and the ocean and terrifying the night-roaming rākṣasas.

48. Upon hearing the terrifying sound of Saumitri's bow, the mighty and immensely powerful son of the rākṣasa lord was astonished.

49. Seeing that Lakṣmaṇa had leapt up, Atikāya, enraged, took up a sharp arrow and spoke these words:

50. "You are a mere child, Saumitri, unskilled in deeds of valor. Get out of my way! Do you really want to provoke me to fight, I who am like Kāla himself?

51. "Not even Himalaya, the sky, or the earth itself is able to withstand the force of the divinely charged weapons released by my arm.

52. "Would you want to stir up the fire at the end of a cosmic age when it is sleeping peacefully? Put down your bow and go back. Don't sacrifice your life by confronting me.

53. "Or if you are obstinate and do not wish to go back, then stay, and, losing your life, you shall go to the abode of Yama.

54. "Just look at these sharp arrows of mine, adorned with burnished gold. Resembling the weapon of Lord Śiva, they crush the pride of my enemies.

55. "This arrow, resembling a serpent, will drink your blood, just as a raging lion, king of beasts, would the blood of a king among elephants."

56. When Prince Lakṣmaṇa had heard those angry and arrogant words of Atikāya in the midst of the battle, the exceedingly powerful and enormously majestic hero spoke these highly sensible words:

57. "You cannot attain excellence by mere words; nor are true heroes produced by boasting. As long as I am standing here, armed with a bow, arrow in hand, you should demonstrate your prowess, evil-minded wretch!

58. "Show what you are made of through your deeds. You oughtn't boast. Only he who is truly endowed with manly valor is accounted a hero.

59. "You are armed with a bow, mounted in a chariot, and equipped with every kind of weapon. So demonstrate your prowess with arrows or divinely charged weapons.

60. "Then, with my sharp arrows, I shall cause your head to fall, just as the wind does a ripened palmyra fruit from its stalk.

61. "This very day my arrows, adorned with burnished gold, will drink the blood spurting from the gaping holes made in your body by my arrowheads.

62. "You should not underestimate me, thinking, 'He is only a child.' Whether I be young or old, you must know me to be your death in battle."

63. When Atikāya had heard those words of Lakṣmaṇa, reasonable and supremely sensible though they were, he was enraged and took up a splendid arrow.

64. Then vidyādharas, spirits of the departed, gods, daityas, great seers, and the great guhyakas watched that fight.

65. In a rage, Atikāya fitted an arrow to his bow and shot it at Lakṣmaṇa, shrinking, as it were, the space between them.

66. But as that sharp arrow, like a venomous serpent, hurtled toward him, Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, cut it to pieces with a half-moon-headed arrow.

67. When he saw his arrow cut to pieces, like a serpent whose coils have been slashed, Atikāya was beside himself with rage. He took up five more arrows.

68. Then that night-roaming rākṣasa shot those arrows at Lakṣmaṇa. But, before they could reach him, Bharata's younger brother cut them to pieces with his own sharp arrows.

69. Once he had cut them to pieces with his sharp arrows, Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, took up another sharp arrow that seemed to blaze with energy.

70. Taking it up, Lakṣmaṇa fitted it to his splendid bow. Then, drawing the bow, he released the arrow with tremendous force.

71. And that mighty man struck that foremost of rākṣasas in the forehead with that straight arrow that had been drawn to the full.

72. Buried in the forehead of that fearsome rākṣasa, the arrow, smeared with blood, resembled a serpent lord in battle.

73. Rocked by Lakṣmaṇa's arrow, the rākṣasa was shaken, just as was the fearsome gateway of Tripura when it was struck by Rudra's arrow.

74. Regaining his composure and reflecting, the immensely powerful rākṣasa thought, "Well done! The impact of your arrow proves you to be a praiseworthy opponent for me."

75. Reflecting in this fashion, he lowered his face and both his arms. He advanced in his chariot, settling into its seat.

76. That bull among rākṣasas took up one, three, five, or seven arrows at a time, nocked them, and then drew and released them.

77. Loosed from the bow of the rākṣasa lord, those arrows, which were like Kāla himself and, with their golden fletching, were as radiant as the sun, seemed to light up the heavens.

78. But, not the least bit perturbed, Rāghava's younger brother cut those torrents of arrows loosed by the rākṣasa to pieces with many sharp arrows of his own.

79. When Rāvaṇa's son, the enemy of the thirty gods, saw his arrows cut to pieces in battle, he was enraged and seized yet another sharp arrow.

80. The immensely powerful warrior nocked that arrow and released it with tremendous force. It then struck Saumitri in the center of his chest as he advanced.

81. Wounded in the chest by Atikāya in battle, Saumitri gushed forth great gouts of blood as does a rutting elephant rut fluid.

82. But then that mighty man swiftly removed that dart from his body. Then, taking up a sharp arrow and invoking a divine weapon-spell, he nocked it.

83. He charged that arrow with the divine weapon-spell of Agni. The arrow of that great warrior then blazed brightly, as did his bow.

84. The immensely powerful Atikāya, in turn, invoked the divine weapon-spell of Sūrya, and, with it, he charged a gold-fletched arrow that resembled a serpent.

85. Meanwhile, Lakṣmaṇa loosed at Atikāya the fearsome and blazing arrow that he had fitted to his bow, just as Kāla, the ender of all things, might his staff of doom.

86. When he saw that arrow charged with the divine weapon-spell of Agni, the night-roaming rākṣasa released his blazing arrow, charged with the divine weapon-spell of Sūrya.

87. Like angry serpents, the two arrows struck each other as they flew through the sky, their tips blazing with energy.

88. Consuming each other, they fell to the ground. Reduced to ashes, their flames extinguished, those two splendid arrows blazed no more.

89. Then Atikāya, in a towering rage, released the divinely charged aiṣīka missile. But mighty Saumitri cut that divinely charged missile to pieces with the divinely charged missile of Indra.

90. Seeing that the divinely charged aiṣīka missile had been destroyed, the prince, son of Rāvaṇa, in a towering rage, charged an arrow with the divine weapon-spell of Yama.

91. Then the night-roaming rākṣasa shot that divinely charged missile at Lakṣmaṇa. But Lakṣmaṇa knocked it down with the divinely charged missile of Vāyu.

92. Then, in a towering rage, Lakṣmaṇa showered the son of Rāvaṇa with volleys of arrows, as might a storm cloud with torrents of rain.

93. As those arrows struck Atikāya, their arrowheads shattered against his diamond-studded armor, and they fell with tremendous force to the ground.

94. Perceiving that they had been ineffectual, glorious Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, showered him with a thousand arrows.

95. Although he was pelted with torrents of arrows, the mighty rākṣasa Atikāya, with his impenetrable armor, was not the least bit discomfited in that battle.

96. Indeed, that foremost of men was unable to wound him in battle. But then Vāyu approached him and said:

97. "Granted a boon from Brahmā, this rākṣasa is encased in impenetrable armor. You must pierce him with the divinely charged missile of Brahmā; for there is no other way that he can be killed."

98. Then, upon hearing the words of Vāyu, Saumitri, who equaled Indra in valor, took up an arrow of irresistible force and swiftly charged it with the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā.

99. As that splendid, sharp-tipped arrow was being charged by Saumitri with that supreme, divine weapon-spell, all the directions, as well as the moon, the sun, the great planets, and the heavens, shook with fear, and the earth groaned.

100. Once he had charged that beautifully fletched arrow, which resembled the messenger of Yama, with the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā, Saumitri fitted it to his bow. Then, in that battle, he shot that arrow, which was like Indra's vajra, at the son of Indra's foe.

101. Atikāya saw it hurtling toward him, loosed by Lakṣmaṇa in battle. Its force was irresistible, and, with its fletching bright with gold and splendid diamonds, it shone like fire.

102. Sighting it, Atikāya struck it violently with many sharp arrows. But that arrow, swift as Suparṇa, continued to hurtle toward him with tremendous speed.

103. Watching that arrow, which was like fiercely blazing Kāla, the ender of all things, Atikāya never slackened his efforts but continued to strike at it with javelins, broadswords, maces, hatchets, lances, and ploughshares.

104. But that arrow, blazing with fire, was impervious to those wondrously formed weapons, and it violently struck off Atikāya's head, crowned with its diadem.

105. Battered by Lakṣmaṇa's arrow, his head, along with its headdress, fell violently to the ground, as might the summit of Himalaya.

106. Now that their unassailable enemy of fearsome strength had been slain, the multitude of monkeys, filled with joy, their faces like blooming lotuses, honored Lakṣmaṇa, who had accomplished their cherished goal.

The end of the fifty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 60

1. Then the hosts of rākṣasas who had survived the slaughter immediately reported to Rāvaṇa that those bulls among rākṣasas, Triśiras, Atikāya, Devāntaka, and the rest, had been slain.

2. When the king heard in this sudden fashion that they had been slain, he was stunned and his eyes filled with tears. Reflecting upon the destruction of his sons and the horrific slaughter of his brothers, the king began to brood deeply.

3. Now, when that bull-like warrior Indrajit, son of the rākṣasa king, saw that the king was despondent and floundering in a sea of grief, he said these words:

4. "Father, lord of the rākṣasas, you must not give way to despondency so long as Indrajit remains alive. For no one who is struck in battle by the arrows of Indra's foe can escape with his life.

5. "This very day you will surely see Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa lying lifeless on the ground, his body pierced and dismembered by my arrows, his every limb bristling with sharp shafts.

6. "Now hear the vow of Śakra's foe, which is well founded and infused with both human and divine power: 'Today, with my unfailing arrows, I shall consume Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa.'

7. "This very day Indra, Vaivasvata, Viṣṇu, Mitra, the sādhyas, the Aśvins, Agni Vaiśvānara, Candra, and Sūrya shall witness my immeasurable valor, which is like the fearsome valor of Viṣṇu in Bali's sacrificial enclosure."

8. When he had spoken in this fashion, Indrajit, the enemy of the lord of the thirty gods, took his leave of the king and, in high spirits, mounted a chariot as swift as the wind. It was yoked to splendid donkeys and equipped with the implements of war.

9. Mounted in that chariot, the equal of the chariot of Indra himself, that immensely powerful tamer of his foes drove swiftly to where the battle raged.

10. As great Indrajit set forth, many immensely powerful warriors followed him in great delight, their splendid bows in hand.

11. Some were mounted on elephant-back, while others rode splendid chargers. They were armed with darts, war hammers, swords, battle-axes, and maces.

12. Praised by the night-roaming rākṣasas, the foe of the lord of the thirty gods went forth to the fearsome blaring of conches and the thunderous sound of bherī drums.

13. With his parasol of the hue of conch shell or the hare-marked moon, that crusher of his enemies was as resplendent as the sky illuminated by the full moon.

14. That hero, foremost of all bowmen, was fanned with the most splendid, golden yak-tail fly whisks, all adorned with gold.

15. Then, illuminated by Indrajit, who was unmatched in valor and equal in blazing splendor to the sun, the city of Laṅkā was as resplendent as the heavens illuminated by the radiant sun.

16. When Rāvaṇa, the majestic overlord of the rākṣasas, saw his son marching forth surrounded by a vast host, he said to him:

17. "You are a peerless warrior, my son. You have conquered even Vāsava in battle. How then would you not more easily slay Rāghava, a vulnerable mortal."

18. Addressed in this fashion by the rākṣasa lord and having received his fulsome blessings, the hero proceeded swiftly to the shrine of Nikumbhilā in his horse-drawn chariot.

19. Upon reaching the battleground, that immensely powerful tamer of his foes stationed the rākṣasas all around his chariot.

20. Then, to the accompaniment of sacred mantras and in accordance with the ritual prescriptions, the foremost of rākṣasas, whose splendor was like that of Agni, eater of oblations, offered oblations to Agni, eater of oblations.

21. The valorous rākṣasa lord offered oblations to Agni, the purifier, along with ritual offerings of parched grain accompanied by flowers and sandalwood paste.

22. Weapons served as the śarapatra grass, myrobalan wood was the kindling. His garments were red and his ladle was of black iron.

23. Having strewn the fire altar there with weapons, including iron cudgels, in place of śarapatra grass, he seized the throat of a live, pure black goat.

24. Once kindled, the smokeless fire with its huge flames displayed signs that betokened victory.

25. Glowing like burnished gold, his flames swirling in an auspicious clockwise direction, Agni, the purifier, himself rose up and received that oblation.

26. Foremost among those familiar with divine weapon-spells, Indrajit invoked the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā. And there with that spell, he infused his bow, his chariot, and all of his weaponry.

27. And as that divine weapon-spell was being invoked and Agni, the purifier, was being gratified with oblations, the heavens shook along with the sun, the planets, the moon, and the constellations.

28. Once Indrajit, whose blazing energy was like that of Agni, the purifier, and whose power was equal to that of great Indra, had made oblation to Agni, the purifier, he vanished into thin air along with his bow, arrows, sword, chariot, horses, and charioteer, his form no longer perceptible.

29. Emerging from his own army, Indrajit swiftly plunged in among the monkey ranks, and there, in that great battle, invisible, he rained down a fearsome torrent of arrows, just as a black storm cloud does torrents of rain.

30. Baffled by his magical illusion, their bodies rent by the arrows of Śakra's conqueror, the tawny monkeys, huge as mountains, fell in battle uttering discordant cries, like lordly mountains smashed down by Indra's vajra.

31. All they could see in the battle were the sharp-tipped arrows raining on the monkey troops. For they could not see the rākṣasa, the foe of the lord of the gods, concealed as he was by magical illusion.

32. Then the great rākṣasa lord filled all the directions with volleys of arrows as radiant as the sun, further disheartening the monkey lords.

33. Brandishing lances, swords, and battle-axes, which were like shining fires and emitted blazing flames along with sparks, he fiercely rained them down upon the army of the lord of the leaping monkeys.

34. Then, struck by the sharp arrows—blazing like fire—of the conqueror of Śakra, the leaders of the monkey troops resembled red-blossoming kiṃśuka trees.

35. Pierced by the divinely charged weapons of the rākṣasa lord, those bulls among monkeys fell, crawling over one another and uttering discordant cries.

36. Some of them, peering into the sky, were struck in the eyes with arrows so that they fell to the ground and clung to one another.

37–40. Then, with darts, lances, and sharp arrows charged with mantras, Indrajit, foremost of rākṣasas, pierced all those tigers among the monkeys: Hanumān, Sugrīva, Aṅgada, Gandhamādana, Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, Vegadarśin, Mainda, Dvivida, Nīla, Gavākṣa, Gaja, Gomukha, Kesari, Hariloman, the monkey Vidyuddaṃṣṭra, Sūryānana, Jyotimukha, the tawny monkey Dadhimukha, Pāvakākṣa, Nala, and the monkey Kumuda.

41. Then, once he had torn apart the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys with maces and with arrows fletched with burnished gold, he pelted Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with massive torrents of arrows that shone like the rays of the sun.

42. Pelted by those showers of arrows, Rāma regarded them no more seriously than showers of rain. Supremely wondrous in his majesty, he turned his gaze to Lakṣmaṇa and said this:

43. "Here is that rākṣasa lord again, Lakṣmaṇa, the enemy of the lord of the gods. Relying upon the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā, he has laid low the fierce army of tawny monkeys and is now constantly harassing us with arrows.

44. "The great warrior, having been granted a boon by self-existent Brahmā, is hovering in the sky, his fearsome body hidden. How is it possible to kill Indrajit in battle today, when he is invisible and is wielding his divinely charged weapon?

45. "I know that the self-existent lord Brahmā, who is the creator of all things, is inconceivable. And this divine weapon-spell belongs to him. Therefore, wise Lakṣmaṇa, with a calm mind you must endure with me the blows of these arrows here and now.

46. "The rākṣasa lord is filling all directions with massive torrents of arrows. And the whole army of the monkey king, its foremost heroes fallen, presents a sorry sight.

47. "Once he sees that we have fallen unconscious and have ceased to fight or show signs either of anger or excitement, he will surely return to Laṅkā, the abode of the foes of the immortal gods, having achieved the greatest glory in battle."

48. At that point, the two brothers were cut down on the spot by the mass of Indrajit's divinely charged weapons. Having laid them low there, the rākṣasa lord roared with delight in battle.

49. Having thus laid low in battle the army of the monkey king, as well as Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, he swiftly reentered the city of Laṅkā, which lay under the protection of the arms of ten-necked Rāvaṇa.

The end of the sixtieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 61

1. Then, when the two heroes, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, had been struck down in the forefront of battle, the army of the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys was stunned. Even Sugrīva, Nīla, Aṅgada, and Jāmbavān could do nothing.

2. But then Vibhīṣaṇa, foremost among the wise, seeing that the army was despondent, addressed the king of the tree-dwelling monkeys and his heroic warriors, comforting them with inimitable words:

3. "Have no fear! Just because the two sons of the king are lying helpless, this is no time for despondency. For, in being struck down by the mass of Indrajit's divinely charged weapons, they are merely observing the command of self-existent Brahmā.

4. "Brahmā's supreme divine weapon-spell of unfailing force was given to Indrajit by the self-existent one himself. If, in order to show their reverence for it, the king's two sons have fallen down, why is that an occasion for despondency?"

5. When wise Hanumān Māruti, who had already once shown his reverence to Brahmā's divine weapon-spell, heard those words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he said this to him:

6. "Let us comfort any of those in the decimated army of the swift monkeys who may still be alive."

7. Then, torches in hand, those two heroes, Hanumān and that foremost of the rākṣasas Vibhīṣaṇa, together roamed the battlefront during that night.

8–9. They saw the ground heaped up on every side with shining weapons that had been dropped and with fallen monkeys, huge as mountains, oozing blood from their limbs and dribbling urine, their tails, hands, thighs, feet, fingers, and necks severed.

10–11. And there Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān saw that Sugrīva, Aṅgada, Nīla, Śarabha, Gandhamādana, Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, Vegadarśin, Āhuka, Mainda, Nala, Jyotimukha, Dvivida, and Panasa had been struck down in battle.

12. For, within the fifth part of a day, Indrajit, self-existent Brahmā's favorite, had struck down six hundred and seventy million swift monkeys.

13. Seeing that that fearsome host, which was like the vast flood of the ocean, had been decimated by arrows, Hanumān and Vibhīṣaṇa sought out Jāmbavān.

14–15. Observing the wise and heroic son of Prajāpati, who, riddled with hundreds of arrows and showing the signs of advanced age, resembled a dying flame, Vibhīṣaṇa Paulastya approached him and spoke these words: "I trust, noble sir, that you have not been mortally wounded by these sharp arrows."

16. Upon hearing the words of Vibhīṣaṇa, Jāmbavān, bull among apes, uttered this speech, articulating the words only with great difficulty:

17. "Mighty hero, lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, wounded as I am by these sharp arrows, I cannot see you, but I recognize you by your voice.

18. "O rākṣasa, son of chaos, does the foremost of the monkeys Hanumān, in whom Añjanā and Vāyu Mātariśvan have an excellent son, still live?"

19. When Vibhīṣaṇa heard these words of Jāmbavān, he said this: "Why do you ignore the king's sons Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and ask only about Māruti?

20. "Noble sir, you have not shown the same extraordinary concern for King Sugrīva, Aṅgada, or even Rāghava himself as you have for the son of Vāyu."

21. Upon hearing the words of Vibhīṣaṇa, Jāmbavān spoke these words: "Now hear, tiger among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, why I inquired only about Māruti.

22. "So long as Hanumān is alive, then our army will survive, even if it should be massacred. But if that hero has lost his life, then, even though we survive, we are as good as dead.

23. "For, dear boy, if Māruti, the equal of Māruta and the rival in power of Agni Vaiśvānara, still lives, only then do we have any hope of survival."

24. Then Hanumān, son of Māruta, approached wise Jāmbavān. Devotedly clasping his feet, he respectfully greeted him.

25. Although his every organ was in agony, when Jāmbavān, bull among apes, heard Hanumān's words, he felt as if he had been born again.

26. Then the immensely powerful Jāmbavān said to Hanumān, "Come, tiger among the tawny monkeys, you must save the monkeys.

27. "For no one else possesses valor equal to the task. You are the monkeys' greatest friend. Now is the moment for you to show your prowess; for I can see no one else who can accomplish this.

28. "You must heal the arrow wounds of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who have been struck down, and thus restore the spirits of the hosts of heroic apes and monkey.

29. "Taking the highest path, far above the ocean, you must go, Hanumān, to Himalaya, greatest of mountains.

30. "Then, slayer of your foes, you will see the great and forbidding Mount Ṛṣabha, all made of gold, and the peak of Mount Kailāsa.

31. "Between those two peaks, hero, you will see the mountain of healing herbs, which, covered with every sort of healing herb, glows with unequaled radiance.

32–33. "And growing on its peak, tiger among monkeys, you will find four healing herbs, glowing so as to illuminate the ten directions. They are mṛtasaṃjīvaṇī, 'the restorer of life to the dead,' viśalyakaraṇī, 'the healer of arrow wounds,' sauvarṇakaraṇī, 'the restorer of a golden glow,' and the great healing herb saṃdhānī, 'the joiner of limbs.'

34. "You must gather them all, Hanumān, and swiftly return. For you must restore the tawny monkeys to life and rally them, son of Vāyu, bearer of scents."

35. When Hanumān, bull among tawny monkeys, had heard those words of Jāmbavān, he was filled with a great upsurge of strength, as is the ocean with its mighty currents.

36. Perching on the top of the mountain slope and crushing that foremost of mountains, the hero Hanumān looked like a second mountain himself.

37. Then, crumbling under the feet of that tawny monkey, the mountain caved in. For, crushed so severely, it was unable to bear its own weight.

38. The tremendous force of that tawny monkey caused the mountain's trees to fall to the ground and burst into flame. And as it was being crushed by Hanumān, its peaks shattered.

39. As that great mountain, its trees and rock faces smashed, was being crushed, it shook so that the monkeys could not keep their footing.

40. With her great gateways shaking and the gates of her buildings crumbling, Laṅkā, overcome with panic in the night, seemed almost to be dancing.

41. Crushing that mountain, the mountainous Hanumān, son of Māruta, made the earth together with the ocean tremble.

42. As he crushed the mountain with his feet, he opened his mouth, which was as fearsome as the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea, and he roared loudly, terrifying the rākṣasas.

43. When they heard that extraordinary roar of fiercely roaring Hanumān, all the rākṣasas in Laṅkā were paralyzed with fear.

44. Then, after first offering obeisance to Rāma, Māruti, that scorcher of his foes, so fearsome in his valor, turned his thoughts to that vital mission on behalf of Rāghava.

45. Extending his tail, which resembled a serpent, crouching down, laying back his ears, and opening his mouth, which was like the gaping mare's head fire that lies beneath the sea, Hanumān leapt into the sky with terrifying force.

46. With his great speed he carried along with him stands of trees, mountains, boulders, and lesser monkeys. Drawn upward and swept along by the force of his arms and thighs, they fell into the ocean as their speed slackened.

47. Stretching out his arms, which resembled the coils of serpents, the son of Vāyu, his power like that of Garuḍa, foe of serpents, headed toward Mount Meru, the prominent king of the mountains, drawing, so it seemed, the directions in his wake.

48. Then, as he flew swiftly along, like the discus loosed by Viṣṇu's fingers, he looked down upon the ocean with its roiling garland of waves and all its creatures tossed violently about.

49. Observing mountains, forests, lakes, rivers, ponds, splendid cities, and prosperous lands, Hanumān, whose swiftness equaled that of his father, flew swiftly onward.

50. Reaching the path of the sun, he flew on tirelessly. Then that foremost of tawny monkeys spied Himalaya, greatest of mountains.

51. It had various kinds of waterfalls and many caves and rushing streams. It was endowed with beautiful peaks that resembled white clouds.

52. As he approached that great lord of the mountains, with its huge, splendid, and formidable peaks, he spied vast and holy ashrams frequented by the hosts of the foremost gods and seers.

53. He saw the abode of Brahmā, the abode of Hiraṇyagarbha in his silver-naveled form, the abode of Śakra, the place where Rudra loosed his arrows, the abode of Hayānana the horse-faced god, and the luminous place where Brahmā's head fell. And he saw the servants of Vaivasvata.

54. He saw the place where the vajra was presented as well as the abode of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa. He also saw the abode of the sun—resplendent as the sun itself—the throne of Brahmā, the place of Śaṅkara's bow, and the very navel of the earth.

55. Then he saw the prominent Mount Kailāsa, the rock face of the Himalayas, and the prominent golden mountain Ṛṣabha. And, at last, he spied the lordly mountain of all herbs, which was illuminated by all its glowing herbs of healing.

56. When Hanumān, son of Vāsava's messenger, the wind god, saw that lordly mountain of healing herbs, glowing as if with flames of fire, he was astonished. Alighting on it, he began to search there for the healing herbs.

57. The great monkey, son of Māruta, roamed that mountain bearing divine herbs of healing for thousands of leagues.

58. However, recognizing the purpose for which he had come, all the powerful healing herbs on that foremost of mountains made themselves invisible.

59. Unable to find them, great Hanumān was furious and bellowed loudly in his rage. Losing patience, his eyes blazing like fire, he said these words to that lordly mountain:

60. "What is this that you have thus resolved upon, in your lack of compassion toward Rāghava? This very day, lord of mountains, overwhelmed by the strength of my arms, you shall see yourself smashed to pieces."

61. Then, forcibly seizing hold of its peak, filled with thousands of minerals, together with its trees, elephants, and gold, he violently tore it off so that its summit crumbled and the tops of its slopes began to slide.

62. Tearing it off, that hero, whose fearsome power was like that of Garuḍa, flew up into the sky, terrifying the worlds, together with the gods and the lords of the gods. Then, praised by innumerable creatures of the air, he proceeded swiftly on his way.

63. Grasping that peak, which shone like the sun, he followed the sun's path. Then, when he whose radiance was like that of the sun drew near the sun, he appeared to be a rival sun.

64. Holding that mountain, the mountainous son of Vāyu, bearer of scents, shone as brightly in the sky as Viṣṇu holding aloft his flaming, thousand-bladed discus.

65. Then, when the monkeys caught sight of him, they roared, and he, too, spotting them, roared back in delight. But when the rākṣasas in Laṅkā heard their resounding cries, they roared more fearsomely still.

66. Then great Hanumān alighted on splendid Mount Trikūṭa in the midst of the monkey army. After bowing his head in respectful salutation to the foremost among the tawny monkeys, he embraced Vibhīṣaṇa there.

67. No sooner had the two human princes smelled the fragrance of those powerful healing herbs than they were freed on the spot from their arrow wounds. The others, too, the heroic tawny monkeys, stood up as well.

68. Then that immensely powerful tawny monkey, the son of Vāyu, bearer of scents, swiftly took the mountain of healing herbs back to the Himalayas and then rejoined Rāma.

The end of the sixty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 62

1. Then Sugrīva, the immensely powerful overlord of the monkeys, spoke sensibly, instructing mighty Hanumān as to what should be done next:

2. "Since Kumbhakarṇa has been slain and the rākṣasa princes slaughtered, Rāvaṇa will now no longer be able to launch a sortie against us.

3. "Bulls among leaping monkeys! Those leaping monkeys who are powerful and agile are to take torches and leap into Laṅkā at once."

4. Then, when the sun had set and the dread onset of night had come, the leaping monkeys marched toward Laṅkā, holding torches.

5. Overrun on every side by swarms of tawny monkeys holding torches, the sentries at the gates, with their hideous eyes, abruptly fled.

6. In a frenzy, the monkeys unleashed fire, the eater of oblations, on gateways, towers, highways, various streets, and mansions.

7. And the fire, eater of oblations, consumed thousands of houses and the residences of all the rākṣasas, including those who performed the household rites.

8–11. Fire, the purifier of all things, consumed thousands of the houses of the residents of Laṅkā. Some of those residents wore armor, beautified with gold, while others wore garlands of flowers and costly garments. Some, their eyes rolling from drinking rum, staggered in their intoxication. The garments of some were clutched at by their lovers. Some held maces, lances, or swords in their hands, as they raged at the enemy, while others went on eating and drinking. Some were asleep with their beloveds in costly beds, while others, terrified, grabbed their sons and fled swiftly in all directions. As the fire burned their homes, it flared up again and again.

12–14. And the fire consumed mansions that looked like mountains. They were firmly built and costly, beautiful with their grand upper stories. They were shaped like full- and half-moons made of gold, soaring aloft with their penthouses. Their round windows were adorned with jewels. They were richly furnished throughout.

Adorned with gems and coral, they seemed almost to touch the sun, bringer of light, and they echoed with the cries of krauñcas and peacocks, the strains of lutes, and the tinkling of ornaments.

15. Wreathed in flames, their gates looked like masses of clouds encircled with lightning at summer's end.

16. As they were being burned alive, the exquisite women, who had been sleeping in their lofty mansions, cast off all their ornaments and loudly shrieked, "Ah! Ah!"

17. The dwellings there, engulfed in fire, collapsed, like the peaks of a huge mountain smashed by the vajra of Indra, the vajra wielder.

18. As those mansions burned, they looked from afar like the peaks of the Himalayas with their thickets of glowing herbs.

19. With the rooftops of its mansions burning and brightly illuminated with flames, Laṅkā looked that night as if it were filled with red-blossoming kiṃśuka trees.

20. With its elephants and horses turned loose by their keepers, Laṅkā resembled the ocean with its huge creatures thrashing about at the end of a cosmic age.

21. Whenever a terrified elephant would encounter a horse roaming free, it would run away, and when a terrified horse would encounter a terrified elephant, it, too, would shy away.

22. Set ablaze by the tawny monkeys, the city in an instant came to resemble the blazing earth, bearer of wealth, at the dreadful destruction of the world.

23. The cries of the womenfolk, who shrieked loudly as they were enveloped in smoke and scorched by the flames, could be heard for a distance of ten leagues.

24. Meanwhile, the tawny monkeys, eager for battle, violently pounced upon any of the rākṣasas who rushed forth, their bodies ablaze.

25. The shouts of the monkeys and the wailing of the rākṣasas made the ten directions, the ocean, and the earth itself resound.

26. Then the great warriors, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, now healed of their arrow wounds, calmly took up their splendid bows.

27. Twanging his splendid bow, Rāma produced a thunderous sound that sowed terror among the rākṣasas.

28. As he twanged his great bow, Rāma looked as splendid as Lord Bhava, when, in his rage, he twangs his bow that consists of the vedas.

29. Those three sounds—the clamor of the monkeys' shouts, the wailing of the rākṣasas, and the twanging of Rāma's bowstring—filled the ten directions.

30. Shattered by the arrows loosed from Rāma's bow, the citadel's gateway, which was like the peak of Mount Kailāsa, crashed to the ground.

31. Then, when the rākṣasa lords saw Rāma's arrows in their houses and mansions, they began frantic preparations for war.

32. And as the rākṣasa lords, roaring like lions, girded themselves for battle, the night took on the aspect of the dark night of universal destruction.

33–34. Then great Sugrīva commanded the monkey lords as follows: "Creeping near, you must assault the gate and give battle, bulls among leaping monkeys. And if any one of you, no matter where he may be posted, should disobey, he is to be pounced upon and slain as a violator of the king's command."

35. When the monkey leaders, their hands illuminated by their flaming torches, had approached the gate and taken up their positions there, rage seized hold of Rāvaṇa.

36. The violent force of the expansion of his body threw the ten directions into confusion, for he looked like an incarnation of the wrath that fills the body of Rudra.

37. In a rage, he sent forth Nikumbha and Kumbha, the two sons of Kumbhakarṇa, accompanied by many rākṣasas.

38. Roaring like a lion, the lord of the rākṣasas commanded all of those rākṣasas, "Rākṣasas! Depart at once."

39. Then, at his command, the heroic rākṣasas, roaring again and again, marched forth from Laṅkā, their weapons glittering.

40–41. With its terrifying horses, chariots, and elephants, and crowded with various types of foot soldiers, the fearsome rākṣasa army emerged into view, its lances, maces, swords, darts, iron cudgels, and bows glittering. Its valor and prowess were terrifying. Its darts were flashing and it resounded with hundreds of little bells.

42–44. The soldiers, their arms covered with golden ornaments, swung their battle-axes about and whirled their mighty weapons. They had fixed their arrows to their bows. They perfumed the strong breeze with their fragrances, floral wreaths, and the honey-wine of their stirrup-cups. Filled with mighty warriors and rumbling like a great storm cloud, the army was truly fearsome. Seeing that truly terrifying army of the rākṣasas approaching, the army of leaping monkeys leapt forward, roaring loudly.

45. Springing swiftly forward, the great rākṣasa army hurled itself at the enemy host, as a moth might hurl itself into a flame.

46. With its iron clubs—like bolts of lightning—burnished from the rubbing of their arms, the rākṣasas' magnificent army shone more brightly still.

47. Then some of the fearsome-looking night-roaming rākṣasas began to cut down the monkey heroes on all sides with their sharp swords.

48. The warriors on both sides cursed, bit, struck down, and killed one another.

49. One cried, "Attack!" "He's attacking!" said another, while still a third cried, "I'll attack!" "Did you wound him?" "Stand!" thus did they shout there to one another.

50. With huge darts held on high amid a welter of fists, lances, and swords, the immensely fierce battle between the monkeys and the rākṣasas raged on.

51. The rākṣasas cut down the monkeys ten and seven at a time, while the monkeys slaughtered the rākṣasas in battle ten and seven at a time.

52. Then the monkeys cut off and surrounded the rākṣasa troops, whose hair and drawstrings were flying loose, their armor and weapons lost.

The end of the sixty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 63

1. In the thick of that fearsome slaughter of heroes, Aṅgada, thirsting for battle, encountered the heroic rākṣasa Kampana.

2. After challenging Aṅgada, Kampana, in a rage, swiftly struck first, hitting him with his mace. Struck with such violence, Aṅgada staggered.

3. But, coming to his senses, powerful Aṅgada hurled the peak of a mountain. Kampana then fell to the ground, slain by that blow.

4. Now that their champions were slain, the rākṣasa troops, deeply shaken, ran headlong to Kumbha, Kumbhakarṇa's son. When Kumbha saw them approaching so swiftly, he calmed them.

5. Then, in deep concentration, that foremost of bowmen took up his bow and loosed arrows that looked like venomous snakes and could rend bodies.

6. With the arrows fixed to it, his splendid bow shone more brightly still as if it were a second bow of Indra, illumined by the splendor of lightning and a great rainbow.

7. Then, with a beautifully feathered, gold-fletched arrow that he had drawn back as far as his ear before releasing it, he struck Dvivida.

8. Struck violently by that arrow, that best of leaping monkeys, who resembled a mountain peak, lost his footing and collapsed, dazed and twitching.

9. Seeing his brother wounded in that great battle, Mainda seized a huge boulder and came running at full speed.

10. The immensely powerful Mainda flung that boulder at the rākṣasa. But Kumbha shattered it with five blazing arrows.

11. Then, nocking another arrow, tipped with a splendid arrowhead and resembling a venomous serpent, the immensely powerful rākṣasa struck Dvivida's elder brother in the chest with it.

12. Struck by him in the vitals with such a blow, Mainda, leader of the monkey troops, fell to the ground, stunned.

13. When Aṅgada saw that his two immensely powerful maternal uncles had fallen, he charged swiftly at Kumbha, who stood with bow drawn.

14. As Aṅgada rushed upon him, Kumbha pierced him—first with five iron shafts and then with three more sharp arrows—as one might an elephant with javelins.

15. Mighty Kumbha pierced Aṅgada with various arrows adorned with gold, their tips honed to razor sharpness, their cutting edges keen.

16. Although his body was pierced all over, Vālin's son, Aṅgada, was not shaken. He rained hails of trees and boulders upon Kumbha's head.

17. But Kumbhakarṇa's majestic son cut down all those trees and smashed the boulders—everything that was thrown by Vālin's son.

18. Seeing the leader of monkey troops rushing upon him, Kumbha struck him in the brow with two arrows, as one might an elephant with two flaming brands.

19. Covering his eyes, which were bathed in blood, with one hand, Aṅgada seized a nearby sāla tree with the other.

20–21. But even as he was about to swiftly hurl that tree, which looked like the flagstaff of Indra and was as huge as Mount Mandara, Kumbha cut him down with seven sharp arrows, rending his body, while all the rākṣasas looked on. In great agony, Aṅgada collapsed and lost consciousness.

22. Seeing the unassailable Aṅgada in agony, drowning as it were in the ocean, the foremost among the tawny monkeys reported it to Rāghava.

23. When Rāma heard that Vālin's son had been gravely wounded in the great battle, he sent forth the foremost among tawny monkeys, led by Jāmbavān.

24. As soon as they heard Rāma's orders, those tigers among monkeys hurled themselves in a towering rage upon Kumbha, who stood with bow drawn.

25. In their desire to rescue Aṅgada, those bulls among monkeys raced onward with trees and boulders in their hands, their eyes red with rage.

26. In a rage, Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, and the monkey Vegadarśin rushed toward Kumbhakarṇa's heroic son.

27. But when Kumbha saw those immensely powerful monkey lords rushing toward him, he stopped them in their tracks with a torrent of arrows, as a barrage of trees might stop a rushing stream.

28. For when they ran into that mass of arrows, the great monkey lords could no more get past it than can the ocean, the great reservoir of the waters, its shore.

29–30. But when Sugrīva, lord of the leaping monkeys, saw that the troops of tawny monkeys had been overwhelmed by those hails of arrows, he stepped in front of Aṅgada, his brother's son, and rushed swiftly upon Kumbha in battle, just as a swift lion might upon an elephant roaming the mountain slopes.

31. The immensely powerful Sugrīva tore up huge mountains as well as many aśvakarṇas, dhavas, and various other trees, and let fly with them.

32. But with his sharp arrows, Kumbhakarṇa's majestic son cut down that hail of trees—so difficult to withstand—that covered the sky.

33. Completely riddled with sharp arrows by that fierce and celebrated marksman Kumbha, those trees resembled fearsome hundred-slayers.

34. But the majestic, fearless, and immensely powerful overlord of the monkeys was not in the least disturbed when he saw his hail of trees cut to pieces by Kumbha.

35. Although he was himself grievously wounded, Sugrīva withstood those arrows. Then, snatching away Kumbha's bow, as lustrous as the bow of Indra, he broke it.

36. Then, when Sugrīva had accomplished this all-but-impossible feat, he swiftly bore down upon Kumbha, who now resembled an elephant with broken tusks, and, in a rage, said to him:

37. "Elder brother of Nikumbha, your power and the force of your arrows are truly extraordinary. Your chivalry and your majesty are shared only by Rāvaṇa himself.

38. "Peer of Prahrāda, Bali, Indra the slayer of Vṛtra, Kubera, and Varuṇa, you alone take after your father, though you are mightier still.

39. "The thirty gods can no more get the better of you—a single-handed great-armed tamer of foes, lance in hand—than can worldly cares, one who has vanquished his senses.

40. "Your paternal uncle Rāvaṇa conquered the gods and dānavas through the gift of a boon, while Kumbhakarṇa did so through his own enormous strength.

41. "You are Indrajit's equal in archery and Rāvaṇa's in valor. In strength and prowess you are the foremost among rākṣasas in the world today.

42. "Let all beings witness this day the great and extraordinary clash in battle between you and me, like that between Śakra and Śambara.

43. "You have performed an unparalleled feat and demonstrated your mastery of missiles; for you have felled all these heroes among the tawny monkeys, fearsome in their valor.

44. "It is only out of fear of incurring censure that I have not killed you thus far, hero. For you must be exhausted after performing this feat. Once you are rested, you shall witness my strength."

45. Kumbha had first been flattered, but now, at the contemptuous words of Sugrīva, his blazing energy flared up, like that of a sacrificial fire into which an oblation of melted butter has been poured.

46. Then, leaping up, Kumbha hurled himself upon Sugrīva and, in a rage, struck him on the chest with a fist that had the force of a thunderbolt.

47. His skin was torn open and his blood poured out; for that fist, with its tremendous force, had penetrated to the bone.

48. Then, from that impact, there briefly sprang forth a blazing flame, like the flame that arises on Mount Meru when it is struck by lightning.

49. Although Sugrīva, the immensely powerful bull among monkeys, had been struck there by him, he clenched his fist, as hard as adamant.

50. Then the mighty monkey brought that fist, which, radiant with a thousand rays of light, was as brilliant as the sun's orb, down upon Kumbha's chest.

51. Struck by that fist, the rākṣasa fell swiftly, like the red planet Mars, with its glowing rays, somehow fallen from the heavens.

52. As Kumbha's body fell, its chest caved in by that fist, it looked like the body of Sūrya, lord of cows, when he was vanquished by Rudra.

53. When Kumbha had been slain in battle by that bull among leaping monkeys, so fearsome in his valor, the earth trembled together with its mountains and forests, while tremendous fear filled the rākṣasas.

The end of the sixty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 64

1. When Nikumbha saw that his brother had been struck down by Sugrīva, he glared at the lord of the monkeys, as if to burn him up with his rage.

2–3. That hero then took up a splendid iron club. It was bound with garlands of flowers, stamped with the sign of five fingers, and it was as huge as the peak of a lordly mountain. It was bound with plates of gold and adorned with diamonds and coral. That fearsome dispeller of the rākṣasas' fear was like the staff of Yama.

4. It was like the flagstaff of Śakra. Brandishing it in battle, immensely powerful Nikumbha, fearsome in his valor, opened wide his mouth and roared.

5–6. With his iron club and his ornaments—the golden necklace hanging across his chest, the armlets on his arms, his burnished earrings, and his variegated garland—Nikumbha resembled a storm cloud replete with thunder, lightning, and rainbow.

7. The tip of that huge warrior's iron club could smash the lair of the winds in the sky. It blazed like a roaring, smokeless fire, purifier of all things.

8–9. The whirling of Nikumbha's iron club seemed to set the very sky spinning, along with the heavenly city of Viṭapāvatī with its splendid mansions of the gandharvas, the celestial city of Amarāvatī with all its mansions, and with its constellations, its hosts of stars, the moon, and the great planets.

10. With his iron club and ornaments for his flames and his rage for kindling, the fire that was Nikumbha was as unapproachable as the fire at the end of a cosmic age when it blazes forth.

11. The rākṣasas and the monkeys were frozen with fear. But mighty Hanumān, thrusting out his chest, took a stand before him.

12. Then mighty Nikumbha, whose arms resembled iron clubs, brought that iron club, radiant as the sun, bringer of light, down upon the chest of mighty Hanumān.

13. But that iron club shattered violently into a hundred pieces against his broad and adamantine chest, so that it resembled a hundred flaming meteors in the heavens.

14. And shaken by that iron club, the great monkey staggered under the blow, as would a mountain during an earthquake.

15. Struck by that iron club in this fashion, the immensely powerful Hanumān, foremost among the leaping monkeys, tightly clenched his fist.

16. Raising it, the forceful, immensely powerful, and mighty monkey, whose power was that of Vāyu, drove it forcefully into Nikumbha's chest.

17. His skin was torn open and the blood gushed forth. That fist sparked flames that resembled lightning bursting forth.

18. Nikumbha staggered under that blow, but, recovering, he seized the immensely powerful Hanumān.

19. Seeing immensely powerful Hanumān swept up by Nikumbha, the inhabitants of Laṅkā roared frighteningly in the midst of battle.

20. But even as he was being carried off in this fashion by Kumbhakarṇa's son, the son of Anila struck him with a fist that had the force of a thunderbolt.

21. Then, freeing himself, Hanumān, son of Māruta, leapt to the ground and swiftly began to belabor Nikumbha.

22. Exerting all his strength, he threw Nikumbha down and pummeled him. Then, leaping up, that powerful monkey landed on his chest with tremendous force.

23. Locking Nikumbha's neck in both his arms, Hanumān twisted it until he tore off the huge head of the rākṣasa, who was shrieking horribly.

24. Once Nikumbha had been slain in battle by Pavana's son, an intense and terrifying battle broke out between the enraged armies of Daśaratha's son and the rākṣasa lord.

The end of the sixty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 65

1. Upon hearing that Nikumbha had been slain and Kumbha struck down as well, Rāvaṇa, in a towering rage, flared up like fire.

2. Beside himself with grief and rage, the rākṣasa, son of chaos, exhorted large-eyed Makarākṣa, Khara's son:

3. "Go, son, at my command, with an army. You must kill Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa along with the forest-dwelling monkeys."

4. Upon hearing these words of Rāvaṇa, the proud night-roaming rākṣasa hero Makarākṣa, Khara's courageous son, replied, "Very well."

5. Then, after respectfully saluting and reverentially circumambulating ten-necked Rāvaṇa, the mighty rākṣasa went forth from that splendid mansion at Rāvaṇa's command.

6. He then said this to the officer who was standing by: "Let my chariot be brought at once and have the army brought up quickly."

7. Upon hearing those words of his, that night-roaming rākṣasa officer had the chariot and army brought up.

8. After reverentially circumambulating the chariot, the night-roaming rākṣasa mounted it and urged on his charioteer, crying, "Drive my chariot swiftly."

9. Then Makarākṣa said this to all those rākṣasas: "Rākṣasas! You must all fight as my vanguard.

10. "I have been commanded by Rāvaṇa, the great king of the rākṣasas, to kill both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in battle.

11. "This very day, night-roaming rākṣasas, with my splendid arrows I shall slay Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, the tree-dwelling monkey Sugrīva, and his monkeys.

12. "And this very day, hurling my lance, I shall consume the vast host of the monkeys that has assembled here, just as fire does dry kindling."

13. Upon hearing that speech of Makarākṣa, all of those mighty night-roaming rākṣasas, armed with various weapons, formed themselves into a column.

14–15. Terrifying with their great fangs, yellow eyes, and bristling hair, those heroes, who could take on any form at will, roared like bull elephants trumpeting. Surrounding the huge son of Khara, those huge rākṣasas then marched forth in great excitement, shaking the earth.

16. A deafening roar arose on every side as they sounded thousands of battle conches and bherī drums, clapped their upper arms, and roared out their battle cries.

17. But suddenly the whip slipped from the hand of Makarākṣas's charioteer, and the rākṣasa's battle standard fell.

18. The horses yoked to his chariot were robbed of their strength. Moving along with halting steps, despondent, they proceeded with tearful faces.

19. As fierce and evil-minded Makarākṣa marched forth, a harsh and fearsome wind filled with dust began to blow.

20. Although they saw those omens, all those immensely powerful rākṣasas paid them no heed and proceeded to where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa stood.

21. Their bodies as dark in hue as clouds, elephants, or buffalos, the night-roaming rākṣasas, having been wounded many times with sword and mace in the forefront of battle, were seasoned in combat. They raced onward, roaring and crying out, "Here I am!" "Here I am!"

The end of the sixty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 66

1. When the bulls among monkeys saw that Makarākṣa had marched forth, they all immediately leapt up and arrayed themselves, eager for battle.

2. Then there ensued a tremendous, hair-raising battle between the night-roaming rākṣasas and the leaping monkeys, just like that between the gods and the dānavas.

3. The monkeys and the night-roaming rākṣasas belabored each other, the former with blows of trees and hails of boulders, the latter with volleys of lances and blows of iron clubs.

4–5. From every side the night-roaming rākṣasas, who prowl in the darkness, slaughtered those lions among monkeys with javelins, lances, maces, swords, iron cudgels, spears, short javelins, volleys of arrows, nooses, war hammers, staves, nirghātas, and other weapons as well.

6. Tormented by Khara's son with his hails of arrows, the monkeys panicked. Stricken with terror, they all fled.

7. When the rākṣasas saw that the forest-dwelling monkeys were fleeing, they roared like lions in their excitement. The rākṣasas then took on an air of victory.

8. But even as the monkeys fled in all directions, Rāma stopped the rākṣasas in their tracks with a hail of arrows.

9. When the night-roaming rākṣasa Makarākṣa saw that his rākṣasas had been stopped in their tracks, he was consumed with the fire of anger, and he said these words:

10. “Stay where you are, Rāma! I challenge you to single combat. With sharp arrows loosed from my bow, I shall rob you of your life.

11. “You are the one who killed my father back then in the Daṇḍaka Forest. Therefore, when I think that the author of that foul deed is standing right before me, my rage redoubles.

12. “My whole body is burning fiercely in that I did not catch sight of you, you evil-minded Rāghava, back then in the great forest.

13. “But now, Rāma, as luck would have it, I find you here right before my eyes. I have been as desperate to catch you as a famished lion is a deer.

14. “This very day, dispatched to the realm of Yama, king of the dead, by the impact of my arrows, you shall meet the heroes you have slain.

15. “But what is the use of endless talking? Hear my words, Rāma. Let all the worlds behold the two of us on the battlefield.

16. “So now, in the midst of this great conflict, give battle, Rāma, with any weapon in which you are skilled—a missile, a mace, or even your bare hands.”

17. When Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, had heard this speech of the endlessly talkative Makarākṣa, he laughed and spoke these words:

18. “In the Daṇḍaka Forest, I slaughtered fourteen thousand rākṣasas, including Triśiras, Dūṣaṇa, and the one who was your father.

19. “Today, evil wretch, the vultures, jackals, and crows with their sharp beaks and fangs and their hooked claws will gorge themselves on your flesh.”

20. When Rāma had addressed him in this fashion, Khara’s son, the night-roaming rākṣasa, loosed a torrent of arrows at Rāghava on the battlefield.

21. But Rāma cut those arrows into myriad pieces with a hail of his own arrows. Cut to pieces, the golden-fletched arrows fell to the ground by the thousand.

22. Then the battle between them commenced as the son of the rākṣasa Khara and Daśaratha’s son rushed violently toward each other.

23. The sound of their bowstrings striking their armguards was like that of two thunderclouds clashing in the sky. The deafening sound of their bows could then be heard throughout the battlefield.

24. Eager to witness that awesome sight, all the gods, dānavas, gandharvas, kinnaras, and great serpents assembled in the sky.

25. As they pierced each other's bodies, their strength only redoubled. They both engaged in thrusts and counterthrusts with each other on the battlefield.

26. In that battle, the rākṣasa cut down the swarms of arrows loosed by Rāma, while Rāma, for his part, with his arrows cut the arrows loosed by the rākṣasa into myriad pieces.

27. All the cardinal and intermediate directions were filled with torrents of arrows. The earth, covered as well on every side, was no longer visible.

28. In a rage, great-armed Rāghava shattered the rākṣasa's bow. With eight iron arrows he slew the charioteer. Then, after smashing the chariot with his arrows, Rāma cut down the chariot-horses.

29. Robbed of his chariot, the night-roaming rākṣasa Makarākṣa took his stand on the ground. In his hand, the rākṣasa held his lance, which, equal in radiance to the fire that ends a cosmic age, struck terror into all beings.

30. Brandishing that huge and blazing lance, the night-roaming rākṣasa hurled it furiously at Rāghava in that great battle.

31. But even as the blazing lance, released from the hand of Khara's son, flew toward him, Rāghava cut it to pieces in the sky with three arrows.

32. Struck by Rāma's arrows, the lance, adorned with heavenly gold, was cut into myriad pieces so that it shattered on the ground, like some great meteor.

33. When the great beings stationed in the sky saw that the lance had been destroyed by Rāma of wondrous deeds, they cried out, "Excellent! Excellent!"

34. When the night-roaming rākṣasa Makarākṣa saw that his lance had been destroyed, he raised his fist and cried out to Kākutstha, "Halt! Stay right where you are!"

35. Seeing Makarākṣa rushing toward him, Rāma, the delight of the Raghus, laughed and fitted to his bow the divinely charged weapon of Agni, the purifier.

36. When he was struck by Kākutstha with that divinely charged weapon in battle, the rākṣasa, pierced to the heart, collapsed and died.

37. Then, when the rākṣasas had witnessed Makarākṣa's fall, they all fled back to Laṅkā, harried by Rāma's arrows.

38. Seeing Khara's son, the night-roaming rākṣasa, struck down by the force of the arrows of King Daśaratha's son, like a mountain struck by a thunderbolt and shattered, the gods were delighted.

The end of the sixty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 67

1. When Rāvaṇa, victorious in battle, heard that Makarākṣa had been slain, he was furious, and he ordered his son Indrajit into battle.

2. "Hero, you must slay those two heroic brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. For, whether visible or invisible, you are mightier still in every way.

3. "In battle you defeated Indra, whose feats are unmatched. How much more easily will you slay two men when you encounter them in battle?"

4. Addressed in this fashion by the rākṣasa lord, Indrajit accepted his father's instructions. Then, in the sacrificial ground, he offered oblations into the purifying sacrificial fire according to the ritual prescriptions.

5. As Rāvaṇi began his oblation into the sacrificial fire, rākṣasa women, bearing red turbans, came in haste to where he stood.

6. Weapons served as the śarapatra grass, myrobalan wood was the kindling. His garments were red and his ladle of black iron.

7. Having strewn the fire altar all around on every side with weapons in place of śarapatra grass, he seized the throat of a live, pure black goat.

8. When kindled and fed the oblation of rice-gruel, the smokeless fire with its huge flames displayed signs betokening victory.

9. Glowing like burnished gold, his flames swirling in an auspicious clockwise direction, Agni, the purifier, himself rose up and received that oblation.

10. Once he had made his oblations into the sacrificial fire and thus gratified the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas, Indrajit mounted his excellent and radiant chariot, which could be rendered invisible.

*11. Complete with its four horses, its sharp arrows, and a mighty bow fastened in place, that magnificent chariot looked splendid.

12. Blazing with splendor and covered with burnished gold, the chariot was decorated with motifs of arrows, moons, and half-moons.

13. With its device of a great conch of jāmbūnada gold, Indrajit's battle standard, adorned with lapis, looked like a blazing fire, purifier of all things.

14. And, protected as he was by the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā, as brilliant as the sun, the immensely powerful Rāvaṇi was unassailable.

15. Once he had completed his oblation into the sacrificial fire to the accompaniment of mantras peculiar to the rākṣasas, Indrajit, victorious in battle and able to render himself invisible, marched forth from the city and said:

16. "This very day I shall slay in combat those two false forest ascetics and thus give my father a great victory in battle.

17. "Once I have cleared the earth of monkeys and slain Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa, I will have given my father the greatest delight." When he had spoken in this fashion, he became invisible.

18. Acting on ten-necked Rāvaṇa's orders, Indrajit, the fierce foe of Indra, in a rage drove swiftly into battle armed with his pitiless bow and iron arrows.

19. He spied the two immensely powerful heroes in the midst of the monkeys. As they prepared to unleash volleys of arrows, they resembled three-headed cobras.

20. With the thought, "There they are!" he strung his bow and inundated them with torrents of arrows, as, with a downpour, might a storm cloud charged with rain.

21. In his chariot, he flew up into the sky, and, stationing himself there out of the range of sight, he riddled Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa with sharp arrows.

22. Beset on every side by the force of his arrows, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa placed arrows on their bows and invoked a divine weapon-spell.

23. Those very mighty warriors, who resembled gods, covered the sky with their volleys of arrows. But their divinely charged weapons did not so much as graze Indrajit.

24. For he had created dense darkness so as to obscure the heavens. Thus did that majestic warrior, shrouded in a murky fog, make it impossible to see in any direction.

25. Not even the sound of his bowstring striking his armguard could be heard or the noise of his chariot wheels and horses' hooves as he darted to and fro. Nor could one discern his form.

26. With his torrent of iron arrows, the great-armed warrior, in that dense and blinding darkness, let loose a veritable and prodigious downpour of arrows.

27. In that battle, the angry Rāvaṇi, who had been granted a boon, completely riddled Rāma in every limb with arrows as radiant as the sun.

28. Although those two tigers among men were pelted with iron arrows like two mountains inundated by torrential rains, they continued to shoot their own sharp gold-fletched arrows.

29. Soaring into the sky, those heron-feathered arrows wounded Rāvaṇi and then fell back to earth, smeared with blood.

30. Although those two splendid men were sorely afflicted by that torrent of arrows, they cut down those shafts as they rained down, with many crescent-headed arrows.

31. The two sons of Daśaratha would loose a splendid divinely charged weapon in any direction from which they saw those sharp arrows raining down.

32. But the great chariot-warrior Rāvaṇi, whose divinely charged weapons flew swiftly, darted in all directions in his chariot and continued to riddle the two sons of Daśaratha with his sharp arrows.

33. Thoroughly riddled by him with those finely made, gold-fletched arrows, the two heroic sons of Daśaratha looked like twin kiṃśuka trees covered with crimson blossoms.

34. No one could follow Indrajit's movements, nor could anyone discern his form, his bow, or his arrows. Nothing whatever of his could be discerned, as if he were the sun hidden behind a dense mass of clouds.

35. Pierced through by him, the tawny monkeys were struck down by the hundred and lay fallen on the ground, robbed of their life breaths.

36. Then, in a towering rage, Lakṣmaṇa said these words to his brother: "I shall use the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā in order to exterminate all the rākṣasas."

37. But Rāma said this in reply to Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks: "You must not slaughter all the rākṣasas of the earth on account of a single one.

38. "A foe who does not resist, is in hiding, cups his hands in supplication, approaches seeking refuge, is fleeing, or is caught off guard—you must not slay any of these.

39. "Therefore, mighty warrior, let us strive to slay him alone. Let us summon our divine weapon-spells, which strike with tremendous force and resemble venomous serpents.

40. "For if the monkey troop leaders could but see that vile master of illusion with his invisible chariot, they could then overpower and slay that rākṣasa.

41. "Whether he enters the earth, the heavens, the underworld Rasātala, or the sky—no matter where he may hide—he shall fall to earth consumed by my divinely charged weapons and robbed of his life breaths."

42. Thus did the great hero of the Raghus speak, surrounded by those bulls among leaping monkeys. Then, the great man urgently began to contemplate how to kill that fierce rākṣasa of cruel deeds.

The end of the sixty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 68

1. Now, when Indrajit realized what great Rāghava had in mind, he withdrew from the battle and reentered the city.

2. But as that immensely lustrous hero recalled the slaughter of those courageous rākṣasas, his eyes grew red with rage and he sallied forth once more.

3. Surrounded by rākṣasas, the immensely powerful Indrajit Paulastya, that thorn in the side of the gods, marched forth through the western gate.

4. But then, perceiving that the two heroic brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, were prepared for battle, Indrajit displayed his power of magical illusion.

5. Placing an illusory Sītā on his chariot in the midst of his vast host, he made as if to kill her.

6. Determined to deceive all of them, that very evil-minded rākṣasa marched out right in front of the monkeys, displaying every intention of killing Sītā.

7. When the forest-dwelling monkeys saw him marching forth from the city, they leapt up in a towering rage, with boulders in their hands, eager for battle.

8. Before them strode Hanumān, elephant among monkeys, holding an immense mountain peak that was impossible to withstand.

9–10. There, in Indrajit's chariot, he saw Sītā. She was sorrowful, wearing a single braid, dejected, her face gaunt with fasting. That splendid woman, Rāghava's beloved, wore only a single garment, now much worn. She was unwashed so that all her limbs were covered with dust and dirt.

11. After observing her closely for a moment and concluding that she was indeed Maithilī, Hanumān became deeply agitated, his face awash in tears.

12–13. Seeing poor Sītā there in the chariot, sorrowful and afflicted with grief, in the clutches of the rākṣasa lord's son, the great monkey thought, "What does he mean to do?" Then, after voicing this concern, he rushed upon Rāvaṇi together with those excellent monkeys.

14. But when Rāvaṇi spied the monkey host, he was beside himself with rage. Unsheathing his sword, he seized Sītā by the head.

15. Then, right before their eyes, Rāvaṇi struck that woman, whom he had conjured up in his chariot through his power of magical illusion, as she cried out, "Rāma! Rāma!"

16. When Hanumān saw Sītā seized by her hair, that son of Māruta shed tears born of grief from his eyes. In anger, he spoke harsh words to the son of the rākṣasa lord:

17. "Evil wretch! You have seized her braid to your own destruction. Though born in a lineage of brahman-seers you dwelt in a rākṣasa woman's womb. Damn you, you creature of foul deeds, whose mind has sunk to this!

18. "Savage! Ignoble! Evildoer! Lowest of the low! Criminal! Such is the act of an ignoble creature! You are without pity, pitiless rākṣasa!

19. "Taken from her home, her country, and the arms of Rāma, what offense has Maithilī done you that you should want to kill her?

20. "If you kill Sītā, you will certainly die soon. For through this deed, for which you would deserve to die, you would fall into my clutches.

21. "And then, once you have lost your life and passed on to the next world, you will surely obtain those worlds reserved for those who kill women, worlds that are despised even by others who deserve death at the hands of all men."

22. Even as he was speaking in this fashion, Hanumān, surrounded by tawny monkeys wielding weapons, rushed in a rage at the son of the rākṣasa lord.

23. But Indrajit, with his army of fearsomely swift rākṣasas, drove back the immensely powerful army of forest-dwelling monkeys as it rushed onward.

24. Once he had routed the army of tawny monkeys with a thousand arrows, Indrajit replied to Hanumān, foremost among the tawny monkeys:

25. "This very day, right before your very eyes, I shall kill Vaidehī, on whose account Sugrīva, you, and Rāma have come here.

26. "And after I kill her, monkey, I shall then kill Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, you, Sugrīva, and that ignoble Vibhīṣaṇa.

27. "Now, as to what you said, leaping monkey, 'Women are not to be killed,' I would respond that one must do whatever causes pain to one's enemies."

28. When he had addressed him in this fashion, Indrajit himself slew the wailing, illusory Sītā with his sharp-edged sword.

29. Hacked in two from her shoulder to her hip, the poor woman, so beautiful and broad-hipped, fell to the ground.

30. After he had killed that woman, Indrajit said to Hanumān: "Now behold Rāma's woman, whom I have slaughtered in my wrath."

31. Then, having slain her himself with his huge sword, Indrajit mounted his chariot in great delight and unleashed a deafening roar.

32. As he withdrew to the safety of his own forces, roaring loudly, his mouth opened wide, the monkeys standing nearby could hear the din.

33. When evil-minded Rāvaṇi had slain Sītā in this fashion, he was delighted at heart. But when the monkeys saw how thoroughly delighted he was, they fled every which way in profound dejection.

The end of the sixty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 69

1. When those bulls among monkeys heard that terrifying sound, they fled in all directions, glancing back toward Indrajit, whose roar was like the sound of Śakra's thunderbolt.

2. But as they all scattered, terrified and dejected, their faces downcast, Hanumān, son of Māruta, called out to them:

3. "Leaping monkeys! Why are you fleeing with downcast faces, abandoning your enthusiasm for battle? Where now are all your heroics?

4. "Follow close behind me as I advance before you into battle. It ill befits heroes endowed with noble birth to run away."

5. Addressed in this fashion by the wise son of Vāyu, the monkeys were highly indignant. Their minds filled with excitement, they seized mountain peaks and trees.

6. Those bulls among monkeys rushed, roaring, toward the rākṣasas. Surrounding Hanumān, they followed him into the great battle.

7. Like fire, eater of oblations, wreathed in flames, Hanumān, surrounded on every side by the principal monkeys, consumed the army of his foes.

8. Surrounded by the monkey host, the great monkey—like Yama, who brings time itself to an end—wrought destruction among the rākṣasas.

9. Consumed with grief and rage, the great monkey Hanumān hurled an enormous boulder at Rāvaṇi's chariot.

10. But when the charioteer saw it hurtling toward him, he drove the chariot, drawn by obedient horses, well out of range.

11. Failing in its purpose, the boulder fell short of Indrajit, who remained in his chariot with his charioteer. It split open the earth and buried itself.

12. But in falling, it wrought havoc among the rākṣasa host. Then, roaring, the forest-dwelling monkeys hurled themselves by the hundred upon Indrajit.

13. Arming themselves, those huge monkeys, fearsome in their valor, hurled trees and mountain peaks into the midst of their enemies.

14. Struck down powerfully with trees by the immensely powerful monkeys, the grotesque night-roaming rākṣasas writhed on the battleground.

15. But when Indrajit saw his army being harried by the monkeys, he seized his weapons in a towering rage and rushed at his foes.

16–17. Surrounded by his own troops, he displayed his valor, releasing torrents of arrows. And he slaughtered many of those tigers among monkeys with lances, darts, swords, spears, mallets, and war hammers. The monkeys, in turn, slew his followers in battle.

18. With sāla trees, complete with trunks and branches, and with boulders, immensely powerful Hanumān slaughtered the rākṣasas of fearsome deeds.

19. Once he had driven back the enemy army, Hanumān said to the forest-dwelling monkeys: "Withdraw! There is no point in defeating this army.

20. "For Janaka's daughter, on whose account we have been fighting, struggling, and sacrificing our lives to please Rāma, has been slain.

21. "Let us first report this matter to Rāma and Sugrīva. Then, we shall do whatever they may ordain."

22. When he had spoken in this fashion, that foremost of monkeys turned back all the monkeys and, calmly and deliberately, withdrew.

23. Now, when Indrajit saw that Hanumān was heading back to where Rāghava waited, he retired to the Nikumbhilā shrine, eager to make oblation to the sacred fire, purifier of all things.

24. The sacred fire, purifier of all things, blazed up fiercely, as, in accordance with the sacrificial injunctions, the rākṣasa poured oblations of blood into it there on the sacrificial ground.

25. Glutted with the oblations of blood and swathed in flames, that fierce fire blazed up like the sun at twilight.

26. Then Indrajit, in accordance with the sacrificial injunctions, made oblations according to those injunctions for the success of the rākṣasas. And the rākṣasas, who knew what was and was not proper conduct, stood around in their vast troops, watching.

The end of the sixty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 70

1. Now, when Rāghava heard the deafening noise of the battle between the rākṣasas and the forest-dwelling monkeys, he said to Jāmbavān:

2. "My friend, surely Hanumān must have accomplished an all-but-impossible feat, since we hear such a mighty and terrifying clash of arms.

3. "Therefore you should go quickly, lord of the apes, surrounded by your own forces, and render assistance to that foremost of monkeys, who is engaged in battle."

4. With the words, 'So be it,' the king of the apes, surrounded by his own army, proceeded toward the western gate, where the monkey Hanumān was.

5. But then, on the road, the lord of apes encountered Hanumān returning, surrounded by his monkeys, who were fresh from battle and breathing hard.

6. Encountering on the road that fearsome army of apes all ready for battle and resembling a black storm cloud, Hanumān halted it and turned it back.

7. With his army of tawny monkeys, the illustrious Hanumān quickly approached Rāma and, in great sorrow, said these words to him:

8. “While we were engaged in battle, Indrajit, the son of Rāvaṇa, slew the wailing Sītā right before our eyes.

9. “When I saw her like that, I was devastated and despondent, tamer of your foes. Then I came straightaway to report this news to you, sir.”

10. Upon hearing those words of his, Rāghava, fainting from grief, fell to the ground, like a tree cut off at the roots.

11. Seeing the godlike Rāghava fallen to the ground, those excellent monkeys leapt up and rushed to him from every side.

12. They doused him with water fragrant with red and blue lotuses, as if he were an unbearable blazing fire that had sprung up.

13. Then Lakṣmaṇa, deeply grieving himself, took the stricken Rāma in his arms and addressed him in words that were both rational and meaningful:

14. “Since the practice of righteousness has been unable to protect you, noble brother—you, who have always trodden the path of virtue and controlled your senses—from calamities, it is truly pointless.

15. “For since we cannot directly perceive the force of righteousness in the same way that we perceive moving and fixed objects, it is my opinion that it does not exist.

16. “This thing called ‘righteousness’ is not demonstrable in the same way that moving and fixed objects are. Otherwise, a person like you would not experience such suffering.

17. “By the same token, if the force of unrighteousness were real, Rāvaṇa would go to hell, while you, sir, who are devoted to righteousness, would not thus suffer calamity.

18. “Since he has suffered no calamity, while you are immersed in one, can it be true that one obtains felicity through the practice of righteousness and that suffering arises from the practice of unrighteousness?

19. “Now, if those people who were averse to unrighteousness would thereby experience the felicity arising from the practice of righteousness, that is, if those who conducted themselves righteously would experience happiness, then they would receive their just deserts.

20. "Therefore, since the fortunes of those among whom unrighteousness is practiced increase, while those who always practice righteousness suffer torments, these two concepts are meaningless.

21. "And if, Rāghava, it were true that evildoers perish through the force of unrighteousness, then the force of righteousness would also be destroyed by the very act of destruction. Then, once it is destroyed, whom could it harm?

22. "Or if we are to understand that it is because of fate that a person is either killed by or kills another, then it is fate alone that would be tainted by that evil act and not the person himself.

23. "Since the results of righteousness are imperceptible and it itself is unmanifest and, in fact, unreal, how, tormentor of your foes, would it be possible to attain the highest good by means of it?

24. "If there were really such a thing as the power of virtue, then you, foremost among the virtuous, would never have suffered any evil. But since such a calamity has befallen you, it must follow that the power of virtue does not exist.

25. "On the other hand, it may be that the force of righteousness is weak and impotent and is merely auxiliary to manly effort. And since it is weak and blurs all distinctions, it should, in my opinion, be ignored.

26. "And if the force of righteousness is merely auxiliary to manly effort when it comes to effective action, then you should abandon it and devote yourself to manly effort, just as you now do to righteousness.

27. "Or should it be argued that righteousness consists, as they say, in speaking the truth, scorcher of your foes, then why is it that you would not imprison our father, who acted both untruthfully and cruelly toward you?

28. "Moreover, scorcher of your foes, if either righteousness or human effort were to be practiced exclusively, then the wielder of the vajra, Indra of the hundred sacrifices, would not first have slain a sage and then performed a sacrifice.

29. "When either human effort or righteousness is practiced exclusively, it destroys a person, Rāghava. Therefore, Kākutstha, a man should act as he pleases in all such matters.

30. "Such is righteousness according to my way of thinking, Rāghava, my poor brother. Besides, when you relinquished the kingship, you cut off righteousness at its root.

31. "For all righteous actions flow from wealth that is drawn and amassed from different sources, just as rivers flow from the mountains.

32. "But when a man is stripped of his wealth and so becomes powerless, all his righteous actions cease to flow like rivulets in the hot season.

33. "And such a man who has been raised to enjoy pleasures will come to crave them. If he should lose his wealth, he will resort to evil deeds. In this way dire consequences will ensue.

34. "A rich man has friends. A rich man has kinsmen. A rich man is an important person in this world. A rich man is considered learned.

35. "A rich man is powerful. A rich man is wise. A rich man is highly fortunate. A rich man is endowed with the finest qualities.

36. "I have thus laid out for you the disadvantages inherent in relinquishing wealth. I cannot imagine, heroic brother, what led you to such a decision when you abandoned your kingship.

37. "A rich man gains righteousness, pleasure, and profit—everything is propitious for him. But a poor man, though he may desire wealth and seek it, can never acquire it.

38. "Joy, desire, pride, righteousness, anger, tranquility, and self-restraint: all of these proceed from wealth, lord of men.

39. "Those who wander about practicing righteousness lose everything of value in this world. Those things of value are no more to be seen in you than are the heavenly bodies on stormy days.

40. "For, hero, it was when you were living in exile, adhering to your father's word, that the rākṣasa stole away your wife, dearer to you than life itself.

41. "But this very day, with feats of valor, hero, I shall dispel the great suffering wrought by Indrajit. Therefore, arise Rāghava!

42. "For I have arisen to aid you, sinless brother. In my rage at learning of the murder of Janaka's daughter, I shall, with my arrows, completely level Laṅkā, along with its horses, elephants, and chariots, as well as the lord of the rākṣasas himself."

The end of the seventieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 71

1. Now, while Lakṣmaṇa, so fond of his brother, was consoling Rāma, Vibhīṣaṇa returned after having stationed the troops at their proper posts.

2. Surrounded by his four valiant ministers, all armed with various weapons and resembling masses of collyrium, he resembled the leader of a herd surrounded by bull elephants.

3. As he drew near, he saw that the great Rāghava was immersed in grief and that the monkeys' eyes were awash with tears.

4. Then he saw the great Rāma Rāghava, delight of the House of Ikṣvāku, who lay dazed in Lakṣmaṇa's lap.

5. Upon seeing Rāma tormented by grief and deeply chagrined, Vibhīṣaṇa, his heart sinking with an inner sorrow, said, "What's wrong?"

6. Looking first at Vibhīṣaṇa's face, then at Sugrīva and the monkeys, Lakṣmaṇa, overwhelmed with tears, said these words:

7. "Upon hearing Hanumān report that Indrajit had slain Sītā, Rāghava fainted on the spot, dear friend."

8. But Vibhīṣaṇa cut Saumitri off even as he was speaking and said these deeply meaningful words to the barely conscious Rāma:

9. "Lord of men, I think that what Hanumān told you in his despair is as preposterous as would be the drying up of the ocean.

10. “For I know full well the plans that the evil-minded Rāvaṇa has for Sītā, great-armed warrior. He would never countenance her murder.

11. “Desiring what was best for him, I begged him over and over again, ‘You must give up Vaidehī!’ But he would not heed that advice.

12. “But no one can so much as get a glimpse of her, whether through conciliation, sowing dissension, bribery, or any other means, much less through violence.

13. “After deluding the monkeys, the rākṣasa Indrajit has returned to the shrine known as Nikumbhilā, where he will perform a sacrifice.

14. “And should that son of Rāvaṇa return after having completed his oblation, he will be unassailable in battle, even by the gods, Vāsava included.

15. “He must surely have employed this illusion, dear boy, in his desire to undermine the monkeys’ valor. We must go there with our troops before he completes his sacrifice.

16. “So cease this baseless grieving that has overcome you, tiger among men, for when they see you racked with grief, the whole army becomes despondent.

17. “You must remain here to compose yourself and recoup your strength. Send Lakṣmaṇa, along with us and the leaders of the troops.

18. “For that tiger among men with his sharp arrows will force Rāvaṇi to abandon his sacrifice. Then that rākṣasa can be killed.

19. “Then his sharp and pitiless feathered shafts, made swift by the feathers of birds, will, like birds of prey themselves, drink Indrajit’s blood.

20. “Thus, great-armed warrior, you must send forth Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks for the destruction of this rākṣasa, just as might Indra, the wielder of the vajra, send forth that weapon.

21. "Nor, best of men, must there be any delay in regard to killing our enemy. So issue your orders for the destruction of our foe, as does great Indra for the smashing of the citadels of the asuras.

22. "For if the rākṣasa lord should complete his sacrifice, he would become invisible in battle to the gods and asuras alike. Then, having completed his sacrifice, should he wish to fight, even the gods themselves would be in grave peril."

The end of the seventy-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 72

1. Although Rāghava had heard those words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he could not, racked with grief as he was, clearly understand what the rākṣasa had said.

2. But then, in the presence of the monkeys, Rāma, the conqueror of enemy citadels, regaining his composure, spoke to Vibhīṣaṇa, who sat beside him.

3. "Vibhīṣaṇa! Lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, I would like to hear once more what you just said. Please repeat what you intended to say."

4. When he had heard those words of Rāghava, Vibhīṣaṇa, skilled in speech, repeated what he had said.

5. "No sooner had you ordered me to station the troops at their proper posts than I executed your command, great-armed hero, just as you said.

6. "All the forces have been disposed separately on every side, while the troop leaders have been duly posted with their respective divisions.

7. "But please, illustrious hero, listen to my request once more. When you were grieving baselessly, our hearts were filled with grief.

8. "So abandon this sorrow, your majesty, this baseless grief that has overcome you. You must give up your brooding, which serves only to delight your enemies.

9. "If you are to recover Sītā and slay the night-roaming rākṣasas, you must bestir yourself, hero, and lift your spirits.

10. "Listen, delight of the Raghus, to the beneficial advice that I will now give you. Let Saumitri set out directly, accompanied by a large army, in order to confront Rāvaṇi in the Nikumbhilā shrine and kill him in battle.

11. "There with arrows—like the venom of venomous serpents—loosed from his full-drawn bow, that mighty bowman, victorious in battle, shall slay Rāvaṇi.

12. "Through the boon of self-existent Brahmā, acquired by virtue of his asceticism, that hero will obtain the divine Brahmaśiras weapon-spell and chariot-horses that can take him wherever he desires.

13. "But this is the way in which the death of that cunning warrior was foreordained, your majesty: 'Should an enemy ever strike you, enemy of Indra, before you can reach the Nikumbhilā grove and there complete your oblation into the fire, he shall compass your death even as you draw your bow to slay him.'

14. "Therefore, Rāma, you must depute mighty Lakṣmaṇa to kill Indrajit. For once he is slain, you can consider Rāvaṇa and all his companions to be as good as dead."

15. When Rāma had heard these words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he replied: "Well do I know, truly valorous hero, the illusory power of that fierce warrior.

16. "For he is cunning and has mastered the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā. He is mighty and mighty is the power of his illusion. Indeed, he can render even the gods themselves, including Varuṇa, unconscious in battle.

17. "And when, illustrious hero, mounted in his chariot, he travels through the sky, his movements can no more be discerned than those of the sun behind a dense mass of clouds."

18. Then Rāghava, who knew well the illusory power of his evil-minded foe, said these words to illustrious Lakṣmaṇa:

19–20. "Lakṣmaṇa! Accompanied by the entire army of the monkey lords and the troop leaders led by Hanumān as well as Jāmbavān, lord of the apes, and his army, you must slay the son of that rākṣasa, skilled though he may be in the power of illusion.

21. "And Vibhīṣaṇa, the great night-roaming rākṣasa, who knows this country intimately, will bring up the rear together with his ministers."

22. When Lakṣmaṇa, of fearsome valor, who was accompanied by Vibhīṣaṇa, heard these words of Rāghava, he took up a superb and extraordinary bow.

23. Girt for battle with his armor, sword, arrows, and golden bow, Saumitri touched Rāma's feet and spoke in great excitement:

24. "This very day, arrows loosed from my bow will pierce Rāvaṇi and then plunge into Laṅkā, as do haṃsas into a lotus pond.

25. "Indeed, this very day, my arrows, flying from the bowstring of my mighty bow, will strike that fierce warrior and tear his body to pieces."

26. When he had spoken in this fashion in the presence of his brother, glorious Lakṣmaṇa departed in haste, eager to slay Rāvaṇi.

27. Then, having made his obeisance to his elder brother's feet and having circled him reverentially, he set out for Nikumbhilā, the shrine guarded by Rāvaṇi.

28. His mission blessed by his brother, the valorous prince hastened on his way, accompanied by Vibhīṣaṇa.

29. Then Hanumān, surrounded by many thousands of monkeys, and Vibhīṣaṇa, together with his ministers, followed Lakṣmaṇa.

30. Accompanied by a vast army of tawny monkeys, Lakṣmaṇa quickly encountered the army of Jāmbavān, king of the apes, which was stationed along the way.

31. After he had traveled a long way, Saumitri, delight of his friends, spied in the distance the army of the rākṣasa lord, which was drawn up in battle array.

32. When the delight of the Raghus, tamer of his foes, had thus encountered that master of illusion Indrajit, he took his stand, bow in hand, in order to triumph according to the decree of Brahmā.

33. Then he plunged into the army of his enemies as into a vast darkness. It was diverse and gleamed with shining weapons. It was thick with battle standards and abounded in great chariot-warriors. In the immeasurable force of its onset, it was utterly terrifying.

The end of the seventy-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 73

1. Now, at this critical juncture, Rāvaṇa's younger brother Vibhīṣaṇa addressed Lakṣmaṇa in words that were inimical to their enemies and instrumental to the achievement of their own ends:
2. "Lakṣmaṇa, you must make every effort to annihilate this vast army. For once it has been annihilated, the son of the rākṣasa lord will become visible.

3. "Showering your enemies with arrows like Indra's thunderbolt, you must attack at once while his sacrifice is not yet completed.

4. "Hero, you must slay evil-minded Rāvaṇi, so unrighteous and adept in magical illusion, for he is cruel in his actions and a terror to all the worlds."

5. Upon hearing these words of Vibhīṣaṇa, Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks unleashed a hail of arrows in the direction of the rākṣasa lord's son.

6. Meanwhile, the apes and tree-dwelling monkeys, armed with huge trees and mountains, together hurled themselves upon the army that stood before them.

7. The rākṣasas for their part, eager to annihilate the monkey host, fought back with sharp arrows, swords, and with upraised javelins and iron cudgels.

8. And thus a tumultuous clash of arms took place between the monkeys and the rākṣasas, which, with its colossal din, caused Laṅkā to reverberate on every side.

9. The very sky itself was hidden from view by weapons of many different kinds: sharp arrows, trees, and fearsome, upraised mountain peaks.

10. Hurling their weapons at the monkeys, the rākṣasas, with their deformed faces and arms, sowed immense panic among them.

11. By the same token, the monkeys struck and slaughtered the bulls among rākṣasas in battle with whole trees and mountain peaks.

12. Immense panic broke out among the rākṣasas as they were being slaughtered by the huge and immensely powerful leaders of the apes and monkeys.

13. When unassailable Indrajit learned that his army was demoralized and afflicted by the enemy, he rose up, his sacrifice still incomplete.

14. Emerging from the shadow of the trees, the rākṣasa Rāvaṇi, in a rage, mounted his chariot, which stood fully equipped and already yoked.

15. Resembling a mass of black collyrium, his eyes and face an angry red, that cruel rākṣasa with his fearsome bow and arrows looked like Death himself, the ender of all things.

16. As soon as the army of the rākṣasas—fearsome in their onslaught and eager to fight with Lakṣmaṇa—saw Indrajit mounted in his chariot, they surrounded him.

17–18. But at that moment, Hanumān, that tamer of his foes, who resembled a mountain, took up a huge and unstoppable tree and, with it, tore through the rākṣasa ranks like the fire at the end of a cosmic age. And, in that battle, the monkey knocked them unconscious with many trees.

19–20. When they saw that Hanumān, son of Pavana, was wreaking swift destruction upon them, thousands of rākṣasas unleashed a hail of weapons toward him—bearers of sharp lances assailed him with their lances, swordsmen with their swords, javelin-wielders with their javelins, and spearmen with their spears.

21–23. Besetting the mountainous monkey on every side, the rākṣasas belabored him with iron clubs, maces, splendid-looking barbed darts, hundreds of hundred-slayers, iron war hammers, fearsome battle-axes, short javelins, fists with the force of the vajra, and palms like thunderbolts. Meanwhile, Hanumān, in a towering rage, wrought great slaughter among them.

24. Indrajit saw that Pavana's mountainous son, the foremost of monkeys, Hanumān, destroyer of his enemies, was slaughtering his enemies.

25. He then said to his charioteer, "Drive to where that monkey is, for if we do not deal with him, he will surely destroy us rākṣasas."

26. When he had been addressed by him in this fashion, the charioteer drove to where Māruti was, conveying the utterly invincible Indrajit, mounted in the chariot.

27. Closing in, the invincible rākṣasa unleashed upon the monkey's head a hail of arrows, swords, spears, scimitars, and battle-axes.

28. But Māruti, parrying those fearsome weapons, was seized with a towering rage and spoke these words:

29. "Come and fight if you are such a hero, evil-minded son of Rāvaṇa! Having now encountered Vāyu's son, you will not escape with your life.

30. "If you want to engage me in single combat in this battle, then fight me with your bare hands. If you can sustain my crushing force, evil-minded wretch, then you will prove to be the best of the rākṣasas."

31. But just then Vibhīṣaṇa informed Lakṣmaṇa that Indrajit, the son of Rāvaṇa, intent on killing Hanumān, had taken up his bow:

32. "Rāvaṇa's son, the conqueror of Vāsava, intent on killing Hanumān, has now mounted his chariot.

33. "Saumitri, you must slay Rāvaṇi with your fearsome, foe-piercing arrows, incomparable in their workmanship and utterly lethal."

34. Addressed in this fashion by that terror to his foes, Vibhīṣaṇa, great Lakṣmaṇa spied the unassailable Indrajit of fearsome power, resembling a mountain and mounted in his chariot.

The end of the seventy-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 74

1. After addressing Saumitri in this fashion, Vibhīṣaṇa, in great excitement, took him, still armed with his bow, and swiftly advanced.

2. Proceeding for a short distance, Vibhīṣaṇa entered a vast grove and there pointed out to Lakṣmaṇa the sacrificial ground.

3. There Rāvaṇa's powerful brother pointed out to Lakṣmaṇa a fearsome-looking banyan tree that resembled a black storm cloud.

4. "It is only after offering oblations to malignant spirits at this spot that the mighty son of Rāvaṇa goes forth to battle.

5. "Then the rākṣasa becomes invisible to all creatures and is able to bind and slay his enemies in battle with his splendid arrows.

6. "Therefore, with your keen arrows, you must destroy the mighty son of Rāvaṇa, together with his chariot, horses, and charioteer, before he returns to that banyan tree."

7. With the words, "So be it," immensely powerful Saumitri, delight of his friends, took up his stand there, twanging his splendid bow.

8. At that, Indrajit, Rāvaṇa's mighty son, appeared in his flame-colored chariot with his armor, sword, and battle standard.

9. Then immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa addressed the invincible Paulastya: "I challenge you to a duel. Give me a fair fight."

10. Although the resolute and immensely powerful son of Rāvaṇa had been challenged in this fashion, he turned his gaze to Vibhīṣaṇa and spoke these bitter words:

11. "Born and bred in our House, you are the very brother of my father. How then, rākṣasa, can you, my own uncle, betray me, your son?

12. "You evil-minded defiler of righteousness! You have no sense of kinship, affection, loyalty to your kind, sound judgment, fraternal feeling, or righteousness.

13. "You are truly pathetic, you evil-minded wretch, and an object of contempt to the virtuous since, abandoning your own kind, you have chosen to serve our enemies.

14. "With your feeble wits you do not perceive this glaring difference. How can one even compare life with one's own kinfolk to despicable servitude to one's enemy?

15. "Even if one's enemy is virtuous and one's kinfolk devoid of every virtue, still one's kinfolk, devoid of virtue though they be, are to be preferred. An enemy is always an enemy.

16. "No kinsman other than you, night-roaming rākṣasa, could demonstrate such pitilessness and callousness as you have, younger brother of Rāvaṇa."

17. When Vibhīṣaṇa had been addressed in this fashion by his brother's son, he replied, "Why do you disparage me, rākṣasa, as if you knew nothing of my character?

18. "Vicious son of the rākṣasa lord, cease your impudent speech out of respect for me. Although I was born in the race of savage rākṣasas, my nature is not that of the rākṣasas. Instead, I share the better nature of virtuous men.

19. "I take delight in neither cruelty nor unrighteousness. Otherwise, how could a brother, even one of radically different character, reject his brother?

20. "There are three faults that lead one to ruin: theft of another's property, raping another man's wife, and excessive distrust of one's friends.

21–22. "My brother's horrific murder of the great seers, his warring with all the gods, his arrogance, his wrathfulness, his unremitting hostility, and his perversity—these crimes and defects of his, so threatening to his life and his rule, obscure his virtues, as do storm clouds a mountain.

23. "It is because of these crimes and defects that I have forsaken my brother, your father. Neither you nor your father nor the city of Laṅkā shall long endure.

24. "You are an arrogant and ill-disciplined whelp, rākṣasa! Say what you will about me; you are bound by the noose of Kāla.

25. "Your death is at hand this very day. What can you say to me now? Lowest of the rākṣasas, you will never make it back to that banyan tree.

26. "If you confront the two Kākutsthas in battle, you will not escape with your life. And now you must do battle with Prince Lakṣmaṇa. Once you are slain, you will accomplish the purpose of the gods in the abode of Yama.

27. "So demonstrate all the power you can muster. Discharge all your weapons and arrows. But once you come within the range of Lakṣmaṇa's shafts, you and your army will not escape with your lives."

The end of the seventy-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 75

1. When Rāvaṇi had heard these words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he was beside himself with rage. He replied in harsh words and swiftly rushed forward.

2. Standing in his huge and ornate chariot yoked to black steeds, with his sword and other weapons raised, he resembled Kāla, the ender of all things.

3–4. Taking up his broad and thick bow, so firm, fearsome, and powerful, and fingering his foe-destroying arrows, he spoke in his fury to Saumitri, Vibhīṣaṇa, and the tigers among monkeys, saying, "Behold my valor!

5. "Now try to ward off in battle the irresistible hail of arrows loosed from my bow, like a torrential downpour from the sky.

6. "This very day my arrows, loosed from my immense bow, will scatter your limbs, as the wind might a heap of straw.

7. "I shall send you all this very day to the abode of Yama, your bodies mangled by sharp arrows, lances, javelins, broadswords, and iron cudgels.

8. "For who can stand before me in battle when, like a thundering storm cloud, I release a hail of arrows with my deft hands?"

9. When Lakṣmaṇa heard the boasting of the rākṣasa lord, his face displayed not the slightest sign of fear. But he was enraged, and he said these words to Rāvaṇi:

10. "The fulfillment of the goals of which you boast is not so easy to accomplish, rākṣasa. He alone is truly wise who fulfills his goals through action.

11. "You are utterly incapable of accomplishing this feat. In fact, no one can accomplish it. Yet after merely boasting about it, fool, you think, 'I have accomplished my purpose!'

12. "As for what you accomplished in battle on that other occasion by making yourself invisible, that is the way of thieves. It is not to be followed by heroes.

13. "So now that I am standing here, rākṣasa, within range of your arrows, go ahead and show us your martial prowess. Why boast with mere words?"

14. Addressed in this fashion, immensely powerful Indrajit, victorious in battle, drew his fearsome bow and let fly sharp arrows.

15. Once launched, those arrows, venomous as serpents, reached Lakṣmaṇa and cascaded upon him with their tremendous striking force, like hissing serpents.

16. With those arrows, exceedingly powerful in their striking force, Rāvaṇa's son Indrajit, whose own striking force was great, pierced Saumitri of auspicious marks in battle.

17. Drenched in blood, his body riddled with arrows, majestic Lakṣmaṇa resembled a smokeless fire.

18. When Indrajit saw what he had done, he drew near and, letting out a tremendous roar, uttered these words:

19. "Now, Saumitri, lethal arrows—sharp edged and well fletched—loosed from my bow will rob you of your life.

20. "Soon, Lakṣmaṇa, packs of jackals, vultures, and flocks of kites will descend upon you as you lie lifeless, slain by me.

21. "This very day, the supremely evil-minded and ever ignoble Rāma, a warrior in name only, will see you, his brother and devotee, slain by me.

22. "Yes, he will soon see you sprawled on the ground, Saumitri, slain by me, your armor cut to pieces, your bow smashed, and your head severed."

23. But as Rāvaṇa's son was speaking these harsh words in such a frenzy, Lakṣmaṇa responded to him with words that were perfectly reasonable.

24. "Why do you boast, rākṣasa, when you have accomplished no feat? You must perform some feat through which I may come to believe your boasting.

25. "Observe, man-eater! Without uttering any harsh speech, any word of censure, and without boasting, I am going to kill you."

26. When he had spoken in this fashion, Lakṣmaṇa sank five arrows of tremendous striking force—iron arrows drawn fully back to his ear—into the rākṣasa's chest.

27. Enraged at being struck by Lakṣmaṇa with those arrows, Rāvaṇa's son pierced him in return with three well-aimed arrows.

28. And thus ensued an immensely fearsome and tumultuous clash in battle between those two lions—man and rākṣasa—each eager to kill the other.

29. For both were endowed with might, both were valorous, both were extremely heroic, and both were skilled in every weapon and divine weapon-spell.

30. Both were supremely invincible and unequaled in their power and blazing energy. The two great heroes clashed like two planets in the heavens.

31. For then the two great warriors, as unassailable as Bala and Vṛtra, fought like a pair of lions.

32. Discharging many torrents of arrows, the two lions—man and rākṣasa—continued fighting in great excitement.

33. Like two great storm clouds, the two champions—man and rākṣasa—bows and arrows in hand and both eager for victory, inundated each other in high excitement with torrents and hails of arrows.

The end of the seventy-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 76

1. Then, hissing like an angry serpent, Dāśarathi, tormentor of his foes, fitted an arrow to his bow and released it toward the rākṣasa lord.

2. When the son of Rāvaṇa heard the slapping of the bowstring against Lakṣmaṇa's armguard, his face went pale, and he stared at him.

3. Meanwhile, Vibhīṣaṇa, observing the downcast face of the rākṣasa, son of Rāvaṇa, addressed Saumitri, who was absorbed in battle.

4. "I perceive unpropitious signs on the person of this son of Rāvaṇa. Therefore, you must make haste, great-armed warrior, for he is doubtless broken."

5. Then Saumitri nocked sharp arrows, like flames of fire or serpents engorged with venom, and let them fly.

6. Struck by Lakṣmaṇa with those arrows, whose impact was like that of Śakra's thunderbolt, Indrajit was momentarily stunned, all his senses wildly disordered.

7. But he regained consciousness after a moment. And, his senses fully restored, that hero stared at Daśaratha's heroic son who stood before him.

8. His eyes red with rage, Indrajit advanced upon Saumitri, and, as he drew near, he once again addressed him in harsh words:

9. "Have you completely forgotten my prowess in our first encounter, when, in battle, you and your brother writhed in bondage?

10. "That first time, during the great battle, the two of you and your followers were struck to the ground unconscious by my arrows, which are like the thunderbolts of Śakra.

11. "So since you dare to attack me, I think that you either must have forgotten that or else, clearly, you desire to depart for the abode of Yama.

12. "If you failed to observe my prowess in that first encounter, I will demonstrate it for you today. Now stand your ground!"

13. And so saying, he pierced Lakṣmaṇa with seven arrows and Hanumān with ten splendid, sharp-edged shafts.

14. Then, his frenzy redoubled in his fury, that powerful warrior pierced Vibhīṣaṇa with one hundred well-aimed arrows.

15–16. But when Rāma's younger brother had witnessed this feat performed by Indrajit, he dismissed it with a laugh, saying, "That's nothing!" Then Lakṣmaṇa, bull among men, his face betraying not the slightest sign of fear, took up fearsome arrows and, in battle, loosed them angrily at Indrajit Rāvaṇi, saying:

17. "This is not the way heroes engaged in battle strike their blows, night-roaming rākṣasa. These arrows of yours are inconsequential and have little force. Indeed, they feel quite pleasant.

18. "No, this is not the way heroes fight if they desire victory in battle." And, speaking in this fashion, he showered him with hails of arrows.

19. Smashed by his arrows, Indrajit's armor, all adorned with gold, shattered across the chariot floor, like a constellation falling from the sky.

20. His armor torn away, heroic Indrajit was wounded with iron arrows, so that he resembled a mountain bristling with trees.

21. Breathing hard, they fought incessantly and savagely in that battle, pierced with arrows in every limb and completely drenched with blood.

22. Deploying their divine weapon-spells again and again, those two, foremost among those expert in divine weapon-spells, filled the sky with arrows of every size and shape.

23. Both man and rākṣasa, shooting flawlessly, swiftly, marvelously, and accurately, continued their fearsome and tumultuous conflict.

24. Each terrifying crash of their bowstrings against their arm-guards was like that of two fearsome storm clouds thundering in the heavens.

25. The golden-fletched arrows struck their bodies only to emerge smeared with blood and plunge into the ground.

26. Meanwhile, some of their arrows were intercepted in the air by other well-honed weapons. They smashed and splintered one another by the thousand.

27. During the struggle, a ghastly carpet of arrows formed around them, so that it looked like a carpet of kuśa grass around two blazing fires at a sacrificial session.

28. Covered with wounds, the bodies of those two great warriors were as resplendent as a śālmali and a kiṃśuka tree in full bloom in the forest before their leaves appear.

29. Tumultuously and gruesomely the two of them—Indrajit and Lakṣmaṇa—clashed again and again, each eager to vanquish the other.

30. Although they continued to strike at each other—Lakṣmaṇa, Rāvaṇi and Rāvaṇi, Lakṣmaṇa—neither of them grew weary in that battle.

31. With the masses of arrows deeply rooted, yet protruding from their bodies, the two powerful and mighty heroes looked like twin mountains bristling with trees.

32. Drenched with blood and completely covered with arrows, all their limbs resembled blazing fires.

33. A long time elapsed while they were thus engaged in combat, but neither of them turned his face from combat or felt any weariness.

34. At that moment, immensely powerful Vibhīṣaṇa joined the fray and took his stand in order to aid and comfort Lakṣmaṇa, unconquered in the forefront of battle, and to give him respite from the fatigue of combat.

The end of the seventy-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 77

1. Rāvaṇa's brother, the heroic Vibhīṣaṇa, then took up his position in the front line of battle, watching the two of them—man and rākṣasa—who were locked in combat.

2. He twanged his great bow as he took up his stance and then shot huge, keen-tipped arrows at the rākṣasas.

3. Those arrows, glowing like fire, fell thick and fast. They tore the rākṣasas to pieces, as thunderbolts might great mountains.

4. Vibhīṣaṇa's followers as well, those outstanding rākṣasas, cut down the heroic rākṣasas in combat with lances, swords, and spears.

5. Surrounded by those rākṣasas, Vibhīṣaṇa then resembled a great bull elephant in the midst of its excited calves.

6. Then, at the appropriate time, that foremost of rākṣasas, who well understood timing, said these words, urging on the tawny monkeys, who took pleasure in battling the rākṣasas:

7. "Indrajit alone is, as it were, the last hope of the rākṣasa lord, and this is the mere remnant of his forces. What are you waiting for, lords of the tawny monkeys?

8. "Once this evil rākṣasa is slain in the forefront of battle, then, with the exception of Rāvaṇa himself, the enemy forces will have been destroyed.

9–11. "In slaying so many mighty rākṣasa chiefs—the loyal hero Prahasta, immensely powerful Nikumbha, Kumbhakarṇa, Kumbha, the night-roaming rākṣasa Dhūmrākṣa, Akampana, Supārśva, the rākṣasa Cakramālin, Kampana, Devāntaka, Narāntaka, and other mighty foes—you have crossed the ocean with your bare hands. You need now only hop across a small puddle.

12. "He is the only one left here for you to conquer, monkeys. All the other rākṣasas who joined battle here, arrogant in their strength, have been slain.

13. "True, it is not right for someone like me, who is like a father to him, to kill one who is like my own son. Still, for Rāma's sake, I must put all pity aside and compass the death of my brother's son.

14. "But although I would like to kill him, tears cloud my vision. Therefore, it is great-armed Lakṣmaṇa who will have to finish him off. Now let the monkeys form up their ranks and slaughter his retainers, who have clustered around him."

15. Urged on in this fashion by the very illustrious rākṣasa, the monkey lords were roused to a frenzy and beat their tails against the ground.

16. Then, roaring again and again, those tigers among monkeys unleashed various screeches, as peacocks do when they see storm clouds.

17. Then Jāmbavān, surrounded by all his troops, assailed the rākṣasas with boulders, claws, and teeth.

18. But those immensely powerful rākṣasas, casting aside their fear and wielding all kinds of weapons, surrounded the lord of the apes even as he attacked them.

19. They belabored Jāmbavān in battle with arrows, keen battle-axes, spears, and iron cudgels even as he was slaughtering the rākṣasa army.

20. A tumultuous clash then ensued between the monkeys and the rākṣasas. It was as fearsome and deafening as the clash between the gods and asuras in their fury.

21. And Hanumān, too, in a rage, ripped up a sāla tree from the mountain and, advancing to the attack, slaughtered the rākṣasas by the thousand.

22. Then, after having engaged in a tumultuous struggle with his paternal uncle Vibhīṣaṇa in that battle, Indrajit charged once again at Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes.

23. Then those two heroes, Lakṣmaṇa and the rākṣasa, violently engaged in battle, struck at each other, raining torrents of arrows.

24. The two swift and immensely powerful archers were concealed from view, again and again, by swarms of arrows, just as are the sun and moon by storm clouds at summer's end.

25–26. Such was the dexterity of their hands as they fought that one could not perceive them taking up their arrows, nocking them, grasping their bows, releasing their arrows, drawing back the bow-strings, taking up their stances, tightly gripping their weapons, or striking their marks.

27. Since the sky was completely covered in every direction with swarms of arrows sent flying by the force of their bows, nothing could be seen. A great and utterly terrifying darkness engulfed everything.

28. The wind ceased to blow and fire to burn. The great seers muttered, "Heaven help us!" while the gandharvas and the celestial bards came and gathered at that place.

29. With four arrows Saumitri pierced the four black, gold-ornamented horses of that lion among rākṣasas.

30. Then, with yet another shaft, a crescent-headed arrow, the majestic Rāghava deftly severed the head from the body of the charioteer as he drove back and forth.

31. Now when the son of Rāvaṇa saw that his charioteer had been slain in combat, he lost his enthusiasm for battle and became dejected.

32. And when the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys saw the rākṣasa with his dejected face, they were supremely delighted, and they honored Lakṣmaṇa.

33. Then four lords of the tawny monkeys—Pramāthin, Śarabha, Rabhasa, and Gandhamādana—unable to hold themselves back, launched a violent assault.

34. Leaping swiftly upward, the four immensely powerful monkeys, terrifying in their valor, landed on Indrajit's splendid horses.

35. Blood gushed visibly from the mouths of the horses as those monkeys, huge as mountains, came crashing down upon them.

36. Having slain his horses, they smashed his great chariot. Then, swiftly leaping back, they stood once more at Lakṣmaṇa's side.

37. But Rāvaṇi, leaping down from his chariot—its horses slain, its charioteer slaughtered—assailed Saumitri with a hail of arrows.

*38. Then, with masses of arrows—and sharp and splendid arrows they were—Lakṣmaṇa, the equal of great Indra, forcefully warded him off, who was now on foot and was releasing sharp and splendid arrows in battle.

The end of the seventy-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 78

1. His horses slain, the enormously powerful night-roaming rākṣasa Indrajit now stood on the ground. In his towering rage, he blazed with energy.

2. Wholly intent on killing each other with their arrows for the sake of victory, the two bowmen charged at each other like two bull elephants in the forest.

3. Meanwhile, the rākṣasas and the forest-dwelling monkeys raced back and forth in battle, slaughtering one another. Yet they never abandoned their respective masters.

4. Then, taking aim at Lakṣmaṇa and relying on his unsurpassed dexterity, Indrajit unleashed torrents of arrows, as does Indra, smasher of citadels, torrents of rain.

5. But Lakṣmaṇa calmly parried that all-but-unstoppable torrent of arrows unleashed by Indrajit.

6. Realizing that Lakṣmaṇa's armor was impenetrable, Indrajit, son of Rāvaṇa, in a towering rage, shot him in the forehead with three well-fletched arrows, thus demonstrating his extraordinary swiftness in releasing divinely charged weapons.

7. With those arrows planted in his forehead, there in the forefront of battle, the delight of the Raghus, who delighted in battle, looked as splendid as a mountain with three summits.

8. Although the rākṣasa had thus pierced him with arrows in the great battle, Lakṣmaṇa nonetheless swiftly pierced him in turn with five arrows.

9. And thus did the two heroes, Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit, armed with their immensely powerful bows and fearsome in their valor, strike each other with sharp arrows.

10. Charging toward each other, the two bowmen, their hearts set on victory, pierced each other in every limb with fearsome arrows.

11. But Vibhīṣaṇa, still further enraged at Indrajit, whose horses had been slain, shot him through the chest with five arrows that struck with the force of thunderbolts.

12. Flying straight to their mark, those gold-fletched arrows pierced his body. Smeared with his blood, they resembled huge red serpents.

13. Then immensely powerful Indrajit, enraged at his uncle there in the midst of the rākṣasas, took up a splendid arrow that had been given to him by Yama.

14–15. But when immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa, fearsome in his valor, saw him nock that great arrow, he took up another arrow. It had been granted to him in a dream by immeasurable Kubera himself. It was invincible and impossible to withstand even for the gods and asuras, Indra included.

16. Fixed to their splendid bows and drawn back by those heroes, the two magnificent arrows blazed brightly in their splendor.

17. Released from their bows, the two arrows lit up the heavens. They struck each other head on, colliding with tremendous force.

18. Colliding with each other in battle like two great planets, the arrows fell to the ground, shattered into a hundred pieces.

19. Seeing their arrows thwarted there in the forefront of battle, both Lakṣmaṇa and Indrajit were filled with shame and rage.

20. Then, in a towering rage, Saumitri took up the divinely charged weapon of Varuṇa, while the conqueror of great Indra, standing firm in battle, loosed the divinely charged weapon of Rudra.

21. Then a tumultuous and wondrous battle took place between the two of them. Hovering in the sky, the supernatural beings surrounded Lakṣmaṇa.

22. As that fearsome battle, with its terrifying roar, raged on between the monkeys and the rākṣasas, the sky was completely filled with numerous supernatural beings, all wonderstruck.

23. The seers, the ancestors, the gods, and the gandharvas along with the great birds and the great serpents, placing Indra of the hundred sacrifices at their head, watched over Lakṣmaṇa in battle.

24–26. And now, Rāghava's heroic younger brother nocked yet another arrow, the greatest of all. It struck with the burning force of fire, eater of oblations, and was capable of piercing Rāvaṇa's son. It was beautifully fletched and its shaft was tapered with smooth joints. Finely crafted and adorned with gold, it was a lethal arrow, impossible either to ward off or to withstand. The terror of the rākṣasas, it was like the venom of venomous serpents, and it was worshiped by the hosts of gods.

27. This was the very arrow with which, long ago, the immensely powerful and heroic lord Śakra of the tawny steeds had defeated the dānavas during the war of the gods and asuras.

28. Then Saumitri, foremost of men, placed upon his foremost of bows that foremost of arrows, the divinely charged weapon of Indra, which had never known defeat in battle.

29. Nocking that foe-destroying, divinely charged weapon, the unassailable Lakṣmaṇa drew his well-strung bow, stretching it to its limit, like Kāla himself at the destruction of the world.

30. Once he had placed the arrow on his splendid bow, fortunate Lakṣmaṇa, drawing it back, uttered these words in order to accomplish his purpose:

31. "If Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, be righteous, true to his word, and unrivaled in manly valor, then may you slay Rāvaṇi."

32. When he had spoken in this fashion, fortunate Lakṣmaṇa, heroic slayer of enemy heroes, drew that straight-flying arrow back to his ear. Then, charging it with the weapon-spell of Indra, he shot it at Indrajit in battle.

33. It severed Indrajit's majestic head—with its helmet and blazing earrings—from his body, before falling to the ground.

34. Lying on the ground, drenched with blood, severed from his shoulders, the huge head of the rākṣasa's son looked like burnished gold.

35. Slain in this fashion, the son of Rāvaṇa collapsed instantly, sprawling on the ground, along with his armor, helmet, and bow.

36. Then, once Indrajit was slain, all the monkeys along with Vibhīṣaṇa raised a shout, rejoicing, as did the gods at the death of Vṛtra.

37. Then in the heavens there arose a mighty shout on the part of the great seers and all beings, including the gandharvas and apsarases.

38. Realizing that their champion had fallen, the vast rākṣasa host fled in all directions, being slaughtered by the tawny monkeys, who now had a victorious air.

39. Being slaughtered by the monkeys, all the rākṣasas dropped their weapons and ran, dazed, toward Laṅkā.

40. In their panic, all the rākṣasas fled by the hundreds in many directions, abandoning their weapons—spears, swords, and battle-axes.

41. Some, harried by the monkeys and terrified, entered Laṅkā. Some threw themselves into the sea, while others took refuge on the mountain.

42. Of the thousands of rākṣasas who had seen Indrajit slain and lying on the battlefield, not a single one was to be found.

43. Once Indrajit had fallen, the rākṣasas vanished in all directions, just as do the solar rays when the sun has set behind the western mountain.

44. Like the sun when its rays grow faint or fire, the purifier, when it dies out, that warrior of immense blazing energy lay there, stripped of life, his limbs sprawling.

45. Then, once the son of the rākṣasa lord had fallen, the world—its enemy destroyed, its oppression nearly at an end—was filled with joy.

46. And Lord Śakra himself, along with all the bulls among the gods, was delighted when that rākṣasa of evil deeds was slain.

47. The waters and the heavens became limpid and the daityas and dānavas assembled and rejoiced when that terror to all the worlds had fallen.

48. And all the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas together cried, "May the brahmans now move about free from anxiety, their impurities removed."

49. Then, seeing that warrior of unrivaled strength, a bull among rākṣasas, sons of chaos, slain in battle, the delighted leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys rejoiced.

50. And Vibhīṣaṇa, Hanumān, and Jāmbavān, the troop leader of the apes, praising Lakṣmaṇa, rejoiced as well in his victory.

51. Their goal obtained, the leaping monkeys pressed close around that scion of the Raghus and stood there, roaring, howling, and bellowing.

52. Beating their tails on the ground and clapping their upper arms, the monkeys raised a shout, "Lakṣmaṇa has triumphed!"

53. Their hearts delighted, the monkeys, great and small, embraced one another as they chattered about Rāghava's exploits.

54. When his dear friends had witnessed Lakṣmaṇa's all-but-impossible feat in battle, they were delighted. And the gods, seeing that Indra's foe had been slain, felt in their hearts the greatest delight.

The end of the seventy-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 79

1. When Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks, his body drenched with blood, had slain in battle the conqueror of Śakra, he was delighted.

2–3. Then mighty and immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa, taking Jāmbavān, Hanumān, and all the forest-dwelling monkeys with him, went straightaway, leaning on Vibhīṣaṇa and Hanumān, to where Sugrīva and Rāghava waited.

4. Approaching Rāma, Saumitri greeted him respectfully and stood there at his brother's side, as might Viṣṇu, Indra's younger brother, at the side of his brother, Śakra. That hero then reported to him the horrific slaughter of Indrajit.

5. Then Vibhīṣaṇa, in delight, told Rāma that great Lakṣmaṇa had cut off Rāvaṇi's head.

6. The bull among men, Rāma, took Lakṣmaṇa on his lap and embraced him tightly. He kissed him on the head and, swiftly stroking him again and again, he spoke these words, comforting him:

7. "You, who can accomplish all-but-impossible deeds, have performed a supremely auspicious feat. Today, I have been freed from my enemy. Surely Rāvaṇa himself will now come forth with a vast array of troops, once he learns that his son has been struck down.

8. "And then, surrounded by my own vast army, I shall kill the lord of the rākṣasas, so difficult to defeat, as he marches forth, burning with grief at the slaying of his son.

9. "Lakṣmaṇa, now that you, my guardian, have slain the conqueror of Śakra, both Sītā and the earth itself have been placed within my grasp."

10. Having thus embraced and comforted his brother, Rāma Rāghava, delighted, spoke these words, addressing Suṣeṇa:

11. "Wise Saumitri, so loving of his friends, is still riddled with darts. You must act in such a way that he is restored to health. You must immediately rid Saumitri and Vibhīṣaṇa of these darts.

12. "And you must assiduously heal the others among the heroic ape and monkey troops—who fight with trees—who were wounded and pierced with darts as they fought."

13. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Suṣena, the great troop leader of the tawny monkeys, held a powerful medicinal herb to Lakṣmaṇa's nose.

14. The moment he smelled its fragrance, the darts fell away from him, his pain subsided, and his wounds healed over.

15. At Rāghava's command, Suṣeṇa treated his comrades, starting with Vibhīṣaṇa, as well as all the monkey leaders.

16. Saumitri was instantly restored to his normal state. The darts were removed, his fever had subsided, and he was free of pain and in good spirits.

17. Then, when they saw Saumitri rise up restored to health and in good spirits, Rāma, along with Sugrīva, the lord of the leaping monkeys, Vibhīṣaṇa, and Jāmbavān, lord of the apes, rejoiced together with their troops for a long time.

18. Great Dāśarathi praised Lakṣmaṇa's all-but-impossible feat, while the foremost of the troop leaders were delighted upon hearing that the conqueror of Śakra had fallen in battle.

The end of the seventy-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 80

1. Upon hearing that Indrajit had been slain, the ministers of ten-necked Paulastya confirmed the news for themselves and then, in great distress, reported it to him.

2. "Great and glorious king! With Vibhīṣaṇa's help, Lakṣmaṇa has slain your son in battle right before our eyes.

3. "Encountering another heroic warrior, that heroic warrior who was unvanquished in battle, your heroic son, the conqueror of the lord of the all-wise gods, has been slain by Lakṣmaṇa."

4. When he heard about the grievous, terrible, and horrifying death of his son Indrajit in battle, he fell into a profound stupor.

5. Regaining his wits after a long time, the king, that bull among rākṣasas, was overwhelmed with grief for his son. Despondent, his senses reeling, he gave way to lamentation.

6. "Alas, my dear child! Leader of the rākṣasa host! Great chariot-warrior! How could you, who had conquered Indra, have succumbed this day to the power of Lakṣmaṇa?

7. "When roused to anger in battle, you could surely, with your arrows, have cut to pieces even Kāla or Yama, the ender of all things, or even the peaks of Mount Mandara. What then to speak of Lakṣmaṇa?

8. "Today King Vaivasvata has risen greatly in my estimation. For he has now brought you, great-armed warrior, under the power of time.

9. "This is the way of brave warriors, even among all the hosts of the immortal gods. A man who gives up his life for his lord attains heaven.

10. "This night all the hosts of the gods along with the guardians of the world and the seers, having seen Indrajit slain, will sleep soundly, freed from fear.

11. "Today, through the loss of Indrajit alone, all the three worlds and the forest-covered earth seem as if empty to me.

12. "Today, in the inner apartments, I shall hear the cries of the daughters of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, like the shrill trumpeting of a herd of elephant cows in a mountain cavern.

13. "Where have you gone, scorcher of your foes, giving up your succession to the throne and abandoning Laṅkā and all of us—the rākṣasas, your mother, your wife, and me?

14. "Surely, it was for you, hero, to have performed the rites for the departed when I had gone to the realm of Yama. But now you have reversed this.

15. "Since Sugrīva, Rāghava, and Lakṣmaṇa yet live, where have you gone, abandoning us without first removing this source of all my torment?"

16. But even as Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, was afflicted with lamentations such as these, an immense anger, born of the loss of his son, took hold of him.

17. His appearance, which was dreadful by nature, was now transfigured with the fire of his wrath, so that it was as unbearable as that of Rudra when he is filled with wrath.

18. And from the furious rākṣasa's eyes fell teardrops, like flaming drops of oil from two blazing lamps.

19. And as he gnashed his teeth, a grinding sound was heard, as if from some vast engine being turned by the dānavas.

20. In whichever direction he cast his glance, the rākṣasas, petrified with terror, hid themselves. For in his rage, he was like the fire at the end of a cosmic age.

21. The rākṣasas did not dare come near him as he glared in all directions in his rage, like Yama, the ender of all things, intent upon devouring everything in the world.

22. Then, in a towering rage, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, spoke in their midst, anxious to steady them in battle:

23. "Over the course of thousands of years I practiced all-but-impossible austerities whereby, time after time, self-existent Brahmā was fully gratified.

24. "As a result of these austerities, through the grace of self-existent Brahmā, I have nothing to fear from either the asuras or the gods.

25. "And the armor, as resplendent as the sun, that Brahmā gave me was never pierced by vajra or javelin in any of my battles with the gods and asuras.

26. "Who then, even Indra, smasher of citadels himself, can approach me, when, this very day, equipped with that armor and mounted in my chariot, I take my stand in combat on the battlefield.

27–28. "Now, for the slaughter of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa in the ultimate battle, bring forth to the blare of hundreds of trumpets the great and terrible bow and arrows that were given to me during my battles with the gods and asuras by self-existent Brahmā, who was pleased with me."

29. Tormented by the killing of his son and in the grip of his rage, heroic Rāvaṇa, reflecting in his mind, resolved to kill Sītā.

30. The fearsome rākṣasa, his eyes red, gazed in his dejection at all the fearsome-looking night-roaming rākṣasas, who were murmuring dejectedly, and said:

31. "A short time ago, in order to deceive the forest-dwelling monkeys, my beloved son, employing his power of illusion, showed them an apparition of a murdered woman, saying, 'Here is your Sītā!'

32. "Now I will make that a reality, just to please myself. I shall murder Vaidehī, so devoted to that false kshatriya!" When he had addressed his ministers in this fashion, he quickly took up his sword.

33–34. In his rage, Rāvaṇa hurriedly seized his magnificent sword, which shone like a cloudless sky, and drew it. Then, surrounded by his ministers, his mind reeling with grief for his son, he swiftly rushed forth from the assembly hall to where Maithilī was.

35. Seeing that rākṣasa rushing forth, the rākṣasas roared like lions. Perceiving that he was enraged, they huddled together and said:

36. "When the two brothers see Rāvaṇa today they will tremble. For in his wrath he conquered the four guardians of the world and laid low many another foe in battle."

37. As they were conversing together, Rāvaṇa, beside himself with rage, went storming toward Vaidehī, who was in the aśoka grove.

38. Although his friends, concerned for his welfare, tried to restrain him, he rushed on in his towering rage, like the angry planet racing toward Rohiṇī in the heavens.

39. Blameless Maithilī, who was guarded by the rākṣasa women, spied the furious rākṣasa brandishing his magnificent sword.

40. Seeing him armed with a sword and not turning back, though his friends tried many times to restrain him, Janaka's daughter was terrified.

41. "From the way he is racing toward me, suffused with rage, it is clear that this evil-minded wretch is going to kill me, as if I had no one to protect me, although, in fact, I do.

42. "For no matter how many times he pressed me, saying, 'Be my wife, enjoy yourself!' I rejected him, devoted as I am to my husband.

43. "It is clear that because I rejected him as a suitor, he has given up all hope of winning me. Overwhelmed with anger and mad passion, he is now on the point of murdering me.

44. "Or perhaps just now, on my account, the ignoble creature has slain in battle the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, tigers among men. Ah! What an evil fate that I should be the cause of the princes' death.

45. "For, foolish wretch that I am, I did not heed the advice of Hanumān. If only I had returned, mounted on his back, then, seated blamelessly in my husband's lap, I should not now be grieving in this fashion.

46. "I think that when Kausalyā, who has but one son, hears that her son has been slain in battle, her heart will surely break.

47. "For, weeping, she will surely call fondly to mind that great man's birth, childhood, youth, righteous deeds, and beauty.

48. "Losing all hope upon the slaughter of her son, she will perform his funerary rites. Then, in her distraction, she will surely mount the funeral pyre or hurl herself into the water.

49. "Damn that hunchbacked slut Mantharā and her wicked scheming! It is on her account that Kausalyā must endure such suffering."

50–51. Now, when the wise rākṣasa Supārśva saw poor Maithilī lamenting in this fashion, like the constellation Rohiṇī occluded by a hostile planet and so cut off from the moon, her lord, he spoke these words to Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, whose ministers were attempting to restrain him:

52. "How can you, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, the younger brother of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa himself, even think of killing Vaidehī, abandoning righteousness in your anger?

53. "You have completed your discipleship in vedic knowledge, and you are ever devoted to the proper duties of your rank. How then, heroic lord of the rākṣasas, can you possibly think of killing a woman?

54. "You should spare Maithilī, your majesty, endowed as she is with such beauty, and instead, together with us, unleash your wrath upon Rāghava himself.

55. "So you must make your preparations this very day, the fourteenth of the dark fortnight. Then, surrounded by your troops, you shall march forth to victory tomorrow on the new-moon day.

56. "A wise and heroic warrior, armed with a sword and equipped with a chariot, you, sir, mounted in your splendid chariot, will slay Rāma Dāśarathi and win Maithilī."

57. Mighty and evil-minded Rāvaṇa paid heed to that advice that was offered by his friend, in keeping as it was with righteousness. Then, returning to his residence, he went once more to his assembly hall surrounded by his friends.

The end of the eightieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 81

1. Upon entering his assembly hall, the king sat down on his splendid throne, despondent and deeply pained, snarling like an angry lion.

2. Tormented by the loss of his son, immensely powerful Rāvaṇa then addressed the leaders of his army, who stood with their hands cupped in reverence:

3. "All of you gentlemen are to march forth surrounded by the entire cavalry and elephant corps and accompanied by the chariot divisions and infantry.

4. "Exerting yourselves, you must isolate Rāma, surround him, and then slay him in battle with a hail of arrows, like storm clouds in the rainy seasons.

5. "Otherwise tomorrow, in a great battle, as the whole world watches, I shall kill Rāma, whose limbs you gentlemen will have pierced with your sharp arrows."

6. When the rākṣasas had received these instructions from the lord of the rākṣasas, they set forth swiftly, surrounded by chariots and columns of elephants.

7. And so at sunrise a fearsome and tumultuous battle broke out between the rākṣasas and the monkeys.

8. Then the monkeys and the rākṣasas assaulted one another with various types of clubs, darts, swords, and battle-axes.

9. Rivers of blood began to flow, carrying logjams of corpses. They had elephants and chariots for their banks, war-horses for their fish, and flagstaffs for their trees.

10. Springing up again and again in battle, those splendid monkeys smashed flagstaffs, armor, chariots, horses, and all kinds of weapons.

11. With their sharp fangs and their claws, the leaping monkeys rent the hair, ears, foreheads, and noses of the rākṣasas.

12. A hundred of those bulls among monkeys swarmed about each rākṣasa in battle, as birds might a tree laden with fruit.

13. Similarly, the rākṣasas, huge as mountains, belabored the fearsome monkeys with darts, swords, battle-axes, and heavy maces.

14. Then the vast host of monkeys, being slaughtered by the rākṣasas, sought refuge with Daśaratha's son Rāma, the refuge of all.

15. Then mighty Rāma of enormous blazing energy took up his bow and, plunging into the rākṣasa host, unleashed a hail of arrows.

16. Once Rāma had plunged in, fearsome and blazing with the fire of his arrows, the rākṣasas could no more approach him than can clouds approach the sun in the heavens.

17. The night-roaming rākṣasas could witness the very fearsome and all-but-impossible feats of Rāma in battle only after he had accomplished them.

18. Although he was shaking their vast host and crushing their great chariot-warriors, they could no more see Rāma than can one a gale tearing through a forest.

19. Although they saw that through the skill of Rāma their forces had been cut to pieces, shattered, scorched with arrows, broken, and afflicted by weapons, they could not catch sight of him, so swiftly did he move.

20. Although Rāghava was striking their very bodies, they could no more see him than can creatures see the inner spirit that resides among the objects of sense.

21–22. "He is slaughtering the elephant corps!" "He is slaughtering the great chariot-warriors!" "With his sharp arrows he is slaughtering the infantry along with the cavalry!" So thinking, because of their seeming similarity to Rāma, all the rākṣasas began in their fury to slaughter one another in battle, slaying those rākṣasas who resembled Rāghava.

23. And since great Rāma had befuddled them with the mighty, divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas, they could not see him, even though he was burning up the army of his foes.

24. Sometimes the rākṣasas saw a thousand Rāmas in battle, while at other times they saw but a single Kākutstha in that great conflict.

25. Sometimes they would see only the golden tip of the great warrior's bow, whirling about like a circle of blazing fire, but not Rāghava himself.

26–27. As he massacred the rākṣasas in battle, Rāma appeared to them like a spinning wheel, as does the wheel of time to all creatures. It had his body for its hub, his power for its flames, his arrows for its spokes, his bow for its rim, the sound of his bowstring striking his armguard for its rumbling, his qualities of blazing energy and mental brilliance for its radiance, and the power of his divine weapon-spell for its sharp edge.

28–30. Thus, in the eighth part of a day, did Rāma with his arrows like flames of fire single-handedly annihilate the forces of the rākṣasas, who could take on any form at will: a host of ten thousand chariots as swift as the wind, eighteen thousand mighty war-elephants, fourteen thousand battle-steeds along with their riders, and a full two hundred thousand rākṣasa foot soldiers.

31. Their horses slaughtered, their chariots smashed, and their battle standards shattered, the remnants of the night-roaming rākṣasas fled back to the citadel of Laṅkā, exhausted.

32. With its slaughtered elephants, foot soldiers, and horses, the battlefield resembled the playground of wrathful Rudra, wielder of the Pināka.

33. The gods, along with the gandharvas, perfected beings, and supreme seers, praised that feat of Rāma, crying, "Well done! Well done!"

34. Then Rāma addressed Sugrīva, who stood nearby, saying, "The power of this divine weapon-spell belongs only to me and three-eyed Śiva."

35. When he had slaughtered the rākṣasa host, great Rāma, who had conquered all fatigue and who was the equal of Śakra in the use of weapons and divine weapon-spells, was praised by the delighted hosts of the gods.

The end of the eighty-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 82

1–3. Thousands of war-elephants and battle-steeds with their riders, thousands of chariots, blazing like fire and flying their battle flags, thousands of valiant rākṣasas, who could take on any form at will, were armed with maces and iron clubs, and were resplendent with their golden battle standards—all of these sent forth by Rāvaṇa, Rāma, tireless in action, had now slaughtered with his sharp arrows adorned with burnished gold.

4. When the remnants of the night-roaming rākṣasa troops had seen what had happened and the rākṣasa women had heard about it, they huddled together in panic, despondent and overwhelmed with gloomy thought.

5. The rākṣasa women—widows, those who had lost their sons, and those who had lost their kinsmen—were grief stricken. Wailing, they huddled together and lamented thus:

6. "How could that potbellied, snaggletoothed hag Śūrpaṇakhā have possibly made advances in the forest to Rāma, who is as handsome as Kandarpa, the god of love?

7–8. "Rāma is delicate, yet immensely powerful. He is devoted to the welfare of all beings. He is mighty, fair of face, and replete with every virtue. This rākṣasa woman, on the other hand, with her ugly face, is hideous and lacking in every virtue. Really, someone ought to kill her. How, after seeing him, could that lustful creature have possibly hoped to win him?

9–10. "It is just the bad luck of our race that this white-haired crone, so ill-suited to Rāghava, should have made advances to him. For this was an impermissible and ludicrous act, condemned by everyone, and it has led to the destruction of Dūṣaṇa, Khara, and the rākṣasas in general.

11. "It was on her account that Rāvaṇa incurred this tremendous enmity. And so the ten-necked rākṣasa abducted Sītā to his own destruction.

12. "Yet although he has not won over Sītā, Janaka's daughter, Rāvaṇa has forged an undying enmity with mighty Rāghava.

13. "When he heard that the rākṣasa Virādha, who was assaulting Vaidehī, had been killed by Rāma single-handedly, that should have been a sufficient warning.

14. "Then, too, in Janasthāna, Rāma slaughtered fourteen thousand rākṣasas of fearsome deeds with his arrows, which were like flames of fire.

15. "And he slew Khara, Dūṣaṇa, and Triśiras in battle with arrows that blazed like the sun. That, too, should have been a sufficient warning.

16. "Next he slew the blood-guzzling Kabandha, whose arms were a league in length and who bellowed in a transport of rage. That, too, should have been a sufficient warning.

17. "Rāma also slew thousand-eyed Indra's mighty son Vālin, who resembled a storm cloud. That, too, should have been a sufficient warning.

18. "Sugrīva, his dreams shattered, had been dwelling despondently on Mount Ṛśyamūka. Rāma established him in royal sovereignty. That, too, should have been a sufficient warning.

19. "In his delusion, Rāvaṇa paid no heed to the fitting words spoken by Vibhīṣaṇa, though they were fully in accord with righteousness and polity and were beneficial for all the rākṣasas.

20. "If only Rāvaṇa, the younger brother of Kubera, bestower of wealth, had acted upon Vibhīṣaṇa's advice, this city of Laṅkā would not have become a cremation ground, overwhelmed by sorrow.

21. "Even when he heard that immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa had been slain by Rāghava and that his own beloved son Indrajit had been slain as well, Rāvaṇa still did not understand.

22. " 'My son has been slain in battle! My brother has been slain! My husband has been slain!' Such are the cries that are heard in household after household of the rākṣasas.

23. "For in battle valiant Rāma has destroyed chariots, horses, elephants, and rākṣasa foot soldiers by the hundreds of thousands.

24. "It must be Rudra, Viṣṇu, great Indra of the hundred sacrifices, or even Yama himself, the ender of all things, who, in the guise of Rāma, is slaughtering us.

25. "With our heroes slain by Rāma, we have lost all hope of life. Foreseeing no end to this terror and bereft of our protectors, we lament.

26. "Having been granted his boon, the valiant ten-necked Rāvaṇa does not realize the terrible danger he faces at Rāma's hands in battle.

27. "For not even the gods, the gandharvas, the piśācas, or the rākṣasas can save one who is assailed by Rāma in battle.

28. "Moreover, portents regularly appear to Rāvaṇa in battle after battle, foretelling his death at Rāma's hands.

29. "For Grandfather Brahmā, being gratified, granted Rāvaṇa invulnerability to the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas. But Rāvaṇa never requested invulnerability to men.

30. "I believe that this is undoubtedly that very same dangerous vulnerability to men that has now presented itself. It is sure to prove fatal to both Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas.

31. "Oppressed by the mighty rākṣasa through the gift of his boon, the wise gods worshiped Grandfather Brahmā with fierce austerities.

32. "Gratified, the Grandfather, great Brahmā, spoke these grave words to all the divinities for their benefit:

33. " 'From this day hence, all the dānavas and rākṣasas will eternally wander the three worlds constantly beset by danger.'

34. "Then all the gods, led by Indra, came together and propitiated the great god, bull-bannered Śiva, destroyer of Tripura.

35. "Gratified, the great god Śiva spoke these words to the gods: 'For your sake, a woman shall be born who will bring about the destruction of the rākṣasas.'

36. "Employed by the gods, this destroyer of the rākṣasas, Sītā, will devour us along with Rāvaṇa, just as, long ago, famine was used to devour the dānavas.

37. "This dreadful lamentation suffused with sorrow is the direct result of the misconduct of this evil-minded criminal Rāvaṇa.

38. "Afflicted as we are by Rāghava, we can see no one in the world who can afford us refuge, any more than one could afford refuge to creatures afflicted by Kāla himself at the end of a cosmic age."

39. Thus did all the women of the night-roaming rākṣasas loudly and grievously lament. Afflicted and tormented by a terrible fear, they grew despondent, holding one another in their arms.

The end of the eighty-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 83

1. Rāvaṇa heard that piteous sound, the lamentation of the grief-stricken rākṣasa women, in household after household throughout Laṅkā.

2. Heaving a deep sigh, he remained for a moment lost in thought. Then, seized with a towering rage, Rāvaṇa became fearsome to look upon.

3. Gnawing at his lip, his eyes red with rage, flaring up like the fire at the end of a cosmic age, he was unbearable to look upon, even for the rākṣasas.

4. The lord of the rākṣasas then addressed the rākṣasas who stood near him, their speech slurred with fear, as if to scorch them with his gaze:

5. "Quickly! On my authority, tell Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa, 'Send forth the troops!' "

6. Hearing the king's words and acting on his orders, the rākṣasas, although stricken with fear, exhorted the rākṣasa warriors, who retained their composure.

7. Then all those rākṣasas of fearsome aspect said, "So be it!" After performing benedictory rites, they all presented themselves before Rāvaṇa.

8. Honoring Rāvaṇa in the prescribed fashion, all of those great chariot-warriors stood with their hands cupped in reverence, eager for the victory of their lord.

9. Then, laughing but beside himself with rage, Rāvaṇa addressed Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, and the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa.

10. "This very day, with arrows loosed from my bow and blazing like the sun at the end of a cosmic age, I shall lead Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa to the abode of Yama.

11. "This very day, through the slaughter of my enemies, I shall avenge Khara, Kumbhakarṇa, Prahasta, and Indrajit.

12. "Obscured by the clouds of my arrows, the atmosphere, directions, rivers, and even the ocean itself shall disappear from view.

13. "This very day, with waves in the form of arrows springing from the ocean that is my bow, I shall annihilate the masses of monkey troops, one division after another.

14. "This very day, like a bull elephant, I shall wreak havoc upon the lotus ponds that are the monkey troops, their faces like full-blown lotuses, their color that of lotus filaments.

15. "This very day in battle the leaders of the monkey troops, their faces riddled with arrows, shall adorn the earth, like lotuses with their protruding stalks.

16. "With each of the arrows I let fly this day in battle, I shall pierce hundreds and hundreds of the tawny monkeys, so ferocious in combat and armed with trees.

17. "Through the slaughter of the enemy, I shall, this very day, wipe away the tears of these women whose husbands, brothers, and sons have been slain.

18. "This very day, with the monkeys strewn about pierced by my arrows and robbed of life, I shall make it so that one will have to strain to see the surface of the earth.

19. "I shall, this very day, let all the jackals, vultures, and other carnivorous beasts gorge on the flesh of my enemies rent by my arrows.

20. "Quickly! Get my chariot ready. Bring my bow at once! Let those night-roaming rākṣasas who remain follow me into battle."

21. When Mahāpārśva heard those words of his, he addressed these words to the commanders of the army, who stood nearby, "Assemble the troops at once!"

22. And the commanders of the army then, in great agitation, raced about Laṅkā with rapid strides, rousting the rākṣasas from house after house.

23–25. In a short time, fearsome-faced rākṣasas of fearsome valor issued forth, roaring. They had mighty arms and bore all manner of weapons: swords, spears, lances, maces, cudgels, ploughshares, sharp-edged javelins, huge mallets and war hammers, clubs, shining discuses, sharp battle-axes, short javelins, hundred-slayers, and other splendid weapons.

26. Then, acting on Rāvaṇa's orders, four commanders of the army swiftly brought up a chariot yoked with eight horses and driven by a charioteer.

27. Rāvaṇa then mounted that celestial chariot, which blazed with its own splendor. In the excess of his power, it seemed as if he would tear up the earth itself.

28. With Rāvaṇa's consent, Mahāpārśva, Mahodara, and the unassailable Virūpākṣa then mounted their chariots.

29. Bellowing in their excitement, as if to rend the earth itself, they marched forth, eager for victory, releasing fearsome roars.

30. And thus, endowed with blazing energy and surrounded by the hosts of rākṣasa troops, Rāvaṇa marched forth. Holding his bow aloft, he resembled Yama, who brings time itself to an end.

31. Then, in his chariot drawn by swift horses, that great chariot-warrior issued forth through the gate to where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa stood.

32. Suddenly the sun grew dim and the directions were shrouded in darkness. Fierce birds screeched and the earth shook.

33. It rained blood and the horses stumbled. A vulture alighted on the tip of his flagstaff and jackals howled inauspiciously.

34. His left eye throbbed and his left arm trembled. His face grew pale; his voice grew faint.

35. And so, as the rākṣasa ten-necked Rāvaṇa raced forth to war, these manifestations appeared, presaging his death in battle.

36. A blazing meteor fell from the sky with a sound like that of a thunderclap. Vultures screeched inauspiciously, their cries echoed by the crows.

37. But, heedless of these terrible portents that appeared before him, Rāvaṇa, in his delusion, marched forth, impelled by his own impending doom, to seek his own destruction.

38. Hearing the rumbling of the great rākṣasas' chariots, the monkey army hurled itself into battle.

39. A hugely tumultuous battle then broke out between the monkeys and the rākṣasas as they challenged one another in their fury, eager for victory.

40. Then, with arrows adorned with gold, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, in his rage, wrought a tremendous slaughter among the monkey hosts.

41. Some of the wrinkle-faced monkeys were beheaded by Rāvaṇa, while others were struck dead, their breathing stopped forever. Still others had their flanks ripped open. Some had their heads shattered, while others had their eyes torn out.

42. Wherever ten-faced Rāvaṇa moved through the battle in his chariot, his eyes wide with fury, the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys could not withstand the crushing force of his arrows.

The end of the eighty-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 84

1. Thus did Rāvaṇa litter the ground, covering it with tawny monkeys, their limbs severed by his arrows.

2. The leaping monkeys could no more withstand Rāvaṇa's single-handed and irresistible barrage of arrows than can moths a blazing fire.

3. Tormented by those sharp arrows, they ran shrieking in all directions, as might elephants burned by the flames of a forest fire that surrounds them.

4. Rāvaṇa careened through the battle, scattering with his arrows the hosts of leaping monkeys, as would a mighty wind great banks of clouds.

5. Having swiftly wrought his slaughter of the forest-dwelling monkeys, the rākṣasa lord then immediately approached Rāghava in battle.

6. When Sugrīva saw his monkeys broken in battle and fleeing in all directions, he placed Suṣeṇa in charge of the encampment and resolved to enter the fight at once.

7. Having placed that heroic monkey, his equal, in charge, Sugrīva turned his face toward the enemy and set forth armed with a tree.

8. All the troop leaders, whether at his side or in his train, voluntarily followed him, wielding huge boulders and various gigantic trees.

9. Roaring with a mighty voice in battle, great Sugrīva began to slaughter the principal rākṣasas, felling various others as well.

10. The gigantic lord of the monkeys knocked down the rākṣasas, as the mighty gale at the end of a cosmic age does full-grown trees.

11. He showered hails of stones upon the rākṣasa hosts, just as a storm cloud might a shower of hailstones on flocks of birds in the forest.

12. Their heads shattered by the hails of boulders released by the king of the monkeys, the rākṣasas crumpled like mountains cut to pieces.

13–14. As the rākṣasas were being annihilated on every side by Sugrīva, routed, falling, and crying out, the unassailable rākṣasa Virūpākṣa, calling out his own name, took up his bow and, leaping from his chariot, mounted the back of a war-elephant.

15. Once the great chariot-warrior Virūpākṣa had mounted the elephant, he charged at the monkeys, unleashing a terrifying roar.

16. He loosed fearsome arrows at Sugrīva in the vanguard of the army and, rallying the frightened rākṣasas, he made them hold their lines.

17. Completely riddled with sharp arrows by that rākṣasa, the irascible lord of the monkeys flew into a rage and resolved to kill him.

18. Then, uprooting a tree, the heroic tawny monkey leapt forward and, in battle, struck Virūpākṣa's great war-elephant in the face.

19. Stricken with that blow by Sugrīva, the great elephant staggered back a bow length and collapsed, bellowing.

20–21. Jumping clear of the wounded elephant, the mighty rākṣasa turned to face the monkey, who stood his ground. Seizing his sword and oxhide shield, he advanced upon Sugrīva with swift strides, reviling him.

22. In his rage at Virūpākṣa, Sugrīva seized a boulder as huge as a storm cloud and hurled it at him.

23. Seeing that boulder hurtling toward him, the immensely valiant bull among rākṣasas dodged it and then struck Sugrīva with his sword.

24. In a towering rage, he cut away Sugrīva's armor with his sword there in the forefront of battle. Struck with that sword, the monkey fell.

25. But the fallen monkey sprang up and unleashed a blow with the palm of his hand, which, with its terrifying sound, was like a thunderbolt.

26. The rākṣasa, however, skillfully dodged the blow that Sugrīva had dealt and in return struck him on the chest with his fist.

27. Now, when Sugrīva, lord of the monkeys, saw that the rākṣasa had dodged his blow, he grew even more enraged.

28. Then, spying an opening, the monkey, in his rage, brought his huge palm down upon Virūpākṣa's temple.

29. Struck by that palm, which was like the thunderbolt of great Indra, he fell to the ground, drenched in gore and vomiting blood.

30. Drenched with foaming blood, his eyes rolling with rage, Virūpākṣa appeared to the monkeys to have his eyes still more disfigured than before.

31. The monkeys watched their enemy as, drenched in blood, he rolled in convulsions from side to side, moaning piteously.

32. Then those vast and powerful armies—that of the monkeys and that of the rākṣasas—who were engaged in battle, roared fearsomely, like two great oceans that have crashed beyond their shorelines.

33. When the combined host of the monkeys and the rākṣasas saw the immensely powerful rākṣasa Virūpākṣa, his eyes disfigured, slain by the king of the tawny monkeys, it became as agitated as the Ganges in raging flood.

The end of the eighty-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 85

1. As the two armies were being rapidly slaughtered by each other in that tremendous battle, they both were vastly diminished, like two lakes in the scorching heat of summer.

2. At the slaughter of his troops and the slaying of Virūpākṣa, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, grew doubly furious.

3. Seeing his army decimated by the wrinkle-faced monkeys and thus diminished, he realized that the fortunes of war had turned against him and he grew agitated.

4. He said to Mahodara, tamer of his foes, who stood beside him, "At this point, great-armed warrior, you are my only hope of victory.

5. "Annihilate the army of our enemies, hero! Demonstrate this day your valor! Now is the time to repay your obligation to your master. Fight bravely!"

6. Addressed in this fashion, Mahodara replied, "So be it," to the rākṣasa lord and then plunged into the enemy army, like a moth into a fire.

7. Then, urged on by his master's words and his own valor, that immensely powerful rākṣasa, filled with blazing energy, sowed destruction among the monkeys.

8. Then Sugrīva, seeing the vast monkey army routed, ran toward Mahodara, who happened to be nearby.

9. Seizing a huge and fearsome boulder as big as a mountain, the immensely powerful lord of the tawny monkeys hurled it in order to kill Mahodara.

10. When Mahodara saw that unstoppable boulder hurtling violently toward him, he was not in the least agitated, and he cut it to pieces with his arrows.

11. Shattered into a thousand fragments by the rākṣasa with his torrents of arrows, the boulder fell to earth, like a frenzied flock of vultures descending.

12. When Sugrīva saw that his boulder had been shattered, he was beside himself with rage. Uprooting a sāla tree, he hurled it at the rākṣasa in the forefront of battle. But that heroic conqueror of enemy citadels cut it to pieces with his arrows.

13. In his rage, Sugrīva then spied an iron club that had fallen to the ground. He brandished that blazing iron club and made a display of it before his foe. Then, with its tip, he violently struck down Mahodara's splendid horses.

14. Jumping down from his huge chariot, now that its horses had been slain, the heroic rākṣasa Mahodara, in his rage, seized a mace.

15. Like two bellowing bulls, the two heroes closed with each other in combat. With one holding a mace and the other an iron club, they resembled two storm clouds streaked with lightning.

16. The lord of the tawny monkeys struck the rākṣasa's mace with his iron club; but, shattered by that mace, his iron club fell to the ground.

17. Then Sugrīva, filled with blazing energy, snatched up from the ground a fearsome iron cudgel, fully ornamented with gold.

18. Raising it aloft, he threw it, just as Mahodara hurled a second mace. The two collided and fell, shattered, to the earth.

19. Their weapons shattered, the two warriors closed in combat with their fists. Filled with strength and blazing energy, they resembled two blazing fires, eaters of oblations.

20. They struck at each other and roared again and again. Slapping each other with their open hands, they both fell to the ground.

21. Jumping swiftly to their feet, they struck each other once again. The two heroes flailed at each other with their arms, yet neither could get the better of the other.

22. Then the immensely swift rākṣasa Mahodara seized a sword and a shield that were lying nearby.

23. But, swifter still, Sugrīva, foremost of monkeys, also seized a huge sword and shield that had fallen.

24. Their very bodies suffused with rage, the two warriors, skilled in the use of weapons, hurled themselves at each other on the battlefield, swords raised, roaring in the fury of battle.

25. Raging at each other and intent on victory, the two quickly circled each other to the right and to the left.

26. Then the immensely swift hero, evil-minded Mahodara, praiseworthy for his valor, brought his sword down upon Sugrīva's great shield.

27. The sword lodged in the shield; and, as Mahodara struggled to free it, that elephant among monkeys, with his sword, cut off the rākṣasa's head, along with its helmet and earrings.

28. When they saw that, the army of the rākṣasa lord—who had fallen to the ground with his head cut off—fled.

29. Having slain Mahodara, the tawny monkey was overjoyed, and he and his monkeys roared in unison. Ten-necked Rāvaṇa was enraged, while Rāghava appeared delighted.

The end of the eighty-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 86

1. Once Mahodara had been struck down, the immensely powerful Mahāpārśva wrought havoc with his arrows upon Aṅgada's fearsome army.

2. On every side, he struck off the heads from the bodies of the principal monkeys, just as the wind might fruit from its stalk.

3. In a towering rage, the rākṣasa, with his arrows, cut off the arms and shoulders of some of the monkeys and tore open the sides of others.

4. Afflicted by Mahāpārśva with his hail of arrows, the monkeys, their faces cast down in despair, were stunned.

5. Now, when great-armed Aṅgada saw that his army was cowed and afflicted by the rākṣasa, he surged powerfully forward, like the ocean on the new- or full-moon day.

6. Seizing an iron club, whose radiance was like that of the sun's rays, the foremost of monkeys brought it down in combat upon Mahāpārśva.

7. Stunned by that blow, Mahāpārśva fell senseless from his chariot to the ground along with his charioteer.

8. At this point, the extraordinarily powerful Gavākṣa, filled with blazing energy and resembling a mass of black collyrium, accompanied by Jāmbavān, the king of the apes, burst forth from his own troop, which resembled a great storm cloud.

9. In his rage, he seized a huge boulder that resembled a mountain peak, swiftly killed Mahāpārśva's horses, and smashed his chariot.

10. But regaining consciousness after a short while, immensely powerful Mahāpārśva once again riddled Aṅgada with numerous arrows.

11. He struck Jāmbavān, king of the apes, in the center of his chest with three arrows and hit Gavākṣa with many more.

12. Now, when Aṅgada saw Gavākṣa and Jāmbavān tormented by arrows, he was beside himself with rage, and he seized a fearsome iron club.

13–14. Enraged at that rākṣasa, who stood at a distance, Vālin's powerful son, Aṅgada, grasped with both hands that iron club, whose radiance was like that of the sun's rays, and, whirling it about, he hurled it at Mahāpārśva in an effort to kill him.

15. Hurled by the powerful monkey, the iron club struck the bow and arrows from the rākṣasa's hand and knocked off his helmet.

16. Rushing violently upon him in his rage, the valorous son of Vālin struck him with his palm just below the ear, where his earring hung.

17. But the immensely powerful Mahāpārśva of blazing splendor was enraged in turn and seized an immense battle-axe with one hand.

18. In a towering rage, the rākṣasa brought down that weapon—honed with oil, spotless, solid, and made of the essence of the mountains—upon Vālin's son.

19. He swung the battle-axe powerfully at Aṅgada's left shoulder blade, but, in his fury, Aṅgada dodged it.

20. In a towering rage, heroic Aṅgada, equal in valor to his own father, clenched his adamantine fist.

21. Knowing all the body's vital points, he brought that fist, whose impact was equal to that of Indra's thunderbolt, down upon the rākṣasa's chest, just over his heart.

22. By virtue of that blow delivered in that great battle, the rākṣasa's heart burst, and he fell at once to the ground, dead.

23. When he had fallen to the ground, his army was deeply shaken there in that battle, but Rāvaṇa flew into a tremendous rage.

The end of the eighty-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 87

1–2. When Rāvaṇa saw that the rākṣasas Mahodara and Mahāpārśva had been slain and that the immensely powerful hero Virūpākṣa had been slain before them, a tremendous rage seized hold of him there in that great battle. He urged on his charioteer, saying these words:

3. "In killing those two, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, I shall allay my grief for my slaughtered ministers and my besieged city.

4. "I shall destroy in battle the tree that is Rāma, which dispenses fruit and has Sītā for its blossom, and whose branches are Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, Kumuda, and Nala."

5. Causing the ten directions to resound with the rumbling of his chariot, that great and splendid chariot-warrior raced swiftly onward and charged directly at Rāghava.

6. Filled with that sound, the entire earth, along with its rivers, mountains, and forests, its boar, deer, and elephants, shook.

7. Rāvaṇa then produced the extremely horrifying and fearsome divine weapon-spell, the Tāmasa, bringer of darkness, and, with it, he scorched all the monkeys. They fled on every side.

8. When Rāghava saw that those numerous hosts had been routed in their hundreds by Rāvaṇa's splendid arrows, he took up his battle stance.

9–10. Rāvaṇa then spied the unconquerable Rāma, who stood there with his brother Lakṣmaṇa like Vāsava with Viṣṇu. Holding aloft his great bow, the long-armed, lotus-eyed tamer of his foes seemed as if to scrape the very sky.

11. Meanwhile, Rāghava, for his part, seeing the monkeys routed in battle and Rāvaṇa rushing toward him, was delighted. He grasped his bow in the middle.

12. Then he began to twang that magnificent bow powerfully and loudly, as if to shatter the earth itself.

13. As Rāvaṇa came within the range of the princes' arrows, he looked like Rāhu, the demon of the eclipse, as he bears down upon the sun and the hare-marked moon.

14. The streams of Rāvaṇa's arrows and the sound of Rāma twanging his bow knocked the rākṣasas down by the hundred.

15. Eager to be the first to fight Rāvaṇa with his own sharp arrows, Lakṣmaṇa drew his bow and released arrows that were like flames of fire.

16. But no sooner had those arrows been released by the bowman Lakṣmaṇa than the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa intercepted them in the air with his own arrows.

17. He cut down one of Lakṣmaṇa's arrows with one of his own, three with three, and ten with ten, thus displaying his deftness of hand.

18. Then, leaving Saumitri aside, Rāvaṇa, victorious in battle, advanced upon Rāma, who stood there as immovable as a mountain.

19. And as he advanced upon Rāma Rāghava in battle, Rāvaṇa, his eyes red with rage, unleashed hails of arrows upon him.

20. But Rāma, seeing those torrents of arrows hurtling swiftly toward him as they were loosed from Rāvaṇa's bow, quickly took up his crescent-headed arrows.

21. Then, with his sharp, crescent-headed arrows, Rāghava cut down those torrents of immensely powerful arrows, which blazed like angry, venomous serpents.

22. In this way, they swiftly showered each other—Rāghava, Rāvaṇa and Rāvaṇa, Rāghava—with all manner of sharp arrows.

23. Never yet defeated in battle, the two of them circled each other for a long time to the left and to the right in an astonishing way, each of them keeping his eyes on the trajectory of the other's arrows.

24. All creatures were terrified as those two fierce warriors, like Yama and Death himself, ender of all things, fought each other, unleashing their arrows.

25. At that time the sky was completely covered with their various arrows, just as it is at the end of the hot season by storm clouds laced with streaks of lightning.

26. The streams of their arrows—arrows that were immensely powerful, keenly honed, fletched with vulture feathers, and extremely swift—made the sky appear to be densely covered with latticework.

27. With their arrows, the two heroes then created a massive and fearsome darkness, as might two vast storm clouds arising at sunset.

28. A tumultuous battle—like that between Vṛtra and Vāsava—unequaled and unimaginable, then raged between the two warriors, each intent on killing the other.

29. Both were armed with splendid bows, both were skilled in the use of weapons, both were preeminent among those familiar with divine weapon-spells, and they hurled themselves at each other in battle.

30. As they maneuvered, waves of arrows preceded them, as might the waves of two oceans driven by the wind.

31. Then Rāvaṇa, who makes the world cry out, his hands working swiftly, unleashed a chain of iron arrows upon Rāma's forehead.

32. Although he bore that chain of iron arrows—shot from that fearsome bow and shining like the petals of a blue lotus—on his head, Rāma took no harm.

33–34. Rāma, suffused with rage, muttered sacred mantras and invoked the divine weapon-spell of Rudra. Then, taking up his arrows once again, that mighty warrior of immense blazing energy bent his bow and let them fly. Allowing no interruption in the stream of his arrows, he loosed them toward the lord of the rākṣasas.

35. But those arrows fell harmlessly on the rākṣasa lord's impenetrable armor, which resembled a huge storm cloud.

36. But then, with a splendid, divinely charged weapon, Rāma, skilled in all divine weapon-spells, pierced the rākṣasa lord through the forehead, as the latter stood in his chariot.

37. But those arrows, after shattering the splendid arrows of Rāvaṇa, were deflected by him and so entered the earth, hissing like five-headed serpents.

38. Having thus thwarted Rāghava's divinely charged weapons, Rāvaṇa, beside himself with rage, invoked yet another divine weapon-spell, the truly dreadful one belonging to the asuras.

39–40. He then released sharp arrows. The heads of some were like those of lions and tigers, while others had the heads of adjutant storks and crows. Some had the heads of vultures and falcons, while others had the heads of jackals. Some had the heads of wolves, their jaws gaping and terrifying. Still others were like five-headed serpents with flickering tongues.

41–42. Hissing like an angry serpent, the immensely powerful rākṣasa, employing his powers of illusion, then loosed still more sharp arrows at Rāma. Some of these arrows had the heads of donkeys, while others were shaped like the heads of boars. Some had the heads of dogs and cocks, while others had the heads of sea monsters and venomous serpents.

43. Assaulted by that divine weapon-spell of the asuras, the immensely energetic delight of the Raghus invoked the divine weapon-spell of Agni, the purifier, a weapon-spell that was like fire itself.

44–45. Rāma then released sharp arrows. Some of these arrows had heads blazing with fire, while some had heads like the sun. Some had heads like the moon or half-moon, while others had heads like comets. Some resembled planets and constellations, while others had heads shaped like huge meteors. Still others were like streaks of lightning.

46. Intercepted in the air by Rāghava's divinely charged weapons, Rāvaṇa's fearsome arrows disappeared, shattering into thousands of fragments.

47. When the monkeys, who could take on any form at will, saw that Rāma, tireless in action, had struck down Rāvaṇa's divinely charged weapons, they roared in delight.

The end of the eighty-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 88

1. Now, when that divine weapon-spell of his had been thwarted, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, redoubled his fury and, in his rage, invoked yet another divine weapon-spell.

2. Immensely lustrous Rāvaṇa then prepared to invoke against Rāghava that other fierce and fearsome divine weapon-spell devised by Maya, the craftsman of the asuras.

3. Then, from his bow, lances, maces, and cudgels flew forth—all of them blazing and as hard as adamant.

4. Like the mighty gales at the end of a cosmic age, there flew forth various mallets, war hammers, nooses, and blazing darts, as well as various other sharp weapons.

5. But immensely lustrous Rāghava, foremost of those familiar with the great divine weapon-spells, thwarted that divine weapon-spell with the supreme divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas.

6. But when that divine weapon-spell of his had been thwarted by great Rāghava, Rāvaṇa, his eyes red with rage, invoked the divine weapon-spell of Sūrya.

7. Then huge and blazing discuses flew forth from the bow of wise ten-necked Rāvaṇa of fearsome power.

8. As they descended on every side, they lit up the sky, as the blazing moon, sun, and planets might light up the directions, if they were to fall.

9. But, with torrents of arrows, Rāghava cut down the discuses and various other weapons of Rāvaṇa there in the vanguard of the army.

10. When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, saw that that divine weapon-spell had been thwarted, he riddled Rāma in all his vital points with ten arrows.

11. Nonetheless, although Rāvaṇa had riddled him with ten arrows loosed from his mighty bow, immensely powerful Rāghava was not shaken in the least.

12. And then Rāghava, victorious in battle, in a towering rage, riddled Rāvaṇa in every limb with numerous arrows.

13. At this juncture, Rāghava's younger brother, mighty Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, took up seven arrows in a rage.

14. And, with those seven immensely powerful arrows, that immensely lustrous hero shredded Rāvaṇa's battle flag with its image of a human head.

15. With a single arrow, majestic and immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa took off the head of the charioteer of the rākṣasa, son of chaos, along with its glittering earrings.

16. And with five sharp arrows Lakṣmaṇa cut to pieces the rākṣasa lord's bow, so like an elephant's trunk, along with his arrows.

17. Meanwhile, Vibhīṣaṇa leapt forward and, with his mace, slew Rāvaṇa's splendid horses, as huge as mountains and resembling black storm clouds.

18. Jumping swiftly down from his great chariot, now that its horses had been slain, powerful Rāvaṇa conceived a burning rage toward his brother.

19. Then the valorous and immensely powerful rākṣasa lord hurled at Vibhīṣaṇa a blazing javelin that was like a blazing bolt of lightning.

20. But Lakṣmaṇa cut it to pieces with three arrows before it reached Vibhīṣaṇa. At that, a mighty roar went up in the battle from the monkeys.

21. Encircled with gold, the javelin fell to earth cut into four pieces, like a huge glowing meteor falling from the sky in a shower of blazing sparks.

22. Then Rāvaṇa took up a huge javelin, which he prized greatly. It glowed with its own blazing energy, and even Kāla himself could not withstand it.

23. Brandished violently by the mighty but evil-minded Rāvaṇa, that supremely terrifying weapon blazed with a splendor equal to that of Śakra's thunderbolt.

24. At that very moment, heroic Lakṣmaṇa ran quickly to Vibhīṣaṇa, who was now in mortal danger.

25. In order to save him, heroic Lakṣmaṇa drew back his bow and, with a hail of arrows, showered Rāvaṇa, who stood there, javelin in hand.

26. Pelted by that torrent of arrows let loose by great Lakṣmaṇa, Rāvaṇa, his martial ardor now diverted, decided not to strike his brother.

27. Seeing that Lakṣmaṇa had saved his brother, Rāvaṇa positioned himself so that he faced Lakṣmaṇa and said these words:

28. "Since you, so proud of your strength, have saved Vibhīṣaṇa in this fashion, this javelin, sparing the rākṣasa, will now fall upon you.

29. "After piercing your heart, this blood-stained javelin, flung by the iron club that is my arm, will fly on its way, taking with it your life breaths."

30–31. When he had spoken in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, taking aim at Lakṣmaṇa, roared and, in a towering rage, hurled that javelin. With its eight bells it made a terrific sound. Maya, the craftsman of the asuras, had forged it with his magical powers so that it was infallible in slaying one's enemies. It glowed with blazing energy.

32. Hurled with terrifying force and emitting a roar like that of Śakra's thunderbolt, the javelin struck Lakṣmaṇa with tremendous impact there in the forefront of battle.

33. But even as that javelin was hurtling toward Lakṣmaṇa, Rāma Rāghava addressed it, saying, "May Lakṣmaṇa be spared! And may you, your energy thwarted, be foiled!"

34. Nonetheless, that immensely brilliant weapon, flashing like the flickering tongue of a serpent king, fell with tremendous force on Lakṣmaṇa's broad chest.

35. Then Lakṣmaṇa, his heart pierced by that javelin, so deeply embedded through Rāvaṇa's strength, fell to the ground.

36. When Rāghava of enormous blazing energy, who was nearby, saw Lakṣmaṇa in that condition, his heart sank out of love for his brother.

37. He remained lost for a moment in thought, his eyes filled with tears. Then he flared up in anger, like the fire at the end of a cosmic age.

38. Reflecting, "This is no time for despondency," Rāghava began a tumultuous battle, intent upon slaying Rāvaṇa.

39. Rāma then gazed at Lakṣmaṇa, who, pierced by that javelin in the great battle and drenched in blood, resembled a mountain with a mighty serpent.

40. Try as they might, the foremost among the tawny monkeys, harried as they were by the swift-handed rākṣasa with his torrents of arrows, were unable to extract the javelin that had been flung by mighty Rāvaṇa.

41. But Rāma, in the rage of battle, seized with both hands that terrifying javelin, which, having transfixed Saumitri, was embedded in the earth. Wrenching it out violently, he broke it in two.

42. But even as Rāma was wrenching out the javelin, mighty Rāvaṇa pelted his every limb with arrows that pierced his vitals.

43. Heedless of those arrows, Rāghava embraced Lakṣmaṇa and then said this to Hanumān and Sugrīva: "Foremost of monkeys, you must stay here and care for Lakṣmaṇa.

44. "The moment to display my valor is now at hand, a moment I have long awaited, as does a thirsty cātaka the sight of rain clouds at the end of the hot season. Now the evil-minded ten-necked Rāvaṇa of evil intent must die.

45. "I give you my solemn word here and now, monkeys, that very soon you shall see a world that is either without Rāvaṇa or without Rāma.

46–47. "For once I have slain Rāvaṇa in battle today, I will put behind me all the terrible suffering and hellish torment that I endured: the loss of my kingdom, the sojourn in the wilderness, the wandering in the Daṇḍaka, the assault on Vaidehī, and the clashes with the rākṣasas.

48–49. "For that evil wretch—on whose account I bridged and crossed the ocean and brought the monkey army here after slaying Vālin in combat and placing Sugrīva on the throne—has now come within my sight here in battle.

50. "Indeed, once he comes within the range of my sight, Rāvaṇa can no more survive than can a person seen by a serpent whose mere glance is deadly venom.

51. "So, unassailable bulls among monkeys, you should seat yourselves comfortably on the mountaintops and watch the battle between Rāvaṇa and me.

52. "This very day let the three worlds, along with the gandharvas, the gods, the seers, and the celestial bards, witness in battle what makes Rāma Rāma.

53. "Today, I shall perform such a feat that all the worlds, with their moving and fixed contents and including the gods themselves, will talk about as long as the earth shall endure."

54. When he had spoken in this fashion, Rāma, with great concentration, struck ten-necked Rāvaṇa in battle with sharp arrows adorned with burnished gold.

55. And Rāvaṇa, in turn, then showered Rāma with blazing iron arrows and cudgels, as might a storm cloud with its torrential rains.

56. And a tumultuous sound arose as the various arrows loosed by Rāma and Rāvaṇa crashed into one another.

57. Broken and scattered, the arrows of Rāma and Rāvaṇa fell from the sky to the ground, their arrowheads blazing.

58. The deafening sound of the bowstrings of Rāma and Rāvaṇa striking against their armguards was almost miraculous, and it terrified all beings.

59. Rāvaṇa was covered with dense hails of arrows and thus tormented by the great wielder of the blazing bow. Having first joined battle, he now fled in terror, like a great storm cloud driven before the wind.

The end of the eighty-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 89

1. When Rāma had thus given tumultuous battle to evil-minded Rāvaṇa, he spoke these words to Suṣeṇa, even as he continued to discharge his torrents of arrows:

2. "Here is heroic Lakṣmaṇa, fallen to the ground through the power of Rāvaṇa. He is writhing like a snake, filling me with sorrow.

3. "When I see that hero, dearer to me than life itself, drenched with blood, my mind is in such turmoil that I wonder what power I have left to fight.

4. "For if my brother, so praiseworthy in battle and marked with auspicious signs, has truly returned to the elements, then of what use to me is pleasure or indeed life itself?

5. "For my valor itself seems to hang its head in shame, while my bow seems to slip from my grasp. My arrows drop away, and my sight is dimmed with tears. Dreadful thoughts grow in my mind, and I wish now only for death."

6. Thus did Rāma, his senses overwhelmed, lament in the greatest despair when he saw his brother struck down by evil-minded Rāvaṇa.

7. "Seeing my brother Lakṣmaṇa struck down in the dust of the battlefield, I have no further use for battle, for my life, or even for Sītā herself.

8. "Now that Lakṣmaṇa lies slain in the forefront of battle, what use have I for kingship or for life itself? There is now no longer any purpose to this war."

9. Then, consoling Rāma, heroic Suṣeṇa spoke these words: "Great-armed Lakṣmaṇa, increaser of prosperity, is not dead.

10. "For his face has not altered, nor has it darkened or lost its radiance. Indeed, his countenance looks quite radiant and clear.

11. "The palms of his hands are as red as the lotus, and his eyes are clear. This is not the way people look, lord of the peoples, when their life breaths have left them. So do not despair, heroic tamer of your foes. He is still alive.

12. "As he lies here unconscious, his limbs sprawling on the ground, the rhythmic movement of his chest proclaims that he still lives, hero."

13. Once Suṣeṇa, skilled in speech, had uttered these words to Rāghava, he immediately said this to Hanumān, who stood nearby:

14–15. "Go swiftly hence, gentle friend, to the splendid mountain known as the mountain of healing herbs, which Jāmbavān told you about earlier. Then bring back the splendid healing herb known as viśalyakaraṇī, the healer of arrow wounds, which grows on its southernmost peak.

16. "Go swiftly and, in order to revive the great hero Lakṣmaṇa, you must also bring the sauvarṇakaraṇī, the restorer of a golden glow, the saṃjīvanī, the restorer of life, and the saṃdhānakaraṇī, the joiner of limbs."

17. Addressed in this fashion, Hanumān proceeded to the mountain of healing herbs. But, unable to identify those potent herbs, the majestic monkey fell to brooding.

18. But then Māruti of immeasurable blazing energy had this idea: "I will take this mountain peak and go back!

19. "For if I were to return without bringing the viśalyakaraṇī, the healer of arrow wounds, the loss of time would lead to dire consequences and there might be a serious calamity."

20. Reflecting thus, immensely powerful Hanumān immediately descended on the peak of that mountain and, seizing it, flew off.

21. "I could not identify those healing herbs, bull among tawny monkeys; so I brought the entire mountain peak."

22. Suṣeṇa, foremost of monkeys, praised the son of Pavana, who was speaking in this fashion. Then he plucked and gathered the healing herbs.

23. Then that foremost of monkeys, Suṣeṇa of immense luster, crushed one of the herbs and held it to Lakṣmaṇa's nose.

24. No sooner had that slayer of enemy heroes, Lakṣmaṇa, who had been pierced by that javelin, inhaled that aroma than he leapt up from the ground, free from the javelin and the pain it had caused.

25. When the tawny monkeys saw that Lakṣmaṇa had leapt up from the ground, they were delighted and, crying, "Excellent! Excellent!" they honored Suṣeṇa.

26. Then Rāma, slayer of enemy heroes, addressed Lakṣmaṇa, saying, "Come to me, come to me." His eyes clouded with tears, he embraced him tightly in his affection.

27. Embracing Saumitri, Rāghava then said to him, "Thank heavens, I see you, hero, risen from the dead.

28. "Sītā, victory, and life itself have no meaning for me. For if you had returned to the elements, what purpose, indeed, would I have had in living?"

29. As great Rāma was speaking in this fashion, Lakṣmaṇa, distressed at this fainthearted speech, said these words:

30. "Having first made that vow, truly valorous warrior, you must not now speak in this fashion, like some weak and insignificant person.

31. "For, blameless hero, the virtuous do not falsify their vows. Indeed, the keeping of one's vows is the sign of greatness.

32. "So enough of your giving way to despair on my account, blameless hero. You must keep your vow by slaying Rāvaṇa this very day.

33. "For once he comes within range of your arrows, your enemy will no more escape with his life than would a great bull elephant that comes within the clutches of a roaring, sharp-fanged lion.

34. "I long for the swift death of that evil-minded wretch before the sun, bringer of day, sets behind the western mountain, his day's work done."

The end of the eighty-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 90

1. When Rāghava had heard those words uttered by Lakṣmaṇa, he loosed fearsome arrows at Rāvaṇa there in the vanguard of the army.

2. But ten-necked Rāvaṇa, mounted in his chariot, in turn pelted Rāma with enormously fearsome arrows that resembled thunderbolts, as might a storm cloud with torrents of rain.

3. Nonetheless, Rāma, with great concentration, pierced ten-necked Rāvaṇa in battle with arrows, which, adorned with gold, resembled blazing fires.

4. Then the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas declared, "This combat between Rāma, who is standing on the ground, and the rākṣasa, mounted in his chariot, is not fair."

5–7. Just then, shining like the rising sun, the majestic and splendid chariot of the king of the gods, ornamented with hundreds of bells, its body studded with gold, its yoke pole made of lapis, and its flagstaff made of gold, descended from Triviṣṭapa, Indra's heaven. It was yoked with splendid tawny horses, which, with their golden plumes, white tufts, and ornaments of gold fretwork, were as radiant as the sun. It drew near to Kākutstha.

8. Standing in the chariot and holding the whip, Mātali, the charioteer of thousand-eyed Indra, cupped his hands in reverence and spoke these words to Rāma:

9. "Thousand-eyed Indra has given you this majestic, foe-destroying chariot so that you may obtain victory, mighty Kākutstha.

10. "And here, too, are Indra's great bow, armor shining like fire, arrows as brilliant as the sun, and a sharp, glittering javelin.

11. "So mount this chariot, heroic Rāma, and, with me as your charioteer, slay the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa, just as did great Indra the dānavas."

12. Addressed in this fashion, Rāma respectfully circumambulated the chariot and, after reverentially saluting Mātali, mounted it, illuminating the worlds with his splendor as he did so.

13. Then there ensued an astonishing and hair-raising chariot duel between great-armed Rāma and the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa.

14. Rāghava, who had mastered the most powerful divine weapon-spells, thwarted each divine weapon-spell of the rākṣasa king with one of his own—a divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas with a divine weapon-spell of the gandharvas, a divine weapon-spell of the gods with a divine weapon-spell of the gods.

15. Then, in a towering rage, the lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas invoked the supremely fearsome divine weapon-spell of the rākṣasas.

16. Loosed from Rāvaṇa's bow, the arrows, adorned with gold, turned into venomous serpents and sped toward Kākutstha.

17. With gaping jaws and mouths aflame, those terrifying serpents hurtled toward Rāma, spewing blazing fire from their mouths.

18. All the cardinal directions were filled, and the intermediate ones covered, by those serpents with their blazing hoods and deadly venom. Their very touch was equal to that of the great serpent Vāsuki.

19. But when Rāma saw those serpents hurtling toward him in battle, he produced the dreadful and fear-inspiring divine weapon-spell of Garuḍa.

20. Loosed from Rāghava's bow, the gold-fletched arrows, blazing like fire, turned into golden eagles, the foes of the serpents, and intercepted them.

21. Rāma's arrows, which could take on any form at will, took the form of eagles and struck down all of those swift arrows, which had taken on the form of serpents.

22. Enraged at the thwarting of his divine weapon-spell, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, pelted Rāma with dreadful hails of arrows.

23. Then, after harassing Rāma, tireless in action, with a thousand arrows, he riddled Mātali with a veritable torrent of them.

24. After first knocking the golden battle standard to the floor of the chariot, Rāvaṇa struck down Indra's horses with a mass of arrows.

25. Then, seeing that Rāma was hard pressed, the gods, gandharvas, dānavas, celestial bards, perfected beings, and supreme seers became despondent.

26. And the foremost of monkeys, together with Vibhīṣaṇa, seeing the moon in the form of Rāma swallowed up, as it were, by Rāhu, the demon of the eclipse in the form of Rāvaṇa, were similarly distressed.

27. Mercury, the planet baleful to all creatures, stood in occlusion of Rohiṇī, the constellation beloved of the hare-marked moon and presided over by Prajāpati, lord of creatures.

28. The sea seemed to be ablaze, its waves shrouded in smoke. Heaving upward in its fury, it seemed almost to touch the sun, bringer of day.

29. The sun, bringer of day, its rays dimmed, its color that of iron, looked ghastly. In conjunction with a smoke-bannered comet, it seemed to be crossed by a headless trunk.

30. And Mars stood in occlusion of Viśākhā, the constellation of the ruling House of Kosala. This constellation, whose presiding deities are Indra and Agni, was clearly visible in the sky.

31. With his ten faces and twenty arms, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, grasping his bow, looked like Mount Maināka.

32. Hard pressed by the rākṣasa ten-necked Rāvaṇa in the forefront of the battle, Rāma was unable even to nock his arrows.

33. Knitting his brows in anger, his eyes turning red with fury, Rāma flew into a towering rage, seeming almost to scorch his foe with his gaze.

The end of the ninetieth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 91

1. At the sight of the face of wise Rāma in his fury, all creatures were stricken with terror, and the earth itself trembled.

2. The mountain, with its lions and tigers and its deeply rooted trees, shook violently, while the ocean, lord of rivers, grew wildly agitated.

3. And, on every side, ominous birds with harsh cries, braying like donkeys, circled in the sky, screeching.

4. Seeing Rāma in such a towering rage and observing those extremely dire portents, all creatures were stricken with terror, and fear entered Rāvaṇa's heart.

5–6. The gods, standing in their aerial chariots, the gandharvas, the great serpents, seers, dānavas, daityas, and the great birds, who soar through the sky, then watched the battle between those two heroes as they engaged with their various fearsome weapons. It seemed like the destruction of the universe.

7. And as they watched that great duel, all the gods and asuras, hostile as always to each other, shouted words of support in their excitement.

8. Arrayed in their ranks, the asuras shouted, "Be victorious!" to ten-necked Rāvaṇa, while the gods cried out again and again to Rāma, "May you be victorious!"

9–12. At this juncture, evil-minded Rāvaṇa, in his rage at Rāghava, fingered his mighty weapons in his desire to strike him down. Then, blazing, as it were, with fury, he seized a lance. Hard as adamant and emitting a mighty clangor, it was lethal to all enemies. Fitted with barbs as huge as mountain peaks, it was fearsome to look upon. Sharp-tipped and belching smoke, as it were, it resembled the holocaust at the end of a cosmic era. It was so vastly terrifying and irresistible that even Kāla himself could not stand before it. Rending and cutting, it was a terror to all beings.

13. Surrounded in battle by many heroic rākṣasas, mighty Rāvaṇa, in a towering rage, grasped that lance in the middle.

14. His eyes red with rage, the gigantic warrior raised the lance on high and roared frighteningly in battle, encouraging his forces.

15. That terrifying roar of the rākṣasa lord caused the earth, the atmosphere, and the cardinal and intermediate directions to tremble.

16. At that roar of the extremely loudly roaring and evil-minded rākṣasa, all beings were filled with terror and the sea grew tumultuous.

17. Grasping his huge lance, the immensely powerful Rāvaṇa released a tremendous roar and spoke harshly to Rāma:

18. "Wielded by me in my wrath, Rāma, this lance, hard as adamant, will instantly steal away your life breaths though you have your brother as an ally.

19. "Arrogant in battle though you be, this very day, striking you down, I shall quickly reduce you to the state of the rākṣasa heroes who have been slain in the forefront of battle.

20. "Stand your ground, Rāghava, for I shall now kill you with my lance!" When the overlord of the rākṣasas had spoken in this fashion, he hurled his lance.

21. As it hurtled onward, Rāghava strove to stop it with hails of arrows, just as Vāsava might strive to suppress with torrents of rain the fire that blazes up at the end of a cosmic age.

22. But Rāvaṇa's great lance burned up the arrows loosed from Rāma's bow, as a blazing fire might so many moths.

23. When Rāghava saw his arrows shattered and reduced to ashes in the air by the impact of that lance, he was furious.

24. In a towering rage, Rāghava, the delight of the Raghus, then took up a javelin that had been crafted for Vāsava, and which Mātali had brought.

25. Hefted by that mighty warrior, the javelin, resounding with the sound of its bells, lit up the sky, like a blazing meteor at the end of a cosmic age.

26. Once hurled, it collided with the lance of the rākṣasa lord. Shattered by the javelin, the great lance fell, its blazing splendor dimmed.

27. Then Rāma riddled Rāvaṇa's swift horses with arrows, arrows that were powerful, swift, hard as adamant, and sharp.

28. Rāghava pierced Rāvaṇa in the chest with sharp arrows and again, concentrating his energies, through the forehead with three feathered shafts.

29. His entire body pierced with arrows, gushing blood from every limb, the rākṣasa lord in the midst of that host looked like an aśoka tree in full bloom.

30. His every limb riddled with Rāma's arrows and his body drenched with blood, the lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas grew weary there in the midst of his hosts, and he gave way to a towering rage.

The end of the ninety-first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 92

1. Stricken in battle by Rāma in his wrath, Rāvaṇa, arrogant in battle, gave way to a towering rage.

2. His eyes blazing with fury, that mighty warrior drew back his bow and, in his rage, assailed Rāghava in that ultimate battle.

3. Rāvaṇa filled Rāma with his arrows, just as a storm cloud fills a pond with its thousands of arrowlike torrents of rain from the sky.

4. Although riddled with a mass of arrows loosed from the bow in battle, Kākutstha, as unshakeable as a mighty mountain, did not so much as tremble.

5. Standing firm in battle, the mighty warrior slowed that mass of arrows with arrows of his own, so that he received them as if they were no more than rays of sunshine.

*6. Then, enraged, the nimble-handed night-roaming rākṣasa sank thousands of arrows into great Rāghava's chest.

7. Drenched with blood in battle, Lakṣmaṇa's elder brother looked like a great kiṃśuka tree in full bloom in the forest.

8. Enraged by the blows of those arrows, immensely powerful Kākutstha, in turn, took up arrows whose radiance was like that of the sun at the end of a cosmic age.

9. In their fury, neither Rāma nor Rāvaṇa could see the other in the midst of that battle, shrouded as it was in the darkness of their arrows.

10. Then, suffused with rage, heroic Rāma, son of Daśaratha, laughed and spoke these harsh words to Rāvaṇa:

11. "You are surely no hero, lowest of the rākṣasas, since you abducted my helpless wife from Janasthāna, behind my back.

12. "You forcibly abducted Vaidehī when she was alone in the vast forest, frightened without me to protect her. And now you think, 'Oh, what a great hero am I!'

13. "Great hero! Molester of other men's wives! You commit contemptible acts against defenseless women and then think, 'Oh, what a great hero am I!'

14. "Violator of all boundaries! Shameless wretch! You are utterly lacking in character! Having brought death upon yourself, in your arrogance, you think, 'Oh, what a great hero am I!'

15. "Indeed, you, the heroic brother of Kubera, bestower of wealth, accompanied by your troops, have accomplished a great, praiseworthy, and glorious deed.

16. "This very day, you shall receive the truly fitting reward for this evil and contemptible act that you committed in your arrogance.

17. "'Oh, what a great hero am I,' that is how you think of yourself, evil-minded wretch, and yet you feel no shame for having carried off Sītā, as if you were a common thief.

18. "If you had dared to lay violent hands upon Sītā in my presence, you would have then and there joined your brother Khara, whom I had earlier slain with arrows.

19. "But now, evil-minded wretch, by my good fortune, you have come into my presence, and, this very day, with my sharp arrows, I shall convey you to the abode of Yama.

20. "This very day, carrion eaters will drag off your head, along with its glittering earrings, as it rolls in the dust of the battlefield, severed by my arrows.

21. "Let the vultures alight on your chest as you sprawl on the ground, Rāvaṇa, and thirstily drink the blood flowing from the wounds made by my arrowheads.

22. "This very day, as you lie dead riddled with my arrows, the carrion birds shall drag out your intestines, as eagles do serpents."

23. Speaking in this fashion, Rāma, annihilator of his foes, pelted the rākṣasa lord, who stood nearby, with hails of arrows.

24. Since he was so eager for the destruction of his enemy, Rāma's valor, strength, zeal for battle, and the power of his divine weapon-spells were all redoubled.

25. All the divine weapon-spells then manifested themselves before that celebrated warrior. And, in his excitement, that immensely powerful hero became still more nimble handed.

26. Perceiving those auspicious signs within himself, Rāma, exterminator of the rākṣasas, pressed Rāvaṇa harder still.

27. As ten-necked Rāvaṇa was being pelted by masses of stones from the tawny monkeys and by hails of arrows from Rāghava, his heart began to falter.

28. Then, his heart faltering, he could no longer deploy his weapons, draw his bow, or counter Rāma's valor in any way.

29. Even those arrows and various other weapons that he managed to deploy proved useless in battle—as he now approached the hour of his death.

30. Seeing his condition, Rāvaṇa's charioteer, who was controlling the chariot, kept his composure and slowly drove the chariot from the field of battle.

The end of the ninety-second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 93

1. Furious in his delusion, his eyes red with rage, Rāvaṇa, impelled by the power of destiny, now addressed his charioteer:

2–3. "Fool! Acting on your own authority, you treat me with contempt, as if I were weak, incompetent, devoid of manliness, cowardly, a person of no consequence, bereft of blazing energy, utterly lacking powers of illusion, and stripped of divine weapon-spells.

4. "Why have you driven off my chariot in full view of the enemy, disregarding my wishes and treating me with contempt?

5. "For now, ignoble wretch, you have utterly undermined my fame—built up over long years—as well as my valor, blazing energy, and reputation.

6. "Though I am eager for battle, you have made me look like a coward in the eyes of an enemy famed for his martial power, one who deserves to be gratified with valorous deeds.

7. "In that you stupidly failed to drive the chariot forward, fool, my conjecture that you have been bribed by the enemy must be true.

8. "This is not the action of a friend who wishes one well. Indeed, it is more typical of one's enemies. What you have done is wrong.

9. "If you are my longtime friend or if you recall my many favors, then you must quickly turn the chariot around, before my enemy departs."

10. Addressed harshly in this fashion by that fool, the charioteer, who wished his master well, addressed to Rāvaṇa these beneficial and conciliatory words:

11. "I am not afraid, nor am I a fool. I have not been suborned by your enemies, nor am I derelict in my duties. I am not lacking in my affection for you, nor have I forgotten the favors you have bestowed.

12. "My heart overflowing with love for you, I did you this favor, which has so displeased you, out of a desire for your well-being and to preserve your reputation.

13. "In this matter, great king, you should not, like some lowly and ignoble person, find fault with me, who am devoted only to your pleasure and well-being.

14. "Listen! I will tell you the reason that I turned the chariot back from the battle, as the current of a river is turned back by the rising tide.

15. "I perceived your exhaustion resulting from your mighty feats in battle. And, heroic warrior, I did not see your wonted enthusiasm and exuberance.

16. "Moreover, these chariot-horses, exhausted from drawing the chariot and overcome by the heat, are as dejected as cattle battered by torrential rain.

17. "And given all the many portents that have appeared before us, I foresee no good outcome for us.

18–20. "Moreover, a good charioteer when driving his chariot must be familiar with all of these things: the proper time and place, signs and gestures, and the despondency, exuberance, exhaustion, and relative strength and weakness of his master. He must also be familiar with the elevations and depressions of the terrain, where it is level and where it is uneven. He must know the proper time to fight and how to spot the weak points of the enemy. He must also know when to advance, when to pull back, when to stand his ground, and when to retreat.

21. "It was in order to alleviate this crushing fatigue and provide some respite for you as well as for the chariot-horses that I acted in this fitting manner.

22. "It was not on my own account, heroic warrior, that I drove the chariot off. I did this, my lord, since I was overwhelmed with love for you, my master.

23. "Command me as is proper. With my mind discharged of its obligations I shall do whatever you say, heroic slayer of your enemies,"

24. Satisfied with the charioteer's words, Rāvaṇa, lusting for battle, praised him profusely and said this:

25. "Charioteer, turn this chariot immediately toward Rāghava! Rāvaṇa shall never turn back without first killing his enemies in battle."

26. Then, having spoken in this fashion, Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, pleased, gave him a splendid and unequaled ring.

27. Then, urged on by Rāvaṇa's words, the charioteer swiftly drove the horses so that, within an instant, the great chariot of the rākṣasa lord stood before Rāma on the battlefield.

The end of the ninety-third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 94

1–2. The king of men watched the chariot of the rākṣasa king as, with its great flagstaffs, it hurtled toward him with a tremendous din. It was yoked to black horses and glowed with a fearsome radiance. It was thick with banners resembling streaks of lightning, and it displayed weapons that were like the weapons of Indra himself. It was pouring forth streams of arrows as a storm cloud might a torrential downpour.

3. As he watched his enemy's chariot, which looked like a great storm cloud and rumbled with the sound of a mountain being shattered by a lightning bolt, Rāma said to Mātali, the charioteer of thousand-eyed Indra:

4. "Mātali! Observe my enemy's chariot as it hurtles furiously toward us. Since he is rushing toward me once more so rapidly on our right flank, he must now have determined to kill me.

5. "Therefore, remain vigilant and head for my enemy's chariot for I wish to destroy him utterly, as a strong wind does a cloud that has newly formed.

6. "Now, keeping firm control of the reins, drive the chariot forward—swiftly, boldly, calmly, and with a steady heart and eye.

7. "Granted, as someone well familiar with this chariot of Indra, the smasher of citadels, you are not in need of instruction. But single-mindedly eager for battle as I am, I am merely reminding you, not giving you instruction."

8. Gratified with that speech of Rāma, Mātali, foremost of the charioteers of the gods, drove his chariot onward.

9. Then, keeping Rāvaṇa's great chariot on his right, Mātali discomfited him with the dust raised by his own wheels.

10. Then, with his arrows, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, infuriated, his eyes red and wide with rage, assailed Rāma, who faced him in his chariot.

11. Provoked by this assault, Rāma, endowed with great blazing energy, in his rage put patience aside, and there, in that battle, took up the enormously powerful bow of Indra, along with arrows and with a radiance equal to that of the sun's rays.

12. Then began the battle between the two of them, who, each intent on killing the other, resembled two proud lions face to face.

13. Anxious for the destruction of Rāvaṇa, the gods, together with the gandharvas, the perfected beings, and the great seers, assembled to watch that chariot duel.

14. Terrifying and hair-raising omens now appeared. They presaged destruction for Rāvaṇa and victory for Rāghava.

15. It rained blood over Rāvaṇa's chariot, and fierce whirlwinds arose, circling to the left.

16. A vast flock of vultures, wheeling in the sky, raced after his chariot whichever way it went.

17. Laṅkā was shrouded in an untimely twilight as crimson as a japā blossom, and, even in bright daylight, the very ground appeared to be ablaze.

18. Huge meteors flew past with a thunderous sound, accompanied by violent gusts of wind. Then, as they were clearly ominous for Rāvaṇa, they plunged the rākṣasas into despair.

19. The earth trembled wherever Rāvaṇa went, and, as the rākṣasas prepared to strike, it seemed as if something held back their arms.

20. As the rays of the sun—red and yellow, pallid and bright white—played across Rāvaṇa's body, they looked like veins of variegated ores on a mountainside.

21. Jackals, shadowed by vultures, howled angrily and inauspiciously, spewing flames from their mouths while staring him in the face.

22. The wind blew directly in the face of the rākṣasa king, whipping up dust across the battlefield and blinding him.

23. From every side, Indra's terrible thunderbolts fell upon his army with an unbearable sound. And yet, there was no rumbling of storm clouds.

24. All directions—both cardinal and intermediate—were shrouded in darkness. A huge dust storm made the sky itself impossible to see.

25. In a fearsome assault upon his chariot, dreadful sārika birds swooped down by the hundred with dreadful cries.

26. His horses incessantly shed blazing sparks from their hindquarters and tears from their eyes so that they poured forth both fire and water equally.

27. Indeed, many dreadful portents of this type appeared, foretelling great danger and presaging Rāvaṇa's destruction.

28. But, in the case of Rāma, favorable and auspicious portents arose on every side, presaging his victory.

29. Observing on the battlefield those portents that augured well for him, Rāghava, skilled in interpreting portents, was excited, and, supremely happy, he redoubled his valor in battle.

The end of the ninety-fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 95

1. Then the great battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa commenced, a fierce chariot duel that terrified all the worlds.

2. Both the rākṣasa army and the vast host of tawny monkeys stood motionless, their weapons still in their hands.

3. As they watched those two mighty warriors—man and rākṣasa—engaged in battle, their attention was riveted and all of them were struck with the greatest amazement.

4. Although their hands were filled with all sorts of weapons, their minds were filled with astonishment. Thus, they stood there gazing at that battle and struck no blows at one another.

5. With the rākṣasas gazing at Rāvaṇa and the monkeys at Rāma, both armies, their eyes wide with astonishment, seemed frozen as if in a painting.

6. Observing those various portents, Rāghava and Rāvaṇa, grimly determined and fixed in their enmity, fought on, unafraid.

7. Kākutstha thought, "I will surely win," while Rāvaṇa realized, "I must surely die." Then those two resolute warriors displayed their utmost valor in battle.

8. Then, in anger, mighty ten-necked Rāvaṇa nocked his arrows and, taking aim at the flagstaff on Rāghava's chariot, let them fly.

9. But those arrows never reached the flagstaff on the chariot of Indra, smasher of citadels. Instead, merely brushing the chariot-javelin, they fell to the ground.

10. In turn, mighty Rāma drew his bow in anger and resolved to return blow for blow.

11. Taking aim at Rāvaṇa's flagstaff, he loosed a sharp arrow that, glowing with its own blazing energy, was as impossible to withstand as a mighty serpent.

12. After cutting down the flagstaff of ten-necked Rāvaṇa, the arrow came to rest on the ground. Cut down, Rāvaṇa's chariot standard likewise fell to the ground.

13. Upon witnessing the destruction of his flagstaff, immensely powerful Rāvaṇa seemed to blaze up on the battlefield with a fire born of anger.

14. In an uncontrollable rage, Rāvaṇa poured forth an immense hail of arrows and, with those arrows, riddled Rāma's celestial horses.

15. Riddled though they were, the tawny steeds never stumbled or swerved. They remained as serene at heart as if they had been stroked with lotus stalks.

16–17. Seeing that the horses had been utterly unaffected, Rāvaṇa, in a towering rage, once more loosed a hail of arrows. He also hurled maces, iron clubs, discuses, cudgels, mountain peaks, and trees, as well as lances and battle-axes.

18. His heart and energies unflagging, he continued to loose his arrows by the thousand, and that hail of weapons that he let fly was invested with the power of magical illusion.

19. It was tremendous and deafening, and consisted of innumerable weapons. It was fearsome and reverberated fearsomely in the midst of the battle. It was unendurable, and it sowed panic everywhere.

20. Missing Rāghava's chariot, it fell upon the monkey host from every side. But ten-necked Rāvaṇa, with unbroken concentration, continued to loose his arrows so that he quickly filled the entire atmosphere with his shafts.

21. But Kākutstha, watching Rāvaṇa exert himself with such concentration in battle, smiled faintly and nocked sharp arrows.

22. Then, in that battle, he loosed hundreds of thousands of arrows. Seeing them, Rāvaṇa filled the entire sky with arrows of his own.

23. By virtue of that blazing hail of arrows discharged by the two warriors, it looked as if there were a second shining sky composed entirely of arrows.

24. As long as Rāma and Rāvaṇa discharged their arrows in that battle, not one of those arrows failed to hit its precise mark, caused excessive damage, or failed to achieve its intended purpose.

25. The two heroes fought on without respite, shooting left and right. With their torrents of arrows, they seemed to leave no room even for air in the sky.

26. Rāma struck Rāvaṇa's horses, and Rāvaṇa struck Rāma's. Thus did the two of them strike at each other, trading blow and counter-blow.

The end of the ninety-fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 96

1. All beings watched with amazement in their hearts as Rāma and Rāvaṇa fought on in this fashion on the battleground.

2. Each pressing the other hard in battle and intent on slaying each other, the two splendid chariot-warriors assumed terrifying forms.

3. Their charioteers demonstrated the various movements exemplary of their skill as drivers—driving in circles and in straight lines, advancing and retreating.

4. Pressing each other hard—Rāma, Rāvaṇa and Rāvaṇa, Rāghava—the two of them advanced and retreated at tremendous speed.

5. And as the two of them loosed their hails of arrows, their splendid chariots moved across the battlefield like two storm clouds unleashing torrential rains.

6. Then, when they had demonstrated their various moves on the battlefield, they once again took up their positions facing each other.

7. And as the two chariots stood there, their yoke poles and battle standards brushed each other and their horses stood face to face.

8. But then, with four sharp arrows loosed from his bow, Rāma drove off Rāvaṇa's four fiery steeds.

9. The night-roaming rākṣasa flew into an uncontrollable rage over the flight of his horses and loosed sharp arrows at Rāghava.

10. Although he was completely riddled by powerful ten-necked Rāvaṇa, Rāghava seemed unaffected and showed no signs of pain.

11. So then the night-roaming rākṣasa, taking aim at the charioteer of Indra, wielder of the vajra, once again loosed arrows that roared with the crash of thunderbolts.

12. But although they fell upon Mātali's body in battle, those immensely powerful arrows caused neither the slightest distraction nor pain.

13. Enraged at that attack upon Mātali as he had never been at those upon himself, Rāghava made his enemy recoil with a mass of arrows.

14. Mighty Rāghava then loosed his arrows—twenty, thirty, sixty, and then by the hundred and by the thousand—upon his enemy's chariot.

15. The seven seas themselves were thrown into turmoil by the sounds of maces, cudgels, and iron clubs, and by the winds stirred up by the fletching of the arrows.

16. Since the seas were thrown into turmoil, all the thousands of great serpents and dānavas who dwelt in the underworld Pātāla were terrified.

17. The whole earth, together with its mountains, groves, and forests, shook. The sun grew dim and the winds ceased to blow.

18. Then all the gods, together with the gandharvas, perfected beings, great seers, kinnaras, and great serpents, were plunged into anxiety, praying:

19. "May all be well with cows and brahmans! May the worlds endure forever! May Rāghava be victorious in battle over Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas."

20. Then, in anger, great-armed Rāma, increaser of the glory of the Raghus, placed on his bow a razor-tipped arrow that was like a venomous serpent. With it, he cut off Rāvaṇa's majestic head, together with its shining earrings.

21. As the three worlds looked on, that head fell to the ground. But a new head exactly like it emerged from Rāvaṇa.

22. Then, with his arrows, quick-handed Rāma, acting quickly, quickly cut off that second head of Rāvaṇa in battle.

23. But no sooner had that head been severed than yet another appeared in its place. And so, with arrows that were like thunderbolts, Rāma cut off that one as well.

24. And so in this way, a hundred heads—all exactly alike—were cut off. But still, there seemed to be no way to bring about the end of Rāvaṇa's life.

25. Therefore, although valorous Rāghava, increaser of Kausalyā's joy, was expert in the use of every divine weapon-spell and still had many arrows, he fell to brooding.

26–27. "These are all the very same arrows upon which I have always relied in battle and with which I killed Mārīca and Khara along with Dūṣaṇa. They are the very ones with which I killed Virādha in the Krauñca forest and Kabandha in the forest of the Daṇḍakas. Why then are they so ineffectual against Rāvaṇa?"

28. Although he was consumed with brooding in this fashion, Rāghava kept up his guard in battle and continued to rain hails of arrows upon Rāvaṇa's chest.

29. Meanwhile, Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, was in a rage, and, mounted in his chariot, he assailed Rāma in battle with a hail of maces and cudgels.

30. The great battle raged all night long as the gods, dānavas, yakṣas, piśācas, great serpents, and rākṣasas looked on.

31. Indeed, the duel between Rāma and Rāvaṇa continued night and day without stopping for an hour or even a moment.

The end of the ninety-sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 97

1. But then Mātali reminded Rāghava, "Why, hero, do you merely match him blow for blow, as if you knew no better?

2. "In order to kill him, my lord, you must unleash upon him the divinely charged weapon of Grandfather Brahmā. For the moment ordained by the gods for his destruction is now at hand."

3–13. Reminded by Mātali's words, Rāma took up a blazing arrow that, as he did so, made a hissing sound like that of a snake. Presented to him earlier by the powerful and blessed seer Agastya, it was a gift of Brahmā. It was a mighty arrow, unfailing in battle. Brahmā, whose power is immeasurable, had fashioned it long ago for the sake of Indra and had presented it to that lord of the gods, who was eager to conquer the three worlds. Pavana resided in its feathers. Agni, the purifier, and Sūrya, bringer of light, were in its arrowhead. Its shaft was made of all of space, and the mountains Meru and Mandara lent it their weight. Radiant with its splendor, beautifully fletched, and adorned with gold, it was fashioned with the blazing energy of all the elements, and it was as brilliant as Sūrya, bringer of light. It looked like the smoking fire at the end of a cosmic age and glistened like a venomous snake. It could instantaneously shatter hosts of chariots, elephants, and horses. It could shatter gateways, together with their iron beams, and even mountains. With its shaft drenched with the blood of many different creatures and smeared with their marrow, it was truly frightful. Hard as adamant and roaring deafeningly, it was terrifying in every sort of battle. Dreadful, hissing like a serpent, it inspired terror in all beings. It was fearsome and looked like Yama. In battle, it provided a never-ending supply of food to flocks of vultures and adjutant storks as well as rākṣasas and packs of jackals. Fletched with the various feathers of Garuḍa—beautiful and variegated—it brought joy to the monkey chiefs and despair to the rākṣasas. That ultimate arrow, which robbed one's enemies of their glory but brought joy to oneself, was to encompass the destruction of that menace to the Ikṣvākus and indeed to all the worlds.

14. Then immensely powerful and mighty Rāma consecrated that arrow with mantras and placed it on his bow in the manner prescribed by the science of archery.

15. Filled with fury toward Rāvaṇa and exerting himself to the utmost, he bent the bow fully and loosed that arrow, which struck at one's vital points.

16. As unstoppable as the vajra hurled by Indra, the vajra wielder, and as inescapable as fate, it fell upon Rāvaṇa's chest.

17. Loosed with tremendous force, that lethal arrow pierced evil-minded Rāvaṇa's heart.

18. Drenched with blood, the lethal arrow swiftly entered the earth, carrying off the life breaths of Rāvaṇa.

19. Once the arrow had accomplished its purpose in killing Rāvaṇa, it dutifully returned to its quiver, glistening with its still-wet blood.

20. Meanwhile, the bow and arrows of him who had been struck down so suddenly slipped from his grasp, along with his life breaths, as he lay dying.

21. Thus did the lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos, once so fearsome in his power and dazzling in his splendor, now tumble lifeless to the ground from his chariot, like Vṛtra struck down by Indra's vajra.

22. Seeing him fallen to the ground, the surviving night-roaming rākṣasas, their lord slain, fled, terrified, in all directions.

23. Meanwhile, the monkeys, armed with trees, seeing that Rāghava was victorious and that ten-necked Rāvaṇa had been slain, roared loudly and fell upon the rākṣasas.

24. Hard pressed by the jubilant monkeys, the rākṣasas fled in fear to Laṅkā, their piteous faces drenched with tears over the death of their protector.

25. Then the jubilant monkeys, with a victorious air, roared loudly, proclaiming Rāghava's victory and the death of Rāvaṇa.

26. The auspicious war drums of the thirty gods then resounded in the sky, and a pleasant breeze blew, wafting a divine fragrance.

27. An extraordinary and delightful shower of blossoms fell from the sky to the earth, covering Rāghava's chariot.

28. And from the great gods in heaven a magnificent shout, filled with the praise of Rāghava, was heard, "Excellent! Excellent!"

29. Now that fearsome Rāvaṇa, the terror of all the worlds, had been slain, great exultation filled the gods and celestial bards.

30. In slaying that bull among rākṣasas, Rāghava, delighted, had fulfilled the wishes of Sugrīva and immensely powerful Aṅgada.

31. The hosts of the Maruts regained tranquility. The directions were limpid, and the sky grew clear. The earth ceased its trembling, and the winds blew gently, while the sun, the bringer of day, shone with a steady light.

32. Then Rāghava's closest allies—Sugrīva, Vibhīṣaṇa, and the rest—together with Lakṣmaṇa, gathered around him, rejoicing in his victory and, with all due ceremony, paid homage to him who was so magnificent in battle.

33. Having thus slain his enemy, the immensely powerful hero, the delight of the king of the Raghu dynasty, proved true to his vow. Surrounded by his kinsman and his troops there on the field of battle, he looked as resplendent as Indra surrounded by the hosts of the thirty gods.

The end of the ninety-seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 98

1. Now, when the rākṣasa women heard that Rāvaṇa had been slain by great Rāghava, they rushed from the inner apartments, overwhelmed with grief.

2. Although many tried to restrain them, they rolled in the dust of the earth, their hair flying loose. They were as stricken with grief as cows whose calves have been butchered.

3. Together with the rākṣasas they poured out through the northern gate and entered the ghastly battlefield, searching for their slain lord.

4. Crying, "My husband!" "Alas, my lord!" on every side, they wandered about the battleground, which was strewn with headless trunks and thick with bloody mire.

5. Overcome with grief for their lord, their eyes filled with tears, they cried, shrieking like elephant cows when the leader of their herd is slain.

6. Then they saw Rāvaṇa lying slain on the ground. With his huge body, his tremendous strength, and his vast splendor, he resembled a mass of black collyrium.

7. When they suddenly spied their husband lying in the dust of the battlefield, they fell upon his limbs like forest creepers that have been cut down.

8. One of them embraced him in her devotion and wept. One clasped his feet, while yet another clung to his neck.

9. Raising her arms, one rolled on the ground. Seeing the face of her dead husband, yet another fainted.

10. One placed his head on her lap and, gazing on his face, wept, so that his face was bathed with tears, as is a lotus with dewdrops.

11. Thus anguished at seeing their lord Rāvaṇa lying slain on the ground, they keened in various ways in their grief and then began to lament once more.

12–13. "He who once terrorized Śakra and even Yama, he who robbed King Kubera Vaiśravaṇa of his flying palace Puṣpaka, and he who sowed tremendous fear among the gandharvas, seers, and the great gods, now lies slain in battle.

14. "He who knew no fear from the asuras, gods, or great serpents had much to fear from a mere human.

15. "He who was invulnerable to the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas now lies on the battlefield, slain by a mere human fighting on foot.

16. "He whom neither the gods, the yakṣas, nor the asuras could kill has, like some feeble creature, been slain by a mere mortal."

17. Speaking in this fashion, Rāvaṇa's women wept copiously. Then, overcome by grief, they began once more to lament repeatedly.

18. "Since you consistently refused to heed the words of your friends, who advised you for your own good, all of us and you yourself have now been ruined all together.

19. "Although your dear brother Vibhīṣaṇa was speaking words that were beneficial to you, you, in your delusion, abused him cruelly, desiring, it appears, your own destruction.

20. "If only you had restored Sītā Maithilī to Rāma, this immense catastrophe, this total extermination, would not have befallen us.

21. "Your brother Vibhīṣaṇa would have had his wish fulfilled, and Rāma would have become an ally of our House. None of us would have been widowed, nor would your enemies have seen their wish fulfilled.

22. "But instead, in holding Sītā by force, cruel Rāvaṇa, you have destroyed the rākṣasas, us, and yourself, all three at the same time.

23. "Nonetheless, it is true, bull among rākṣasas, that this was not an action taken of your own free will. For it is fate that sets all things in motion. Whatever is destroyed, is destroyed by fate.

24. "And so the destruction in battle of the monkeys, the rākṣasas, and you yourself, great-armed warrior, occurred through the power of fate.

25. "For in this world the relentless march of fate cannot be stopped by wealth or act of will, by valor or by imperious command."

26. Thus did the wretched women of the rākṣasa lord lament, afflicted with grief, their eyes clouded with tears, shrieking like ospreys.

The end of the ninety-eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 99

1. Now even as the rākṣasa women were lamenting in this fashion, Rāvaṇa's beloved seniormost wife, Mandodarī, gazed on her husband in her sorrow.

2. And as pitiable Mandodarī gazed there upon her husband, tennecked Rāvaṇa, who had been slain by Rāma of inconceivable deeds, she lamented.

3. "Surely, great-armed younger brother of Kubera Vaiśravaṇa, even Indra himself, the smasher of citadels, feared to stand before you when you were angry.

4. "And surely it was because of your power that the seers, the gods on earth, the illustrious gandharvas, and the celestial bards fled in all directions.

5. "Yet now you have been vanquished in battle by Rāma, a mere human. Are you not ashamed, your majesty? How could this be, bull among rākṣasas?

6. "How could a mere human, a wanderer in the wilderness, have slain you, who had conquered the three worlds, who was endowed with majesty and might, and whom no one could withstand?

7. "It makes no sense that Rāma could have slain you in battle—you who could wander in realms inaccessible to mere mortals and could take on any form at will.

8. "I do not believe that it was, in fact, Rāma who accomplished this feat in vanquishing you in the vanguard of the hosts when you were fully equipped for battle.

9. "Instead, it was your sensual appetites alone that vanquished you, since they recalled, as it were, your hostility when, long ago—before you conquered the three worlds—you subjugated your senses.

10. "Or perhaps it was Vāsava himself who came here in the form of Rāma, putting forth some unimaginable magical illusion in order to destroy you.

11. "For when in Janasthāna he killed your brother Khara, who was surrounded by many rākṣasas, it was clear right then that this was no mere human.

12. "And when, through his might, Hanumān entered the city of Laṅkā, which even the gods could not enter, we were all deeply shaken.

13. "When I told you, 'You should make peace with Rāghava,' you would not listen. And this is the result that has come of it.

14. "Unaccountably, bull among rākṣasas, you conceived this desire for Sītā, which has only led to the loss of your sovereignty, your kinsmen, and your life.

15. "You acted utterly improperly, you fool, when you assaulted Sītā, who is worthy of respect and who is superior even to Arundhatī and Rohiṇī.

16. "This Maithilī is in no way my superior or even my equal in breeding, beauty, or talent. But in your infatuation you did not realize this.

17. "No creature ever dies without a reason. In your case, then, your death has been brought about because of your treatment of Maithilī.

18. "Now Maithilī, free from all sorrow, will enjoy herself with Rāma, while I, a person of little merit that I am, have been plunged into a dreadful ocean of sorrow.

19–20. "I, who used to enjoy myself with you on Mount Kailāsa, Mount Mandara, Mount Meru, the Caitraratha Garden, and in all the gardens of the gods, traveling in unparalleled splendor in a flying chariot befitting our station, wearing marvelous garlands and garments, and gazing out upon the many different lands, have now, because of your death, hero, been robbed of the enjoyment of all pleasures.

21. "The destruction of the principal rākṣasas, which my illustrious brother-in-law Vibhīṣaṇa, a speaker of truth, foretold, has now come to pass.

22. "Through this catastrophe born of your lust and anger and characterized by your obsession, you have deprived the entire rākṣasa race of its protector.

23. "I really should not grieve for you, for you were a warrior famed for strength and manly valor. But still, because of the inherent nature of women, my heart is in a pitiable state.

24. "Taking with you both the good and the evil deeds you performed, you have gone to your proper destination. It is for myself that I grieve, miserable as I am, because of my separation from you.

25. “Resembling a black storm cloud, with your yellow garments and bright armlets, why do you lie here drenched in blood, splaying out all your limbs? I am overcome with sorrow. Why do you not answer me, as if you were asleep?

26. “Why do you not look at me, the granddaughter of an immensely powerful and skillful yātudhāna who never fled in battle.

27–28. “You always used to worship your iron club, adorned with a fretwork of gold and, with a radiance like that of the sun, as if it were the vajra of Indra, the wielder of the vajra. With it you used to slaughter your enemies in battle. But now that smasher of your foes in battle, shattered by arrows, lies scattered in a thousand pieces.

29. “Curse me whose heart, oppressed by sorrow, does not shatter into a thousand pieces now that you have returned to the five elements.”

30. At this juncture, Rāma said to Vibhīṣaṇa, “Perform the funeral rites for your brother and send these women back.”

31. When he had heard those words, Vibhīṣaṇa, who was deferential and understood righteousness, reflected and, in order to conform to Rāma’s wishes, replied with words that were filled with righteousness and political sense.

32. “I cannot perform the funeral rites for someone who abandoned both righteousness and his vows, who was cruel, heartless, and untruthful, and who assaulted the wives of others.

33. “Ever intent on injuring all creatures, he was my enemy in the form of a brother. So, although he should be respected because of the deference one owes to one’s elders, still Rāvaṇa does not merit respect.

34. “In this world, people will say I am heartless, Rāma, but once they hear about his qualities, they will all say that I acted properly.”

35. Upon hearing that, Rāma, foremost of those who upheld righteousness, was greatly pleased, and, skilled in speech, he said this to Vibhīṣaṇa, who was similarly expert in speech:

36. “I really ought to do what pleases you, since it was through your might that I have been victorious. Nonetheless, I must address you with regard to what is proper, lord of the rākṣasas.

37. "Granted, the night-roaming rākṣasa was given to unrighteousness and untruthfulness. Nonetheless, he was always a powerful and energetic hero in battle.

38. "Rāvaṇa, who made the worlds cry out, was a great hero, endowed with might. One never heard that the gods, led by Indra of the hundred sacrifices, ever defeated him.

39. "But hostilities cease with death. Our purpose has been accomplished. You may now perform his funeral rites, for as he was to you, so he is to me.

40. "For he deserves a quick and proper funeral at your hands, great-armed knower of righteousness. Thus, you will reap glory."

41. Having heard Rāghava's words, Vibhīṣaṇa, hastening, provided Rāvaṇa with a fitting funeral.

42. Vibhīṣaṇa then cremated him according to the prescriptions of the ritual texts. Then, speaking soothing words again and again, he consoled the women.

43. And then, once all the rākṣasa women had gone back, Vibhīṣaṇa came to Rāma's side and stood there humbly.

44. Then, having slain his mortal enemy, Rāma, together with his army, Sugrīva, and Lakṣmaṇa, attained as much delight as did Indra of the hundred sacrifices after slaying Vṛtra.

The end of the ninety-ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 100

1. When the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas had witnessed the slaying of Rāvaṇa, they departed, each in his own flying chariot, proclaiming those auspicious events.

2–3. Proclaiming the frightful slaying of Rāvaṇa, the valor of Rāghava, the brave fighting of the monkeys, the counsel of Sugrīva, and the devotion and heroism of Lakṣmaṇa Saumitri, those noble beings, in great delight, departed as they had come.

4. But as for noble Rāghava, he released the celestial chariot, radiant as fire, that Indra had loaned him and paid homage to Mātali.

5. Granted leave by Rāghava, Mātali, the charioteer of Śakra, mounted that celestial chariot and ascended into the sky.

6. Once that foremost of the charioteers of the gods had ascended into the sky, Rāghava embraced Sugrīva with the greatest delight.

7. After embracing Sugrīva, he returned to the army's encampment, reverently saluted by Lakṣmaṇa and honored by the foremost of the tawny monkeys.

8. And then Rāma spoke to mighty Lakṣmaṇa Saumitri, of blazing energy, who stood beside him:

9. "Gentle brother, you must consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa in the kingship of Laṅkā, for he has been loyal and devoted and has rendered me great assistance.

10. "For this is my most cherished desire, gentle brother: that I should see Rāvaṇa's younger brother Vibhīṣaṇa consecrated in the kingship of Laṅkā."

11. Addressed in this fashion by great Rāghava, Saumitri replied, "So be it," and, greatly delighted, he brought a golden vessel.

12. Then, in the midst of the rākṣasas, at Rāma's command, Saumitri used that vessel to consecrate Vibhīṣaṇa as king in Laṅkā.

13. Thus did that righteous hero consecrate pure-minded Vibhīṣaṇa, while the latter's ministers and those rākṣasas who were devoted to him rejoiced.

14. Upon seeing the lord of the rākṣasas, Vibhīṣaṇa, consecrated in the kingship of Laṅkā, Rāghava, together with Lakṣmaṇa, experienced the greatest delight.

15. When he had received that great kingdom, which Rāma had conferred upon him, Vibhīṣaṇa comforted his people and then approached Rāma.

16. In great delight, the night-roaming rākṣasas of the city then brought unhusked rice, sweetmeats, parched grain, and celestial flowers for him.

17. When he had received all those auspicious offerings, the unassailable and mighty hero presented them in an auspicious fashion to Rāghava and Lakṣmaṇa.

18. And Rāma, seeing that Vibhīṣaṇa had accomplished his purpose and was now endowed with prosperity, accepted it all, merely out of a desire to please him.

19. Rāghava then spoke these words to the leaping monkey, mighty Hanumān, as huge as a mountain, who stood beside him, his hands cupped in reverence:

20–21. "My gentle friend, after obtaining permission of the great king Vibhīṣaṇa, you must enter Rāvaṇa's palace. Once there, foremost among the victorious, you are to humbly approach Vaidehī and inform her that Sugrīva, Lakṣmaṇa, and I are well, and that I have slain Rāvaṇa.

22. "Lord of the tawny monkeys, once you have related the good news to Maithilī, please take a message from her and return."

The end of the one hundredth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 101

1. Instructed in this fashion and honored by the night-roaming rākṣasas, Hanumān, son of Māruta, entered the city of Laṅkā.

2. Entering Rāvaṇa's palace, that hero of immense blazing energy spied Sītā, who resembled the constellation Rohiṇī cut off from her lord, the hare-marked moon, and occluded by a malevolent planet.

3. Modest, humble, and deferential, he approached her, greeted her respectfully, and began to tell her everything that Rāma had said:

4. "Rāma is quite well, Vaidehī, as are Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa. Having slain his foe and having thus accomplished his purpose, that tamer of his enemies inquires after your well-being.

5. "With Vibhīṣaṇa as his ally and together with the tawny monkeys, Rāma, through the wise counsel of Lakṣmaṇa, has slain Rāvaṇa, O queen.

6. "Inquiring as to your well-being, the mighty hero Rāma, delight of the Raghus, greatly delighted, his heart having achieved its purpose, now says this to you:

7. "'I bring you this good news, my lady, and once again I offer you my respectful salutations. Thank god, O knower of righteousness, you have survived by virtue of my victory in battle.

8. "'We have gained victory, Sītā. You may now be at ease and free from care. My enemy Rāvaṇa has been slain, and Laṅkā is under my control.

9. "'With grim determination to win you back, without pause even for sleep, I built a bridge across the mighty ocean and thus fulfilled my vow.

10. "'Nor should you have any further anxiety about staying in Rāvaṇa's palace, for the lordship of Laṅkā has now been made over to Vibhīṣaṇa.

11. "'So, trusting in that, be comforted. For now you are living in your own home, as it were. Moreover, in great delight, he is on his way, eager to see you.'"

12. Addressed in this fashion, Sītā, whose face was like the hare-marked moon, sprang to her feet, speechless with joy.

13. Since Sītā did not reply, that foremost of the tawny monkeys said, "What are you worried about, O queen? Why do you not speak to me?"

14. Addressed in this fashion by Hanumān, Sītā, so firmly grounded in righteousness, replied in the greatest delight with a voice that was choked with joy.

15. "When I heard the wonderful news concerning my husband's victory, I was overwhelmed with joy and momentarily speechless.

16. "Even upon reflection, leaping monkey, I can think of no adequate response to you who have brought me this wonderful news.

17. "Nor, gentle monkey, can I think of anything on this earth to give you for reporting this news—so wonderful for me—that would be fitting and adequate.

18. "Neither gold nor silver, various gems, or even the kingship over the three worlds can be said to equal this."

19. Addressed in this fashion by Sītā Vaidehī, the leaping monkey cupped his hands in reverence and, standing before her, replied with these words:

20. "You alone are capable of speaking such affectionate words, you who are so devoted to your husband's welfare and have longed so for his victory.

21. "Indeed, these words of yours, gentle lady, so affectionate and full of meaning, are more precious to me than a heap of all kinds of jewels or even the kingship of the gods.

22. "In that I see Rāma still standing after having slain his enemy and gained victory, I have truly already attained those treasured things, such as the kingship of the gods, and the like.

23. "However, if you permit me, I should like to kill all these rākṣasa women who previously threatened you.

24–25. "Please grant me this wish. These cruel and horrible rākṣasa women with their dreadful rumors, their fierce glances, and terrifying threats, tormented you, who are so devoted to your husband, when you were suffering in the aśoka grove. I would really like to slaughter them with different types of blows.

*26–28. "Illustrious and lovely queen, these creatures have done you such injury. I would like to slaughter them with punches, slaps, kicks, fearsome blows of the knees, slashes of my fangs, biting off their ears and noses, tearing out their hair, violent clawing, dreadful flying kicks, and many more of these kinds of assaults."

29. Addressed in this fashion by Hanumān, the illustrious Vaidehī, daughter of Janaka, responded to him in words that were in keeping with righteousness.

30. "Who, foremost of monkeys, could be angry at servant women, for, as mere functionaries and dependent on the king, they are obedient and act only on the orders of another.

31. "It is as a consequence of my evil destiny and my own misdeeds in the past that I have suffered all of this. For one always experiences the fruits of one's actions.

32. "I have concluded that I had to suffer this as a consequence of my fate, and, being helpless, I had to endure all of this here at the hands of Rāvaṇa's servant women.

33. "These rākṣasa women tormented me only on the orders of Rāvaṇa. Now that he has been slain, foremost of monkeys, they will not torment me anymore.

34. "There is an ancient verse in keeping with righteousness that a bear once recited in the presence of a tiger. Hear it now from me, leaping monkey.

35. " 'A superior person never requites evil on the part of evildoers with evil.' This rule of conduct must always be adhered to. For good conduct is the ornament of the virtuous.

36. "A noble person must act compassionately whether people are wicked, virtuous, or even if deserving of death. For, leaping monkey, no one is entirely innocent.

37. "One should not harm the rākṣasas, who can take on any form at will and take pleasure in injuring people, even when they do evil."

38. When he was addressed in this fashion by Rāma's illustrious wife, Sītā, eloquent Hanumān replied to her:

39. "You are a fitting, illustrious, and righteous wife to Rāma. Please give me your return message, queen, and I shall go to where Rāghava is."

40. When Vaidehī, Janaka's daughter, had been addressed in this fashion, she said, "Foremost of monkeys, I wish to see my husband."

41. When Hanumān, son of Pavana, had heard those words of hers, that immensely splendid hero said these words, lifting Maithilī's spirits:

42. "Noble lady, just as the goddess Śacī gazes upon Indra, lord of the thirty gods, you shall gaze upon Rāma, whose face is like the full moon, whose allies are staunch, whose enemies have been slain, and who is accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa."

43. When he had spoken in this fashion to Sītā, who was as radiant as Śrī incarnate, the immensely swift Hanumān returned to where Rāghava waited.

The end of the one hundred first sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 102

1. Approaching the exceedingly wise Rāma, foremost of all bowmen, the leaping monkey, who understood the matter at hand, addressed him with these words:

2. "Now you really must see Queen Maithilī, who has been tormented with grief, she on whose account we undertook this entire mission and achieved the culmination of our efforts.

3. "For Maithilī, who had been overwhelmed with grief, her eyes brimming with tears, was filled with joy upon hearing of your victory.

4. "Since she trusted me because of the confidence I had earlier inspired in her, she said to me, 'I desire to see my husband, who, together with Lakṣmaṇa, has accomplished his purpose.' "

*5. Addressed in this fashion by Hanumān, Rāma, foremost among upholders of righteousness, was suddenly plunged into gloomy thought and became somewhat tearful.

6. Heaving long, hot sighs and staring at the ground, he spoke to Vibhīṣaṇa, who stood beside him, looking like a great storm cloud:

*7. "Have Sītā Vaidehī come here anointed with celestial unguents, adorned with celestial ornaments, her hair freshly washed. Make haste!"

8. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Vibhīṣaṇa, hurrying, entered the inner apartments and there had his own wives instruct Sītā in these words:

9. "Vaidehī, anointed with celestial unguents and adorned with celestial ornaments, you are to mount a carriage. For, bless you, your husband desires to see you."

10. Addressed in this fashion, Vaidehī replied to Vibhīṣaṇa, "But I wish to see my husband without having bathed, lord of the rākṣasas."

11. When Vibhīṣaṇa heard those words of hers, he replied, "You should do exactly as your husband, Rāma, says."

12. Upon hearing those words of his, virtuous Maithilī, whose husband was her god and whose vow was devotion to him, responded, "So be it."

13–14. Young women then washed her hair and adorned her with costly garments and ornaments. Then Vibhīṣaṇa took Sītā with him, after having had her mount a shining palanquin that was draped in costly fabrics and guarded by many rākṣasas.

15. Approaching the great man and noting that he was lost in brooding thought, he bowed and, in great delight, announced that Sītā had come.

16. But when Rāghava heard that she who had dwelt so long in the rākṣasa's house had come, three emotions—joy, sorrow, and anger—took hold of him.

17. Then, perceiving that Vibhīṣaṇa now stood beside him, Rāghava, miserable and debating inwardly, spoke to him:

18. "Gentle lord of the rākṣasas, ever dedicated to my victory, please bring Vaidehī to me at once."

19. Heeding those words of Rāghava, Vibhīṣaṇa quickly made an effort to have the area cleared on every side.

20. Guards, wearing mail and turbans and holding staves and drums in their hands, began to move about there, clearing the area on every side.

21. Then, being driven back on every side, the crowds of apes, monkeys, and rākṣasas withdrew to a distance.

22. And as they were all being driven back, there arose a sound like the roar of the ocean being whipped up by a gale.

23. But when Rāghava saw them being driven back in great agitation on all sides, he stopped it out of kindness and because he could not abide it.

24. Furious, Rāma spoke reproachful words to the immensely wise Vibhīṣaṇa, seeming almost to burn him up with his eyes:

25. "Why are you harassing these people with complete disregard for my wishes? Stop this business at once. These people are like my own kin.

26. "It is not houses, garments, high walls, curtains, or such royal treatment as this that shields a woman; it is her virtuous conduct alone.

27. "Moreover, there is nothing wrong with a woman being seen in public during emergencies, periods of hardship, in time of war, at a ceremony of choosing her husband, during a sacrifice, or at a wedding ceremony.

28. "She has been through a war and has been placed in tremendous hardship. Therefore, there would be nothing wrong in her being seen publicly, especially in my company.

29. "So bring her into my presence at once, Vibhīṣaṇa. Let Sītā see me surrounded by the hosts of my friends."

30. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Vibhīṣaṇa, reflecting on all of this, obediently led Sītā into his presence.

31. And as for Lakṣmaṇa, Sugrīva, and the leaping monkey Hanumān, they, too, became deeply troubled upon hearing Rāma's words.

32. Because of his demeanor that was so pitiless and seemed to show no regard for his wife, they inferred that Rāghava was displeased with Sītā.

33. Trying to make her body appear small in her shame, Maithilī, followed by Vibhīṣaṇa, approached her husband.

34. Covering her face with her garment in her shame there before the assembled people, she wept as she came near her husband, murmuring, "My noble husband."

35. She whose husband was her divinity and whose face was more radiant than the moon gazed upon the moonlike face of her husband with amazement, joy, and love.

36. Then, gazing upon her beloved's face, which she had not seen for so long and which was as lovely as the full moon rising, she shed her depression of spirit and her face became as radiant as the hare-marked moon.

The end of the one hundred second sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 103

1. As he gazed upon Maithilī, who stood so meekly beside him, Rāma began to speak, as rage simmered in his heart:

2. "So here you are, my good woman. I have won you back after conquering my enemy in battle. Whatever there was to be done through manly valor, I have now accomplished.

3. "I have wiped clean the affront, and so my wrath is appeased. For I have eliminated both the insult and my enemy at the same time.

4. "Today my manly valor has been witnessed. Today my efforts have borne fruit. Today, having fulfilled my vow here, I am once more master of myself.

5. "You were carried off by that wanton rākṣasa when you were left alone, but now, through manly action, I have expunged that affront brought about by fate.

6. "What human purpose can man serve if his spirit is so feeble that he will not wipe clean through his own blazing energy an insult he has received?

7. "The leaping of the ocean and the razing of Laṅkā—today those praiseworthy deeds of Hanumān have borne fruit.

8. "Today, through their valor in battle and their beneficial counsel to me, the efforts of Sugrīva and his army have borne fruit as well.

9. "And the efforts of my devoted Vibhīṣaṇa, who abandoned his evil brother and came to me of his own accord, have likewise borne fruit."

10. As Rāma was saying these words in that fashion, Sītā, wide-eyed like a doe, was overcome with tears.

11. But as Rāma gazed upon her, his anger flared up once more, like the raging flame of a blazing fire drenched with melted butter.

12. Knitting his brows on his forehead and glancing at her from the corner of his eye, he spoke harshly to Sītā there in the midst of the monkeys and rākṣasas.

13–14. "In wiping away this affront, Sītā, I have accomplished all that a man could do. In my wrath, I have won you back from the hands of my enemy, just as, through his austerities, the contemplative sage Agastya won back the southern lands that had been inaccessible to all living beings.

15. "Bless you, but let it be understood that it was not on your account that I undertook the effort of this war, now brought to completion through the valor of my allies.

16. "Instead, I did all this in order to protect my reputation and in every way to wipe clean the insult and disgrace to my illustrious lineage.

17. "Since, however, your virtue is now in doubt, your presence has become as profoundly disagreeable to me as is a bright lamp to a man afflicted with a disease of the eye.

18. "Go, therefore, as you please, daughter of Janaka. You have my permission. Here are the ten directions. I have no further use for you, my good woman.

19. "For what powerful man born in a respectable family—his heart tinged with affection—would take back a woman who had lived in the house of another man?

20. "How could I who boast of my noble lineage possibly take you back—just risen from Rāvaṇa's lap and gazed upon by his lustful eye?

21. "I have recovered my reputation, and that is the purpose for which I won you back. I do not love you anymore. Go hence wherever you like.

22. "I have made up my mind in saying this, my good woman. Turn your thoughts toward Lakṣmaṇa or Bharata as you please.

23. "Or, Sītā, set your mind on Sugrīva, lord of the monkeys, or on the rākṣasa lord Vibhīṣaṇa, or on whomever you please.

24. "For surely, Sītā, once Rāvaṇa had seen you, so enchanting with your heavenly beauty, he would not long have left you unmolested while you were dwelling in his house."

25. When Maithilī, who deserved to hear only kind words, had heard those cruel words of her beloved after such a long time, she shed tears and trembled violently, like a vallarī creeper struck down by the trunk of an elephant lord.

The end of the one hundred third sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 104

1. When Vaidehī was addressed in this cruel and horrifying manner by the furious Rāghava, she was deeply wounded.

2. Hearing those cutting words of her husband—words such as she had never heard before—in the presence of that great multitude, Maithilī was overcome with shame.

3. Pierced, as it were, by those verbal barbs, the daughter of Janaka seemed to shrink within herself and gave way to bitter tears.

4. Wiping her tear-stained face, she replied softly to her husband in a faltering voice:

5. "How can you, heroic prince, speak to me with such cutting and improper words, painful to the ears, as some vulgar man might speak to his vulgar wife?

6. "I am not as you think of me, great-armed prince. You must believe in me, for I swear to you by my own virtue.

7. "You harbor suspicion against all women because of the conduct of the vulgar ones. If you really knew me, you would abandon your suspicion.

8. "If I came into contact with another's body against my will, lord, I had no choice in this matter. It is fate that was to blame here.

9. "My heart, which I do control, was always devoted to you. But I could not control my body, which was in the power of another. What could I have done?

10. "If, my love, you do not truly know me despite our long-nurtured love and intimacy, then surely I am lost forever.

11. "When you dispatched the hero Hanumān to search for me, why, heroic prince, did you not repudiate me then, while I was still being held in Laṅkā?

12. "No sooner had I heard your words to that effect, heroic prince, than, abandoned by you, I would have abandoned my own life right before the eyes of that monkey lord.

13. "Then you would not have had to risk your life in a useless effort nor would your allies have had to suffer hardship to no purpose.

14. "But now, tiger among men, you have given way to anger like some lesser man, taking into account only that I am a woman.

15. "Since my name is derived from Janaka, you failed to take into account the fact that I was born from the earth itself, nor, though you are an expert judge of conduct, have you given due consideration to my virtuous conduct.

16. "Moreover, you do not weigh the fact that, as a boy, you firmly clasped my hand while I was but a child. My devotion, my virtuous conduct—you have turned your back on all of that."

17. As she was speaking in this fashion, Sītā turned, weeping, to Lakṣmaṇa, who stood there, despondent and brooding. Then she spoke, her voice choked with tears.

18. "Build me a pyre, Saumitri, the only remedy for this calamity. I cannot bear to live tainted by these false allegations.

19. "Rejected in this public gathering by my husband, who is not satisfied with my virtues, I shall enter the fire, bearer of oblations, so that I may follow the only path proper for me."

20. When Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, had been addressed in this fashion by Vaidehī, he was overcome with anger and closely studied Rāghava's face.

21. But, sensing Rāma's intentions, which were betrayed by his facial expression, mighty Saumitri, obedient to Rāma's wishes, built the pyre.

22. Then Vaidehī slowly and reverently circumambulated Rāma, whose face was downcast, and approached the blazing fire, eater of oblations.

23. After making her obeisance to the gods and the brahmans, Maithilī cupped her hands in reverence and, in the presence of Agni, said this:

24. "Since my heart has never once strayed from Rāghava, so may Agni, the purifier, witness of all the world, protect me in every way."

25. When she had spoken in this fashion, Vaidehī reverently circumambulated the fire, eater of oblations. Then, with complete detachment, she entered the blazing flames.

26. The vast crowd assembled there, filled with children and the aged, watched as Maithilī entered the fire, eater of oblations.

27. As Sītā entered the fire, a deafening and prodigious cry of "Alas! Alas!" arose from the rākṣasas and monkeys.

The end of the one hundred fourth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 105

1–3. Then King Kubera Vaiśravaṇa; Yama, dragger of his foes; great Indra of the thousand eyes; Varuṇa, scorcher of his foes; the great god, majestic Śiva, with his half-six eyes and the bull on his banner; and Brahmā, foremost of those who know the vedas, the creator of the entire universe—all these assembled in their flying chariots as radiant as the sun, and, coming to the city of Laṅkā, they approached Rāghava.

4. Then, raising their broad arms covered with bracelets, the foremost of the thirty gods addressed Rāghava, who stood before them, his hands cupped in reverence.

5. "How can you, the creator of the entire universe, the most ancient one, and foremost among those possessing supreme knowledge, stand by and watch as Sītā falls into the fire, eater of oblations? How can you not realize that you are the foremost among the hosts of the gods?

6. "Long ago, you were the Vasu Ṛtadhāman, the progenitor of the Vasus. You are the primal creator of the three worlds, the untrammeled lord.

7. "You are Rudra, the eighth among the Rudras, and you are fifth among the sādhyas. The twin Aśvins are your ears, the moon and the sun your eyes.

8. "You are present before the beginning and after the end of the worlds, scorcher of your foes. And yet, like some ordinary man, you ignore Vaidehī."

9. When Rāma Rāghava, the lord of the world, was addressed in this fashion by those guardians of the world, that foremost of those who uphold righteousness said to the foremost of the thirty gods:

10. "I think of myself only as a man, Rāma, the son of Daśaratha. May the Blessed Lord please tell me who I really am, to whom I belong, and why I am here."

11. As Kākutstha was speaking in this fashion, Brahmā, foremost among those who know the vedas, said to him: "Truly valorous Rāma, now hear the truth from me.

12. "You are a god, the majestic Lord Nārāyaṇa, wielder of the discus. You are the single-tusked boar and the conqueror of your enemies, past and future.

13. "You are the imperishable Brahman, existent in the beginning, the middle, and the end. You are the highest governing principal of all the worlds, the four-armed Viṣvaksena.

14. "You are the wielder of the horn bow, you are Hṛṣīkeśa, the primal person, the Supreme Spirit. You are Viṣṇu, the invincible wielder of the sword, and you are Kṛṣṇa of immense strength.

15. "You are the leader of the hosts. You are the leader of all beings. You are intelligence, strength, forbearance, and self-control. You are the origin and the dissolution. You are Upendra, Indra's younger brother, and Madhusūdana, slayer of the asura Madhu.

16. "You are the author of Indra's deeds. You are the lord of the great gods. You are the lotus-naveled god. You are the destroyer of your enemies in battle. The divine great seers call you fit for refuge and refuge itself.

17. "You are the great bull of a thousand horns and a hundred tongues that is the veda itself. You are the sacrifice, the sacred utterance vaṣaṭ, and the sacred syllable oṃ, scorcher of your foes.

18. "No one knows your origin or your end. People wonder, 'Who are you?' You are manifest in all creatures—especially brahmans and cows—and also in all the directions, the sky, the mountains, and the forests.

19. "You are the majestic Lord of a thousand feet, a thousand heads, and a thousand eyes. You support all beings as well as the earth with all its mountains.

20. "At the end of the world, you manifest yourself resting on the great serpent on the waters. You support the three worlds, Rāma, along with the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas.

21. "I am your heart, Rāma, your tongue is the goddess Sarasvatī. It is I, Brahmā, O Lord, who made the gods, who are the hairs on your limbs.

22. "When you close your eyes, it is night; when you open them, it is day. Your ritual practices are the ordinances of the vedas. Without you, there is nothing.

23. "Your body is this world; your steadfastness, the earth. Agni is your wrath; Soma, your gentleness, O bearer of the Śrīvatsa mark.

24. "In ancient times, you spanned the three worlds with as many strides. After confining the great asura Bali, you made great Indra king.

25. "Sītā is Lakṣmī; you are the god Viṣṇu. You are Kṛṣṇa. You are Prajāpati, the lord of creatures. It was in order to slay Rāvaṇa that you entered a human body here.

26. "Thus have you accomplished our purpose, foremost of upholders of righteousness. Rāvaṇa has been slain. Now, Rāma, in your delight, please return to heaven.

27. "Your strength and might have not been in vain, nor has your valor. Nor will men who are devoted to you ever fail of their purpose.

28. "You are the ancient god and Supreme Spirit. Those who are firmly devoted to you and those men who praise you will never fail in any way."

The end of the one hundred fifth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 106

1. Upon hearing that auspicious speech uttered by Grandfather Brahmā, Agni, the shining god of fire, arose, holding Vaidehī at his side.

2–3. Adorned with ornaments of burnished gold and clad in a red garment, the young woman was as radiant as the rising sun. Her hair was dark and curling and her garland and ornaments were unsinged. Her mind was calm and she looked unchanged. Holding Vaidehī at his side, Agni, the shining god of fire, gave her back to Rāma.

4. Then Agni, the purifier and witness of all the world, spoke to Rāma, saying, "Here is your Vaidehī, Rāma. She has committed no sin.

5. "She is of pure conduct and high moral character and has never betrayed you by word, thought, imagination, or glance.

6. "When you left her alone, she was carried off—helpless and sorrowful—from the deserted forest by the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa, arrogant in his power.

7. "Hidden and imprisoned in the inner apartments, thinking only of you and having you for her only recourse, she was guarded by hordes of hideous rākṣasa women, dreadful to behold.

8. "Although she was enticed and threatened in various ways, Maithilī would not even think of the rākṣasa, since her heart was utterly devoted to you.

9. "You must take her back, Rāghava, for her heart is pure and she is free from sin. I am giving you an order; there is nothing further to be said."

10. When Rāma, of immense blazing energy, steadfast and firm in his valor, had been addressed in this fashion, that foremost of those who maintain righteousness replied to that most eminent among the thirty gods:

11. "Unquestionably Sītā needed to be proven innocent before the three worlds, since this auspicious woman had long dwelt in Rāvaṇa's inner apartments.

12. "For surely had I not put Jānakī to the test, the virtuous would have said of me, 'Daśaratha's son Rāma is a lustful fool.'

13. "I know full well that Janaka's daughter Maithilī could give her heart to no other, since she is devoted to me and obeys my every thought.

14. "But in order that the three worlds, too, should have faith in her, I, whose ultimate recourse is truth, simply stood by as Vaidehī entered the fire, eater of oblations.

15. "Rāvaṇa could no more have violated that wide-eyed lady, protected by her own blazing energy, than could the mighty ocean violate its shore.

16. "That evil-minded wretch was incapable of assaulting Maithilī, even in his thoughts. For she is as unapproachable as a blazing flame of fire.

17. "This auspicious woman could never have ruled over Rāvaṇa's inner apartments. For she is as inseparable from me as is its radiance from the sun, bringer of light.

18. "Janaka's daughter Maithilī has been proven innocent before the three worlds, and I am no more able to give her up than is a self-controlled man, his good name.

19. "Moreover, I must follow the good advice that all of you affectionate friends, respected throughout the worlds, have uttered in this fashion for my own good."

20. When he had uttered these words, mighty Rāma, praised by his mighty companions for the feat he had accomplished, was reunited with his beloved. Then Rāghava experienced the happiness he so richly deserved.

The end of the one hundred sixth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 107

1. Upon hearing that auspicious speech so beautifully spoken by Rāghava, Maheśvara responded with these still more auspicious words:

2. "Lotus-eyed, great-armed, broad-chested scorcher of your foes! Foremost of weapon bearers! Thank heavens you have accomplished this feat.

3. "Thank heavens, Rāma, you have dispelled in battle the vast and terrible darkness in the form of the fear of Rāvaṇa that had engulfed the entire world.

4–6. "You must now console despondent Bharata and the illustrious Kausalyā and see Kaikeyī and Lakṣmaṇa's mother, Sumitrā. You must assume the kingship of Ayodhyā and reward all your allies. Then, mighty hero, you must establish a lineage in the House of the Ikṣvākus. At last, once you have offered the Horse Sacrifice and attained unsurpassed glory, you should give away your wealth to the brahmans and ascend to the triple heaven.

7. "And here, Kākutstha, in his flying chariot, is your father, King Daśaratha, who, in the world of men, was your illustrious elder.

8. "Saved by you, his son, the majestic king has attained the world of Indra. Together with Lakṣmaṇa, you must now respectfully salute him."

9. Upon hearing these words of the great god Śiva, Kākutstha, together with Lakṣmaṇa, made obeisance to his father, who stood atop his flying chariot.

10. Then the lord, together with his brother Lakṣmaṇa, gazed upon his father, who was clad in a spotless garment and was blazing with his own innate splendor.

11–12. Filled with the greatest joy, the lord of the earth, Daśaratha, mounted on his flying chariot, gazed upon his son, who was dearer to him than life itself. Then, seated on a splendid throne, the great-armed lord took him on his lap and, taking him in his arms, said these words:

13. "I swear to you truthfully, Rāma, that without you I care nothing for heaven and the esteem of the divine seers.

14. "And, most eloquent of men, those words that Kaikeyī uttered regarding your banishment were still rankling in my heart.

15. "But today, seeing that you are safe and sound and having embraced you and Lakṣmaṇa, I have been freed from my sorrow, like the sun, maker of day, emerging from a dense fog.

16. "My son, you, an excellent son and a great man, have saved me, just as a righteous brahman was saved by Aṣṭāvakra.

17. "I now realize, my gentle son, that you are the Supreme Spirit, who was enjoined by the lords of the gods to slay Rāvaṇa.

18. "Surely, Rāma, Kausalyā will have achieved her most cherished desire when, in delight, she sees that you, slayer of your enemies, have returned home from the wilderness.

19. "And just as surely, Rāma, will the people have achieved their most cherished desire when they see that you have returned to the city and, dripping with water, have been consecrated as lord of the earth, bearer of wealth.

20. "I only wish that I could see you reunited with devoted, powerful, honest, and righteous Bharata.

21. "My gentle son, you have spent fourteen years in the wilderness living with Sītā and wise Lakṣmaṇa.

22. "You have completed your sojourn in the forest and have thus fulfilled your vow. Moreover, having slain Rāvaṇa in battle, you have gratified the gods.

23. "You have performed a praiseworthy feat and gained renown, slayer of your foes. Now, established in the kingship, may you attain long life, together with your brothers."

24. As the king was speaking in this fashion, Rāma, cupping his hands in reverence, said this to him: "O you who understand righteousness, please extend your grace to Kaikeyī and Bharata.

25. "And may that terrible curse that you invoked when you told Kaikeyī, 'I renounce both you and your son,' not be visited upon Kaikeyī and her son, Lord."

26. The great king said, "So be it," to Rāma, who stood there with his hands cupped in reverence. Then, embracing Lakṣmaṇa, he now spoke to him in these words:

27. "In devotedly serving Rāma as well as Sītā Vaidehī, you have given me the greatest pleasure and attained the fruit of your righteousness.

28. "And since Rāma is pleased with you, O you who know righteousness, you will attain righteousness, great renown on earth, heaven, and everlasting glory.

29. "Bless you, increaser of Sumitrā's joy, you must serve Rāma. For Rāma is perpetually devoted to the welfare of all the world.

30. "All these gods, including Indra, along with the three worlds, the perfected beings, and the supreme seers, have approached him, the great Supreme Spirit, and are worshiping him.

31. "Rāma, scorcher of his foes, has been revealed by them, my gentle son, to be Brahman, the unmanifest and imperishable Supreme Spirit, the secret heart of the gods.

32. "Devotedly serving Rāma as well as Sītā Vaidehī, you have attained righteousness and immense glory."

33. When he had spoken in this fashion to Lakṣmaṇa, who stood with his hands cupped in reverence, the righteous and great-armed king then said these splendid words to Vaidehī:

34. "You should not be angry over this repudiation, Vaidehī. Wishing only what is best for you, Rāma did this to demonstrate your purity.

35. "Fair-browed woman, you do not need to be instructed with regard to your obedience to your husband. Nonetheless, it is necessary for me to tell you that he is your highest divinity."

36. When radiant Daśaratha had instructed his two sons and his daughter-in-law Sītā in this fashion, he proceeded in his flying chariot to Indra's world.

The end of the one hundred seventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 108

1. When Daśaratha Kākutstha had departed, great Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, spoke in the greatest delight to Rāghava, who stood with his hands cupped in reverence:

2. "Rāma, scorcher of your foes! Your seeing us should not be without its reward. I am pleased, and therefore you must say what your heart desires."

3. Addressed in this fashion, Kākutstha, together with his brother Lakṣmaṇa and his wife, Sītā, cupped his hands in reverence and replied:

4. "If you are truly pleased with me, lord of all the gods, I will tell you. Please make my words prove true, foremost among the eloquent.

5. "May all those valorous monkeys who, for my sake, have gone to the abode of Yama rise up, restored to life.

6. "Let them, who were devoted to my service and heedless of death, be reunited through your grace. This is the boon I choose.

7. "Humbler of pride, I wish to see the langurs and apes free from their pain and their wounds and filled once more with strength and vigor.

8. "May there always be choice roots and fruits, even out of season, and may the rivers run clear wherever those monkeys may dwell."

9. When great Indra had heard those words of great Rāghava, he responded with these words, which manifested his pleasure:

10. "This is a major boon that you have requested, my son, delight of the Raghus. But these tawny monkeys shall arise, just like sleepers when their sleep is done.

11. "Filled with the greatest joy, they will all be reunited with their friends, their relatives, their kinsmen, and their own people.

12. "The trees shall be filled with fruit and varicolored with blossoms, even out of season, great bowman, and the rivers shall be filled with water."

13. Then all the monkeys—their bodies, which had been covered with wounds, now healed and free of wounds—were wonderstruck, crying, "What is this?"

14. When all the principal gods saw that Kākutstha had had his wish fulfilled, they first praised him, who was so praiseworthy and who was accompanied by Lakṣmaṇa, and then they said:

15. "Proceed from here to Ayodhyā, hero, and discharge the monkeys. You should also console your devoted and long-suffering Maithilī.

16. "You must see your brother Bharata, who is practicing austerities in his grief for you. Then, once you have gone there, have yourself consecrated, and so bring joy to the people of the city."

17. When they had spoken in this fashion, the gods took their leave of Rāma and Saumitri and, in great delight, they went off to heaven in their flying chariots, which were as radiant as the sun.

18. Then Kākutstha, along with his brother Lakṣmaṇa, after respectfully saluting all of the most eminent of the thirty gods, ordered the army to make camp.

19. Under the protection of Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma, that great and glorious army, radiant with splendor, its troops delighted, glowed on every side, as does the night illumined by the cool-rayed moon.

The end of the one hundred eighth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 109

1. When Rāma, tamer of his enemies, had passed the night and risen at his leisure, Vibhīṣaṇa, cupping his hands in reverence and wishing him victory, said to him:

2–3. "Here is water for your bath, ointments for your body, garments and ornaments, heavenly sandalpaste, and various kinds of garlands. These lotus-eyed women, skilled in the arts of grooming their like, are at your service. They will bathe you in the proper fashion, Rāghava."

4. Addressed in this fashion, Kākutstha replied to Vibhīṣaṇa, "You should instead invite the tawny monkeys, led by Sugrīva, to bathe.

5–6. "For the great-armed and righteous prince Bharata, Kaikeyī's son, who is delicate and accustomed to comforts, is nonetheless true to his vows and suffering hardship for my sake. Without him—so righteous in his conduct—I do not care for baths, garments, and ornaments.

7. "Moreover, we must return to the city immediately by this very road, for the path of one traveling to Ayodhyā is extremely difficult."

8. Addressed in this fashion, Vibhīṣaṇa replied to Kākutstha, "I shall see to it that you reach your city in a single day, prince.

9. "For, bless you, there is a flying palace, as radiant as the sun, called Puṣpaka, which Rāvaṇa took from my brother Kubera by force.

10. "That flying palace, which resembles a cloud, is kept nearby. By means of this conveyance you shall go to Ayodhyā free from anxiety.

11. "But if I am at all worthy of your favor, if you are cognizant of my virtues, and if you have any affection for me, my wise friend, then please stay here for a while.

12. "Then, Rāma, honored with all manner of desirable things, you can depart with your brother Lakṣmaṇa and your wife, Vaidehī.

13. "You are very dear to me, Rāma, as is your army and your host of friends. Therefore, please accept this appropriate hospitality that I am offering.

14. "But I am not trying to give you orders, Rāghava. I am your servant, and I am beseeching you out of my affection, esteem, and friendship."

15. Addressed in this fashion, Rāma replied to Vibhīṣaṇa in such a way that all the rākṣasas and monkeys could hear him:

16. "I have been greatly honored by you, heroic scorcher of your foes, through your counsel, your wholehearted assistance, and your unparalleled friendship.

17–19. "It is not that I would not heed your words, lord of the rākṣasas. But my heart is eager to see my brother Bharata. For he came out to Citrakūṭa to bring me back, and, though he beseeched me, bowing his head to my feet, I would not heed his words. And my heart is eager also to see Kausalyā, Sumitrā, and illustrious Kaikeyī, as well as my elders, my friends, and the citizens, together with their children.

20. "So please get that flying palace ready for me immediately, lord of the rākṣasas. For how indeed could I agree to stay here, now that my mission has been accomplished?

21. "Please grant me leave, Vibhīṣaṇa, my gentle friend. I have already been deeply honored. Please don't be angry, but since I am in haste, I beseech you."

22–27. Vibhīṣaṇa then stood waiting after announcing to Rāma that that unassailable flying palace, as swift as thought, had arrived. Each of its parts was variegated with gold, and its raised platforms were made of lapis. It was covered on every side with penthouses, and it shone like silver. It was adorned with white flags and banners. It was splendid with golden mansions and adorned with golden lotuses. It was covered with masses of tiny bells and had windows of pearl. It was covered with masses of bells on every side so that it made a sweet sound. Fashioned by Viśvakarman, it resembled the peak of Mount Meru. It was adorned with many mansions that shone with pearl and silver. It had floors whose sections were variegated with crystal, and its splendid and costly seats of lapis were spread with expensive coverlets.

The end of the one hundred ninth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 110

1. When Vibhīṣaṇa saw that the flying palace Puṣpaka, all adorned with flowers, had come, he spoke to Rāma, who stood nearby.

2. Cupping his hands in reverence, the humble and obedient lord of the rākṣasas, filled with a sense of urgency, said to Rāghava, "What should I do now?"

3. After some reflection, Rāghava of immense blazing energy said these affectionate words to him in such a way that Lakṣmaṇa could hear them:

4. "Vibhīṣaṇa, the forest-dwelling monkeys have performed arduous deeds. You must honor them with gems, various ornaments, and other valuables.

5. "O lord of the rākṣasas, Laṅkā was besieged and conquered with the assistance of these monkeys, who, filled with the excitement of battle, cast off their fear of death and never retreated in battle.

6. "Honored in this fashion by you, bestower of honor, in your gratitude, these leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys, who are deserving of honor, will be delighted.

7. "I am advising you to do this so that they may recognize that you know both how to acquire wealth and dispense it and that you are compassionate and illustrious."

8. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, Vibhīṣaṇa honored all the monkeys, each according to his share, with gems and other valuables.

9–10. Then, having seen the troop leaders honored with gems and other valuables, Rāma, taking the glorious, but embarrassed, Vaidehī on his lap, ascended that magnificent flying palace, together with his valorous brother Lakṣmaṇa, who was armed with a bow.

11. Once he had ascended the flying palace, Kākutstha addressed the immensely powerful Sugrīva, the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa, and all the monkeys:

12. "Foremost among the monkeys, you have done all that friends could be expected to do. I grant you leave. You may now all depart at your leisure.

*13. "And you, Sugrīva, scorcher of your foes, you who fear only unrighteousness, have accomplished all that a friend and ally could be expected to do. You may now quickly return to Kiṣkindhā accompanied by your army.

14. "And you, Vibhīṣaṇa, may dwell in Laṅkā, your own kingdom, which I have given you. Not even the heaven-dwelling gods along with Indra will be capable of assaulting you.

15. "I will now return to Ayodhyā, my father's capital. I wish to take my leave, and I bid you all farewell."

16. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, the immensely powerful monkeys and the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa cupped their hands in reverence and said to him, "We wish to go to Ayodhyā. Please, sir, take us all."

17. "Once we have seen you dripping from your consecration and have respectfully saluted Kausalyā, we will immediately return to our own homes, O son of the lord of men."

18. Addressed in this fashion by Vibhīṣaṇa and the monkeys, righteous and majestic Rāghava replied to them and to Sugrīva:

19. "All my friends and I would experience a pleasure greater than any other if I could share the joy of returning to the city together with all of you.

20. "So quickly ascend the flying palace, Sugrīva, together with your monkeys. And you too, Vibhīṣaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, ascend along with your ministers."

21. Then, hastening, Sugrīva, together with his army, quickly ascended the heavenly flying palace Puṣpaka, as did Vibhīṣaṇa, together with his ministers.

22. Once they had all ascended the superb vehicle of Kubera, lord of wealth, it rose into the sky at Rāghava's command.

23. Then Rāma departed in that radiant flying palace yoked to haṃsas. Delighted in mind and body, he resembled Kubera himself.

The end of the one hundred tenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 111

1. At Rāma's command that magnificent flying palace flew onward, like a great cloud driven before the wind.

2. Casting his gaze in all directions, Rāma, the delight of the Raghus, said to Sītā Maithilī, whose face was like the hare-marked moon:

3. "Vaidehī, behold Laṅkā, fashioned by Viśvakarman himself, situated there on the peak of Mount Trikūṭa, which resembles the peak of Mount Kailāsa.

4. "And look, Sītā, there, mired with flesh and blood, is the battlefield that was the scene of that huge slaughter of the tawny monkeys and the rākṣasas.

5. "It was here, on your account, wide-eyed lady, that I slew Rāvaṇa. Here, too, Kumbhakarṇa was slain as well as the night-roaming rākṣasa Prahasta.

6. "And it was here that Lakṣmaṇa slew Indrajit Rāvaṇi in battle, while Virūpākṣa, impossible to even look upon, as well as Mahāpārśva and Mahodara were also slain.

7. "Akampana was slain here as were those other powerful rākṣasas, Triśiras, Atikāya, Devāntaka, and Narāntaka.

8. "And here Rāvaṇa's wife Mandodarī, surrounded by a thousand of her co-wives all drenched with tears, mourned him.

9. "And there you can see the shore of the ocean, fair-faced woman, where we camped for the night after crossing the sea.

10. "And, wide-eyed lady, that bridge is Nala's bridge, all-but-impossible to build, which, for your sake, I had constructed across the ocean, the reservoir of waters.

11. "Observe the imperturbable ocean, Vaidehī, Varuṇa's abode, boundless and roaring, abounding in conch and mother of pearl.

12. "And look, Maithilī, at the golden lord of mountains, Mount Maināka, with its golden peak, which, parting the sea, rose up to provide a resting place for Hanumān.

13. "And here is where Vibhīṣaṇa, king of the rākṣasas came over to me.

14. "And there, Sītā, one can see Sugrīva's charming city, Kiṣkindhā, with its lovely woodlands. That is where I killed Vālin.

15. "There, Sītā, one can see Ṛśyamūka, foremost of mountains. Laced with golden minerals, it resembles a huge storm cloud laced with lightning.

16. "It was here that I met Sugrīva, lord of the monkeys, and where I forged a pact, Sītā, with the purpose of slaying Vālin.

17. "And there one can see the lotus pond Pampā, with its lovely woodlands where, bereft of you, I lamented in my profound grief.

18. "On its banks I met Śabarī, who practiced righteousness. And it was here that I killed Kabandha, his arms a league in length.

19. "And there, graceful Sītā, in Janasthāna, one can see that majestic tree, the lord of the forest, where, on your account, a great battle took place between cruel Rāvaṇa and great Jaṭāyus.

20. "And it was here, too, that, with my straight-flying arrows, I slew Khara and struck down Dūṣaṇa and immensely powerful Triśiras in battle.

21. "There one can see the charming and beautiful leaf hut from which you were forcibly abducted by Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas.

22. "And there is the lovely and auspicious Godāvarī River with its limpid waters. Look, Maithilī, one can see the ashram of Agastya.

23. "And, Vaidehī, here one can see the vast ashram of Śarabhaṅga to which thousand-eyed Śakra, smasher of citadels, himself came.

24. "Over there, slender-waisted woman, one can see the dwellings of the ascetics, where Atri, the ashram elder, whose radiance is like that of Sūrya or Agni Vaiśvānara, dwells. It was here, Sītā, that you met the ascetic woman who practiced righteousness.

25. "It was in this region that I killed the giant Virādha.

26. "And here, slender woman, just coming into view, is Citrakūṭa, the lord of mountains, where Kaikeyī's son came to beseech me to return.

27. "Over there, in the distance, where Bharadvāja's majestic ashram is just coming into view, one can see the Yamunā with its lovely woodlands.

28. "And over there one can see the Ganges, which flows by three paths, lady of the fair complexion. And that is the city of Śṛṅgavera, where Guha met us.

29. "And there one can see Ayodhyā, my father's capital. Now that you have returned, Vaidehī, you should make obeisance to Ayodhyā."

30. Then all the monkeys and the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa, jumping up again and again, gazed at that beautiful city.

31. Those leaping monkeys gazed upon the city of Ayodhyā, garlanded with white mansions. It had spacious courtyards and was crowded with elephants and horses, just like Amarāvatī, the city of great Indra.

The end of the one hundred eleventh sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 112

1. And so, on the fifth day of the fortnight when the fourteenth year was just complete, Lakṣmaṇa's older brother reached Bharadvāja's ashram and, with complete self-possession, praised that sage.

2. When he had respectfully saluted that treasure trove of asceticism Bharadvāja, he inquired of him: "I trust, holy sage, that you hear that the people of the city are healthy and well fed. I trust that Bharata is intent on his duties and that my mothers are still living."

3. Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, the great sage Bharadvāja smiled and, in great delight, replied to that foremost of the Raghus.

4. "Smeared with mud and wearing matted locks, Bharata awaits you, having placed your sandals in a position of honor. And, yes, everything is fine in your household.

5–7. "When last I saw you, conqueror in battle, you were entering the deep forest on foot, clad in barkcloth garments, with but one lone companion and a woman. Desiring only righteousness, you had been driven from the kingdom, giving up everything to obey your father's instructions and intent on obeying those of Kaikeyī. Stripped of all objects of enjoyment and subsisting on wild roots and fruits, you were like an immortal god fallen from heaven. At that time, I was deeply saddened.

8. "But now, when I see that you have accomplished your mission and triumphed over your enemy in the company of your kinsmen and your hosts of friends, I feel unsurpassed delight.

9–14. "And I know, Rāghava, about all the many joys and sorrows you experienced, starting with the slaughter in Janasthāna. There was the encounter with Mārīca and the assault on Sītā while you were employed on behalf of the brahmans to protect all the ascetics. Then there was the encounter with Kabandha, your arrival at Lake Pampā, and your alliance with Sugrīva on account of which you slew Vālin. I know about the search for Vaidehī, the feats of the son of the wind god, and how Nala's bridge was built once Vaidehī had been found. I know, too, about how the excited troop leaders of the tawny monkeys set Laṅkā ablaze, and how Rāvaṇa, that thorn in the side of the gods, was destroyed, along with his sons, his kinsmen, his ministers, his army, and his vehicles. Finally, I know about your meeting with the thirty gods and how they granted you a boon. All of that is known to me, lover of righteousness, through the power of my asceticism.

15. "And I, too, will grant you a boon, foremost of those who bear weapons. So please accept my guest-offering. Tomorrow you shall go to Ayodhyā."

16. The majestic son of the king, bowing his head, accepted his instructions with the words, "Very well." Then, in great delight, he requested his boon.

17. "Holy sage, may all the trees along the road I take to Ayodhyā bear fruit out of season and drip with honey."

18. Then, suddenly, those trees that had no fruit were filled with fruit, those that had no blossoms were covered with them. Those that were bare were covered with leaves, and all of them dripped with honey.

The end of the one hundred twelfth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 113

1. But once Rāghava had caught sight of Ayodhyā, he was plunged into thought. Then, after some reflection, he cast his glance upon the monkeys.

2. Then wise Rāma of blazing energy, wishing to do a kindness, spoke kindly to the leaping monkey, swift-striding Hanumān:

3. "Go quickly, best of leaping monkeys. Hastening to Ayodhyā, you must find out if all is well with the people in the king's palace.

4. "When you reach the city of Śṛṅgavera, you must inform the chief of the Niṣādas, Guha, whose realm is the deep forest, in my words, that I am safe.

5. "For once my friend and equal Guha hears that I am safe, well, and free from anxiety, he will be delighted.

6. "And Guha, chief of the Niṣādas, in great delight, will show you the way to Ayodhyā and will inform you of Bharata's activities.

7. "You are to inform Bharata in my words that I am safe. Tell him that, together with my wife and Lakṣmaṇa, I have accomplished my purpose.

8–11. "Tell him about Vaidehī's abduction by powerful Rāvaṇa, my negotiations with Sugrīva, the slaying of Vālin in battle, the search for Maithilī, and how you found her after leaping across the great water, the imperishable lord of rivers. And tell him about the march to the sea and the encounter with Sāgara, god of the ocean, and how the bridge was built and Rāvaṇa slain. Tell him about the granting of the boon by great Indra, Brahmā, and Varuṇa, and about my reunion with our father through the grace of the great god Śiva.

12. "Tell him: 'Having conquered the hosts of his enemies, attained unsurpassed glory, and accomplished his purpose, immensely powerful Rāma has returned with his allies.'

13. "And whatever facial expression Bharata may adopt upon hearing this, you must report that to me fully.

14. "Through the color of his face, his glance, and his manner of speaking, you should accurately determine everything about Bharata's state of mind and his intentions.

15. "For whose head would not be turned by an ancestral kingdom rich in every object of desire and filled with elephants, horses, and chariots?

16. "And should majestic Bharata, being long accustomed to it, desire the kingship for himself, then let that delight of the Raghus rule the entire earth without exception.

17. "Once you have determined his state of mind and his intentions, monkey, you must return quickly before we have gone very far."

18. Instructed in this fashion, Hanumān, son of Māruta, took on a human form and hastened to Ayodhyā.

19–20. Leaping along the path of his father and crossing the fearsome confluence of the Ganges and the Yamunā rivers, the auspicious abode of the serpent lords, powerful Hanumān reached the city of Śṛṅgavera, and, approaching Guha, he delightedly addressed him with these auspicious words:

21. "Your truly valorous friend Rāma Kākutstha, who is accompanied by Sītā and Saumitri, informs you that he is safe.

22. "On the instructions of Bharadvāja, Rāghava spent last night, the night of the fifth, with him. Now, since he has taken his leave of the sage, you shall see him this very day."

23. When he had spoken in this fashion, swift Hanumān of immense blazing energy, without further hesitation, swiftly flew up once more, the hairs of his body bristling with excitement.

24. He saw the spot sacred to Rāma and the river Vālukinī. And he saw the Gomatī River and a fearsome forest of sāla trees.

25. When he had swiftly traveled a long way, that elephant among monkeys reached the blossoming trees that grew near Nandigrāma.

26–30. A quarter of a league from Ayodhyā he spied Bharata, who was living in an ashram. Dejected and emaciated, he was clad in garments of barkcloth and black antelope skin. Wearing matted locks, his body was smeared with dirt. Tormented by the catastrophe that had befallen his brother and practicing righteousness, he engaged in asceticism, restrained and subsisting on fruits and roots. He had a mass of matted hair piled high and was clad in barkcloth and animal skins. Self-controlled and with focused mind, he was equal in blazing energy to a brahman-seer. Having placed Rāma's sandals in a position of honor, he ruled the earth, protecting the people of all four social classes from every danger. He was attended by incorruptible ministers, household priests, and attentive army chiefs, all clad in ochre garments.

31. For the citizens, who loved righteousness, were determined never to abandon the prince, who was clad in barkcloth and black antelope skin.

32. Cupping his hands in reverence, Hanumān, son of Māruta, spoke these words to that knower of righteousness, who was like a second Dharma, god of righteousness, incarnate:

33. "Kākutstha, for whom you have been grieving and who had been living in the Daṇḍaka Forest wearing barkcloth garments and matted hair, informs you that he is safe.

34. "I bring you wonderful news, your majesty! Reunited with your brother Rāma within the very hour, you shall put aside your terrible sorrow.

35. "Having slain Rāvaṇa and recovered Maithilī, Rāma, who has accomplished his purpose, has come back with his immensely powerful allies.

36. "And so have Lakṣmaṇa of immense blazing energy and illustrious Sītā Vaidehī, who is united with Rāma, just as is Śacī with great Indra."

37. Addressed in this fashion by Hanumān, Bharata, Kaikeyī's son, in a sudden access of delight, fell and fainted dead away in his joy.

38. Regaining consciousness and getting up after a short while, Bharata Rāghava then said this to Hanumān, who had told him the good news.

39. Embracing the monkey in his excitement, majestic Bharata drenched him with copious teardrops of joy and delight.

40–42. "Whether you be a god or a man, you have come here out of compassion. My gentle friend, I shall give you, the bearer of this good news who reported it to me, a hundred thousand cows, a hundred prosperous villages, and sixteen maidens of excellent character, adorned with earrings, to be your wives. These are women of excellent caste and family, adorned with every ornament. Their complexions are like gold, their faces as lovely as the moon, and their noses and thighs perfect."

43. When the king's son had heard from the monkey hero about Rāma's seemingly miraculous return, he was delighted, and in his joy and eagerness to see Rāma, he once more spoke these words.

The end of the one hundred thirteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 114

1. "I am hearing such delightful news of my lord, who had gone to the deep forest for so many years.

2. "So it seems to me that the popular verse, 'Joy comes to a man even if he has to wait a hundred years,' is quite true.

3. "How and in what country and for what reason did Rāghava come to be associated with the tawny monkeys? Tell me truthfully, since I am asking you."

4. Questioned in this fashion by the prince, Hanumān, seated on an ascetic's seat, recounted all of Rāma's adventures in the forest:

5–9. "Great-armed prince, you already know all about how Rāma was exiled, about the two boons given to your mother, and about how King Daśaratha died from grief for his son. And you know how you yourself, lord, were hastily brought back from Rājagṛha by messengers, and how, when you entered Ayodhyā, you declined the kingship. You also know how, when you had gone to Mount Citrakūṭa, your brother, the tormentor of his foes, remained faithful to the king's vow and rejected the kingdom, even though you—following the righteous path of the virtuous—begged him to accept it. And you know, of course, how, taking your noble brother's sandals, you came back once again. Now learn from me what took place once you had gone back.

10. "Once you had departed, Rāma entered the vast and deserted Daṇḍaka Forest, whose beasts and birds were wildly agitated.

11. "And as they were making their way through that dense forest, the powerful Virādha appeared before them, roaring a mighty roar.

12. “Seizing him, they hurled him, face down with his arms raised, into a pit, as he roared a mighty roar like an elephant.

13. “After accomplishing that difficult feat, the brothers Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa came, that very evening, to Śarabhaṅga’s lovely ashram.

14. “Once Śarabhaṅga had gone to heaven, truly valorous Rāma respectfully saluted all the sages and then proceeded to Janasthāna.

15. “While great Rāghava was living there, he slaughtered fourteen thousand rākṣasas of fearsome deeds.

16–17. “Then, a little later, Śūrpaṇakhā approached Rāma. Instructed by Rāma, immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa suddenly sprang up, seized his sword, and hacked off her ears and nose. Mutilated by him, that foolish creature then approached Rāvaṇa.

18. “Next, a fearsome rākṣasa, a servant of Rāvaṇa named Mārīca, turned himself into a bejeweled deer and infatuated Vaidehī.

19. “When she caught sight of it, Vaidehī said to Rāma, ‘You must catch it! Oh, how charming and beautiful it would be in our ashram!’

20. “Then Rāma chased him as he fled and, as he fled, killed him with a straight arrow.

21. “Then, gentle prince, when Rāghava had gone after the deer and Lakṣmaṇa, too, had gone out, ten-necked Rāvaṇa entered the ashram. He violently seized Sītā, just as a baleful planet might seize the constellation Rohiṇī in the heavens.

22. “Once he had killed the vulture Jaṭāyus, who tried to rescue her, Rāvaṇa seized Sītā violently and swiftly departed.

23. “However, some monkeys of extraordinary form, as huge as mountains, who were there on a mountaintop, were astonished to see Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, going by, clutching Sītā.

24. “Rāvaṇa, who made the world cry out, then entered Laṅkā.

25. “There Rāvaṇa installed Maithilī in a vast and beautiful palace covered with gold and tried to calm her with soothing words.

26. “Finding the vulture upon his return, Kākutstha was distraught.

*27. “After cremating the slain vulture, a dear friend of his father, Rāma wandered along the Godāvarī River and through its forest regions all in blossom. Then the two princes encountered the rākṣasa Kabandha in the vast forest.

28. "On the advice of Kabandha, truly valorous Rāma went to Mount Ṛśyamūka and met with Sugrīva.

29. "Even before they had met, the two had formed an emotional bond through their mutual affection. Through their conversations with each other, it became a profound love.

30. "Once he had slain the gigantic and immensely powerful Vālin through the strength of his own arms in battle, Rāma bestowed upon Sugrīva a kingship of his own.

31. "Once Sugrīva had been established in the kingship, he promised Rāma that, together with all the monkeys, he would search for the princess.

32. "Under orders from Sugrīva, the great lord of the monkeys, a hundred million monkeys were sent out in all directions.

33. "And then, while we were lost in the great Vindhya mountain range and were sorely afflicted with sorrow, a great deal of time passed.

34. "But the mighty brother of the king of vultures, Saṃpāti by name, informed us about Sītā's dwelling in the abode of Rāvaṇa.

35. "Then, relying on my own strength, I leapt a hundred leagues, dispelling the sorrow of my kinsmen, who were overcome with sorrow.

36. "And there I found that woman, all alone, in an aśoka grove, clad in a silken garment, covered with dirt, miserable but firm in her vows.

37. "After meeting with that blameless woman and having thoroughly questioned her in the proper fashion, I took a jewel as a token of recognition and, having accomplished my mission, returned.

38. "When I returned, I presented that great and glittering gem to Rāma, tireless in action, as a token of recognition.

39. "Once he had heard about Maithilī, he was delighted and regained his will to live, as might a gravely ill man at the point of death after drinking the nectar of immortality.

40. "Putting in motion a great undertaking, he turned his thoughts to the destruction of Laṅkā, just as Agni, the shining god of fire, desires to destroy all the worlds at the end of a cosmic age.

41. "Then, when he reached the sea, he had Nala construct a bridge. It was by means of that bridge that the army of monkeys crossed over.

42. "Nīla slew Prahasta, and Rāghava killed Kumbhakarṇa. Lakṣmaṇa slew Rāvaṇa's son Indrajit, and Rāma himself killed Rāvaṇa.

43. "Then Kākutstha, that scorcher of his foes, having met with Śakra, Yama, and Varuṇa, along with the gods and seers, received boons.

44. "And when he had received those boons, he was reunited with the monkeys in great delight. He then proceeded to Kiṣkindhā in the flying palace Puṣpaka.

45. "Nothing can prevent you from seeing Rāma tomorrow on the auspicious day of the moon's conjunction with the constellation Puṣya. For, having once more reached the Ganges, he is staying there with the sage Bharadvāja."

46. Then, when Bharata had heard that great and truthful speech of Hanumān, he was delighted. Cupping his hands in reverence, he spoke these words that delighted one's heart, "At long last, indeed, my fondest wish has been fulfilled."

The end of the one hundred fourteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 115

1. When truly valorous Bharata, slayer of enemy heroes, had heard those words that filled him with joy, he gave instructions to Śatrughna, who was similarly delighted.

2. "Let pious men worship all the divinities and the shrines of the city with fragrant garlands and musical instruments.

3. "And let the king's wives and his ministers, the soldiers, the army troops and their womenfolk go out to see Rāma's face, which is like the hare-marked moon."

4. When powerful Śatrughna, slayer of enemy heroes, had heard those words of Bharata, he commanded his many thousands of conscripted laborers:

5. "Level the road—depressions, rough places, as well as smooth areas—from Nandigrāma onward, sparing only the roadside shrines.

6. "Have some men sprinkle the whole ground with ice-cold water, and then have others strew it everywhere with parched grain and flowers.

7. "Let them raise flags along the main road in our splendid city, and let them beautify their houses starting at daybreak.

8. "Let hundreds of men strew the broad royal highway with garlands, festoons, and loose blossoms and with fragrant powders in five colors."

9. Given their orders, great chariot-warriors went forth swiftly in their chariots along with thousands of rutting elephants adorned with gold, while others went forth with bull- and cow-elephants with golden girths.

10. Next, all of Daśaratha's wives went forth mounted in carriages, placing Kausalyā and Sumitrā at their head.

11. The thundering of the horses' hooves, the rumbling of the chariot wheels, and the din of conches and war drums seemed to shake the very earth.

12. Indeed, the entire city went forth to Nandigrāma.

13–16. Thus did great and righteous Bharata, together with his counselors, set forth to meet Rāma. He was surrounded by eminent brahmans, the leaders of the caste guilds, and merchants, as well as by his ministers, who held garlands and sweets in their hands. To the sounds of conches and bherī drums, he was lauded by panegyrists. Deeply learned in righteousness, he bore his noble brother's sandals on his head and carried with him a white umbrella festooned with white garlands, and a pair of white yak-tail fly whisks adorned with gold and fit for a king. He who had been earlier downcast and was still emaciated with fasting and clad in garments of barkcloth and black antelope skin was now filled with joy upon hearing of his brother's return.

17. Looking about him, Bharata said these words to the son of Pavana: "I hope you have not fallen prey to the typical flightiness of monkeys. For I do not see the noble Rāma Kākutstha, the scorcher of his foes."

18. When these words had been spoken, Hanumān said this to truly valorous Bharata, informing him of the reason:

19. "They have reached those trees that, through the grace of Bharadvāja, are always in fruit and flower, dripping honey, and resounding with intoxicated bees.

20. "For such, scorcher of your foes, was the boon granted to Rāma by Vāsava. And this was the hospitality, complete with every desirable thing, that was offered to him and his army.

21. "One can hear the fearsome racket of the excited forest-dwelling monkeys. I think the monkey army must be crossing the Gomatī River.

22. "Look at the cloud of dust that has been kicked up over toward the Vālukinī River. I think that the leaping monkeys must be crashing their way through the lovely forest of sāla trees.

23. "And there in the distance one can see the bright celestial flying palace Puṣpaka, which looks like the moon and was created by the mind of Brahmā.

24. "Through the grace of Kubera, bestower of wealth, great Rāma obtained this celestial flying palace, as swift as thought, after killing Rāvaṇa together with his kinsmen.

25. "In it are the two heroic Rāghava brothers, together with Vaidehī as well as Sugrīva of immense blazing energy and Vibhīṣaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas."

26. Then a great clamor of joy arose reaching to the heavens, as the women, children, youths, and elderly cried out, "There's Rāma!"

27. The men got down from their chariots, elephants, and horses and, standing on the ground, gazed at Rāma, who, in his flying palace, resembled the moon in the sky.

28. Cupping his hands in reverence and facing Rāghava, Bharata joyfully honored Rāma with a fitting welcome.

29. In that flying palace, which Brahmā created with his mind, the elder brother of Lakṣmaṇa, with his long and wide eyes, looked as splendid as a second Indra, wielder of the vajra.

30. Then Bharata humbly praised his brother Rāma, who stood atop the flying palace, like the sun, maker of day, on the summit of Mount Meru.

31. Invited on board the flying palace, truly valorous Bharata approached Rāma in great delight and once more respectfully saluted him.

32. Then Kākutstha, raising up Bharata, whom he had not seen in such a long time, placed him on his lap and embraced him in great joy.

33. After warmly greeting Lakṣmaṇa, Bharata, scorcher of his foes, respectfully saluted Vaidehī and, in great delight, announced his name.

34. Next, the son of Kaikeyī embraced Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, Aṅgada, Mainda, Dvivida, Nīla, and Ṛṣabha.

35. Those monkeys, who could take on any form at will, took on human forms and, in great delight, inquired of Bharata about his welfare.

36. Then Bharata graciously spoke these words to Vibhīṣaṇa: "Thank heavens that through your assistance this all-but-impossible feat has been accomplished!"

37. Next, Śatrughna respectfully saluted Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and, afterward, humbly worshiped Sītā's feet.

38. Then Rāma approached his mother, who was so disconsolate and drawn with grieving, and, bending, he clasped her feet, soothing her heart.

39. Then, after respectfully saluting Sumitrā and illustrious Kaikeyī, he approached all his other mothers and the household priest.

40. All the people of the city addressed him, their hands cupped in reverence, crying, "Welcome great-armed increaser of Kausalyā's joy!"

41. And Bharata's elder brother gazed upon those thousands of cupped hands that were extended by the people of the city and that were like so many full-blown lotuses.

42. Then, taking Rāma's sandals, Bharata, who knew righteousness, himself placed them on the feet of the lord of men.

43. Cupping his hands in reverence, Bharata said to Rāma, "Here, your majesty, is your well-guarded kingdom, which I have now given back.

44. "Today the purpose of my birth has been accomplished and my most cherished wish fulfilled, in that I see you returned to Ayodhyā once more as king.

45. "Sir, please inspect the treasury, the granary, the city, and the army. Through your blazing energy, I have increased all of them tenfold."

46. When the monkeys and the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa saw Bharata speaking in this fashion, with such love for his brother, they shed tears.

47. Then, taking Bharata on his lap in great delight, Rāghava proceeded with his army in the flying palace to Bharata's ashram.

48. Once he reached Bharata's ashram, Rāghava, together with his army, descended from atop the flying palace and stood on the ground.

49. Rāma then addressed that unsurpassed flying palace, saying, "You must now carry the god Kubera Vaiśravaṇa. I give you leave. You may go."

50. Given leave by Rāma, that unsurpassed flying palace departed in a northerly direction to the abode of Kubera, bestower of wealth.

51. Just as Śakra, lord of the immortal gods, might grasp the feet of Bṛhaspati, mighty Rāghava clasped the feet of his household priest, who was his equal. Then they sat down together, each on a separate, splendid seat.

The end of the one hundred fifteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

Sarga 116

1. Cupping his hands to his forehead in reverence, Bharata, increaser of Kaikeyī's joy, addressed his elder brother, truly valorous Rāma:

2. "You showed my mother respect and gave over the kingdom to me. I now give it back to you, just as you once gave it to me.

3. "I am no more able to bear this heavy burden than could a young calf bear a yoke set down by a powerful but solitary bullock.

4. "I think that any threat facing the kingdom, if unaddressed, would be as difficult to remedy as it would be to repair a dike that, breached by a tremendous flood of water, has sprung a leak.

5. "Your majesty, tamer of your foes, I am no more able to follow the path you have blazed than is a donkey to match the speed of a horse, or a crow to match that of a haṃsa.

6–7. "A tree planted in one's inner court might grow to a great height, impossible to climb with its huge trunk and many branches. But after coming into blossom, it might wither and fail to bear fruit. And thus he for whose sake it was planted would reap no benefit from it.

8. "This is merely an analogy, great-armed lord of men. But if you do not rule us, your devoted servants, you will come to realize its significance.

9. "Let the whole world see you consecrated this very day, shining with radiant energy like the blazing sun at noon.

10. "You should fall asleep and waken to the sounds of musical ensembles, the jingling of women's anklets and girdles, and the sweet sounds of singing.

11. "As long as the wheel of heavenly bodies shall turn and as long as the earth, bearer of wealth, shall endure, so long may you exercise lordship over all in this world."

12. Upon hearing Bharata's words, Rāma, the conqueror of enemy citadels, accepted them, saying, "So be it," as he sat on his splendid seat.

13. Then, at the command of Śatrughna, skillful barbers with a gentle touch and quick at their work attended upon Rāghava.

14–15. Once Bharata, immensely powerful Lakṣmaṇa, the monkey lord Sugrīva, and the rākṣasa lord Vibhīṣaṇa had all bathed before him, Rāma gave up his matted locks and bathed. Then, wearing multicolored garlands and unguents and clad in costly garments, he stood there, blazing with splendor.

16. Thus did mighty and splendid Śatrughna, increaser of the House of Ikṣvāku, see to the adornment of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.

17. Then the virtuous wives of Daśaratha themselves saw to the ravishing adornment of Sītā.

18. Finally, with great care, Kausalyā, delighted and deeply fond of her son, beautified all the wives of the Rāghavas.

19. Then, at the command of Śatrughna, the charioteer named Sumantra yoked a chariot that was richly adorned throughout and brought it up.

20. When he saw that heavenly chariot standing before him and blazing like the orb of the sun, great-armed and truly valorous Rāma mounted it.

21. Meanwhile, those ministers of King Daśaratha who had remained in Ayodhyā, placing the household priest at their head, purposefully took counsel together.

22–23. They took counsel with regard to the prosperity of Rāma and the maintenance of the city. "Preceding all your actions with auspicious rites, you must do everything necessary for the consecration of great Rāma, so worthy of success." Having thus instructed the household priest, all the ministers quickly left the city, their minds intent on seeing Rāma.

24. Like blameless, thousand-eyed Indra mounting his chariot yoked to tawny steeds, Rāma mounted his chariot and proceeded toward the splendid city.

25. Bharata held the reins and Śatrughna the umbrella, while Lakṣmaṇa waved a fan over Rāma's head.

26. Sugrīva, the lord of the monkeys, held one white yak-tail fly whisk, while Vibhīṣaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, held another as bright as the moon.

27. In the heavens was heard the sweet sound made by the hosts of seers and gods, together with the Maruts, as they praised Rāma.

28. Then Sugrīva, the lord of the monkeys, filled with immense blazing energy, mounted an elephant named Śatruṃjaya, as huge as a mountain.

29. The other monkeys, too, who had taken on human form and were adorned with every ornament, mounted nine thousand elephants and set forth.

30. Thus, to the sound of conches, cheers, and the thundering of war drums, did the tiger among men proceed toward the mansion-garlanded city.

31. And as the great chariot-warrior Rāghava, radiant with splendor, passed in his chariot with his retinue, the people gazed upon him.

32. Congratulating Rāma Kākutstha and graciously acknowledged by him, they followed the great man, who was accompanied by his brothers.

33. Like the moon surrounded by the constellations, Rāma, surrounded by the brahmans, his ministers, and his subjects, shone with splendor.

34. As he proceeded, he was accompanied by musicians who went before him, holding cymbals and svastikas in their hands, and by delighted people shouting out blessings.

35. And, before Rāma, went cows, maidens, and brahmans, bearing unhusked, golden rice, and men with sweetmeats in their hands.

36. Rāma then told his counselors about his friendship with Sugrīva, the supernatural strength of Hanumān, the son of Anila, and the deeds of the monkeys. When the people of Ayodhyā heard this, they were wonderstruck.

37. After reporting all of this, Rāma, resplendent and surrounded by the monkeys, made his entrance into Ayodhyā, which was thronged with delighted and prosperous people.

38. Then, as the citizens raised flags on house after house, he reached his father's lovely residence, the ancestral home of the Ikṣvākus.

39. When he reached the palace of his great father, he entered it and respectfully saluted Kausalyā, Sumitrā, and Kaikeyī.

40. Then the prince, the delight of the Raghus, sweetly addressed Bharata, foremost among the righteous, with these significant words:

41. "Place at Sugrīva's disposal my vast and splendid palace, the one adjacent to the aśoka grove and covered with pearls and lapis."

42. When truly valorous Bharata had heard those words of his, he took Sugrīva by the hand and entered that dwelling.

43. Then, ordered by Śatrughna, servants entered at once holding oil lamps and bed coverings.

44. Rāghava's younger brother, of immense blazing energy, then said to Sugrīva, "Lord, you must dispatch emissaries in connection with Rāma's consecration."

45. At once, Sugrīva gave four golden vessels, adorned with every gem, to four of the monkey lords.

46. "Monkeys, you must act in such a way that you are waiting for me at daybreak with these four vessels filled, respectively, with water from each of the four oceans."

47. Addressed in this fashion, those great monkeys, as huge as elephants, swiftly flew up into the sky, like so many Garuḍas, swift in flight.

48. Jāmbavān, Hanumān, the monkey Vegadarśin, and Ṛṣabha then fetched pitchers full of water. And in urns they brought the waters of five hundred rivers.

49. From the eastern ocean, Suṣeṇa, endowed with might, fetched a pitcher adorned with every gem and filled with water.

50. Ṛṣabha swiftly brought water from the southern ocean.

51. Gavaya brought a golden vessel covered with camphor and red sandalwood paste. In it was water from the vast western ocean.

52. He whose power was that of Māruta and whose pace that of Garuḍa or the wind swiftly brought frigid water from the northern ocean in a great jeweled urn.

53. Then Śatrughna, together with his ministers, presented that water to the foremost of household priests and his assistants for the purpose of Rāma's consecration.

54. Then the aged and devout Vasiṣṭha, together with the brahmans, seated Rāma and Sītā on a jeweled throne.

55–56. Vasiṣṭha, Vāmadeva, Jābāli, Kāśyapa, Kātyāyana, Suyajña, Gautama, and Vijaya all consecrated that tiger among men with fragrant and pellucid water, just as the Vasus consecrated thousand-eyed Indra Vāsava.

57–58. And thus, in great delight, with that water and with the extracts of all the different herbs, did they perform the consecration, first with the officiating priests and brahmans, and then with maidens, counselors, soldiers, and merchants, as well as with the divinities, who were hovering in the sky, the four world guardians, and all the assembled gods.

59. Śatrughna held his splendid white umbrella. Sugrīva, the lord of the monkeys, held one white yak-tail fly whisk, while Vibhīṣaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas, held another as bright as the moon.

60. Then, on the orders of Vāsava, Vāyu gave Rāghava a golden necklace with a hundred lotuses that glowed with splendor.

61. And, on the orders of Śakra, he also gave the lord of men a pearl necklace strung with every sort of jewel and adorned with an immense gem.

62. The gods and gandharvas sang and the troops of apsarases danced at the consecration of wise Rāma, who so richly deserved it.

63. And, on the festive occasion of Rāghava's consecration, the land grew rich in grain, the trees heavy with fruit, and the flowers redolent with fragrance.

64. First, that bull among men made gifts to the brahmans of a hundred bulls and a hundred thousand each of cows that had newly calved and horses.

65. Next, Rāghava gave the brahmans three hundred million gold pieces as well as costly jewels and garments of every kind.

66. Then that bull among men gave Sugrīva a heavenly diadem of gold encrusted with gems and shining like the rays of the sun.

67. And as he was greatly pleased with Aṅgada, the son of Vālin, Rāma gave him a pair of armlets adorned with diamonds and gems and variegated with lapis and jewels.

68. Rāma then presented Sītā with an unsurpassed pearl necklace set with the finest gems, its luster equal to that of moonbeams.

69. Then, keeping her eyes on her husband, Vaidehī gave the son of Vāyu two spotless and divine garments as well as splendid ornaments.

70. Unfastening the necklace from her neck, the delight of Janaka looked back and forth repeatedly from her husband to all the tawny monkeys.

71–72. Rāma, skillful at divining people's true intentions, looked closely at Janaka's daughter and said, "Beloved and charming lady, you should give the necklace to him with whom you are pleased, that is, to him in whom might, valor, and wisdom are ever present." Then that dark-eyed woman gave the necklace to the son of Vāyu.

73. Wearing that necklace, Hanumān, bull among monkeys, looked as resplendent as a mountain wreathed with a white cloud illuminated by a flood of moonlight.

74. Then the lord of the earth, that scorcher of his foes, after some thought, gave every desirable thing to Dvivida, Mainda, and Nīla.

75. And all the seniormost monkeys and the other monkey lords as well were honored according to their merit with garments and ornaments.

76. When each one of them had been honored according to his merit with many jewels and other desirable things, they all returned as they had come, delighted at heart.

77. Supremely magnanimous Rāghava then ruled in supreme felicity. And Rāma, who loved righteousness, said to Lakṣmaṇa, a knower of righteousness:

78. "Knower of righteousness, please govern with me this land of which those kings who came before us took possession with their forces. In the capacity of prince regent, you must, as my equal, bear this burden, which was borne by our forefathers."

79. But although Saumitri was being offered the position of prince regent of the land and was most earnestly entreated to accept this appointment, he would not do so. So great Rāma therefore consecrated Bharata.

80. Once righteous Rāghava had obtained that unsurpassed kingdom, he performed many different kinds of sacrifices, together with his friends, his brothers, and his kinsmen.

81. That bull among kings performed the Pauṇḍarīka, Aśvamedha, and Vājapeya sacrifices many times, as well as various other sacrifices.

82. Rāghava ruled his kingdom for ten thousand years and performed one hundred Aśvamedha sacrifices with splendid sacrificial horses and generous sacrificial fees.

83. With broad shoulders and his arms extending to his knees, valorous Rāma ruled the land with Lakṣmaṇa at his side.

84. While Rāma ruled the kingdom, no widows mourned, nor was there any fear of snakes or threat of disease.

85. The world was free from thieves, and misfortune afflicted no one. The elders never had to perform the funeral rites for their children.

86. Everyone was content. Everyone was devoted to righteousness. Looking constantly to Rāma alone, people did not harm one another.

87. While Rāma ruled the kingdom, people lived for thousands of years and had thousands of sons. They suffered no illness and were free from all sorrow.

88. The trees with their spreading boughs were always in flower and filled with fruit. Parjanya brought the rains at the proper time, and the breeze was pleasant to the touch.

89. While Rāma ruled, his subjects adhered to their own proper occupations and were satisfied with their own duties. Devoted to righteousness, they adhered always to the truth.

90. Everyone was endowed with auspicious marks. Everyone was devoted to righteousness. And so, for ten thousand years, Rāma ruled his kingdom.

The end of the one hundred sixteenth sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa of the Śrī Rāmāyaṇa.

The end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa.

NOTES

Sarga 1

In many N manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ,V1,B,D3,8,9,12), as well as the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore, the first fifteen sargas of our Yuddhakāṇḍa form the last part of the Sundarakāṇḍa. In these manuscripts, the Yuddhakāṇḍa begins immediately after the bridge to Laṅkā has been built (sarga 16). Most of the other manuscripts begin with an invocation to one deity or another—Gaṇeśa, Rāma, Viṣṇu, etc. The previous sarga left off with the account of Hanumān reciting from memory to Rāma a fiery speech he had delivered to Sītā, whom he has just visited in her prison in Laṅkā. The beginning of the Yuddhakāṇḍa finds Hanumān and Rāma, two allies in a war against Rāvaṇa, on Mount Prasravaṇa, some distance away from the monkey capital, Kiṣkindhā. Hanumān has just told Rāma that Sītā's grief has somewhat abated.

1. According to Cg and Cm, the syllable "ma" in the name Hanumān (hanumataḥ) is the fifteenth syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 3 and note; and B. N. Bhatt 1976. See notes to 2.39.5; 2.65.22; 2.93.24; 3.45.10; 5.1.1; 5.12.48; and 5.25.14. See, too, notes to 6.19.26; 6.40.40; 6.56.1; 6.68.1; and 6.97.33, App. I, No. 67, n. 34.

"report, so faithfully rendered" vākyaṃ yathāvad abhibhāṣitam: Literally, "words accurately or properly spoken." Cs, apparently trying to avoid the repetition of words for speech (vākyam . . . abhibhāṣitam), understands abhibhāṣitam, "spoken, delivered," nominally in the sense of "speech" and reads avākyam, "without speech," for vākyam. He then takes avākyam adverbially with the gerund śrutvā, "having heard," in the sense of "having listened silently."

"he was delighted" prītisamāyuktaḥ: Literally, "[he was] joined or filled with delight."

"responded in these words" vākyam uttaram abravīt: Literally, "he spoke words [by way] of response." Several commentators, including Cg, Cm, Cs, and Ct, understand, "appropriate to the period after hearing good news (uttaraṃ priyaśravaṇottarakālārham—so Cg)."

2. Cg sees the verse as illustrative of the maxim: "One's elders are to be praised to their face, friends and relatives behind their backs, slaves and servants at the end of an assignment, and sons never (pratyakṣe guravaḥ stutyāḥ parokṣe mitrabāndhavāḥ / karmānte dāsabhṛtyāś ca na kadācana putrakāḥ //)." According to him, Rāma here praises his servant Hanumān upon the completion of his assignment.

"enormous feat, difficult to accomplish in this world" sumahad bhuvi duṣkaram: Cg understands the various words of praise in the verse to refer incrementally to the successive feats accomplished by Hanumān. He describes as great (mahat) the monkey's crossing of the ocean, and what is very great (sumahat) as his managing to enter Laṅkā. His assault on the city is well-nigh impossible (durlabham v.l. for duṣkaram), while what is not to be accomplished by others even in their imagination is Hanumān's return from his adventures. (atra mahad ity anena sāgaratāraṇam uycate. sumahad ity anena laṅkāpraveśaḥ. durlabham ity anena laṅkādharṣaṇam. manasāpi na śakyam ity anena punar nirgamaḥ.) Cs, typically eccentric, reads the sequence sumahad + bhuvi as a compound in the sense of "in the realm of the great ones, i.e., the gods." He then understands the verse to say, "Hanumān has accomplished here on earth a feat, that is, the finding of Sītā, that would be impossible to accomplish even in heaven (sumahatāṃ mahātmanāṃ devānāṃ yā bhūḥ svargādirūpaṃ sthānaṃ tasyām api durlabham asādhyaṃ yat kāryaṃ sītāsaṃdarśanarūpaṃ tad dharaṇītale hanumatā kṛtam)."

"imagination" manasā: Literally, "by one's mind or thought."

3. "from Garuḍa and Vāyu" garuḍād vāyoḥ: Literally, "of Garuḍa and Vāyu." Cg understands the verse to suggest that Hanumān is not only equal to but superior to the great mythical eagle and the wind god. He paraphrases, "Garuḍa and Vāyu together might cross, [but he (Hanumān) has done it on his own] (garuḍavāyū militvā taretām iti bhāvaḥ)."

4–5. The repetitiveness of the two verses has not gone unnoticed by the commentators. Cv suggests that 5ab (praviṣṭaḥ sattvam āśritya jīvan ko nāma niṣkramet) has been added to the verse he sees as beginning with 4cd (apradhṛṣyāṃ purīṃ laṅkāṃ rāvaṇena surakṣitām). He further notes that 5cd (ko viśet sudurādharṣāṃ rākṣasaiś ca surakṣitām) has been added on and is, moreover, misplaced in some manuscripts due to scribal error (apradhṛṣyām ity ādeḥ ślokasyoparitanam ardhaṃ praviṣṭaḥ sattvam āśritya jīvan ko nāma niṣkramed ity etat ko viśed ity ādeḥ ślokasyoparitanam ardhaṃ yo vīryabalasaṃpanno na samaḥ syād dhanūmata etat keṣucit kośeṣu vyatyāsena dṛśyate tal lekhakadoṣakṛtam).

"citadel of Laṅkā . . . unassailable . . . unassailable citadel" apradhṛṣyāṃ purīṃ laṅkām . . . sudurādharṣām: Literally, "unassailable citadel of Laṅkā . . . wholly impregnable one."

"unless he were so endowed with might and valor as to be the equal of Hanumān" yo vīryabalasampanno na samaḥ syād dhanūmataḥ: Literally, "who, endowed with might and valor, would not be the equal of Hanumān."

6. "his own power, which is commensurate with his valor" svabalaṃ sadṛśaṃ vikramasya: We follow the interpretation of all commentators and translators consulted in understanding that sadṛśam, "commensurate," modifies svabalam, "own power." One could also take sadṛśam to modify bhṛtyakāryam, "service," in pāda a, lending the line the sense of "a great service, commensurate with his valor." Cg appears to emphasize the prior member sva-, "his own," in svabalam, understanding the word to refer specifically to those actions performed on Hanumān's own initiative, without any authorization on the part of his master, Sugrīva. These actions, such as the destruction of the aśoka grove, etc., are thus contrasted to the service to Sugrīva mentioned in the first half of the verse and comprising those actions that were specifically enjoined upon Hanumān [that is, leaping the ocean, infiltrating Laṅkā, and finding Sītā] (svabalam aśokavanikābhañgādikaṃ pauruṣaṃ svayam ātmanaḥ svāminiyogaṃ vinā vidhāya sugrīvasya bhṛtyakāryaṃ bhṛtyena kartavyaṃ mahad adhikaṃ kṛtam ity arthaḥ—so Cg). Cm and Ct understand similarly. All three understand the adjective mahat, "[truly] great," to mean "exceeding his instructions (mahad uktād adhikam—so Ct)."

7. This verse and the one that follows seem to be quoted or paraphrased from a treatise on statecraft that has not been traced. Sternbach 1965–1967, vol. 2, pt. 2 cites a few aphorisms of the same import from the Mahābhārata and other works.

"loyally" anurāgeṇa: The translation follows the commentators who understand the word in its normal lexical sense of "devotion, affection, loyalty (atiprītyā—so Cr)."

"is considered to be" tam āhuḥ: Literally, "they call him."

"the best type of servant" puruṣottamam: Literally, "the best of men."

Following verse 7, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines. This verse is unnumbered in the critical apparatus, which understands the additional verse as a repetition with variants of verse 8. The verse as found in GPP 6.1.8; VSP 6.1.8; and KK 6.1.8 reads: "A servant who, although given an important assignment, does not carry it out to the satisfaction of the king, though he is fit and competent, is considered to be the middle type of servant."

8. "single-mindedly" samāhitaḥ: Literally, "focused, concentrated."

"is considered to be" tam āhuḥ: Literally, "they call him."

"the worst type of servant" puruṣādhamam: Literally, "the worst of men."

9. "assignment" niyoge: The commentators return to the theme of Hanumān's having exceeded his instructions. Cm, Ct, and Cr, for example, understand the term niyoga, "assignment," to refer exclusively to the search for Sītā (sītānveṣaṇamātre—so Ct). Ct then understands kṛtyam, "what he had to do," to refer to the additional deeds of Hanumān (kṛtyam adhikam api kṛtyaṃ kṛtam ata uttamabhṛtyo 'yam iti bhāvaḥ).

"without disgracing himself" na cātmā laghutāṃ nītaḥ: Literally, "nor was he himself brought to insignificance." The commentators agree that the reference here is to Hanumān's not being bested by the rākṣasas (rakṣobhir aparājitatvāt).

10. "preserved . . . from unrighteousness" dharmataḥ parirakṣitāḥ: Literally, "preserved in accordance with righteousness." The commentators offer a variety of interpretations of this vague phrase. The translation follows the majority of commentators, including Cg, Cm, and Cv, who understand that Hanumān's actions have established Rāma and his brothers in righteousness, reasoning that, "If Sītā had not been discovered by Hanumān, Rāma would have committed the sin of taking his own life. This, in turn, would have driven Lakṣmaṇa and the other members of the Raghu clan to suicide. (dharmataḥ parirakṣitā dharme sthāpitā adharmān nirvartitā iti yāvat. yadi hanumān vaidehīṃ nādrākṣīt tadāhaṃ jīvitaṃ jahyāṃ madviyogāsahiṣṇavo lakṣmaṇādayaś ca tathā kuryuḥ. tathā cātmahananarūpādharmaḥ sarveṣāṃ saṃbhaved iti bhāvaḥ—so Cm.)" Cf. Hanumān's contemplation of this scenario in 5.11.20ff. and 5.53.8ff. Ct also understands the term parirakṣitāḥ to refer to the saving of Rāma and his kinsmen from suicide. He and Cr, however, understand dharmataḥ to refer to the righteousness or propriety of Hanumān's execution of the duties of a servant in carrying out his master's orders (bhṛtyadharmaṃ prāpya—so Cr). Cg offers as an alternative yet a third explanation, glossing dharma with upakāra, "service, assistance, favor," in the form of finding Sītā, and notes that, through that service, he [Rāma] and his kinsmen have been rescued from infamy (yadvā vaidehīdarśanarūpeṇa dharmeṇopakāreṇa sarve vayaṃ parirakṣitā nirapavādāḥ kṛtāḥ smeti bhāvaḥ).

11. "here and now" iha: Literally, "here."

12. "all the wealth" sarvasvabhūtaḥ: The commentators explain this collocation in terms of Śrīvaiṣṇava theology. Ct, citing Rāmānuja's utterance in his commentaries on the Bhagavadgītā and Viṣṇusahasranāmastotra that "the essence of the Lord is pure bliss (ānanda eva hi bhagavataḥ sarvasvam)" and that this bliss is manifested through "illusion (māyā)," in the bodily forms of Rāma, etc., sees the expression as a reference to the supreme bliss of union with the Lord. He further cites the parallel of the bliss associated with Brahmā to have been communicated to Hanumān through the means of the god's embrace. (bhagavaddehasya śuddhānandarūpatvāt svaliṅganasya sarvasvabhūtatvaṃ bodhyam. ānanda eva hi bhagavataḥ sarvasvaṃ. ānanda eva hi māyayā rāmādidehatvena bhāsata iti gītābhāṣyaviṣṇusahasranāmabhāṣyayor bhagavadpādaiḥ spaṣṭam evoktam). Next, Ct makes reference to the Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa and similar texts (brahmāṇḍapurāṇādiṣu caivaṃ pariṣvaṅgadvārā brahmānandārpaṇam eva hanūmate kṛtam iti bodhitam).

Cr takes the phrase to suggest that Hanumān has no use for anything other than Rāma's embrace and that, through this embrace, one accomplishes the supreme goals of mankind (etena pariṣvaṅgātiriktaṃ hanumadupayogivastvantaraṃ nāstīti sūcitaṃ tena rāmapariṣvaṅgaprāpteḥ paramapuruṣārthatvaṃ sūcitam).

Cg suggests a much more elaborate theological and psychological analysis in which he interprets the inner workings of Rāma's mind that underlie the sentiments expressed in the verse. His analysis may be summarized as follows: Rāma's distress [at having no fitting reward for Hanumān's service] cannot be assuaged without compensation in the form of giving him [Hanumān] all his wealth. Rāma thinks that his embrace will serve as a substitute for giving all his wealth. The embrace is equivalent to all his wealth because of Rāma's embodiment in a large and desirable form and because of his limitless capacity to be enjoyed. Thus, in this world the Lord instructs those whom he loves regarding his own capacity to be enjoyed, because if the Lord were to give all he owned apart from that, the gift would be wanting, whereas in the gift of that capacity itself everything is given, since all things are dependent upon his body. That very embrace alone is to be given to Hanumān as one who is truly a lover of the Lord's form, for one should not give an eater of ambrosia a mouthful of straw. (etad pradāne tu sarvaṃ dattam etad vigrahasya sarvāśrayatvāt pariṣvaṅgo hanūmataḥ. amṛtāśino hi tṛṇakavalādikaṃ na deyam.)

Cs offers a somewhat forced alternative explanation: Rāma derives his wealth from the Goddess (reading mayā as the instrumental of mā = lakṣmī), and thus he was previously unable to pass it on to Hanumān in the form of an embrace, suggestive of perfect union with the Lord, as the time was not propitious (reading mayākālam as mayā akālam). He can, however, do so now. All of this, Cs concludes, illuminates [the Lord's] overmastering compassion. (eṣa pariṣvaṅga āliṅganarūpaḥ. imaṃ kālam etādṛśaṃ samayaṃ prāpya. mahātmanaḥ tasya hanumato dattaḥ. mayā ramayā mahātmano mama ca sarvasvabhūta eṣo 'pīmam akālaṃ sāyujyasūcakasya tasyedānīm ayogyatvāt tatkālabhinnaṃ kālaṃ prāpyāpi mayā datta iti vā.) According to Cs, by this we understand the Lord's utter devotion to compassion (anena kṛpā pāravaśyaṃ dyotyate).

"at this time" kālam imaṃ prāpya: Cr remarks that the time is suitable for giving gifts (imaṃ dānayogyaṃ kālaṃ prāpya sarvasvabhūto mama sarvadhanatvaṃ prāptaḥ). Cg continues (see above sarvasvabhūtaḥ) his representation of Rāma's thoughts, explaining, "He certainly merits a gift, since he is filled with love for this body [i.e., Rāma's form] as evidenced by his expression, 'I have the greatest love [for you], your majesty' (7.40.16 = GPP 7.39.15). I will give him something at this time. He [Hanumān] is not expecting anything from me, but I am filled with anxiety about when I will be able to give him something. Therefore, I will give him something right now because to do so is not prohibited at this time. (sneho me paramo rājann ity etadvigrahe premavataḥ sa eva dātavyaḥ. mayā kālam imaṃ prāpya dattaḥ. ayaṃ kiṃcid api matto 'napekṣamāṇo vartate. kadā mayāsmai kiṃcid dattaṃ syād iti sotkaṇṭhena mayā sthitaṃ saṃpraty apratiṣedhasamayalābhād dattavān asmi.)" Interestingly, Cg sees Rāma as concerned that even his cherished embrace may not be adequate compensation for Hanumān's extraordinary service. He explains Rāma's thinking as follows: "Is it proper to give a single body to one who has performed such service to two bodies, that is, to him who has given [i.e., saved] two bodies—Sītā's when she was about to hang herself by her hair (5.27.17) and Rāma's when he was on the point of throwing himself into the sea (6.5.9) by providing him with the message about Sītā? (dehadvayam upakṛtavataḥ kim ekadehapradānam ucitam iti bhāvaḥ. veṇyudgrathanasamaye sītāṃ saṃrakṣya dattvāvagāhyārṇavaṃ svapsya iti daśāyāṃ rāmadehaṃ ca sītāsaṃdeśavacanenājīvayad dhi. evaṃ dehadvayaṃ dattavataḥ kim ekadehadānam ucitam iti bhāvaḥ.)" Evidently, Cg sees Rāma in his compassion and gratitude as thinking that even his embrace is insufficient compensation for Hanumān's feat.

Following verse 12, D5,7,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [9*]: "When Rāma had spoken in this fashion, his body bristling with delight, he embraced great Hanumān, who had returned after accomplishing his mission. Then, after pondering, the delight of the Raghus once more spoke these words as Sugrīva, lord of the tawny monkeys, stood listening."

13. "my mind once again gives way to despair" punar naṣṭaṃ mano mama: Literally, "once again my mind is destroyed." Most commentators understand that Rāma, having been cheered by the news of Sītā's discovery, is plunged once more into despondency when he sees how formidable an obstacle the ocean is (punar naṣṭaṃ sītāvṛttāntaśravaṇena hṛṣṭam api punar viṣādaṃ prāptam—so Ct).

14. "all" samāhitāḥ: Literally, "assembled, joined together."

15. "what on earth are we to do next" kim ivottaram: Literally, "what indeed [is] next?" The commentators generally supply the word "action (karma—Cr)" or "means, method (sādhakam—Cm, Cg)." Cg understands the question to be rhetorical, indicating that Rāma believes that there is no possible way of getting monkeys across (kiṃ na kim apīty arthaḥ).

16. "distracted by sorrow" śokasaṃbhrāntaḥ: Cr proposes reading uktvāśoka- (uktvā + aśoka-) instead of the critical uktvā śoka-. He interprets the compound to mean "Rāma who was devoid of any real sorrow (vāstavaśokasaṃbhrāntirahitaḥ)."

"fell to brooding" dhyānam upāgamat: Literally, "he went to meditation." The commentators generally understand the phrase to mean that Rāma is pondering the means of crossing the ocean (sāgarataraṇopāyacintām akarod ity arthaḥ—so Cg).

Sarga 2

1. "majestic" śrīmān: Cg takes the adjective as an opportunity to quote the Kāmandaka on the qualities of a friend of which we are to understand Sugrīva is exemplary. They are honesty, selflessness, heroism, stoicism, loyalty, courtesy, and truthfulness (śucitā tyāgitā śauryaṃ samānasukhaduḥkhatā / anurāgaś ca dākṣiṇyaṃ satyatā ca suhṛdguṇāḥ //). Cg also remarks on the slightly unusual fact that Sugrīva responds to a speech that was uttered in his presence but directed to Hanumān. See note to 6.4.1, where Rāma, in response to a speech of Hanumān, appears to reply to Sugrīva. See 9* at note to 6.1.12. Cg explains this departure from the epic convention by saying that Sugrīva is reflecting on the nītiśāstra rule that one who wishes someone well at a moment of crisis may speak helpful words, even though unasked (āpady unmārgagamane kāryakālātyayeṣu cāpṛṣṭo 'py hitānveṣī brūyāt kalyāṇabhāṣitam).

2. "other, ordinary man" anyaḥ prākṛtaḥ: Literally, "another, ordinary [one]." Cr understands the term to mean a person different from one who is independent, and so on (anyaḥ svatantrādibhinnaḥ prākṛto janaḥ).

4. "resolute, learned in the śāstras, wise, and erudite" dhṛtimāñ śāstravit prājñaḥ paṇḍitaś ca: D6,7,10,11,G3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cg, and Ct read matimān, "intelligent," for dhṛtimān, "resolute." This is one of the frequent epic lists of near synonyms. The commentators offer similar, but by no means identical, explanations of the individual terms. Ct, Cg, and Cm understand śāstravit to mean "learned in the traditional texts on polity (nītiśāstraḥ), etc." Ct understands prājñaḥ to mean "skillful in deliberation (vicārakuśalaḥ)," while Cg and Cm understand this word to mean "learned in positive and negative argumentation (ūhāpohajñaḥ)." Ct understands paṇḍitaḥ to mean "capable of setting forth the proper conclusion after deliberation (siddhāntapratiṣṭhāpanaḥ)." Cg understands, "making accurate determinations (paricchetā)." Cm offers the same explanation as Cg plus an alternative: "understanding the essence of a matter (arthatattvajñaḥ)." Cv understands paṇḍitaḥ to mean "capable of positive and negative argumentation (ūhāpohasamarthaḥ)." See note to verse 14 below.

"reprehensible attitude" pāpikāṃ buddhiṃ: Literally, "sinful idea or thought." Cg explains, "tainted with sin, that it to say, inducing lethargy or torpor (pāpayuktām anutsāhakāriṇīm iti yāvat)." Cm glosses, "wholly inauspicious, wrongful (aśubhātmikām, kaluṣitām)." Ś1,Ñ1,D1,2,4,8,10–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prākṛtām, "ordinary, vulgar."

5. "We shall . . . scale the battlements of Laṅkā" laṅkām ārohayiṣyāmaḥ: Literally, "we shall climb Laṅkā."

"huge sharks" mahānakra-: Cf. 5.7.6 and notes.

6. "fail utterly" vyavasīdanti: Literally, "they fail or come to grief."

8–9. "I am absolutely certain of this" tarkaś cāsmin dṛḍho mama: Literally, "my reasoned conclusion with respect to this is firm." The placement of this phrase lends a certain ambiguity to the referent, an ambiguity only heightened by the fact that some printed versions of the text take 8ab as a separately numbered and defective verse (KK and VSP = 6.3.8) or number it as pādas ef of verse 7 (GPP). The issue is whether Sugrīva's conclusion refers backward to the readiness of the monkeys for battle or forward to the necessity for crossing the ocean and assaulting Rāvaṇa. We have selected the former approach on the basis of the normal range of meanings of tarka, that is, "logical conclusion, conjecture, etc.," and see the phrase as a reiteration of Sugrīva's inference of the monkeys' state of mind based on their outward manifestation of excitement. We are joined in this interpretation by Cg and Cm. Ct and Ck, however, take the latter view.

"excitement" harṣeṇa: Ct understands that the excitement of the monkeys is brought about by the mention of crossing the ocean [and confronting] Rāvaṇa. He goes on to say that Sugrīva is able to infer the monkeys' enthusiasm from their excited facial expressions [at the thought] of the mission. (harṣeṇa samudrataraṇarāvaṇaprasaṅge jāyamānena. tatkāryamukhavikāsādinānumitenety arthaḥ.) (Cm similarly.) Cg understands the term to refer to Sugrīva's inference based on the tranquility (prasāda) of the monkeys' facial expressions (harṣeṇa mukhaprasādānumānena).

"we may reach" paśyema: Literally, "that we may see."

Following verse 8, D5–7,10,11,S insert, while D3 substitutes for 9cd, a passage of one line [16*]: "You must act in such a way that [having killed your enemy], the wicked Rāvaṇa . . ."

10. "From the very moment that we see" dṛṣṭvā . . . darśanāt: Literally, "having seen . . . from the sight." The reading darśanāt, "from the sight," is both awkward and ambiguous. The majority of commentators understand, as we do, that it is the sight of Laṅkā alone that will serve as a sign of the doom of Rāvaṇa (trikūṭaśikharasthāṃ tāṃ laṅkāṃ dṛṣṭvā darśanāt taddarśanasamanantaram eva yuddhe rāvaṇaṃ hatam avadhāraya jānīhi—so Ct). The idea, which seems to follow from the preceding verses, is that the major obstacle is not Rāvaṇa himself but the crossing of the ocean. Cr, alone among the commentators, understands darśanāt to refer to the sight of Rāvaṇa, an interpretation that, though perhaps less appropriate to the context, has the advantage of avoiding the redundancy with dṛṣṭvā in pāda a (purīṃ laṅkāṃ dṛṣṭvā rāvaṇadarśanād rāvaṇadarśanaṃ prāpya yuddhe rāvaṇaṃ hatam avadhāraya jānīhi).

"on the peak of Mount Trikūṭa" trikūṭaśikhare: Literally, "on the peak of Trikūṭa." See 6.3.29; 6.30.18–20; 6.34.25; 6.61.66; and notes. See, too, notes to 6.29.13; 6.78.41; and 6.91.2. See also 5.1.183,189; 5.2.1,8,18; 5.3.1; 5.37.49; and 5.54.9 and notes.

Following verse 10, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [17*]: "For without building a bridge across the dreadful ocean, the abode of Varuṇa, not even the gods and asuras along with Indra could lay waste to Laṅkā."

11. "to Laṅkā" laṅkāsamīpataḥ: Literally, "near Laṅkā."

"you may claim victory" jitam ity upadhāryatām: Literally, "You may think, 'Conquered!' " See MBh 2.54.3–29 for a similar construction (jitam ity eva). The syntax of the participle jitam is somewhat unusual. Cg explains it as a kartari niṣṭhā, that is [normally] the passive participial ending kta used actively, while Cv explains it as an abstract use of the participle (bhāve niṣṭhā).

12. 12ab = 20ab.

"So . . . enough of this craven attitude, so destructive to all endeavors" tad alaṃ viklavā buddhiḥ . . . sarvārthanāśinī: The syntax is slightly opaque, although the meaning is unambiguous. Various manuscripts associated with the southern recension and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators select alternately the accusative or the nominative of buddhi and its modifying adjectives. Neither case is normally governed by alam in the classical grammar, and we must therefore assume that these variants are particular to the epic language (Apte s.v. alam). Cg tries to avoid the difficulty by using the prohibitive force of alam to render it in the sense of the injunctive form mā bhūt. In order to support this use of alam, he quotes Amarakośa 3.3.882. (alaṃ mā bhūt. alaṃ bhūṣaṇaparyāptiśaktivāraṇavācakam ity amaraḥ.)

Following 12ab, M, VSP (6.2.15ab in brackets), and KK (6.12.14cd) insert a passage of one line [18*]: "They are capable of uprooting Laṅkā—rākṣasas included—and bringing it here." No translation consulted renders this line.

13. "But, wise Rāma, now is the time for you to resort energetically to strength, which is the proper recourse of a man who relies on valor." yat tu kāryaṃ manuṣyeṇa śauṇḍīryam avalambatā / asmin kāle mahāprājña sattvam ātiṣṭha tejasā //: Pādas c–f of the critical text are somewhat difficult to construe as they stand. The critical reading is well represented in a variety of southern manuscripts and is also the reading of Cg and the texts and printed editions that follow him (VSP; KK). The major problem with the critical reading is the poor resolution of the relative clause of pādas cd. Our translation assumes an implied correlative tat referring to sattvam, "strength," in pāda f. Even so, the verse is semantically, as well as syntactically, problematic. Different northern and southern texts attempt to avoid the difficulty in various ways. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck include an additional line [19*]. Reading 13cd with 19*, the verse would translate as "Whatever action must be taken by a man who relies on valor redounds to the credit [literally, "adorns"] of him who does it with alacrity." Those translations based on the text of Ct (Dutt 1893, p. 1108; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 5; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 74; and Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 4) follow this version. This reading leaves 13ef to be construed as a separate sentence: "At this time, wise Rāma, you must energetically resort to strength." As a result of these complications, few of the published editions number this passage as does the critical edition. Several northern manuscripts, including the text of Gorresio (5.71.6), avoid the problem by substituting tat tvam for sattvam. Thus, the text of Gorresio reads, "At this time, lord of men, you must have active recourse to that which is practiced by a man who cherishes valor."

"wise Rāma" mahāprājña: Literally, "O one of great wisdom!"

"energetically" tejasā: Literally, "with energy." Cg suggests, "with valor (parākrameṇa)."

"strength" sattvam: Cg, Cm, and Cr gloss, "fortitude or resolve (dhairyam)." Cg optionally understands, "strength (balam)." Ct takes the word in its other sense of "virtue (guṇam)." He is followed in this by Dutt (1893, p. 1108), who translates, "Do thou realize goodness through thy energy." Dutt explicitly acknowledges Ct in his footnote, where he remarks, "i.e., as I understand this rather obscure passage, prove thou good through thy vigor—secure victory to the cause of goodness through thy might.—T [= Ct]." Similarly Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 4) translates, "unis l'énergie à la vertu," followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 5), who renders, "unite energy with virtue."

14. "in the case of death or disappearance" vinaṣṭe vā pranaṣṭe vā: Literally, "when [someone] has died or disappeared." Here, the commentators generally agree that one of these near synonyms means the disappearance of a living person, while the other means death. Ct understands vinaṣṭa to refer to someone who has been removed from one's sight, like Sītā, and pranaṣṭa to refer to someone who has been irrevocably removed from one's sight, i.e., dead, like Daśaratha (vinaṣṭe sītāvad adarśanaṃ gate pranaṣṭe daśarathavat sarvathādarśaṇaṃ gate). Cm and Cg concur with Ct. Cm understands vinaṣṭa to mean "disappeared," citing the form as a participle of the root $\sqrt{naś}$ [$\sqrt{ṇaś}$] in the sense of invisibility. He offers no comment on the meaning of pranaṣṭa. Cr reverses the two meanings and understands vinaṣṭa to mean "destroyed (vidhvastaḥ)," i.e., dead, and pranaṣṭa to mean "removed from sight (adarśanam)." For another commentarial discussion on the range of meanings for these two terms, see note to 5.11.17.

The use of such synonyms is common in Vālmīki's epic as we have noted elsewhere. Cf. 5.1.33; 5.2.14–15; 5.7.12,40; 5.24.2,11; 5.31.9; 5.34.8; 5.35.63; 5.55.29; 5.60.12; and notes. Cf., too, 6.2.4; 6.4.17,41; 6.7.5; 6.8.10; 6.9.20; 6.12.18; 6.14.7; 6.20.5; 6.27.14,16; 6.28.20–21; 6.28.35; 6.35.6,19; 6.36.4–7; 6.37.9; 6.40.23,40; 6.48.31,83; 6.47.93; 6.55.106; 6.57.37; 6.63.15; 6.64.16; 6.80.4; 6.81.19; 6.93.2–3; 6.115.13–16; and notes.

15. "comrades" sacivaiḥ: The term can also mean counselors or ministers, and we generally translate it in the latter sense.

"now" iha: Literally, "here." The translation follows the interpretation of Cr (asmin samaye) and Cg (idānīm).

16. "I cannot think" na . . . paśyāmy aham: Literally, "I do not see."

"once you take your bow in hand" grahītadhanuṣaḥ: Literally, "of [you] who have grasped a bow."

18. "Unleash your anger!" krodham ālambha: Literally, "Have recourse to your anger!"

"Passive . . . fare badly" niśceṣṭāḥ . . . mandāḥ: Literally, "inactive ones [are] sluggish." Commentators differ somewhat as to the interpretation of these terms. Ct and Ck understand the latter term, manda, to refer to warriors who are lacking in rage toward their enemies and who therefore become niśceṣṭa (literally, "motionless") by virtue of their becoming imprisoned by their enemies. (mandāḥ satruviṣaye krodhahīnāḥ kṣatriyāḥ niśceṣṭā bhavanti. śatrukṛtabandhanādineti śeṣaḥ.) Similarly, Cr explains niśceṣṭa as "devoid of actions caused by appropriate anger (ucitakrodhahetukavyāpārarahitāḥ mandā bhavanti)." Cg and Cm, whom we follow, understand that warriors who are not aggressive (nirudyogāḥ) fare poorly (literally, "become unfortunate") (mandabhāgyāḥ).

"impetuous" caṇḍasya: The term commonly refers to violent or furious anger. It has been taken as such by commentators and translators alike. Despite Sugrīva's exhortation to anger in pāda b, however, we feel the sense of caṇḍa is contextually most apposite in the second half of the verse as "impetuous," where the issue appears to be that of aggressive action versus passivity.

19. The verse lends itself to a certain ambiguity of interpretation. As a result, the prepositional phrase sahāsmābhiḥ, "with us," can be read with any or all of the three verbal elements, "crossing (lañghana)," "coming (upeta)," and "deliberating (vicāraya)." In addition, the participle upetaḥ is ambiguous and can mean either "together with" or "approached." Ct reads the prepositional phrase with both lañghana- and upetaḥ, yielding the sense "you have come with us for the purpose of crossing with us." Cr reads upetaḥ in the first of the above-mentioned senses, glossing, "joined (yukta-)," which yields the sense "joined with us, you should consider the means to cross the ocean."

"you should consider how to accomplish this" vicāraya: Literally, "you must think or consider."

Following verse 19, D5–7,10,11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cm insert a passage of two lines [25*], whereas the text of Cg inserts only line 2 of 25*: "Once they [the monkeys] have crossed it, consider [Rāvaṇa's] army as good as destroyed. Once my whole army has crossed, you may claim victory." Ct's reading, which many translators follow, has a slight variant: "Once my soldiers have crossed, you may claim victory. Once my whole army has crossed, you may claim victory."

20. 20ab = 12ab.

"smash" vidhamiṣyanti: Literally, "they will blow away or they will disperse." Cg glosses, "they will scorch or burn (dhakṣyanti)."

*21ab. "Rāvaṇa's abode" rāvaṇālayam: We have emended the critical text's reading, varuṇālayam, "Varuṇa's abode," i.e., "the ocean." The critical reading of pāda ab is not well attested, being derived mainly from a small number of northwest manuscripts. As it stands, the critical reading makes little sense. The whole thrust of the verse, and indeed of Sugrīva's argumentation, is that, once the monkeys have found a way to cross the ocean, victory over the rākṣasas is assured. Aside from the northwest manuscripts and the critical edition, no southern or northern manuscript makes vāruṇālaya the object of the verb paripaśyāmaḥ. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions aligned with Ct, Cr, and Ck avoid the problem by reading laṅghitam, "crossed over," in place of the critical text's te vayam, "we [who are] they," which would then modify varuṇālayam. The sense of this reading—"Somehow or other I [reading paripaśyāmi] will see that the abode of Varuṇa is crossed"—is, if awkward, at least in keeping with the tenor of this passage. This is rendered in the translations that follow

Ct. D6,7,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions associated with Cm and Cg, which read varuṇālayam, read for paśyāmaḥ, "we shall see," saṃtariṣyāmaḥ, "we shall cross," yielding the meaning "One way or another we shall cross the abode of Varuṇa." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 3–4). The majority of the remaining manuscripts, northern and southern, including the text of Gorresio, read rāvaṇālayam instead of varuṇālayam, and we have therefore selected it as the most plausible reading. The Lahore edition excises this half verse, relegating it, roughly in the form found in the critical edition, to its critical apparatus.

"what more is to be said" kim uktvā bahudhā: Literally, "what is the use of speaking in so many ways?"

Following 21ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [28*]: "Then I regard him [Rāvaṇa] as slain in battle, O you who delight in battle." After 21cd, these same manuscripts insert one additional line [30*]: "I see [auspicious] omens and my heart is filled with joy."

Sarga 3

1. "grasped its essential meaning" paramārthavit: The critical edition follows the text of Cg, who understands this epithet to be suggestive of Rāma's ability to grasp the essence of any matter (sāragrāhitvam). D7,10,11,T1,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cs read instead paramārthavat, which is then an adjective with the sense "filled with profound meaning," modifying vacaḥ, "speech." Ct and Ck suggest that the ending -vat has no semantic value here (paramārthavat paramārthabhūtaṃ svārthe vatiḥ—so Ct). Cr understands the adjective to mean "awakening [Rāma] to his supreme purpose (paramārthabodhakam)." Cs understands "the supreme purpose" to be the principal purpose of the [Rāma] avatāra, that is, the destruction of Rāvaṇa, and so on," and then understands the adjective to mean "bringing that about." (paramārtho 'vatāramukhyārtho rāvaṇamaraṇādis tadvat. tadghaṭakam iti yāvat.)

2. "by building a bridge" setubandhena: Ct and Ck envisage Rāma doing so with his arrows in a manner similar to that employed by the young Bhīṣma in the Mahābhārata to dam the Ganges (setubandhanena gaṅgāyāṃ gāṅgeyena śarair iva). Compare MBh 1.94.24 (divyam astraṃ vikurvāṇaṃ yathā devaṃ purandaram / kṛtsnāṃ gaṅgāṃ samāvṛtya śarais tīkṣṇair avasthitam).

"by . . . drying up the ocean" sāgarocchoṣaṇena: Ct and Ck note that Rāma would be capable of so doing through the power of his divine astras (divyāstrabalata iti śeṣaḥ).

"quickly" tarasā: A wide variety of northern and southern manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B3,D,T1,3,G1,3,M), virtually all the southern commentators, and all printed editions, with the exception of Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 133), read tapasā, "through [the power of my] austerities." The critical reading is mentioned as a variant by Cg, who glosses it as vegena, "swiftly." On the reading tapasā, Ct and Ck remark that the power of Rāma's austerities can also be seen from his leading all the inhabitants of his own city [Ayodhyā] to the Brahmaloka at the end of the epic (Compare 1.1.76 and 7.100.1–4,23 [devaloka]). (tapasā tapaḥkāryasaṃkalpasiddhyā. ata eva sakalasvapura-vartiprāṇināṃ brahmalokanayanaṃ vakṣyamāṇaṃ saṃgacchate.) Ck adds that this power is similar to that manifested by Svayaṃprabhā when she rescues the monkeys from the enchanted cavern in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.52.1–12) (svayaṃprabhayā bilād vānarottāraṇavad ity arthaḥ).

3–4. "defenses" durgāṇi: The term here appears to apply broadly to both the natural and artificial defenses of the city. Ct and Ck understand the reference to be to the city's natural defenses, such as its bodies of water, mountains, forests, etc. (jalagirivanādinānāprakāradurgeṣu). Cg glosses the term as "defensive parapets (durgaprākāraḥ)" but goes on to enumerate the defensive works as consisting of bodies of water, mountains, earthworks, etc. (jalagiristhalātmakāni durgāṇi).

"the fortress of Laṅkā" durgāyā laṅkāyāḥ: Literally, "of the fortress Laṅkā." We read the term durgā here in its common nominal sense of "fortress, citadel, fortified place," against the majority of commentators and translators, who take it adjectivally in the sense of "difficult of access, inaccessible (duṣprāpāyāḥ—so Cg; gantum aśakyāyāḥ—so Ct)."

"the fortification of the gates" dvāradurgakriyām: Ct, Cr, Ck, Cg, and Cv explain that these are the arrangements to make entry at the gates difficult (dvārāṇāṃ duṣpraveśatvasaṃpādanam—Ct). Cr enumerates them as the construction of moats, etc. (parikhādiviśeṣanirmitam). Cg extends the list to include bolts, moats, devices for flooding, etc. (kīlakhananajalaughaplavanakaraṇādibhir durgamatvakaraṇam).

"the defensive works" guptikarma: Ct and Cr understand the reference to be to the emplacement of defensive devices (yantras) on the ramparts of the city (prākārādiṣu yantrādisthāpanarūpam—so Ct). These defensive devices (yantras) are frequently understood to be some kind of military machinery, but it is likely that the term guptikarma here is understood in the root sense of the word as a restraint or bolt. This notion is perhaps strengthened by Cg's explanation, which is "the fixing of bars, etc., on the ramparts (prākāraparighādinirmāṇam)." Cf. 5.40.31 and note. Cm understands, "the construction of watchtowers, and so on, on the ramparts (prākārāṭṭālakādinirmāṇam)." Ck (Ct as variant) reads guptikrama, "sequence of defenses." Cf. 6.30.26; 6.80.19; and notes.

5. "you were able to reconnoiter" asi dṛṣṭavān: Literally, "you saw."

"carefully" yathāvat: Literally, "duly, properly."

"at will" yathāsukham: Cg and Cm see this term as referring to the fearlessness (Cg—niḥśaṅkam; Cm—visrabdham [v.l. of viśrabdham]) of Hanumān.

"qualified to do so" kuśalaḥ: Literally, "skillful." Cg, Ct, Ck, and Cm indicate, in various ways, that the sense is that Hanumān is qualified both to reconnoiter and to explain what he has seen (laṅkāyāṃ dṛṣṭavān kuśalaḥ tadvarṇanādau nipuṇaś ca—so Cr).

7. Following verse 7, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [38*], which can be, and has been, read in two ways by commentators and translators according to whether they construe the second pāda with the preceding or following verse. Thus it can be read with the preceding verse to mean "and how the rākṣasas are devoted because of Rāvaṇa's magnificent power," or construing the second pāda with verse 8, which reads "and how devoted the rākṣasas are. And how, because of Rāvaṇa's power . . ." See note to verse 8 below.

8–39*. The syntax of verse 8 is extremely awkward. No manuscript, northern or southern, reads as does the critical text. The problem with the text as constituted is that the string of accusatives that make up verse 8 is orphaned, as it were, with no verb in the surrounding syntax to govern it. Cr, who reads 8ab ["the fearsome nature of the sea, the extraordinary wealth of Laṅkā"] with 38* (see note to verse 7 above), tries to link it to akhyāsye, "I will tell you," in 7a, but this is difficult to accept, given the intervening nominatives of 7cd. For this reason, we have chosen to include the southern reading 39*, which provides at least a plausible verb in kathayāmāsa, "he reported." The problem does not arise in the northern recension, for there the critical edition's verse 8 does not occur until somewhat later, where its accusatives are clearly governed by the verb ācacakṣe, "he described," from a previous verse. Cf. Gorresio 5.73.3–4 and Lahore 5.70.23–24. See Sutherland 1992.

"of its mounts and vehicles" vāhanasya: Literally, "of its vehicle or mount." We follow Ct in taking the term here as a reference to the collectivity of the city's vehicles and mounts. He glosses, "characterized by elephants, horses, and chariots (gajāśvarathalakṣaṇasya)."

9–20. This appears to be one of the few extant literary descriptions of an ancient Indian fortress. See Singh 1965. Cf. the description of Lañkā at 5.3 and also Kauṭilīya's Arthaśāstra 2.3.

9. "joyous and filled with crowds of happy rākṣasas" prahṛṣṭā muditā . . . rakṣogaṇasamākulā: Literally, "joyous and happy . . . filled with crowds of rākṣasas." We have followed the suggestion of Cr and Cm, who understand at least one of the adjectives, both of which modify the city, to refer to its inhabitants (hṛṣṭaiḥ harṣaviśiṣṭai rākṣasaiḥ pramuditā prāptapramodā—Cr). To avoid redundancy, we have connected the adjective "happy (prahṛṣṭā)" with the adjective "filled with crowds of rākṣasas (rakṣogaṇasamākulā)."

Following verse 9, D7,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg insert a passage of one line [40*]: "Filled with horses, that citadel is unapproachable by enemies."

10. "lofty and broad" vipulāni . . . sumahānti ca: Literally, "wide and very large." Cg and Cr attempt to avoid the redundancy of the two terms. Cg, whom we follow, understands the latter term to refer to the height of the gateways (unnatāni). Cr understands it as a value judgment rather than a measurement of size, glossing, "worthy of great praise (atipraśaṃsanīyāni)."

"massive iron bars" mahāparigha-: See note to 5.3.30.

11. "On its ramparts" vapreṣu: The reading is based on relatively sparse manuscript evidence (Ś2,V2,D13,T1,M1,2,5,G3). Subrecensions show some variation. D6,7,10, 11,T2,3,M3, as well as the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators, read tatreṣūpalayantrāṇi, which yields the translation, "there [on the gateways] are devices for hurling arrows and stones." Many northwestern and western manuscripts and the Lahore edition (5.70.8, p. 444) read yantreṣūpari (Ś1,D1,2,4,8,12), while the northeastern manuscripts (V1,3,B,D9) read yantrāṇy upari, which Gorresio (5.72.8) translates as "macchine guerriere d'ogni sorta" (1856, vol. 9, p. 133).

"devices for hurling stones" upalayantrāṇi: These weapons may have been large bows like the Roman ballista or single-armed catapults, like the Roman onager. Cf. Singh 1965, p. 113. Dikshitar (1944, p. 123) lists both goṣpaṇāpāṣāṇa (stones thrown by a rod) and yantrapāṣāṇa (stones thrown by a machine), which may reflect the same distinction. Sensarma (1979, p. 93) quotes Chakravarti (1941, p. 161) to this effect: "We are inclined to believe that these were of the nature of catapults and ballistae used by the ancient Hebrews, Greeks and Romans in their warfare. Like them, these engines were enormous in size, and were used for propelling large arrows and stones." Cf. 6.15.15; 6.30.26; 6.49.11; 6.80.19; and notes.

12. "hundred-slayers" śataghnyaḥ: Here, as in 1.5.11 and 5.3.30, the śataghnī appears to be a weapon placed along the ramparts. See Dikshitar (1944, p. 105). Cf. Singh (1965, pp. 114–15), who distinguishes fixed, movable, or portable śataghnīs, some even rolling on wheels. According to the commentators, this term is used principally of a club or a mace studded with spikes four hastas (the length between the elbow and the tip of the middle finger, about 18 inches), or approximately two meters. Dutt (1893, p. 1109) notes, "a kind of fire-arms, or ancient Hindu rocket; or a stone set round with sharp iron spikes—according to Râmánuya, a sort of mace about two yards in length with spikes." See notes to 1.5.11; 5.2.22; 5.3.30; and 5.41.14 and notes. See, too, 6.48.46; 6.60.12; 6.73.20–23 and notes.

"black iron" kālāyasa-: The meaning of the term is uncertain. Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss āyaḥsāra-, which we take to mean "steel." Secondary sources vary in their interpretation. Thus Vyas (1967, p. 244) understands kālāyasa to refer to blue steel but renders the apparently synonymous kārṣṇāyasa as "wrought iron." But Guruge (1960, p. 113) understands "black iron" for kālāyasa. Apte understands kālāyasa (s.v. kāla-) as "iron" but renders kṛṣṇāyasa (s.v.) as "iron, crude or black iron." PW (s.v.) understands "Eisen," as does MW (s.v.), who renders, "iron, made of iron." Cf. 5.39.11; 5.51.38; and notes, where the term is used. See, too, 6.53.12; 6.55.47; 6.63.14; and notes.

"fully deployed" saṃskṛtāḥ: We follow Cg, Ct, and Cm, who interpret the term as "ready or made ready (sajjāḥ)." Cr explains, "distinguished by appropriate saṃskāras (ucitasaṃskāraviśiṣṭāḥ)." This could mean either "adequately prepared" or "consecrated with appropriate mantras."

13. "impossible to scale" duṣpradharṣaṇaḥ: We follow Cg, who glosses, "hard to climb (durārohaḥ)." As Ct points out, the adjective could also mean "difficult to assault (dharṣayitum aśakyaḥ)."

"Its interior is studded with" -viracitāntaraḥ: Cr understands the compound as a bahuvrīhi samāsa and glosses antarāṇi as "middle, central [portions] (madhyāni)." This could either be interpreted as in the translation or in the sense of "its central portion studded with."

"gemstones" maṇi-: Cg glosses, "rubies (padmarāgāḥ)."

"coral, lapis" vidrumavaidūrya-: See note to 5.52.12. For vaidūrya, see note to 6.67.13; and notes to 3.30.9 and 4.13.5–8. See also 5.2.50; 5.3.8; and notes.

14. "deep" āgādhāḥ: Cr explains this to mean that it is impossible to touch the bottom (talasparśarahitāḥ).

"menacing" mahāśubhāḥ: The term is ambiguous and the reading uncertain. The compound may mean either "highly auspicious (mahā + śubhāḥ)" or "highly inauspicious (mahā + aśubhāḥ)." Aside from those northeastern and eastern manuscripts (Ñ2,V3,B1,2,4,D9) that replace the term with bhayāvahāḥ (redundant with mahābhīmāḥ), a wide range of southern and northern manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ1,V1,B3,D1–4,6,8,12, T3,G2,3,M), as well as the texts and printed editions of Cg, have readings that oblige us to read śubhāḥ as "auspicious" or "beautiful." For example, for mahāśubhāḥ, Cg reads [śītatoya]vahāḥ śubhāḥ, lending the line the meaning "auspicious [moats] having streams of cold water." This variant is rendered in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 5), who, however, appears mistakenly to read the adjective śubhāḥ to modify the waters, rendering, "filled with pure cold water." Other translators render variously. Cr, alone among the commentators, takes up the term mahāśubhāḥ, explaining it to mean "inauspicious for enemies, that is, fatal (mahānty aśubhāni ripūṇām amaṅgalāni vināśā ity arthaḥ)." Given the tenor of this verse, with its emphasis on the fearsome and formidable quality of the defenses, we have translated according to this interpretation.

"icy waters" śītatoyāḥ: The term śīta-, too, can be ambiguous, meaning either "pleasantly cool" or "unpleasantly cold." Once again, in keeping with the context, we have chosen the latter in agreement with Cg, who remarks that "by the mention of the water's coldness is suggested the impossibility of entering it (śītatoyatvena duṣpraveśatvam uktam)."

"full of crocodiles" grāhavatyaḥ: Literally, "possessed of crocodiles." Cf. note to 5.7.6. See, too, notes to 6.4.78; 6.14.21; 6.15.6,7; 6.62.20 and notes.

See Singh (1965, pp. 127ff.) for a discussion on walls and moats.

15. "bridges" saṃkramāḥ: Literally, "passageways." There is some disagreement among the commentators as to the precise nature of these structures. Ct, Cr, and Cv understand them to be constructed in the manner of platforms (mañcarūpeṇa baddhāḥ), by which we think they are referring to pierlike structures raised on pilings above the moats. This seems to accord well with verse 17 below, where the pilings (stambhaiḥ) of one such structure are mentioned. Cm seems to concur, explaining the structures as "a type of pathway constructed in the form of a platform in the vicinity of the gates of a walled city for the purpose of traversing a moat (puradvārapradeśeṣu parikhopari saṃcaraṇārthaṃ mañcarūpeṇa baddho mārgaviśeṣaḥ)," but see the note below, where he offers an alternative opinion. Cg describes these as "passageways made out of wooden planks (dāruphalakanirmitasaṃcāramārgāḥ)" that are arranged over moats. As it becomes clear from his commentary on the following verse, he understands these to be a type of drawbridge (see note to verse 16 below). Cg supports his interpretation by citing the Viśvakośa (also cited by Cm), which defines saṃkrama as "a gateway mechanism good for crossing (saṃkramaḥ kramaṇe samyag dvārasaṃcārayantraka iti viśvaḥ)."

"with . . . instruments of war" yantraiḥ: Literally, "with devices or machines." In keeping with his understanding of saṃkrama as "drawbridge," Cg understands these to be "devices for extending the bridges (yantraiḥ saṃkramāvakīryakaiḥ)." We follow Cr, who understands the yantras to be military devices, such as the śataghnīs mentioned in verse 12 above.

"crowded one upon the other" dṛḍhasaṃdhibhiḥ: This could also mean "firmly fastened." The reading is highly dubious, since it is found in only two southern (T2,3) and three devanāgarī (D3,4,13) manuscripts collated for the critical edition. A majority of the southern manuscripts, including the texts and printed editions of all the southern commentators, read instead gṛhapaṅktibhiḥ, literally, "with rows of houses." This is explained by Ct and Ck as meaning "lined with rows of turrets on the ramparts (prākāraśirogṛhapaṅktibhiḥ)." Cg explains that the bridges are lined with rows of the houses or barracks of its guards (rakṣijanāvāsasthānapaṅktibhir upetāḥ). Roussel appears to have misread the term paṅktibhiḥ, "with rows or lines," as if it were pañcabhiḥ, "with five." He therefore translates, "D'énormes constructions, disposées par cinq" (1903, vol. 3, p. 6). In this erroneous reading he has been followed by Shastri, who has the even more extraordinary reading, "and five great cannons" (1959, vol. 3, p. 7).

16. "at those points" tatra: Literally, "there." We agree with Cm and Cg, who gloss, "in the areas of the gates (dvārapradeśeṣu—so Cg)."

"cast into the moats on every side" avakīryante parikhāsu samantataḥ: Commentators differ as to who or what is cast into the moats, depending on their views as to the nature of the bridges (saṃkramas) and their associated machinery (yantras) (see note to verse 15 above). Our translation follows Cr, who understands that, upon the approach of hostile forces, the weaponry mounted on the bridges drives them into the moats, and it is in this way that the bridges can be said to protect the city. (taiḥ saṃkramasthair yantraiḥ samantataḥ parikhāsv avakīryante prakṣipyante parasainyānīti śeṣaḥ. ata eva parasainyāgame sati saṃkramās trāyante puraṃ rakṣante.) Ct and Ck have a similar interpretation differing only in that they see the weapons as placed on the ramparts of the city rather than on the bridges themselves (prākāropari pratiṣṭhāpitaiḥ). Cm offers two variants on this interpretation. The first is quite similar to that of Cr. In the second, however, he interprets the verb avakīryante, "are hurled or scattered," to have as its object not the enemy troops but the missiles fired by the military devices. He says, "alternatively, they are hurled into the moats on every side by those instruments; that is to say, stones, etc., are fired when enemies approach the moat to prevent them from reaching the ramparts of the city (yadvā . . . pareṣāṃ parikhāmukhena prākārasamīpaprāptinivāraṇārthaṃ śilādayo vikṣipyante 'tas tatra dvāreṣu saṃkramās trāyante purīṃ rakṣantīty arthaḥ)." Cg, in keeping with his understanding that the saṃkramas are drawbridges, appears to understand that the yantras are the mechanisms for lifting and lowering the bridges. He says:

> He [Vālmīki] now explains the function of the drawbridges with the verse beginning, "They . . . protect (trāyante)." "There" means in the areas around the gateways. When hostile forces approach, the drawbridges protect the city. And we must supply the word[s] "the city." He [Vālmīki] explains how, with the half verse beginning, "by the instruments (yantraiḥ)." The instruments are the mechanisms for lowering the planks of the bridges. "Into the moats" means "over the moat." "Extended on all sides" means "laid down." Normally, the planks are laid down across the waters of the moats. They are, however, drawn up at the approach of hostile troops. Because of the impassable waters of the moats, it is impossible [for them] to approach the ramparts. That is the point of the verse. (saṃkramānām upayogam āha trāyanta iti. tatra dvārapradeśeṣu parasainyāgame sati saṃkramās trāyante purīm iti śeṣaḥ katham ity atrāha. yantraiḥ saṃkramaphalakavikṣepayantraiḥ. parikhāsu parikhopari. samantato 'vakīryante kṣipyante. sarvathā parikhājalopari phalakā nikṣipyante. śatrusainyāgame tu tā utkṣipyante tena durgaparikhājalena prākārasamīpagamanaṃ na śakyata iti ślokatātparyam.)

Although the translators understand the yantras to be instruments of war rather than mechanical devices for lifting the bridges, the majority of them appear to follow Cg in translating saṃkramas as "drawbridges" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 5; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 7; and Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1377). Dutt (1893, p. 1110) renders, "bridges." Pagani (1999, p. 877) understands similarly, translating, "ponts." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 133) seems to prefer another sense of saṃkrama-, that of "a long or narrow passage," rendering, "angusti passi." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 6), possibly influenced by Gorresio, offers, "galeries." See notes to 6.93.13; 6.98.2; and 6.116.11 for other examples of Gorresio's apparent influence on Roussel.

"emplaced upon them": Following the suggestion of Cr and Cm (first interpretation), we have added these words for the sake of clarity (saṃkramasthair [yantraiḥ])."

17. "One" ekaḥ: Ct and Ck gloss, "principal (mukhyaḥ)."

"solid" akampyaḥ: Literally, "unshakeable." Ct interprets, "impossible to break (durbhedaḥ)." Cr understands, "incapable of being shaken by enemies (paraiḥ kampayitum aśakyaḥ)." Cg sees the bridge's unshakeability to be a consequence of its extremely strong construction (atyantavṛddhasaṃghaṭano 'ta evākampyaḥ).

"strong" balavān: Ct, Cr, and Ck understand the term bala- in its sense of "army, troops." Thus, they see the adjective balavān here as meaning "characterized by its many troops (bahusenāviśiṣṭaḥ)." Cg, whom we have followed, takes bala- in its sense of "strength." He thus takes the term to mean "strong" and attributes the strength to its massiveness of construction. He glosses, "possessed of massiveness (sthaulyavān)."

"extremely stable" sumahādṛḍhaḥ: Literally, "very firm." Ct and Ck gloss, "having a firm foundation (dṛḍhapratiṣṭhānaḥ)."

"pilings" stambhaiḥ: We agree with Cg in taking these as the posts or pilings upon which the bridge itself is supported. He explains, "posts set in the moats to support the bridges (saṃkramādhārārthaṃ parikhāsu sthāpitaiḥ stambhaiḥ)."

"watchtowers" vedikābhiḥ: Literally, "raised platforms, seats." Here this polysemic term appears to refer to raised seats, which, as Cg suggests, are raised platforms or balconies for the guards (rakṣijanādhārārthābhīr vitardikābhiḥ). See notes to 5.3.8–11 and 5.7.14–15. See Sharma 1971, p. 262.

Various commentators provide additional bits of information about this bridge. Ct and Ck indicate that it is the main means of entrance to the city and passes through the middle of the rampart (mukhyaḥ saṃkramaḥ prākāramadhyavartī sākṣāt purapraveśasādhanabhūtaḥ). Cr takes the reference to the bridge's golden accoutrements to suggest that it is by this bridge that Rāvaṇa leaves and enters the city (etena tenaiva rāvaṇo nirgacchatīti praviśati ceti sūcitam). Cg notes that this bridge leads to the northern gate of Laṅkā (uttaradvārasthaḥ). The northern gate is, of course, the one at which Rāma stations himself (see 6.27.19).

18. "in full command of himself" svayaṃ prakṛtisampannaḥ: Literally, "inherently endowed with [his own] nature" or "naturally well-endowed." Cg, the only one among the southern commentators to have this precise reading, takes it to mean "devoid of any distractions in the form of addiction to gambling, etc. (dyūtādivyasanarūpavicārarahitaḥ)." B2,D1,4,5,7,10,11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cm, Ck, and Cr read instead the well-attested variant prakṛtim āpannaḥ, which appears to be roughly synonymous. Ct and Cm take the phrase to mean that Rāvaṇa's spirit never falters. Cr explains that he is grounded in his own inherent nature, which is to say that he does not undergo any transformation even when engaged in drinking, and so on (prakṛtiṃ svasvabhāvam āpanno madyapānādāv api svabhāvapariṇāmarahita ity arthaḥ). The thrust of all these interpretations, and indeed of the entire verse, is that Rāvaṇa is always a formidable foe and that Rāma cannot expect to catch him off guard or when he is incapacitated.

"Always ready for battle" yuyutsuḥ: We feel the context supports Cg's gloss, "always prepared (sarvadā yuddhodyataḥ)," against the more straightforward interpretation of the desiderative, such as Cr's, "always desirous of battle (nityaṃ yoddhum icchuḥ)." Cf. 6.4.19 and note.

"energetic and vigilant in inspecting his troops" utthitaś cāpramattaś ca balānām anudarśane: Cg and Cm claim that this means that Rāvaṇa is wakeful for the purpose of inspecting his troops daily (bālānāṃ sainyānām anudarśane pratidinam avalokananimittam utthito jāgarūkaḥ). Cm glosses "vigilant (apramattaḥ)" as "devoid of carelessness (pramattarahitaḥ)." Cm, perhaps disturbed by the abrupt change of subject, from the bridges to Rāvaṇa, remarks, "Whenever Rāvaṇa is desirous of battle, he stands on this bridge to review his troops (yadā rāvaṇo yuyutsur bhavati tadā tasmin saṃkrame senādarśanārthaṃ tiṣṭhatīti bhāvaḥ)."

19. "not to be scaled" nirālambā: Literally, "without dependency or self-sufficient." This adjective could suggest that Laṅkā is self-sufficient and therefore all the more able to withstand a siege. However, in the present context, with its virtually exclusive focus on the city's natural and constructed defenses, we feel it best to follow the unanimous commentarial tradition whereby ālambana- is taken to refer to the climbing [lit., clinging] to the walls of the lofty citadel. The commentators argue that the fortress is not to be climbed because of its situation on the peak of a high and sheer mountain (nirālambātiślakṣṇamahoccagiriśikharapratiṣṭhitatvenārohaṇālambanarahitā—so Ct). Cg embellishes this interpretation by suggesting that the sheerness of the slope of Mount Trikūṭa is not purely natural but has been enhanced through the work of a stonecutter's chisel (ṭaṅkacchedamasṛṇīkṛtatrikūṭaśikharasthitatvād ārohaṇālambanarahitā—so, too, Cv and Cm). Cs, alone among the commentators, understands ālambā in its sense of support, explaining the term to mean "lacking any support; that is, seeming to hang in the sky because of having very firm support in the form of a mountain peak, etc. (nirālambāmbaralambinīti nirālambeva nirālambā nitarāṃ dṛḍheti yāvat. ālambaḥ parvataśikharādirūpa āśrayo yasyāḥ sā.)" Many northern manuscripts and Gorresio's edition substitute durālambā, literally, "difficult to cling to," which appears to be an example of the northern tendency to gloss. See Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86. Translators generally render the commentators' interpretation as "impregnable" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 7) and "emprenable" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 6). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1377) attempts to provide a literal meaning of ālambā, rendering, "no base for invasion." Dutt (1893, p. 1110) gives a literal rendition of Ct, "[Lankā] cannot be ascended by means of any support." On Mount Trikūṭa, see note to 6.2.10.

"inaccessible even to the gods" devadurgā: The translation follows Cr, Cg, Cm, and Cs (first alternative), who understand, "unattainable even by the gods (devair api duṣprāpā—so Cg)." Ct and Ck understand, "having the appearance of a fortress built by the gods (devanirmitadurgarūpiṇī—so Ck)." Cv offers both alternatives.

"defensive constructions" kṛtrimam: Literally, "artificial, man-made." The term contrasts the constructed defenses of the city with the other, natural defenses mentioned in the verse. Commentators point out that this refers to the rampart surrounding the city of Laṅkā (kṛtimaṃ prākārarūpaṃ catuṣprākāravattvena prākārarūpam—so Ct).

20. "far off, on the other side of the vast ocean" pāre samudrasya dūrapārasya: Literally, "on the far shore of the ocean whose far shore is distant."

"navigable passage" naupathaḥ: Literally, "path for ships."

"the way is all uncharted" nirādeśaś ca sarvataḥ: Literally, "completely lacking information." The translation follows the suggestion of Cg and Cm, who explain, "the meaning is 'this region is devoid of the transmission of [any] information' (sarvato nirādeśaś cādeśo vartāsaṃcāras tadrahito 'yaṃ deśa ity arthaḥ)." Cm adds that this suggests the impassability of the waters (anena jaladurgavattvaṃ sūcitam). Ś1,Ñ,D1–4,8–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead niruddeśaḥ, literally, "devoid of regions," for the critical reading nirādeśaḥ. Ct and Ck explain, "devoid of regional subdivisions (pradeśavibhāgarahitaḥ—so Ct)." This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1377) and Dutt (1893, p. 1110). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 6), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 7), offers "car elle n'offre de port nulle part."

"there" atra: Literally, "here." The commentators are unanimous in understanding this to refer to the ocean (atra samudre—so Cr).

22. "hundred-slayers" śataghnyaḥ: See note to verse 12 above.

"instruments of war" yantrāṇi: See note to verse 15 above.

23. "On one side" atra: Literally, "here." Cg and Cr understand "in Laṅkā." The use of the adverb in this and the following three verses may suggest that Hanumān is pointing to places on a drawing or sketch of the layout of the city, perhaps scratched in the dirt or sand.

"They . . . bear lances" śūlahastāḥ: Literally, "lances in hand."

"fight . . . in the vanguard" -agrayodhinaḥ: We follow Cg, who glosses, "at the front of the army (senāgre)." Ct understands similarly. This could also mean "they fight with the tips of their swords," as Ck suggests.

24. "On the next side" atra: Literally, "here." Cg and Cr understand, "in Laṅkā (laṅkāyām)."

"an army, complete with all four divisions" caturaṅgeṇa sainyena: Literally, "a four-limbed army." This is the classic army of four divisions, mentioned throughout the literature. It consists of specific numbers of infantry, cavalry, chariot, and elephant corps. See BrahmāṇḍP 3.26.7, 45.1, 46.18; MatsyaP 240.19–21; and BhāgP 1.10.32 for technical definitions of caturaṅga. See, too, ArthŚā 2.33.9 and 9.2.29. See 6.7.11; 6.28.23; 6.31.41,83–84; 6.46.931*; 6.53.27; 6.81.3; 6.84.6; and notes.

"fighters" yodhāḥ: Cg, who wishes to see the four divisions of the traditional army represented among the forces stationed at the four city gates, glosses, "infantrymen (padātayaḥ)." See note to verse 26 below.

25. "Next" atra: Literally, "here." See notes to verses 23 and 24 above.

"adept in the use of every missile" sarvāstrakovidāḥ: Literally, "skilled in all missiles."

26. "Finally" atra: Literally, "here."

"ten million" arbudam: This could also mean one hundred million. The commentators are silent. D6,10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead nyarbudam, which generally means "one hundred million" and is seen, for example, in the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1377), which translates accordingly.

"and cavalry" aśvavāhāś ca: Literally, "horsemen." Cg argues that the conjunction ca, "and," is intended to include the forces mounted on elephants who are the fourth standard division of the army (cakāreṇa gajavāhāḥ samucīyante).

"sons of noble families" kulaputrāḥ: The commentators waver between understanding this term in its usual sense, as we have done, and taking it as a kind of proper noun used of the kiṃkaras, an elite group of Rāvaṇa's troops with whom Hanumān fights at 5.40. See notes to 5.40.23ff. Thus, Ct remarks, "the kulaputras are the kiṃkaras, or they are those born in noble warrior families. (kulaputrāḥ kiṃkarāḥ. yadvā yoddhṛsatkule prasūtāḥ.)" Cm gives similar alternatives. Cr and Ck see them only as the kiṃkaras. Crā sees them only as the sons of noble families. Cg similarly offers only the latter sense but interprets it to mean that these warriors are therefore trustworthy (satkulaprasūtā viśvasanīyā iti yāvat).

"treated with great respect" supūjitāḥ: Literally, "well-honored." Cg understands that the warriors are the kiṃkaras held in high esteem by Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇena bahumatāḥ kiṃkarā iti śeṣaḥ).

27. "central encampment" madhyamaṃ gulmam: D6,7,10,11,T2,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead skandham for gulmam, "encampment." This is explained by most commentators as "army camp in the middle of the city (puramadhyasenāniveśasthānam—so Ct)," and by Cg as "the place in the middle of the city (nagaramadhyamasthānam)." Cf. 5.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

"ten million" śataṃ śatasahasrāṇām: Literally, "a hundred hundred-thousands." D5,7,10,11,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead śataśo 'tha sahasrāṇi, "hundreds of thousands."

"yātudhānas" yātudhānāḥ: Yātudhānas are said to be a type of rākṣasa. See 6.31.74; 6.47.39; 6.48.28; 6.55.49; 6.57.47–48; 6.99.26; and notes. Cf. 5.3.26 and 5.4.12 and notes, where the term refers to the more virtuous of the rākṣasas. See also the discussion of rākṣasas in Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 65–68 and note 246. See, too, MBh 18.5.19.

"and an even greater number" sāgrakoṭiś ca: Literally, "and ten million with a surplus." Ct and Cr are quite specific and understand that the phrase sāgrakoṭi means "one and one-quarter crore, or 12.5 million," a number that turns up in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 6) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1377). Raghunathan, however, understands this to be a cumulative total of all the rākṣasas in the city. Ck, with whom we agree, is less specific, explaining, "somewhat more [than a crore] (sāgrā kiṃcid abhyadhikā)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 6) translates, "une Koti et plus." Cg understands, "a full crore (pūrṇakoṭiḥ)."

Following verse 27, D7,G2,3,T2,M3, and Ct (after 28); G1 (after 29ab); and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cr (unnumbered in GPP in brackets between 6.3.29–30; Gita Press 6.3.29cd; VSP 6.3.30; and KK 6.3.30) insert a passage of one line [49*]: "But I annihilated a part of that army[1] of great[2] rākṣasas."

[1]"but I annihilated a part of that army" balaikadeśaḥ kṣapitaḥ: Literally, "a part of the army was destroyed." The reference is, of course, to Hanumān's slaughter of the rākṣasas in the Sundarakāṇḍa (40–45). See, too, 5.52.3.

Cg says that it means that Hanumān destroyed one-quarter of the army (senācaturthāṃśa ity arthaḥ). Cr notes that Ct, who does not accept this passage, nonetheless understands its sense to be conveyed by the conjunction ca in 28c. Cr's commentary to GPP 6.3.29 does indeed indicate that the conjunction ca of 28c should be read as implying the destruction of a portion of the army (etad arthapāṭho na bhaṭṭasaṃmato 'ta eva cena balaikadeśakṣayo 'pi kṛta iti tair uktam).

[2]"of great" mahātmanām: Cg, taking the term ātman in its sense of "body," glosses, "of huge bodies (mahākāyānām)."

28. Hanumān burns the city of Laṅkā at 5.52.7–17. Although there is no explicit mention of the destruction of the bridges or moats, the towers, ramparts, and archways are said to have been destroyed at 5.53.26.

29. "you may regard . . . as destroyed by the monkeys" hateti . . . vānarair avadhāryatām: We follow Ct and Cr in taking vānaraiḥ, "by the monkeys," to be the subject of the participle hatā, "[Laṅkā] is destroyed," rather than, as do some translators

(Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 6 and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 7), understanding it to be the subject of the verb avadhāryatām, "let it be considered." To us, the interpretation of Ct and Cr seems clearly more harmonious with the context; it also parallels the similar construction used twice in the preceding sarga (cf. 6.2.10,19). Note, too, the northern reading, which seems to gloss by dropping the confusing iti in pāda c and substituting the second person singular imperative (upadhāraya) for the ambiguous passive imperative of the critical text. See Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86.

30. Cm explains the sense of the verse as follows: "What is the use of worrying over a means to get the whole army across? If a few of the troop leaders get across the ocean, they will uproot Laṅkā, along with its mountains, forest, etc. [52*], and bring it back. (sarvasainyataraṇopayacintayā kiṃ? katipayayūthapā eva samudraṃ laṅghayitvā parvatavanādiviśiṣṭāṃ laṅkām utpāṭyāneṣyantīty āha.)"

31. "leaping through the air, those monkeys" plavamānāḥ: Literally, "[those] leaping [ones]." We understand, with the commentators and most translators, that the subject is the group of monkey troop leaders, Aṅgada, etc., mentioned in the previous verse.

"will bring back Maithilī" ānayiṣyanti maithilīm: Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6–12,T2,3, G1,3,M3, and the printed editions of Gorresio 5.72.19 and Lahore 5.70.19, as well as the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, substitute the vocative singular rāghava, "O Rāghava," for the accusative singular maithilīm, "Maithilī." It should be noted, however, that for the southern commentators who do not read maithilīm, ānayiṣyanti lacks an explicit object. This deficit is remedied by Ct and Ck, who supply the proper noun sītām, "Sītā." Alternatively Cg and Cm understand the city of Laṅkā to be the object of both the gerund and the finite verb. They understand that the monkeys will bring back the entire city of Laṅkā with its palaces, ramparts, etc. This interpretation is represented in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 6).

Following 31ab, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [52*]: "Having smashed [Laṅkā] along with its mountains and forests, its moats, and its gateway arches."

32. "to that effect" evam: Literally, "thus, in this fashion." Cg specifies that this refers to the mode of action proposed in the preceding verse (evaṃ plavamānā ityādy uktarītyā). Ct and Ck see Hanumān as presenting Rāma with two options in this verse. The first, signaled by the adverb evam, is for the principal monkeys to carry out the mission as proposed in verses 30–31 above. If Rāma wishes that option, he should so order immediately. If, however, he selects the second option, that is, leading the entire monkey army to the opposite shore, [then he should select an auspicious juncture to set out]. (evaṃ pradhānair eva kāryasādhanam iṣṭaṃ cet kṣipram idānīm evānayatety ājñāpaya. yadi balānāṃ sarvasaṃgrahaṃ balasaṃmelanam uddiśya balānām api pāranayanam iṣṭaṃ tadā—so Ct.)

"entire army" balānāṃ sarvasaṃgraham: As noted above, this is the interpretation of Ct and Ck. Cg and Cm, however, understand the term in the sense of "the elite forces in the midst of the army," and see it as a reference to the elite monkey warriors mentioned in verse 30 above. (sarvasaṃgrahaṃ saṃgṛhyata iti saṃgrahaḥ. balānāṃ madhye sarvasārabhūtaṃ balam aṅgadādikam ājñāpaya.)

"You must select a propitious moment to set forth" muhūrtena tu yuktena prasthānam abhirocaya: Literally, "choose a departure at a suitable moment." The commentators understand the meaning here as "choose the moment of your own departure at an hour suitable for a journey or expedition (tadā yuktena yātrocitena muhūrtena prasthānaṃ svayātrām abhirocaya—so Ct)." See note to 6.4.3.

Sarga 4

1. "said" abravīt: Cg claims that Rāma addresses Sugrīva (sugrīvam iti śeṣaḥ), although, in the following verse, he appears to be addressing Hanumān. Cg's explanation is that the reference in verse 2 to the description of Laṅkā is "caused to be related [by Sugrīva] through the mouth of Hanumān (hanumanmukhena nivedayasi)." The issue of the person to whom Rāma addresses his remarks hinges on whether the word "Sugrīva" in verse 3 is to be taken as a vocative or a prior member of a compound. Gorresio's text (5.73.13) specifies Sugrīva as Rāma's interlocutor. See note to verse 3 below. Cf. note to 6.2.1 above.

2. "Laṅkā, the city . . . which you have had described . . . This is the truth I am telling you" yāṃ nivedayase laṅkāṃ purīm . . . satyam etad bravīmi: Literally, "you have described which city, Laṅkā . . . I speak this truth or I speak this truly." Given the critical reading of the vocative sugrīva, "Sugrīva," in verse 3 below, we concur with Cg's reading of the verb as a causative whose subject is Sugrīva and whose simplex subject is Hanumān. See notes to verse 1 above and notes to verse 3 below.

D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead yan nivedayase, "what you have been telling me." They then understand the thrust of this verse rather differently. In their reading, the neuter pronoun yat, "what," refers specifically to Hanumān's statement, that he can see to the destruction of Laṅkā. Ct and Ck then understand etat, "this," in pāda d as the correlative pronoun, which is modified by the word satyam, "true." In their view, Rāma, realizing that the proposed mission to be undertaken by an advance party consisting of Aṅgada, etc., is not feasible, is diplomatically rejecting the plan enunciated at 6.3.30–31 above, whereby only a few of the great monkey warriors would assault Laṅkā, leaving the bulk of the army and Rāma behind. According to them, Rāma thinks the plan unworkable but diplomatically endorses it before putting forth his own plan, which will involve the use of the entire monkey army. A translation of the verse according to this interpretation would read: "What you have said—that I could quickly destroy Laṅkā, this city of the rākṣasa—is quite true. Nonetheless I will tell you [my own plan]. (tatrāṅgadādimukhena kāryanirvahaṇam aśakyaṃ matvā tatprarocanāya tad aṅgīkurvann iva svamatam āha—yad iti. rakṣasa enāṃ purīṃ kṣipram eva vadhiṣyāmīti yan nivedayase tat satyam eva tathā te śaktir asty eva tathāpi te tubhyaṃ svamataṃ bravīmīty arthaḥ.)" Cm, who reads yām in pāda a, also sees a reference to the plan involving Aṅgada, etc. as enunciated by Hanumān, but sees Rāma as accepting it (hanumatoktam aṅgadādimukhena kāryanirvahaṇam aṅgīkurvann āha).

3. "I wish to set forth this very moment, Sugrīva" sugrīva prayāṇam abhirocaye: Manuscript traditions vary here in two respects that bear on the murky issue of whom Rāma is addressing in the opening verses of this sarga. The questions here are whether Rāma is addressing Sugrīva or Hanumān and whether he is discussing his own or Sugrīva's proposed expedition. The first issue is whether the sequence sugrīva-prayāṇam should be read as separate words, thus making the former a vocative; the second is whether the verbal form is the second person imperative abhirocaya or the first person indicative abhirocaye. This yields four possible permutations. The first of these is largely indeterminate, as manuscripts typically do not separate words. Thus, it becomes a matter of interpretation as to whether we are to understand the sequence as a compound. Printed editions of the northern recensions, i.e., Gorresio and Lahore, separate the words and use the first person form of the verb. The sense yielded thereby is the one we have rendered in our translation. Some printed versions of the southern recension, e.g., KK, VSP, and NSP, read with the critical edition and northern recension. Gita Press has the vocative but reads the second person; GPP, which normally represents the text of Ct, reads the compound and the second person imperative, noting, however, that Cg reads the first person. Ct is unambiguous in identifying sugrīvaprayāṇam as a ṣaṣṭhītatpuruṣasamāsa, while Ck concurs by providing the vigraha. Cr prefaces his discussion of this verse by remarking, "having first addressed Hanumān, he now addresses Sugrīva (hanumantaṃ pratyuktvā sugrīvaṃ pratyāha)." He thus understands sugrīva to be a vocative and sees Rāma as asking Sugrīva to approve of his [Rāma's] setting forth. Cg reads the vocative and the first person as in the critical edition and makes no specific comment on either point. However, see note to verse 1 above. Cm reads the second person imperative and appears, in reading prayāṇam abhirocaya, to understand the vocative, although he does not indicate this explicitly. Cs is the only commentator to explicitly acknowledge the alternate readings. His own preference appears to be the vocative and the first person, that is, the reading of the critical text. He then goes on to state: "The alternate reading abhirocaya has the meaning 'please sanction or permit (anumodasva).' By reading sugrīvaprayāṇam as a single word and in accepting [Rāma's] utterance [to Sugrīva] to be delivered while facing Hanumān, it is clear that the text is consistent with the following verse, which contains the words abhiprayāma sugrīva sarvānīkasamāvṛtāḥ, 'let us set forth, Sugrīva, surrounded by the entire army.' (abhirocayeti pāṭhe 'numodasvety arthaḥ. sugrīvaprayāṇam ity aikapadyena hanumadābhimukhyena vacanam ity añgīkāre "abhiprayāma sugrīva sarvānīkasamāvṛtāḥ" ity agrimagranthānānuguṇyaṃ sphuṭam.)" In other words, Cs understands the compound to be consistent with the vocative in the following verse (verse 4) if we understand that Rāma is speaking to Sugrīva in this verse through the mediation of Hanumān. Cs remarks that Rāma delivers this speech while glancing indirectly at Sugrīva because of the latter's kingship (rājatvāt sugrīvaṃ kaṭākṣīkṛtyāha). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 8), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 8), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1378) all understand Rāma to be asking Sugrīva to approve his [Rāma's] departure. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 6) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 135) translate as we do. Dutt (1893, p. 1111) understands Rāma to be asking Hanumān to arrange for Sugrīva's march (following Ct and Ck; cf. Cs's alternative reading).

"propitious" yuktaḥ: We follow Cg's explanation, "propitious for a journey (yukto yātrārthaḥ)." D3,8,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read muhūrte for the critical reading muhūrtaḥ. Ct, Ck, and Cr take the adjective yuktaḥ to refer to Rāma's departure, the words for which must be supplied (me nirgama iti śeṣaḥ—Ct). See Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1378.

"juncture called Vijaya" muhūrto vijayaḥ: Vijaya ("victory") is mentioned earlier in the Rāmāyaṇa (see 1.72.8) as a propitious moment for undertaking a journey. It is a forty-eight-minute period—11:36 AM through 12:24 PM—and is, as the commentators suggest, called by this name because it is conducive to success or triumph. In fact, as several commentators point out, the more common and, perhaps, more technically correct name for this muhūrta is Abhijit (cf. Ct, Ck, Cs, Cm, Cg). Cg then quotes the Vidyāmādhavīya, which provides a list of the daytime muhūrtas, among which Abhijit is the eighth. See Hopkins 1903, passim. Cg uses the identification of this muhūrta as a starting point for a geographical discussion, which bears on his notion of the location of Lañkā relative to Kiṣkindhā. He quotes an unnamed śāstra that prohibits the starting of a journey to the south during the Abhijit muhūrta, for to undertake such a journey will be fatal, like several other actions taken at that time. Cg claims, however, that this is not a problem in the present case, since Lañkā is to the southeast of Kiṣkindhā so that the prohibited southward journey does not occur. See note to verse 42 below. (tad uktaṃ vidyāmādhavīye "ārdroragamitramakhāvasujalaviśvābhijid viriñcendrāḥ / aindrāgnimūlavaruṇāryamabhagatārā divā muhūrtāḥ syur iti //" nanv abhijid muhūrtā dakṣiṇayātrāsu niṣiddhā yathā jyautiṣaratnākare "bhuktau dakṣiṇayātrāyāṃ pratiṣṭhāyāṃ dvijanmani / ādhāne ca dhvajārohe mṛtyudaḥ syāt sadābhijit" ity ucyate. laṅkā hi dakṣiṇapūrvasyāṃ kiṣkindhāyāḥ. ato neyaṃ dakṣiṇayātreti noktadoṣaḥ.) See Kane for which activities are appropriate for particular muhūrtas (1974, vol. 5, p. 537) and also see note to 6.81.28 below.

Following verse 3, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [56*]. D5,6,10,11,T1,G1,2, and the texts of Ct and Ck omit, in whole or in part, line 1: "For if I set forth at this auspicious juncture known as Vijaya, when the sun has reached its zenith,[1] where in the world will that fellow [Rāvaṇa], having taken Sītā, flee?[2] When Sītā hears of my expedition, life will once more hold hope for her[3], just as one grievously ill and at death's door from drinking poison might [gain hope] at the taste of the nectar of immortality.[4]"

4. "Moreover, today is the day of the lunar asterism Uttarāphalgunī" uttarāphalgunī hy adya: Literally, "for today is Uttarāphalgunī." This is the name of the tenth (Kane 1974, vol. 5, p. 502) or twelfth (Apte s.v.) lunar asterism. According to Ct, this is Sītā's natal asterism. He goes on to state that, in order to liberate a person held in captivity, it is necessary to set out for that purpose on the day in which the moon enters that person's natal asterism. In keeping with his own chronology of the Rāmāyaṇa story, Ct uses the mention of this asterism to note that the events taking place in this sarga occur on either the seventh or the eighth of the dark half of Mārgaśīrṣa [November–December], calculating from the end of the new-moon day. (uttarā ca sītāyā janmatārā baddhasya janmatārāyāṃ tanmocanārthayātrāyām avaśyaṃ tanmuktir iti bhāvaḥ. adyāmāntamānena mārgaśīrṣakṛṣṇāṣṭamyāṃ kṛṣṇasaptamyāṃ vā mārgaśīrṣapūrṇīmottaraṃ tadanyattarasminn uttarālābhāt.)

Cg and Cm remark that this asterism is particularly favorable for Rāma.

And it is this, coupled with the fatal quality of the following asterism, Hasta, that, for them, accounts for Rāma's urgency to begin his march. (hasto rāmasya nidhanatārā. uttarāphalgunī tu sādhanatārā. ato 'dyaiva sarvānīkasamāvṛtāḥ santo 'bhiprayāma gacchema—so Cg.) See note below. Cg, who characteristically disagrees with Ct's understanding of the chronology of the Rāmāyaṇa, takes the reference to the asterism to demonstrate that the events described here take place on the full-moon day of the month Phālguna (February–March), i.e., Holi. (atrottarāphalgunīty anena sa divasaḥ phālgunapaurṇamāsīty avagamyate. idam uttaratra pratipādayiṣyate.) He claims that this position will be substantiated later in the text. On epic chronology, see Hopkins 1903. On the chronology of epic events in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see notes to 6.29.17; 6.32; 6.34.2; 6.36.43; 6.42.37; 6.43.1; 6.44.38; 6.46.51; 6.47.135; 6.48.12; 6.50.12; 6.55.129; 6.59.106;

6.61.68; 6.62.4; 6.65.1; 6.66.38; 6.69.23; 6.73.14; 6.78.54; 6.79.7; 6.80.55; 6.81.7, 28–31; 6.88.59; 6.97.31,33; 6.99.41,43; 6.100.7; and 6.112.1. See, too, 5.2.54 and note.

"Tomorrow the moon will enter the asterism Hasta." śvas tu hastena yokṣyate: Literally, "Tomorrow it will be conjoined with Hasta." We follow Ct, Ck, and Cm in adding the word candra, "moon." Hasta is the eleventh (Kane 1974, vol. 5, p. 502) or thirteenth (Apte s.v.) lunar asterism. Cg notes that this asterism is particularly inauspicious for Rāma. Ct, Ck, and Cm all elaborate, noting that it is inauspicious for anyone like Rāma who is under the asterism Punarvasū (punarvasau jātasya mama śvas tu naidhanatārā). In astrology, naidhana refers to the eighth house, or "the House of Death." This accounts for his urgency to set out immediately. See note to 6.59.23.

For a thorough discussion of Rāma's horoscope based on the data furnished by the southern recension, see Pillai 1922, pp. 112–22.

5. "Jānakī" jānakīm: According to Cg, the use of the epithet here indicates that Rāma needs to bring Sītā back in order to please Janaka (jānakīm iti viśeṣaṇena janakaprītyarthaṃ cāvaśyaṃ sā netavyeti vyajyate). Perhaps Cg is anticipating the important scene of the late Yuddhakāṇḍa, where Rāma claims that he has not recovered Sītā for her sake or to keep her. See 6.103.13–24, esp., verses 15–16.

6. "For the upper lid of my eye is throbbing" upariṣṭāt . . . nayanaṃ sphuramāṇam idaṃ mama: Literally, "from above, this eye of mine is throbbing." Cm, no doubt keeping in mind the general tradition that throbbing on the right side of the body is auspicious for men, proposes adding the word "right" (nayanaṃ dakṣiṇam iti śeṣaḥ). Cg, however, disputes this view, quoting a verse from an unnamed astrological text, which, although supporting the view that throbbing above the eye is an auspicious sign, appears to interpret the throbbing of the right eye as negative. From this verse he calls into question the explanation [no doubt Cm's] that the eye referred to in the verse is the right one. (tathoktaṃ jyotiḥśāstre netrasyādhaḥ sphuraṇam asakṛt saṅgare bhañgahetur netropānte harati nayanaṃ netramūle ca mṛtyuḥ / netrasyordhvaṃ harati sakalaṃ mānasaṃ duḥkhajātaṃ vāme caivaṃ phalam avikalaṃ dakṣiṇe vaiparītyam // ity evaṃ vacane vidyamāne dakṣiṇanayanam iti vyākhyānaṃ cintyam.) However, Cm's view is consistent with the general understanding that throbbing of the right part of the body is auspicious for men and inauspicious for women, and vice versa. See 6.43.7; 6.53.43; 6.83.34; and notes. For a discussion of omens in the Rāmāyaṇa, see Sharma 1971, pp. 177–79; Vyas 1967, pp. 145–51, esp. pp. 148–49; and Guruge 1960, pp. 227–32. Cf. Kapadia 1967, p. 255. See also Dange 1986, pp. 445–51. See, too, AgniP 230–31. See also 5. 25.35–37; 5.27.4; and notes. Cf. 6.26.21–30; 6.31.7; 6.41.30–33; 6.43.6–8; 6.45.32–38; 6.49.6; 6.53.40–44; 6.60.22; 6.76.4; 6.94.14; 6.96.1; and notes.

Following verse 6, D5–7,10,11,S (except G1,M5) insert a passage of two lines [58*]: "Then honored by Lakṣmaṇa and the monkey king, righteous Rāma, who was expert in worldly affairs, spoke once more."

8. "honey" madhu-: The term is used in the sense of honey-wine, or mead, in connection with the monkey army's refreshment at the end of the Sundarakāṇḍa. See note to 5.59.8.

"furnished with cool groves and waters" śītakānanavāriṇā: Cr reads the bahuvrīhi compound kānanavāriṇā as a madhyamapadalopī rather than as a dvandva as we have done. His interpretation would then be "furnished with cool forest-waters (śītāni kānanavārīṇi vanasaṃbandhijālāni yasmin)."

9. "you must . . . guard . . . against [them]" parirakṣethās tebhyaḥ: We follow the interpretation of Cr, who makes it clear that Nīla is to secure the provisions against the depredations of the rākṣasas. A number of manuscripts, both northern and southern (V1,B1,3,D6,10,11,T2,3,M1,2), and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck redundantly read pathi, "on the path or road," for the critical pari.

"might poison" dūṣayeyuḥ: Literally, "they might spoil or taint." Ct, Cg, and Cm add "with poison, etc. (viṣādineti śeṣaḥ—so Ct)."

10. "hidden" nihitam: Ct, Cg, and Cm add, "placed in hiding in order to strike secretly (guptaprahārārthaṃ līnatayā sthāpitam—Ct) or at an unguarded moment (randhre prāhārārthaṃ sthāpitam—Cg, Cm)." Cr understands, "stationed in order to destroy their enemies (svaripuvināśāya saṃsthāpitam)."

"in hollows, swamps, and thickets" nimneṣu vanadurgeṣu vaneṣu ca: The three terms are subject to a certain amount of ambiguity in interpretation, which is accentuated by the poet's repetition of the word vana-, "forests," to resonate with the vana in vanaukasaḥ, "forest dwellers." Ct and Cg understand nimneṣu to refer to depressed or low-lying land (nimneṣu gartapradeśeṣu—so Cg), and we agree that this best suits the context. Cr appears to take nimna as an adjective modifying vanadurgeṣu, which would then have the sense of "characterized by excavations, etc. (khātādiviśiṣṭeṣu)." The commentators differ somewhat in their interpretations of vanadurgeṣu, "forest fastnesses." Ct and Ck understand, "inaccessible places consisting of forests (vanātmakeṣu durgeṣu)." They contrast this to the following word vana-, which they then take to refer to "forest areas that are not inaccessible (vaneṣv adurgavaneṣu ca)." Cr distinguishes the excavated or entrenched forest fastnesses from the vanas, which he sees as "areas near water (jalasamīpadeśeṣu)." Cg, whom we follow, has the opposite interpretation. On the basis of a lexical citation from Amarakośa 1.10.3, whereby vanam may have the sense of water, he interprets vanadurga to mean "places made inaccessible by waters (vanair jalair durgeṣu durgamapradeśeṣu)." He then gives the following word vana- its more common sense of "forest or woodlands."

Following verse 10, Ñ2,V1,3,B,D5–11,S insert a passage of two lines [59*]: "Any part of the force that is not fit[1] should be employed here.[2] For our mission is a formidable one and must be undertaken through valor."

[1]"is not fit" phalgu: Literally, "weak or defective."

[2]"should be employed here" prayujyatām: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead upapadyatām, literally, "let it approach or go near." Ct glosses, "let it stay or remain (tiṣṭhatu)."

11. "resembles the surge of the sea" sāgaraughanibham: Cr remarks that the army's resemblance to the sea derives from the tumultuous noise that both make (atighoṣavattayā sāgarapravāhaughasadṛśam).

12. "Let . . . march . . . like haughty bulls" yāntu . . . dṛptā ivarṣabhāḥ: Literally, "let them go like haughty bulls." V1,B3,D10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the singular, yātu . . . dṛpta ivarṣabhaḥ. This can be taken collectively, as Cr does, or to refer only to Gavākṣa, as does Dutt (1893, p. 1112).

13. "right flank" dakṣiṇaṃ pārśvam: Citing a passage claimed to be from Kāmandaka[nītiśāstra], which specifies how the different wings of an army are to be arranged,

Cg notes that this refers to the western flank of the force. (dakṣiṇaṃ paścimapārśvam ity arthaḥ. yataś ca bhayam āśaṅki tāṃ prācīṃ parikalpayed iti kāmandakaḥ.)

14. "Gandhamādana . . . as an unrivaled war-elephant" gandhahastīva . . . gandhamādanaḥ: Literally, "like a scent-elephant . . . Gandhamādana." The upamāna here is no doubt chosen because of the resonance of the term with the name Gandhamādana, literally, "intoxicating by scent." Cg glosses, "rutting elephant (mattagajaḥ)." Although his interpretation appears in most translations, it is not quite accurate. As Ct and Cm explain, the reference is to a special and superior kind of elephant, the smell of whose rut fluid causes other elephants to flee (yasya madagandhād itare hastino dravanti sa—Cm). See Apte (s.v.). See notes to 6.97.33, App. I, No. 67, line 52 and n. 15; and notes to 6.15.33, App. I, No. 16, lines 57–69.

15. "lord Indra" īśvaraḥ: Literally, "the lord."

"urging on" abhiharṣayan: Cg takes the verse to be consonant with the military dictum, "having put them in formation [a leader] should exhort the troops (praharṣayed balaṃ vyūhyety ukteḥ)."

"the vast host" balaugham: Literally, "the flood or throng of troops."

16. Cg argues that, by these instructions, Rāma is implicitly suggesting to Sugrīva that he mount a palanquin and march in company with him and Lakṣmaṇa (atra tvaṃ ca śibikām ārūhyāvābhyām āgaccheti siddham).

"Yama, ender of all things" antaka-: Literally, "the ender."

"on Aṅgada" aṅgadena: Literally, "with Aṅgada." We agree with Ct, Cr, and Cg, who understand that Lakṣmaṇa is to ride on Aṅgada (aṅgadam ārūhya saṃyātv ity arthaḥ).

"Kubera, the ruler of the yakṣas" bhūteśaḥ: Literally, "the lord of bhūtas." This term is most commonly an epithet of Śiva or Skanda in the sense of "lord of ghosts or spirits." These figures are said to form Śiva's entourage. The term bhūteśa is sometimes also used as an epithet of Brahmā or Viṣṇu with the broader sense of "lord of [all] creatures." Here, however, the appositional epithet, "draviṇādhipatiḥ (lord of wealth)," and the association with the elephant Sārvabhauma make it clear that Kubera is intended and that bhūta is to be read as "supernatural being," with the particular sense of yakṣa. Kubera is the lokapāla of the north. See MatsyaP 67.15 and ViṣṇuP 5.36.12. See, too, 6.7.3; 6.22.10; 6.69.26; 6.80.52; 6.82.2; 6.92.15; 6.98.12–13; 6.110.23; 6.115.24,49; and notes. Cf. 6.47.9, where bhūtas are understood as malignant spirits; and 6.55.127 and note, where the term refers to spirits of the departed.

"Sārvabhauma" sārvabhaumena: The majority of commentators agree that this is the name of one of the earth-supporting elephants and the one that serves as Kubera's mount. See BrahmāṇḍP 2.22.47,51; VāyuP 51.43–45; and MatsyaP 1.1.125.17–21. Cg, Cm, and Cv add that this is the elephant stationed in the northern quarter. This is the name found in the standard lists of the diggajas (AmaK 1.3.4), but note that earlier in the Rāmāyaṇa the diggaja of the north is named Bhadra. See 1.39.12,21 and notes. Bhadrā is also named as Kubera's wife in Mahābhārata 1.191.6. See, too, 6.31.4 and 6.58.45–46.

17. "the . . . king of the apes" ṛkṣarājaḥ: There is some disagreement among the commentators and translators as to the actual number of monkeys mentioned here and regarding which one is called "king of the apes." Cv, Cm, and Ct, whom we follow, hold that only three monkeys are named and that Jāmbavān is the ṛkṣarāja. This latter identification is in keeping with a well-established tradition in Vālmīki (6.28.1; 6.40.11; etc.), as well as in the Mahābhārata (3.264.23) and later texts (Tulsīdās Rāmāyaṇa caupai 4 following dohā 28 of the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa), that identifies Jāmbavān as the king of the ṛkṣas, creatures most commonly understood in the later tradition to be bears instead of apes (see 1.16.10 and note). The difficulty here arises from the fact that the names of the other two monkeys intervene between "Jāmbavān" and the title. Normal epic usage in such cases would be to attach the title to the last-named monkey, in this case Vegadarśin, and that is precisely how Roussel has translated it (1903, vol. 3, p. 9). Cg, evidently disturbed by the disjunction, takes ṛkṣarāja here to be a proper noun, the name of a brother of Jāmbavān, and thus finds four monkeys named in the verse, "these three" viz., Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, and Vegadarśin, and Ṛkṣarāja. See R. Goldman 1989. See 6.28.31; 6.31.17; 6.39.25; 6.40.11; 6.72.30; 6.86.8; and notes, where Jāmbavān is identified as "king of the ṛkṣas." Cf. 6.61.16,26; 6.70.3; and notes. On the term ṛkṣa as "ape," see 6.28.1–3; 6.22.32; 6.54.14; 6.55.45; 6.102.21; etc. Compare, however, below verse 57, 7*, lines 24–25 and n. 12, as well as 6.12.12; 6.30.17; 6.101.34; and notes, where the term is translated as "bear."

"rear" kukṣim: In the context, we are inclined to agree with Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cg that this term, whose normal meaning is "belly or interior," is used as a technical military term, in the sense of "the rear guard of an army (paścādbhāgam—so Ct)," the one portion of the force that has not thus far been mentioned. Ck, Ct, and Cr elaborate, saying that the rear part of the army is characterized as being its belly (kukṣyupalakṣitaṃ senāpucchabhāgam). See verse 30 below and note.

18. "gave those orders" vyādideśa: Literally, "he commanded." The idea is, as Cg notes, that Sugrīva instructs the monkeys to do as Rāma has just said (rāmoktaṃ sarvaṃ kurutety ājñāpayāmāsa).

19. "eager for battle" yuyutsavaḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahaujasaḥ, "of immense strength."

21. "They numbered in the hundreds" śataiḥ: Literally, "by the hundreds."

22. "The vast host of tawny monkeys" mahatī harivāhinī: Cg claims that these are different from the monkeys belonging to the previously mentioned army (pūrvokta-balavānarabhinnā). See verse 6.4.18.

23–24. "Excited and filled with joy" hṛṣṭāḥ pramuditāḥ: This is another of the epic poet's frequent groups of near synonyms, the nuances of whose meanings are difficult to ascertain. Ct argues that the distinction between the two is that the former represents the outward manifestations of delight, whereas the latter refers to inner feelings (harṣapramodayor bāhyābhyantarakṛto bhedaḥ). Cr sees a causal relation between the two, arguing that the former means that the monkeys are "satisfied or content (hṛṣṭa)" and are therefore "pleased or delighted (pramudita)" (hṛṣṭāḥ prāptasaṃtoṣā ata eva pramuditāḥ). See note to 6.2.14.

"leaping outward and onward" āplavantaḥ plavantaś ca: Here, too, the terms are nearly synonymous. The commentators distinguish them by taking the former to refer to the monkey's leaping around in all directions (Ct, Ck, Cr, Cm, Cg). Ct, Ck, and Cr add that this is by way of patrolling to protect the army (samantād rakṣaṇārthaṃ plavamānāḥ—so Ct). The second term is taken to mean bounding in a forward direction either to lead the troops (senām ākarṣayantaś ca santaḥ—Cr) or clearing or investigating [the path] (agre śodhanārthaṃ gacchantaḥ—Ct, Ck). The two participles have been used, no doubt, to create a resonance with the term plavaṅgamāḥ, "leaping monkeys." See note to 6.2.14.

"bellowing, roaring, and howling" garjantaḥ . . . kṣvelanto ninadantaś ca: This is yet another set of near synonyms. See note to 6.2.14. Cf. 5.55.29; 5.60.12; and notes. Commentators offer various explanations for the sounds the monkeys make. Ct explains garja as the sound similar to that of thunderclouds, etc., and, citing the Nighaṇṭu, understands that kṣvelā is a leonine roar. He then understands *ninād*a as the ordinary sound [that monkeys make]. (kṣvelā tu siṃhanādaḥ syād iti nighaṇṭuḥ. garjo meghādisadṛśaḥ śabdaḥ. ninādaḥ sāmānyaśabdaḥ.) Cg agrees on the first two, adding, "it is well known that [clouds] bellow deeply or growl (ghanagarjitam iti prasiddhiḥ)." He defines the third noise as an indistinct sound (ninandato 'vyaktaṃ śabdāyamānāḥ). Cm comments only on the second sound. He agrees with the other two commentators, and, like them, cites the definition in the Nighaṇṭu (Cg cites AmaK 2.8.107) of kṣvelā as "a lion's roar." See, too, 6.17.16–19; 6.47.8; 6.48.31; 6.77.16; 6.78.5; and notes.

"carrying huge trees laden with masses of blossoms" udvahanto mahāvṛkṣān mañjarīpuñjadhāriṇaḥ: The syntax is somewhat ambiguous. We agree with the interpretation of Cr, who glosses "laden with masses of blossoms (mañjarīpuñjadhāriṇaḥ)" as "possessing many masses of blossoms (mañjarīsamūhavataḥ)." Following Ct, who takes both adjectives to refer to the monkeys, the phrase could also be rendered as "bearing clusters of blossoms (or blossoming shrubs), they [the monkeys] carried huge trees." This second, and, to our mind, less plausible interpretation, has been adopted by several translators (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 9; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 9; Dutt 1893, p. 1113; and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 8). Virtually all commentators agree that the monkeys are carrying the trees [and blossoms] for sport (līlārtham—Ct, Cr). The commentators are thus indicating their understanding that the trees in question are not the ones that serve as one of the monkeys' principal weapons in combat. Note that most northern manuscripts substitute for mañjarīpuñjadhāriṇaḥ words meaning large rocks, boulders, mountain peaks, etc. These texts thus see the monkeys as armed for battle with their characteristic weapons rather than simply frolicking along with trees as playthings.

25. "In their wild exuberance" dṛptāḥ: Normally, "proud, haughty." The context, however, supports the term's less common meaning, "wild, frenetic."

"they would carry one another about. Then they would suddenly throw down those being carried." nirvahanti kṣipanti ca: Literally, "they carry and they throw." The idea here, as Ct and Ck suggest, is that the monkeys' horseplay is for the sake of amusement (vinodārtham—Ct, Ck). Compare the still more violent clowning of the inebriated monkeys at 5.59.11–22 and 5.60. Following Ct, who understands, "they threw to the ground those mounted on them (svamārūḍhaṃ bhūmau pātayanti), the words "those being carried" have been added.

"Some would fall down then leap up" patantaś cotpatanty anye: Literally, "others, falling, leap up." We take the root √pat in its sense of "to fall down," and ut √pat in its sense of "to jump or leap up" [in order to knock down those who had caused them to fall]; this seems to us the central point of the verse. Commentators, however, interpret differently. Thus Ct and Ck interpret: "Some simply proceeded, while others fly up, that is, go on a path through the sky. (patantaś ca bhavanti kevalaṃ gacchantīty arthaḥ. anye utpatanty ākāśamārge gacchanti.)" Cr has a similar explanation. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read ākṣipanti for utpatanti. Cg explains this sequence as follows: "Some, falling down (patantaḥ), reviled (ākṣipanti) those who made them fall. The meaning is 'those who were unable to retaliate, merely talked back, while those who were capable of it, knocked down (pātayanti) those who had made them fall.' (pratikārakaraṇāsāmarthyena paribhāṣaṇaṃ kurvantīty arthaḥ. apare śaktāḥ parān pātayitṝn pātayanti.)" For the use of √kṣip in the sense of "to verbally abuse," in a similar context, see 5.60.11.

27. "Ṛṣabha" ṛṣabhaḥ: Commentators differ as to whether this monkey is the same individual that was appointed to the guardianship of the right flank in verse 13 above. Ct, Cm, and Ck argue that this is another monkey, a companion of Nīla (ayam ṛṣabho dakṣiṇapārśvaviniyuktād anyo nīlasahakārī—so Ct). See verses 7 and 8 above. Cg, however, argues that, "although Kumuda and the rest are different from Nīla and so forth—who were appointed earlier by Rāma to guard the army's route [verses 7–9 above]—they present themselves for this service because of their devotion to Rāma. The Ṛṣabha mentioned here," Cg claims, "is the same as the one earlier [verse 13 above] appointed to the right flank. We are," he goes on, "to understand that he volunteers for this additional duty because of his devotion as well as his tremendous valor (ṛṣabho dakṣiṇapārśvarakṣaṇāya niyukto bhaktyā parākramātiśayena cātrāpi rakṣaṇaṃ kṛtavān iti jñeyam)."

"scouted the path ahead of them" panthānaṃ śodhayanti sma: Here, too, the causative of the verb √śudh, "to purify," can mean either "to clear" or "to investigate."

28. "In the center marched" madhye: Literally, "in the center [were]." The verse provides no explicit finite verb. We have added one for the sake of clarity.

"powerful and fearsome monkeys" balibhir bhīmaiḥ: Literally, "with powerful, fearsome [ones]."

29. "one hundred million troops" koṭībhir daśabhiḥ: Literally, "by ten koṭis or crore." A crore or a koṭi is ten million.

"sole" ekaḥ: Literally, "one, alone."

"took over the . . . supervision and protection of" avaṣṭabhya rarakṣa: Literally, "having taken charge, he protected." Cr and Cg understand the gerund avaṣṭabhya in the sense of "having taken charge or control of (adhiṣṭhāya)," whereas Ct and Ck explain the phrase to mean "patrolling on all sides, he guarded (samantato bhraman rakṣati smety arthaḥ)."

30. "Kesarin" kesarī: For a discussion of the name of this monkey in the Rāmāyaṇa and his identification as Hanumān's father, see Bulcke 1959–1960 and S. Goldman 1999.

"Gaja" gajaḥ: Cm (also quoted by Ct) argues that this is not the same monkey who was assigned to march in the vanguard of the army (eṣa gajaḥ pūrvabhāganiyuktād anya iti tīrthaḥ—so Ct). Cg feels, however, that it is the same monkey who, in his great devotion, takes on both assignments (gajasyāgrabhāganiyuktasyāpi pārśvarakṣaṇaṃ bhaktyatiśayāt). Compare notes to verse 27 above, where similar arguments are made about Ṛṣabha.

"mighty" atibalaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead bahubhiḥ, "with many [monkeys]."

"each guarded one of the army's flanks" pārśvam ekaṃ tasyābhirakṣati: Literally, "he guarded one of its flanks." The commentators differ as to the flanks that are guarded by the various monkeys. Ck, also quoted by Ct, sees the four monkeys as assigned in pairs to the left and right flanks, respectively (kesaryādīnāṃ caturṇāṃ dvau dvau tasya balasya dakṣiṇaṃ vāmaṃ caikaikaṃ pārśvam abhirakṣata ity artha iti katakaḥ—so Ck, as quoted by Ct). Cr agrees and specifically assigns Kesarin and Panasa to the right flank and Gaja and Arka to the left (keśarī panasaś ca tasya balasyaikaṃ dakṣiṇam ity arthaḥ . . . gajo 'rkaś caikaṃ vāmam ity arthaḥ). Cg understands only one wing to be mentioned here and that is the left (ekaṃ pārśvaṃ savyaṃ pārśvam). Cm understands the reference to be to the rear guard of the army on the grounds that the right and left flanks had already been assigned in verses 13 and 14 above to Ṛṣabha and Gandhamādana, respectively (pārśvam ekaṃ paścād bhāgam ṛṣabhagandamādanayoḥ pūrvam eva dakṣiṇasavyapārśvayor viniyogāt). Since he does not appear to object to a similar redundancy with regard to the rear guard from verse 17, it is likely that he, against the other commentators, understands the term kukṣi there to mean "interior" rather than "rear guard."

31. "the tail end of the army" jaghanam: Literally, "the hindmost part." This conforms with the assignment of Jāmbavān and Suṣeṇa to protect the rear guard (kukṣi). See note to verse 17 above. Cv, apparently anticipating a redundancy between the two verses, notes that jaghana here refers to the tail end of the kukṣi, the rear guard (sugrīvasya pṛṣṭhataḥ kukṣeḥ paścimabhāgam). Cm, also noting the previous assignment of Jāmbavān and Suṣeṇa to the rear, sees this verse as referring specifically to the portion of the army following behind Sugrīva (sugrīvasya pṛṣṭhataḥ kukṣiṃ paścimabhāgam).

32. "moving swiftly about, guarded the army on every side" saṃpatan patatāṃ śreṣṭhas tad balaṃ paryapālayat: Cg and Cm, the only commentators to comment on this reading, understand that Nīla is moving in advance of the army in order to clear or scout the way. Cg states that he protects the army on all sides because he is the general (senapatitvāt). Cm argues that he is able to do this because of his extraordinary speed in leaping (nīlaḥ puromārgaśodhanakaḥ sann api plavanavegātiśayavattayā paritaḥ sarvato rarakṣety arthaḥ). D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead saṃyataś caratāṃ śreṣṭhas tad balaṃ paryavārayat, "self-controlled, that best of marchers restrained the army on every side." Ct, Cr, and Ck all interpret this to mean that General Nīla led his troops in such a way as to prevent them from harassing cities, etc., along their route (paryavārayan nagarādipīḍārāhityaṃ yathā bhavati tathā parivāryānayat).

33. "urging . . . onward" tvarayantaḥ: Literally, "hastening, hurrying up."

34. "the . . . Sahya mountains" sahyam: One of the seven major mountain ranges of Bhāratadvīpa understood to be the northern part of the Western Ghats (Law 1944, p. 1). Cg notes that we must understand that the monkeys saw the mountains "from a distance (apaśyan dūrād iti śeṣaḥ)." Ct observes that the reference to the mountains is to be understood to indicate that this is where the monkeys will make camp after their first day of marching (atra prathamadinavāsa iti jñāyate). See note to verse 4 above.

Following verse 34, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of three lines [72*]: "[They saw] large ponds and lakes covered with blossoms.[1] Heeding in their fear the orders of Rāma, whose wrath was dreadful, they avoided the settled countryside and the vicinity of towns.[2–3]"

35. "mighty roar . . . dreadful rush" mahāghoṣaṃ bhīmavegaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahāghoraṃ bhīmaghoṣam, "[the ocean] very dreadful, having a fearsome roar." D5,T1,2,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read mahāghoṣaḥ, "having a tremendous roar," for bhīmavegaḥ, "dreadful rush."

36. "leapt swiftly onward" tūrṇam āpupluvuḥ: Cg understands the sense of the verse to be that the monkeys act in this fashion in order to cheer up or divert Rāma (tanmukhollāsāyeti bhāvaḥ).

37. "by the two monkeys" kapibhyām: The reference is to Aṅgada and Hanumān, who carry Lakṣmaṇa and Rāma, respectively. See verses 15 and 16 above.

*"two great planets" grāhābhyām [sic]: Literally, "by two crocodiles." The critical reading as it stands is absurd. The word must be a misprint for grahābhyām, for it is attested in no available printed edition of any recension. The form grahābhyām, moreover, is not given as a variant in the critical apparatus. All commentators who gloss the word use grahābhyām, including the critical edition's own quotation of Crā. It is not listed under the errata and corrigenda (critical edition, p. 1103). No translation consulted understands grāhābhyām.

The commentators are divided as to the identity of the planets in question. Ct, Ck, and Cm identify them as Rāhu and Ketu, or the ascending and descending nodes of the moon (sometimes considered the ninth planet). Cg and Cs, however, understand the reference to be to Śukra (Venus) and Bṛhaspati (Jupiter). Cg sees the reference in the simile to the conjunction of four heavenly bodies to suggest the destruction of a great army [Rāvaṇa's] through the conjunction of Hanumān and Aṅgada with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa on the grounds that such a planetary event portends the death of large numbers of people. Thus he sees the figure as effecting a suggestion of the plot (vastudhvani). (atropamāne caturgrahasaṃyogasya bahujanavināśahetutvād dhanumadaṅgadābhyāṃ rāmalakṣmaṇayogasya mahāsenāvināśakatvaṃ gamyata ity alaṃkāreṇa vastudhvaniḥ.) Cs understands the reference to these planets quite differently. He indicates that Lakṣmaṇa is compared to the moon and Rāma to the sun, and understands that just as the splendor of those two planets (Śukra and Bṛhaspati) is outshone by the radiance of the sun, so the splendor of the two monkey vāhanas is outshone by the splendor of Rāma. (śukrabṛhaspatibhyāṃ kavikāvyayutajyotsnākāntavat sa vyarocata ity ukter lakṣmaṇapakṣe candro nidarśanam. rāmapakṣe bhāskaraḥ tataś ca kavikāvyābhyāṃ sakāntiś candra iva vāhanasāhityena sa kāntir lakṣmaṇaḥ. sūryaprakāśābhibhūtaprakāśas tayor iva rāmaprakāśābhibhavo vāhanarūcor iti nidarśanaviveko draṣṭavyaḥ.) On Bṛhaspati, cf. 6.7.9–10; 6.11.42; 6.40.28; 6.115.51; and notes.

Following verse 37, D5–7,10,11,S repeat verse 20.

38. "bold" pratibhānavān: We have departed from the reading favored by most commentators and translators, which takes pratibhāna in its more common sense of "intellect." In this way we agree with Gorresio, who renders animoso (1856, vol. 9, p. 137). Thus, Cg glosses, "his intellect [focused] on the moment (tātkālikabuddhimān)"; Cm reads similarly (tatkālocitaprajñaḥ).

"learned in the traditional texts" smṛtimān: Cr, whom we follow, understands, "distinguished in the foremost scientific texts (praśastasmṛtiviśiṣṭaḥ)." Cg understands the reference to be more specific, glossing, "recalling the meaning of the texts on omens (nimittaśāstrārthasmaraṇavān)." Cm understands the adjective to refer not to traditional texts but to Lakṣmaṇa's lived experience, glossing, "whose nature is not to forget past experiences (anubhūtārthāvismaraṇaśīlaḥ)."

D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead pūrṇārtha-. This reading yields the compound pūrṇārthapratibhānavān, literally, "possessing intelligence with respect to the completed matter." Ct explains, "possessing intelligence, that is, knowledge of the completed matter, that is undertaken by means of omens. The meaning is 'possessing knowledge of the completion of the mission that is going to be undertaken' (pūrṇasyārthasya kāryasya śakunaiḥ pratibhānavāñ jñānavān kariṣyamāṇasya kāryasya pūrṇatvajñānavān ity arthaḥ)."

"his quest certain of success" pratipūrṇārthaḥ: The term presents ambiguities for both semantic and textual reasons. Northern manuscripts, many devanāgarī manuscripts (D1–4,8–12), southern manuscripts (G,M5), and the texts and printed editions of Ct read paripūrṇārtham and simply render the compound as an adjective modifying Rāma. Gorresio (5.73.49), who reads vacanam in place of the critical edition's smṛtimān, translates, "con liete parole" (1856, vol. 9, p. 137).

Our interpretation is similar to that of Cg, who glosses, "whose desire was fulfilled (paripūrṇārthamanorathaḥ)," and Ct, who understands the term to refer specifically to the fulfillment of Rāma's mission (see above).

39. "whom he has abducted" hṛtām: Literally, "[she who was] abducted."

"your goals accomplished . . . prosperous" samṛddhārthaḥ . . . samṛddhārthām: Literally, "having goals that were accomplished . . . having an abundance of wealth." Note the poet's play on the two meanings of the compound. The commentators are silent. Translators consulted understand both occurrences of the term in the same sense, that is, "whose purpose has been accomplished." The majority of these translators also understand the second occurrence to refer to the city of Ayodhyā, as do we. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 9), however, takes the second term to refer to Vaidehī in pāda a, translating, "whose dearest wish had been fulfilled."

41. "auspicious . . . favorable and pleasant" śubho . . . mṛduhitaḥ sukhaḥ: The list of the wind's qualities presents yet another series of near synonyms of which Vālmīki is so fond. Commentators offer slightly different interpretations of the individual adjectives and, in some cases, disagree as to their number. Cg and Cm explain śubhaḥ as "foretelling future auspiciousness (bhāviśubhasūcakaḥ)." Cr reads the synonymous variant śivaḥ, "conveying auspiciousness (mañgalapradaḥ)." Cm, who also reads śivaḥ, glosses, "foretelling auspiciousness (śubhasūcakaḥ)." Ct and Ck read the compound mṛduhitaḥ as a dvandva and so see the wind as qualified by four adjectives: śiva, "auspicious"; mṛdu, "gentle"; hita, "beneficial"; and sukha, "pleasant." They explain that the adjectives mṛdu, hita, and sukha, respectively, express the coolness, gentleness, and fragrance of the wind (mṛduhitasukhapadaiḥ krameṇa māndyaśaityasaurabhāṇy uktāni—so Ct). Cm explains the sequence of modifiers similarly but takes mṛdu adverbially, i.e., "gently (mṛdu mandaṃ yathā tathā)." He thus takes hitaḥ separately to mean "beneficial in that it allays the weariness of the journey (adhvaśrāntiharaṇād dhitaś ca)." Cr reads the compound as a tatpuruṣa, understanding, "beneficial by virtue of its gentleness (mṛdutvena hitakārī)." He further explains sukhaḥ as "producing pleasure through coolness and fragrance (śaityasaugandhyābhyāṃ sukhapradaḥ)." (Note that Cg's text as represented in GPP [6.4.46] is incorrect.) Cg, whom we follow, understands the compound as a dvandva and glosses, "joined with gentleness (mṛdur mārdavayuktaḥ)" and "favorable (anukūlaḥ)." (Note that Cg's text as represented in GPP [6.4.46] is incorrect.) See note to 6.2.14.

"in the direction of the army's march" anu . . . senām: Literally, "following the army." As several commentators explain, the wind is blowing at the army's back (senāpṛṣṭhabhāgena vāti—so Ct). This is significant because it is considered an auspicious omen. See note to 5.25.10 for references on auspicious omens. See 6.41.33; 6.43.8; 6.45.35; 6.53.44; 6.65.19; and notes. Cf. 6.94.22, where the wind blowing into Rāvaṇa's face is a bad omen.

"continually" pūrṇa-: Literally, "full." We follow Ct, Cr, and Ck, who understand the term to mean "without interruption, continuously (vicchedarahitāḥ—so Ct)."

42. "the Bhārgava Uśanas" uśanā . . . bhārgavaḥ: The sage Uśanas, also known as Śukrācārya, is a scion of the Bhārgava gotra and is identified with the planet Venus. See Sutherland 1979. See 6.40.28; 6.45.12; and notes.

"behind you" anu tvāṃ . . . gataḥ: Literally, "has gone after you." Cg offers two explanations of this phrase. In the first, he understands anu in the sense of anukūla, "favorable," and renders, "is positioned in a region favorable to you (tavānukūladiśi sthitaḥ)." The second, which we have followed, Cg bases upon an astrological injunction against undertaking a journey or expedition in a direction facing the planet Venus. He quotes an astrological text to the effect that a king who sets forth on a campaign in the face of Venus, Mercury, or Mars will suffer calamity on the battlefield, even if he is Indra's equal. (yadvānugataḥ paścād bhāgaṃ gataḥ. puraḥ śukrasya yātrāsu pratiṣedhād iti bhāvaḥ. tathoktaṃ jyautiṣe pratiśukraṃ pratibudhaṃ pratibhaumaṃ gato nṛpaḥ / api śakreṇa sadṛśo hatasainyo nivartate // iti.) Ct and Ck disagree with Cg's second interpretation. They argue that it is never possible for people either traveling north or south to be facing Venus (dakṣiṇottaragantṝṇāṃ kadāpi puraḥ śukraprasakter abhāvāt). (Venus normally appears in roughly the same direction as the sun because it is closer to the sun than the earth.) It should be kept in mind, however, that Cg understands that Laṅkā is not to the south but to the southeast of Kiṣkindhā, and therefore, for him, Rāma would not be traveling due south. See notes to verse 3 above.

Cg then offers a lengthy discussion of the astrological positions of various planets and other heavenly bodies at the time of Rāma's birth and other significant moments in his career. The general thrust of his discussion is to show that, like the planets described in this and the following verses, these astrological signs are favorable to Rāma and unfavorable to his rākṣasa foes. It is of some interest here to note that in the course of this discussion he indicates that it is now the thirty-eighth year of the Rāmāvatāra (aṣṭātriṃśadvarṣe yuddhayātrakālaḥ). This point conforms to the general chronology of the epic according to which Rāma was twenty-five years old at the time of his exile. See notes to 2.17.26 and 5.14.5.

43. "The constellation Brahmarāśi is clear" brahmarāśir viśuddhaś ca: The commentators are divided in their opinion as to the significance of this term. Cv, Cg, and Cm (first alternate) take the word brahma in its sense of "vedas," reading the compound as an epithet of Uśanas in verse 42 above in the sense of "master of the entire veda (adhītasarvavedaḥ)." They then read the following adjective, "clear (viśuddha)," with Uśanas as well. Cg takes it to mean "free from conjunction with inimical planets (pāpagrahāsaṃyuktaḥ)," and Cm takes viśuddha in its sense of "pure," a quality that he sees deriving from Uśanas's vedic learning. (brahmarāśir vedānāṃ rāśibhūtaḥ. adhītasarvaveda ity arthaḥ. ata eva viśuddha uśanāś ca tvām anugataḥ.) Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the reference to be to the constellation known as the Saptarṣis, here called the Great Seers (Paramarṣis), or Ursa Major. Cr understands the word brahmarāśiḥ as a bahuvrīhi, referring to Dhruva, in the sense of "that in which there is a collection of the stars known as the Seven Seers (brahmaṇāṃ saptarṣīṇāṃ rāśiḥ samūho yatra saḥ)." Ck and Ct understand, similarly, "that which has for its tail the Seven Seers (pucchabhāgo yasmin sa tathā—so Ck)." They thus take it as a kind of kenning for Dhruva, the North Star (brahmarāśir dhruvaḥ—so Ct). In the second alternate, only Cm—whom we follow—appears to read it as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "the collection of seers (teṣāṃ rāśiḥ saṅgaḥ)." Thus, he refers not to the North Star or Saptarṣis but to a different group of stars situated in the southern sky along the path of the pitṛs, which he claims are described in a verse of the Viṣṇupurāṇa (tatrāsate mahātmāna ṛṣayo yo 'gnihotriṇaḥ / bhūtārambhakṛtaṃ brahma śaṃsanto ṛtvigudyatāḥ // prārabhante lokakāmās teṣāṃ panthāḥ sa dakṣiṇaḥ).

"illuminate" prakāśante: Literally, "they shine." We agree with Cr in reading the verb in the sense of the causative (prakāśayante).

44. "Triśañku" triśañkuḥ: The story of Triśañku and how, under the tutelage of Viśvāmitra, he was transformed into the constellation of the Southern Cross is narrated at length at 1.56–59 (see ad loc. and notes). See 2.36.10 and note. See, too, 6.23.19; 6.60.24; and notes.

"the foremost among the forefathers of our great Ikṣvāku lineage" pitāmahavaro 'smākam ikṣvākūṇāṃ mahātmanām: Literally, "the best grandfather of us, the great Ikṣvākus." Cg interprets the word -varaḥ to mean that Triśañku was the most eminent among the most prominent of the Ikṣvāku dynasts (ikṣvākūṇāṃ pradhānakūṭasthaḥ). Ś1,Ñ1,B3,D3,4,8,10–12,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read puraḥ [asmākam], for -varaḥ, yielding the sense "[is shining] before [us]." Ct and Ck take this interpretation to be in accordance with the constellation Triśañku's position in the southern sky (dakṣiṇadiksthatvāt). Ck insists that this is the authentic reading (iti pāñktaḥ).

"with his preceptor" sapurohitaḥ: The commentators are also divided as to whether the sage referred to here is the traditional preceptor of the Ikṣvāku dynasty, Vasiṣṭha, or his archenemy, the Kauśika sage Viśvāmitra, who serves as a guru to both Triśañku and Rāma. Thus, Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cg (as an alternative) see the term as a reference to Vasiṣṭha, who is situated near him in the midst of the alternate set of seven seers that was created in anger by Viśvāmitra (1.59.20–21) (bhagavadviśvāmitrasṛṣṭa-svasamīpavartisaptarṣimaṇḍalamadhyavartivasiṣṭhasahita ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cv, Cg, and Cr see Triśañku's preceptor as Viśvāmitra himself.

45. "the two Viśākhās" viśākhe: These twin stars constitute the fourteenth or sixteenth lunar mansion and form part of the constellation Libra. See 6.90.30 and note; and 6.63.3, App. I, No. 43, lines 23–24 and n. 13. According to Kirfel (1920, p. 36), the four stars constitute Libra. See, too, 2.36.11 and note. Cf. 6.46.24.

"most significant of constellations for our . . . Ikṣvāku lineage" nakṣatraṃ param asmākam ikṣvākūṇām: Cg, alone among the commentators, addresses the association of this particular constellation with the Ikṣvāku dynasty, citing a passage from the Jyotiṣadarpaṇa (aśvinyāṃ yadi ketuḥ . . . ikṣvākukūlanāthas tu hy anyato yadi bhaved viśākhāsthas tu). See, too, note to 2.36.11.

46. "those rākṣasas, sons of chaos . . . whose regent is Nirṛti" nairṛtam . . . nairṛtānām: Literally, "that which belongs to Nirṛti . . . of those who descend from Nirṛti." The poet plays here on the epithet of the constellation Mūla and an occasional epithet of the rākṣasas. The commentators are in general agreement that the former indicates that Nirṛti, the personification of destruction or chaos and regent of the southwestern quarter, is the presiding divinity of the constellation. See 5.43.7; 5.45.3; 5.50.15; and notes. See, too, 6.36.11 and note.

"Mūla" mūlam: Mūla is generally regarded as the nineteenth nakṣatra, or lunar mansion (Jacobi 1888, p. 37; Apte s.v.). It is associated with two stars in the tail of Scorpio (Macdonell and Keith 1967, s.v. nakṣatra). According to Apte (s.v. mūla), it contains eleven stars (in its tail). See note to 6.97.33, App. I, No. 67, n. 17.

"nearby" mūlavatā: Our translation follows the interpretation of Cm, Cg, and Cv, who justify it by citing the lexicon Vaijayantī, which gives antika, "proximity," as one of the meanings of the word mūla. Other commentators, however, offer differing interpretations. Ct and Ck understand, "rising on high in the form of a staff (uccair daṇḍākāratayotthitena)." Cr interprets, "governing or constraining Mūla mūlaniyāmakena)." Cs, alone among the commentators, sees the presence of the ominous comet as a direct result of Rāvaṇa's transgression. He appears to understand mūla here in its sense of "root, ground, basis," glossing, "[a comet] the very embodiment [lit., taking its origin from the form] of the sin produced by the abduction of Sītā (sītāharaṇajanyapāpārūpakāraṇavatā)." Differences among those translators who directly engage this term can be traced to the disagreements among these various commentators. Thus, Dutt (1893, p. 1115) renders, "rod-bearing," and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1382), "risen with a tail of light," both appearing to follow Ct and Ck, whereas Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 9) translates, "proximity," like us, following Cm, Cg, and Cv.

"by a . . . comet" dhūmaketunā: Cm glosses, "a planet foreboding calamity (utpātagraheṇa)."

47. "All of this" sarvaṃ caitat: As the commentators indicate, the reference is a collective one to all the omens presaging the destruction of the rākṣasas (rākṣasavināśasūcakānekanimittajātam—so Cm).

"inimical planets" graha-: Literally, "planets." We have added the word "inimical" in keeping with the interpretation of Ct and Ck, who gloss, "occluded by planets, such as Saturn, Mars, Rāhu, etc. (śanyaṅgārakarāhvādigrahapīḍitam)." The astronomical bodies referred to are thought to have a baleful influence. See note to 5.46.20.

"at the hour of their doom" kāle: Literally, "at the time." The translation reflects our agreement with Ct, Cg, Ck, and Cm, who gloss, antakāle, "at the time of death [end]." Cr alone understands, "at this time (asmin samaye)."

48. Ct remarks that Lakṣmaṇa's observations concerning the astrological phenomena starting at verse 42 up to this verse have been delivered while the army rested for a while in the Sahya mountains and refreshed itself with fruits and roots. The following observations, he feels, are made by Lakṣmaṇa when the army sets out again that same night. He justifies this with reference to verse 53 below, where it is stated that the monkey army marches both day and night. (uśanā cetyādy etad antaṃ sahye kiṃcit kālaṃ viśramya phalamūlādi bhuktvā punā rātrau gamanakāle lakṣmaṇena pradarśyate. ata eva vakṣyati sā sma yāti divārātram iti.)

"Fragrant breezes" gandhāḥ: Literally, "fragrances." Like most commentators and all translators, we add the word "breezes."

"briskly" abhyadhikam: Literally, "strongly, excessively." There seems to be no way around this somewhat unusual description of a favorable breeze. The convention is that favorable breezes blow gently, and, indeed, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read the poorly attested nādhikāḥ, "not excessive, gentle," which yields the conventional sense. Virtually all translators consulted render this variant reading.

"of the season" yathartu-: For some reason, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 11) translates, "out of season," although no printed text or commentator supports such a reading. Quoting a verse from Varāhamihira (Bṛhatsaṃhitā), Cg notes that the blossoming and fruiting of trees out of season is considered a portent of calamity; however, Cg believes that this is not the case in the present instance. (akālakusumotpattir hy utpātaḥ sa idānīṃ nāstīty arthaḥ. tathoktaṃ varāhamihireṇa śītoṣṇānāṃ viparyāsaḥ phalapuṣpam akālajam aśosyāṇāṃ viśoṣaś ca phalaṃ ṣāṇmāsikaṃ bhaved iti.) Nevertheless, the blossoming of trees out of season or in all seasons is often taken as a sign of extraordinary natural beauty or of some miraculous or auspicious events. Compare the description of the aśoka-vanikā at 5.12.2–39 and 5.13.2–14, as well as 6.108.12 (and note), where Indra gives the monkeys such a miraculous boon. Similarly, see the miraculous boon of Bharadvāja at 6.112.17 and note. See, too, 6.115.19 and Kālidāsa's description of the splendid transformation wrought by Kāma in Śiva's penance grove (KumāSaṃ 3.24–42). See, too, 6.18.32–34.

49. "Tāraka was slain" tārakāmaye: The commentators generally agree that the reference here is to the well-known purāṇic episode in which the asura Tāraka is destroyed by the armies of the gods, who are under the leadership of Śiva's son Skanda. Dikshitar (1951–1955, pp. 19–20) understands that that particular battle between the gods and asuras took place during the Kṛtayuga, citing some purāṇic references (BhāgP 9.14.4–7; BrahmāṇḍP 3.5.32; MatsyaP 129.16, 172.10). If we understand this battle to be the one referred to here, the word āmaya, which normally means "illness or affliction," must be read in a secondary sense to mean "death or destruction." Cg and Cm claim that it takes this sense because of its suggestion of misery (duḥkhatvāt—Cg) or oppression (baddhatvāt—Cm). These two commentators, however, also offer an alternative reading of the phrase, which retains the primary sense of āmaya. According to this interpretation, the reference here is not to the battle with the asura Tāraka at all but to a battle fought for the sake of Bṛhaspati's wife, Tārakā. This latter battle takes its name from the mental affliction suffered by this woman. (yadvā tārakā nāma bṛhaspatipatnī. tannimttatvāt saṃgrāmasya tārakāmaya iti saṃjñā.) In support of this interpretation they cite a verse from the Viṣṇupurāṇa (4.6.16): "And thus did an extremely fierce battle take place between those two on account of Tārakā. And so it came to be known as [the battle of] Tārakā's affliction (tathāha śrīviṣṇupurāṇa evaṃ ca tayor atīvograḥ saṃgrāmas tārakānimittas tārakāmayo nāmābhavat)."

50. "Considering these things" samīkṣyaitān: Literally, "having considered these." Neither this phrase nor the vulgate variant samīkṣyaitat has a clear antecedent. Nevertheless, the context leads us to agree with the commentators in taking the reference to be to the various omens mentioned by Lakṣmaṇa (etat phalakaṃ nimittaṃ samīkṣya—so Cr). This is further supported by a northern insertion [74*]: "Observing those omens, Rāma was delighted."

"noble brother" ārya: Literally, "O noble one."

51. "apes and monkeys" ṛkṣavānara-: See note to 6.4.17.

52. "fore and hind feet" kārāgraiś caraṇāgraiś ca: Literally, "with the tips of their hands and the tips of their feet." We have used these terms particularly when the context refers to the locomotion of the monkeys as opposed to their handling of objects or use of their limbs in combat. See note to 5.1.10.

"earthly world" bhaumam . . . lokam: Ś1,Ñ1,B1,3,4,D1–5,7–12,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read bhīmam, "frightful, fearsome," for bhaumam, "earthly," which then must modify rajaḥ, "dust," in pāda d.

Following 52, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of twenty-two lines [75*]: "The fearsome host of tawny monkeys advanced, covering the southern lands with their vast expanses of mountains and forests,[1] just as a vast canopy of clouds[2] might cover the sky.[1–2] And as the army crossed over in a continuous column for many leagues in length,[3] all the currents of the rivers seemed to flow upstream.[4] [3–4] Plunging through lakes with their cool waters, skirting mountains covered with trees, swarming across the level tracts of land, and moving under forests laden with fruit,[5] the great host advanced, covering the land.[5–8] All the tawny monkeys, swift as Māruta,[6] marched forward, their hearts delighted[7] and their valor high for Rāghava's sake.[9–10] Showing off to one another the excess of their excitement, valor, and strength,[8] along the way they performed all manner of prideful feats out of the abundance of their youthful exuberance.[9] [11–12] Some of the forest-ranging monkeys ran, while others leapt, and still others chattered.[10] [13–14] They lashed their tails against the ground,[11] and they stamped their feet. Some flung out their arms and broke off rocks and trees.[15–16] Scaling the peaks of the mountains, the mountain-ranging monkeys loosed great roars while others roared like lions.[12] [17–18] With the force of their thighs they crushed many thickets of creepers. Expanding themselves, those valorous monkeys played with boulders and trees.[19–20] And so the earth was covered with troops[13] of very fearsome monkeys in their hundreds, hundreds of thousands, and tens of billions.[21–22]"

[1]"southern lands with their vast expanses of mountains and forests" saparvata-vanākāśāṃ dakṣiṇām: Literally, "the southern [direction], together with mountains, forests, and space." Some translators take ākāśa in its sense of "sky."

[2]"vast canopy of clouds" ambudasaṃtatiḥ: Literally, "a line of clouds."

[3]"in a continuous column for many leagues" satataṃ bahuyojanam: Literally, "continuously for many yojanas." Some translators understand this phrase to refer to the distance to which the waters back up.

[4]"seemed to flow upstream" sasyandur viparītavat: Literally, "they flowed as if in reverse or backward." According to Ct and Cr, the force of the army crossing the rivers causes them to flow backward (vānarādibhir atyantam āhatatvāt pravāhābhimukhaṃ celur ity arthaḥ).

[5]We follow Cg in taking the monkeys' different movements respectively with the different kinds of terrain they traverse. According to Ct (and quoted by Cr), lines 6 and 7 of this insert mark the second night's encampment (ayaṃ dvitīyo vāsa iti pratīyate). See note to verse 53 below.

[6]"swift as Māruta" mārutaraṃhasaḥ: Literally, "with the speed of Māruta."

[7]"their hearts delighted" hṛṣṭamanasaḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead hṛṣṭavadanāḥ, "their faces delighted."

[8]"the excess of their excitement, valor, and strength" harṣavīryabalodrekān: D5,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead harṣaṃ vīryaṃ balodrekān, yielding the sense "[demonstrating their] excitement and valor and [feats] of excessive strength."

[9]"they performed all manner of prideful feats out of the abundance of their youthful exuberance" yauvanotsekajān darpān vividhāṃś cakruḥ: Printed editions of Ct read for the accusative plural the ablative singular, -jād darpād, yielding the sense "out of the pride born from the exuberance of youth." This variant is unnoted in the critical edition.

[10]"chattered" kilakilāṃ cakruḥ: We understand with Cg and Cr that the term here refers to the unique sound that monkeys make. See 5.55.22 and note.

[11]"lashed their tails against the ground" prāsphoṭayaṃś ca pucchāni: Literally, "they clapped [their] tails." Like all translators consulted, we understand pucchāni, "tails," to construe with the verb prāsphoṭayan, "they clapped," even though this verb is normally intransitive and refers to the action of clapping one's arms as one enters into battle. Cf. 5.55.30 and note.

[12]"while others roared like lions" kṣvelām anye pracakrire: See note to 5.55.29.

[13]"with troops" yūthaiḥ: D10,11,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead śrīmat. Construing this word in the syntax of the sentence is most difficult. The commentators offer various solutions. Ct, Ck, and Cs understand the term to be an instrumental plural that has lost its case ending. Thus, in their opinion, the term stands for śrīmadbhiḥ, "by those majestic [ones, i.e., hosts]" (śrīmal luptatṛtīyāntaṃ śrīmadbhir ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cs understands that the term refers to the most majestic among the monkeys (śrīmadbhiḥ . . . vānarāṇāṃ madhye). Cg understands the term adverbially in the sense of "majestically [covered]" (śrīmad yathā bhavati tathā parivṛtāsīd iti saṃbandhaḥ).

53. "Day and night" divārātram: Ct and Cs note that this means the army rested for one brief period of three hours only (yāma) (in the middle of the night [madhyarātre]—so Ct). According to Ct, this marks the third night's encampment (ayaṃ tṛtīyo vāsaḥ). See note to 52 above 75*, line 6.

"army" senā: Cg, Crā, and Cm, perhaps disturbed by the redundancy of this term with vāhinī in pāda b, read senā etymologically as an adjective in the sense of "accompanied by its leader (senā inena svāminā sahitā)."

54. "not even for a moment" muhūrtam . . . nāsata: Literally, "they did not sit for a muhūrta." Ct and Cs, who understood the phrase "day and night" in the previous verse to allow for a brief rest during the night, take note, in different ways, of the seeming contradiction. Ct, commenting on his variant reading, nāvasan, "they did not camp," remarks that the expression "by day (divasā)" should be supplied, thus remaining consistent to his notion that the monkeys do take a short rest at night. Cs, in his comment on verse 53, notes this suggestion of Ct but takes exception to it, remarking that the natural sentiment of the verse requires us to understand that the monkeys marched the whole night and that this interpretation is further supported by the fact that the syntax of the verse can be easily construed without the ellipsis seen by Ct. (ahorātraṃ yāmamātravāsa ity āśayaḥ. uttaratra diveti śeṣa iti ca nāgojībhaṭṭo 'khaṇḍāhorātram ity arthaḥ svarasaḥ. muhūrtaṃ kvāpi nāvasann ity uttaragranthasvārasyāt. śeṣaṃ vinā 'nvayasambhavāc ca.) Evidently, Cs believes that the monkeys did rest briefly on the previous night, but now, in their eagerness for action, they march without rest.

55. "Sahya and then the Malaya mountains" sahyaparvatam . . . malayaṃ ca mahīdharam: Literally, "the Sahya Mountain and the upholder of the earth Malaya." These two ranges of the southern portion of the Western Ghats lie, as Cg notes, along the line of the monkeys' march. According to Dey (1927, pp. 123, 171), Sahya is that portion of the mountain range that lies to the north of the Kāverī River, while the Malaya range lies to the south of the river. See note to verse 34 above.

Ñ2,V1,3,B,D6,9,11,12,T2,3,G2,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sahyaparvatam āsādya . . . vānarās te samāruhan, "having reached the Sahya Mountain, those monkeys climbed [it]." Ct notes the variant of Cm (shared by Cg, Crā), which is the reading accepted by the critical edition.

"abounding in all sorts of wild creatures" nānāmṛgasamāyutam: Ñ2,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nānāvanasamāyutam, "covered with all types of forests."

56. "passed through" atiyayau: (Printed incorrectly, we believe, in the critical text as ati yayau.) We read the form as governing the objective genitives malayasya and sahyasya, as we feel this best captures the force of the upasarga ati. Ś1,Ñ, V1,B3,D2,7,10–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read api for ati, yielding the sense "even as he gazed, Rāma marched."

57. "many trees": The phrase has been added.

"aśokas" aśokān: B4,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prasekān, "flowering (sinduvārakas)."

Following this verse, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of thirty lines [78*]: "And those leaping monkeys broke down other trees:[1] añkolas,[2] karañjas, plakṣas, banyans, tindukas,[3] jambukas, āmalakas, and nāgas.[4] [1–2] On the lovely tablelands, the various kinds of forest trees shaken by the force of the wind strewed the earth[5] with their blossoms.[3–4] In those honey-scented woodlands, loud with the buzzing of bees, a wind cooled by sandalwood blew pleasantly to the touch.[5–6] That king of mountains was richly adorned with minerals.[7] And the dust that streamed from those minerals, whipped up by the force of the wind, completely covered that vast host of monkeys.[8–9] On the lovely slopes of the mountain, beautiful blossoming ketakīs, sinduvāras, and charming vāsantīs were everywhere.[10–11] And there were also fragrant spring creepers (mādhavīs) and flowering clusters of jasmine[12] as well as ciribilvas, madhūkas, bakulas, vañjulas, sphūrjakas,[6] tilakas, and flowering nāga trees, mangos, pāṭalis,[7] and flowering kovidāras.[13–15] And there were also muculindas, arjunas, śiṃśapas, kuṭajas, dhavas, śālmalis, red kurabakas,[8] hintālas, timiśas, cūrṇakas, nīpakas, blue aśokas, varaṇas,[9] añkolas, and padmakas.[16–19] All of them were thrown into disarray by the leaping monkeys as they leapt about.[10] [20] And on that mountain there were charming lakes and cool[11] ponds, which were thronged with cakravākas and frequented by kāraṇḍavas. They were crowded with plavas and krauñcas, and frequented by boar and deer.[21–23] They were frequented on every side by bears,[12] hyenas, lions, and fearsome tigers, as well as many terrifying serpents.[24–25] And those pools were lovely with different kinds of flowers that grew in their water: red lotuses, full-blown, white water lilies, night-blooming lotuses, and blue lotuses.[26–27] And on its slopes, flocks of different birds were warbling.[28] The monkeys bathed there, drank the water, and played in it.[29] Having scaled the mountain, the monkeys threw one another into the water.[30]"

[1]"broke down other trees" bhañjanti sma: Literally, "they broke." D11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhajanti sma, "they partook of or enjoyed."

[2]"añkolas" añkolān: D10,11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead aśokān, "aśokas." See Brockington 1984, p. 106.

[3]"tindukas" tindukān: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead -pādapān, "[banyan] trees." See Brockington 1984, p. 105.

[4]"nāgas" nāgān: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead nīpān, "nīpas."

[5]"earth" gām: Literally, "the cow [i.e., the earth]." D6,10,11,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead tān, "them," i.e., the monkeys.

[6]"sphūrjakas" sphūrjakāḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rañjakāḥ, "rañjakas." According to Brockington (1984, p. 107), this plant is relegated to the "fourth stage" in the northern recension.

[7]"pāṭalis" pāṭalayaḥ: D7,10,11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead pāṭalikāḥ, "pāṭalikas."

[8]"dhavas, śālmalis, red kurabakas" dhavāḥ śālmalayaś caiva raktāḥ kurabakāḥ: D10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this line. GPP reads the line in brackets as 6.4.80ef.

[9]"varaṇas" varaṇāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saralāḥ, "saralas." See Brockington 1984, p. 106.

[10]"as they leapt about" plavamānaiḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prīyamāṇaiḥ, "delighted."

[11]"cool" śītāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ramyāḥ, "lovely or charming."

[12]"bears" ṛkṣaiḥ: Given the context in which carnivorous beasts are being listed, it is unlikely that we are to take the term ṛkṣa in its common Vālmīkian sense of "ape or monkey." See note to verse 17 above.

58. "Intoxicated with their strength" balotkaṭāḥ: Ś1,Ñ1,D1,7,10–12,T1,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead madotkaṭāḥ, "elated with intoxication." Thus, all translations consulted, with the exception of Gorresio, indicate that the monkeys are inebriated. The idea, no doubt, is the same as that elaborately depicted at 5.59.11–22 and 60, where the monkeys gorge themselves on the intoxicating honey-wine of Sugrīva's madhuvana.

"ate" bubhujuḥ: Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T2,3,G2,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead babhañjuḥ, "they broke," which several translators render as "they plucked" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 12; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 12—arrachaient) or "crumbled" (Dutt 1893, p. 1117). Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 139) translates, "schiantavano."

According to Ct, this verse marks the fourth night's encampment (ayaṃ caturtho vāsaḥ).

59. "drinking from" pibantaḥ: Literally, "[they] drinking."

"honeycombs" madhūni: Literally, "honeys." We follow Cg and Cm, who gloss, "masses of honey or a beehive (madhupaṭalāni)." See note to 5.60.8. See verse 61 and note below.

"as big as bushels " droṇamātra-: We take droṇa in the sense of "a tub or bucket," as at note to 5.60.8. Cg defines the measure here as equal to two "śivas," a term we are unable to trace in the sense of a measure.

60. "devastating" vidhamantaḥ: We believe that the use of the root √dhmā, "to blow," suggests that the monkey armies have stripped the hills of their vegetation in the manner of a strong wind. Cg, taking the root in its sense of "fanning a fire," thinks that the monkeys actually burned the hilltops (vidhamantaḥ dahantaḥ).

61. "exhilarated with the honey-wine" madhudarpitāḥ: Literally, "exalted by honey." Given the intoxicated or exalted state of the monkeys, we take madhu here in its sense of "fermented honey or honey-wine." This seems confirmed by the monkeys' boisterous behavior here, which is strongly reminiscent of the much more elaborate passage at 5.59–60, where the wild behavior of the inebriated monkeys is described in great detail. See 5.8.21–22; 5.59.8; 5.60.6; 5.61.5; 5.62.4; and notes. See note to verse 59 above.

62. "the earth looked as if it were covered with fields of ripened winter rice" yathā kalamakedāraiḥ pakvair iva vasuṃdharā: Literally, "like the bearer of treasure with ripened paddies of winter rice as it were." The commentators seem confused and indecisive as to the precise sense of the simile. This is largely owing to the poet's use of two words of comparison, yathā and iva. Commentators struggle to avoid the seeming redundancy. One option proposed by Ct and Ck, whom we more or less follow, is to take iva in the sense of tathā and understand a similarity in which the earth, covered with tawny monkeys, appears to be covered with rice paddies of [golden] grain. (pakvaiḥ pakvaphalaiḥ kalamakedārair vrīhikṣetrair yathā bhāti. ivaśabdas tathārthe. tathā taiḥ pūrṇā vasudhā babhūva.) Cr understands the earth to be as full of tawny monkeys as it is with rice standing in the fields (pakvaiḥ kalamakedāraiḥ kṣetrāropitaśālibhir yathāvat saṃpūrṇā vasuṃdhareva haripuṅgavaiḥ saṃpūrṇā vasudhā babhūva). Cg offers a variety of explanations, some of which he attributes to other commentators. His first explanation involves reading iva as merely ornamental (vākyālaṃkāra), thus stripping it of any semantic value that might duplicate that of yathā. This would appear to yield a meaning similar to that given by Cr. Cg goes on to note that some commentators (probably Cv, see below) construe the verse to mean: "The earth was as full of tawny monkeys as it was with fields of ripened rice." To others, he attributes the construction: "Filled with tawny monkeys, who resembled ripened rice, the earth was like a field of ripened rice." In this interpretation, Cg continues, the use of both words iva and yathā is intentional on the part of the poet who wishes to make clear the duality of the object of comparison (upamāna), i.e., that the earth resembles a field, while the monkeys resemble the rice within the field. He gives another example of what he sees as such a usage in a verse involving a samastavasturūpaka. (anye tu. tatra tadānīm. pakvaiḥ kalamakedāraiḥ pakvaśālikṣetraiḥ saṃpūrṇā vasuṃdhareva yathā bhavet tathā tair haripuṅgavaiḥ saṃpūrṇā vasudhā babhūveti yojayanti. apare tu kalamakedārair yathā kalamakedārasadṛśair haripuṅgavaiḥ saṃpūrṇā vasudhā vasuṃdhareva kalamakedārabhūr iva babhūvety āhuḥ. upamānadvitvaṃ vyañjayitum upamāvācikadvayaṃ prayuñjate kavayaḥ. yathā "uddhṛtya meghais tata eva toyam arthaṃ munīndrair iva saṃpraṇītāḥ / ālokayamāsa hariḥ patantīr nadīḥ smṛtīr vedam ivāmburāśim" iti //.) Cm similarly offers three interpretations. His first is the same as Cg's first. The second explanation is the same as Cg's last interpretation. Cm's third interpretation, reading iva in the sense of tathā, understands: "The earth was as full of tawny monkeys as it was of ripened rice." This rendering is similar to the first interpretation of Cg and that of Cr. Cv understands: "That just as the earth might be filled with fields of rice, in the same way it was filled with them [the monkeys] (kalamakedāraiḥ śālikṣetrair yuktā vasuṃdhareva bhaved yathā tathā taiḥ saṃpūrṇā vā vasudhā vā)." Compare 6.5.11 and note.

63. "Then" atha: Cg understands the adverb to indicate that the army has crossed the Sahya and Malaya ranges (atha sahyamalayātikramaṇānantaram).

"his eyes resembling blue lotuses" rājīvalocanaḥ: Cg takes this stock epithet to indicate here that Rāma is eager [presumably manifested by his wide eyes] to climb the mountain peak in order to glimpse the sea (rājīvalocana iti samudradarśanāya mahendraśikhārarohaṇakutūhalitvam uktam).

Ct and Cm note that, although it is not explicitly stated here, we are to understand that the army encamps itself for three nights at the seashore. They tell us that we are to infer this interpretation from other passages, notably the text of one Āgniveśya, a disciple of Madhva. (tatrānuktam api vāsatrayam anyasmād bodhyam. āgniveśyokteḥ.) See notes to 6.40.64 and 6.97.33.

65. "at last": The phrase is added to provide a transition.

"in good order" ānupūrvyeṇa: Ct, Ck, and Cm explain, "in the order of the army's formations (ānupūrvyeṇa senāsaṃniveśakrameṇa)." Cr says merely, "in appropriate order (ucitakrameṇa)."

66. "descending" avaruhya: As Ct, Cr, and Cm note, Rāma is descending from Mount Mahendra, which he climbed in verse 64 above (mahendrād ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cg, however, appears to have a somewhat different conception of Rāma's movements, indicating that the gerund is used because of the elevation of the seaside grove. He appears to envisage Rāma as climbing down from the grove to the shore, although the syntax of the verse hardly supports this interpretation (velāvanasyonnatatvād avaruhyety uktam).

"Rāma, foremost of those who inspire delight" rāmo ramayatāṃ śreṣṭhaḥ: Cg notes this etymological epithet of Rāma, explaining that it is used here to show how Rāma delights Lakṣmaṇa and the others by showing them the tumult of the ocean (samudrasaṃbhramapradarśanena lakṣmaṇādirañjakatvaṃ vyañjitam). Cf. 6.5.3; 6.8.12; 6.14.13; and notes. See Slatin 2006.

67. "surging waves" toyaugaiḥ sahasotthitaiḥ: Literally, "by violently rising floods of water."

*68. "Here and now our earlier concern arises once again." ihedānīṃ vicintā sā yā na [sic] pūrvaṃ samutthitā: Literally, "here and now [is] that concern of ours which arose previously." As Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm point out, the concern to which Rāma alludes is the problem of how to cross the ocean, which he and the monkeys have discussed at length at 6.1.13–16 and 6.2.5–11,19–21 above. The critical edition's reading na (for naḥ) must surely be an erratum although it is not indicated in the errata. The critical apparatus fails to show the almost universal southern reading naḥ, which suggests that this is the reading the editor intends. Moreover, the meaning that the critical text yields, "this concern, which has not arisen previously," stands in glaring contradiction to the passages mentioned above.

69. "Beyond this point lies only the boundless ocean" ataḥ param atīro 'yaṃ sāgaraḥ: The phrase is ambiguous and can be read in two ways: either as ataḥ param atīraḥ or ataḥ parama-tīraḥ. The sequence in the manuscripts would appear the same.

We follow Ct, Cg, Cm, and Ck in breaking up the phrase as indicated and translating as we do. Commentators explain the adjective atīraḥ, "shoreless, boundless," as "having an unreachable farther shore (alabhyaparatīraḥ—so Ct)"; "whose farther shore cannot be seen (adṛśyaparapāraḥ—so Ck)"; and "having no shore, i.e., consisting entirely of water (avidyamānatīraḥ. jalapraya iti yāvat—so Cg)." Cr reads the phrase as ataḥ parama-tīraḥ, which he explains in two ways: 1) "having a delightful shore (paramaṃ ramaṇīyaṃ tīraṃ yasya saḥ)" and 2) "possessing a shore rendered extraordinary by the grandeur of the eminent rākṣasa (utkṛṣṭarākṣasasaṃpattiviśiṣṭatīravān)."

"ocean . . . it" sāgaraḥ . . . arṇavaḥ: Literally, "ocean . . . ocean."

"Without some extraordinary measure" na . . . anupāyena: Literally, "not with a non-stratagem." We follow the commentators, who generally understand the term anupāyena to mean "without a stratagem (upāyaṃ vinā—so Cg)." Clearly the magnitude of the task calls for a stronger reading of the term.

71. "Thus" itīva: Cg believes that the collocation of the two particles iti, marking the end of quote, and iva, "as it were," suggests that the consultation about the means for crossing the ocean is not the central reason for Rāma's instructing the army to make camp. Rather, he argues, the real reason is Rāma's torment over the abduction of Sītā (itīvety anena senāniveśaniyoge sāgarataraṇopāyavicāro 'hṛdayo hetur vastutas tu sītāharaṇakleśa eva hetur iti vyajyate).

Following verse 71, Ñ,V3,B,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [86*]: "Let all the troops camp upon the shore, bull among tawny monkeys."

72. "his unit" svāṃ svāṃ senām: Literally, "his own, his own army." Cm and Cv envisage the monkey army as divided into troops by species. Thus, they see Rāma as ordering the vānaras to remain with the vānaras and the ṛkṣas with the ṛkṣas. Cv adds golāṅgūlas to the list. See note on verse 17 above. (svāṃ svāṃ senāṃ vānaro vānarasenām ṛkṣa ṛkṣasenāṃ samutsṛjya kaścid api kuto 'pi mā vrajet—so Cm.)

"let . . . go on patrol" gacchantu: Literally, "let them go." We follow Ct, Cr, and Cg, who see the instruction for the monkeys to go as connected with the warning about hidden dangers expressed in the last line of the verse. Thus, they argue, the pickets are to be dispatched on all sides of the encampment to watch for danger. (senāraksārthaṃ gacchantu. senāyāś caturdikṣu gatvā tatra sthitvā tāṃ rakṣāntv ity arthaḥ—so Ct.) Cm and Ck take the verb in a general sense and understand that the monkeys are simply being told to go and make camp (balaniveśanārtham—so Cm).

"hidden dangers" channaṃ bhayam: Literally, "hidden danger." Ct, Cr, and Ck understand the dangers to be invisible because of the magical powers of the rākṣasas (channaṃ rakṣomāyākṛtatvād gūḍhaṃ bhayam astīti jñeyam). Cg and Cm see the reference as a warning against the possibility of attack from a hidden enemy (tatra tatra līnaiḥ śatrubhiḥ prāyaśaḥ praharaṇasaṃbhavād iti bhāvaḥ—so Cm).

73. "on the densely wooded seashore" tīre sāgarasya drumāyute: Literally, "on the tree-covered shore of the sea."

74. "Spread out along the seashore" samīpasthaṃ sāgarasya: Literally, "near the sea."

"seemed almost" virarāja . . . iva: Literally, "it shone like." Our translation follows Cg and Cm, who take the figure here to be utprekṣā, "fanciful ascription."

"its waters tawny as honey" madhupāṇḍujalaḥ: Literally, "its waters pale as honey." Either because of the force of the word madhu, "honey" (Ct, Ck), or because of lexical citation (Cv, Cm), several commentators note that the word pāṇḍu, "pale," should be understood in the sense of "yellow" (piṅgalavarṇavācī—so Ct). Cg agrees but provides no reason. Cm and Crā note a variant reading, otherwise unattested in the critical apparatus, namely, madhupānotkaṭaṃ śrīmān, "the majestic [army] drunk with honey-wine resembled a second ocean" (so—Crā).

75. Following verse 75, D5–7,10,11,S (in full),Ñ2,V1,3,B1–4,D9 (in part) insert a passage of four lines [89*] further describing the mode of encampment: "The sound of the army as it pitched camp drowned out the roar of the ocean. Under the direction of Sugrīva, the great army of monkeys encamped themselves in three groups[1] intent on Rāma's quest."

[1]"encamped themselves in three groups" tridhā niviṣṭā: Most commentators offer two alternative explanations: 1) The monkeys divide themselves into their three subspecies: ṛkṣas, golāṅgūlas [or gopucchas], and vānaras (compare note to verse 72 above); 2) The monkeys divide themselves into three separate circular encampments (valaya).

76. "the great ocean . . . it" mahārṇavam . . . mahārṇavam: Literally, "the great ocean . . . great ocean."

77. "vast" dūrapāram: Literally, "having a distant [farther] shore." Here we follow Cg, who glosses, "vast (viśālam)."

"abode of Varuṇa" varuṇāvāsam: See note to verse 78 below.

"featureless" asaṃbādham: Literally, "without obstruction." We follow the interpretation of Ct and Ck, who understand the reference to be to the ocean: "devoid in the middle of a place to rest, such as a mountain, etc. (madhye giryādyāśrāyarahitam—so Ct)." Cg, Cm, and Cr, on the other hand, understand, "imperturbable (akṣobhyam—so Cg)." Although such a characterization of the ocean is common in Sanskrit literature, we feel that the present context, with its emphasis on the turbulence of the waters, makes it a less probable interpretation. Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 12) appears to follow Cg's interpretation, translating, "inviolable."

"lair of hosts of rākṣasas" rakṣogaṇaniṣevitam: Literally, "frequented by hosts of rākṣasas." The reading is slightly puzzling. Although some rākṣasas, such as Siṃhikā (see Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 8, 43, 45, 70; and 5.1.166–78; 5.56.36–43; and notes; also see 4.40.26), dwell in the ocean, and despite Cg's assertion that it is well known that they dwell there, the rākṣasas of the Rāmāyaṇa are not generally thought of as creatures of the deep. In the Uttarakāṇḍa, however, the rākṣasas, defeated by Viṣṇu, fall into the ocean (7.7.48–50). Later the rākṣasas are said to abandon Laṅkā and retreat to the underworld known as Pātāla (7.8.21). A variety of northern manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,8,9,12, and the printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore read yādo-, "aquatic creatures," perhaps a facilior for the critical rakṣo-, "rākṣasas." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 14) and Dutt (1893, p. 1118) attempt to get around the problem by seeing rakṣogaṇaniṣevita as a reference to Laṅkā and forcibly subordinating it to dūrapāram, translating, "whose distant shore was inhabited by titans (Shastri)" and "having its distant shore inhabited by the demons (Dutt)."

"gave way to despair" niṣeduḥ: This can also be read as "they sat" or "they settled down," and all translators consulted have understood it in this way. We feel, however, that, in light of the shock that the exuberant monkey hosts have experienced in seeing the terrifying ocean, such an interpretation is far too weak.

78–80. "For it was dreadful with its fierce sharks and crocodiles." caṇḍanakragraham: The bahuvrīhi compound is somewhat ambiguous. We understand the sequence -nakragraha- to be a dvandvasamāsa meaning "sharks and crocodiles." Cg and Cm, the only commentators to read with the critical text, on the other hand, take graha in its etymological sense of "seizing" and understand the underlying compound as a kind of tatpuruṣa, so that the whole compound yields the sense of "snaring [creatures] through the agency of its great sharks (caṇḍanakraiḥ karaṇair graho grahaṇaṃ yasya sa tathoktas tam)." Ct, Cr, and Ck read the less ambiguous -grāha-, "crocodile, large fish." Ct reads the compound as an appositional karmadhāraya in the sense of "very dreadful because of its great marine creatures in the form of fierce sharks (caṇḍanakrarūpair grāhair mahāghoram)." See note on caṇḍānilagrāhaiḥ below.

"the night came on" kṣapādau: Literally, "at the beginning of night." We follow all available commentaries with the exception of Cs. Cs idiosyncratically understands ādi, "first, beginning," in the sense of "lord," thus rendering the compound "lord of the night" as a kenning for the moon. He takes the locative as a sati saptamī in the sense of "the moon being present [i.e., having risen]." This, however, seems redundant in the light of the phrase candrodaye in pāda c.

"Varuṇa's lair" varuṇālayam: Cg and Cm, noting the seeming redundancy of the synonymous kennings for ocean in verses 77 ("abode of Varuṇa") and 78, argue that the first is "more etymological (yoga)," in other words, that it refers specifically to the waters being the abode of the god Varuṇa, whereas the second is merely a conventional usage (rūḍhi) in the sense of "ocean." Ct and Ck attempt, it seems, to avoid the perceived redundancy by understanding varuṇālayam as a kenning for Pātāla, the lowest of the seven subterranean worlds. They then read the half verse as an upamā, deriving its force from the tradition that Pātāla is inhabited by great serpents (bhujagair ākīrṇaṃ varuṇālayaṃ pātālam iva—so Ct).

"covered with reflections of its orb" praticandrasamākulam: Literally, "crowded with counter-moons." Cr reads samākulam, "crowded," simply as saṃyuktam, "joined," and thus understands that the ocean reflects but one image of the moon. Ct, Cg, and Ck, whom we follow, all understand that the agitation of the waves causes multiple reflections (ūrmisthapraticandraiḥ samākulaṃ vyāptam—so Ct).

"It was swarming with huge crocodiles . . . and with whales and whale sharks" -mahāgrāhaiḥ kīrṇaṃ timitimiṃgilaiḥ: See notes to 5.7.6 and 5.35.47 for a discussion of nakras, makaras, timis, and timiṅgilas; for grāha, see notes to 6.3.14; 6.14.21; 6.15.6,7; and 6.62.20. Most commentators cite a verse from an unidentified source, which states that timi is the name of a fish one hundred yojanas in length and that timiṅgila is the name of a fish capable of swallowing a timi. There is, the verse continues, an even more monstrous creature, the timiṅgilagila, which can swallow a timiṅgila." (timayaḥ śatayojanāyatā mahāmatsyāḥ. tān api bhakṣayituṃ kṣamās timiṅgilāḥ . . . tad uktaṃ purāṇe "asti matsyas timir nāma śatayojanam āyataḥ / timiṅgilagilo 'py asti tad gilo 'py asti sāgare" iti—Cg.)

"as powerful as fierce gales" caṇḍānilamahāgrāhaiḥ: Cg, Cm, Cv, and Ct, whom we follow, understand the compound as a samastopamā in the sense of "great sea creatures equal in strength to fierce winds (caṇḍānilatulyavegair jalacarair mahāgrāhaiḥ—so Ct)." Ck and Cr differ slightly in taking the compound as subordinate to timitimiṅgilaiḥ in the sense of "violently seizing hold [of creatures] like a fierce wind for the purpose of harming them (caṇḍānilavan mahāgrāhair hiṃsārtham atyantaṃ grāhakaiḥ—so Cr)." They thus take grāha in its etymological sense of "grasping, seizing." See note on caṇḍanakragraham above.

"with . . . their coils flashing" dīptabhogaiḥ: It appears likely that the poet is referring to the moonlight reflected off the glistening scales of the serpents. Ct, Cr, and Ck understand, "with . . . their shining bodies (ujjvaladehair—so Ct)." Cm understands, "with . . . their bodies shining with extraordinary brilliance (tejotiśayenojjvaladehaiḥ)." However, they do not specify the source of the light. Cg alone falls back on the convention that serpents hold luminous jewels in their heads, remarking that "the serpents' hoods are illuminated, as it were, by the brilliance of the jewels in their heads (śiroratnakāntyā prakāśitaphaṇair iva sthitaiḥ)." See note 82 below.

"unapproachable, and impossible to cross" durgaṃ durgamamārgam: We, along with Cg and Cr, understand the ocean to be "unapproachable" because of the fearsome marine creatures mentioned earlier in the passage. Cg explains "impossible to cross" as "unnavigable (naupathasaṃcārāyogyam)." Ct and Ck gloss, "it was impossible to find a means of reaching the farther shore (duṣprāpaparapārāprāptyupāyam)." Dutt (1893, p. 1119) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1387) oddly understand durga in its sense of "fortress," translating, respectively, "it had picturesque fortresses on its marge" and "which had excellent fastnesses (like Laṅkā) on its shore."

Following verse 78ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [90*]: "With its masses of foam and its waves, the sea appeared to be laughing[1] and dancing."

[1]"appeared to be laughing" hasantam iva: The simile depends on the Sanskrit poetic convention associating whiteness with laughter. See Ingalls 1965, p. 166, vs. 389; p. 226, vs. 684, etc.

Following verse 78, D7,G3,M3, and VSP (in brackets between verses 6.4.114 and 115) include a passage of two lines [91*]: "With the tips of its waves, the ocean seemed to be grinding a sandalpaste of foam, which the moon, taking up with its rays, seemed to be smearing on the women who were the directions." No translation consulted renders this verse.

81. Cg remarks that the description of the ocean, which continues here, is the product of poetic fancy (utprekṣā).

"crocodiles" makaraiḥ: See note to 5.7.6 and notes to 78–80 above.

"waves" jalarāśayaḥ: Literally, "masses of water."

82. "great sea serpents glittering" bhāsvarāmbumahoragam: The commentators are divided as to whether to analyze the bahuvrīhi compound as a dvandva, "with its shining water and great serpents (bhāsvarāmbu-mahoragam)" or as a tatpuruṣa, as we have done. Cg and Cm choose the former option, Cg remarking that it is well known that the droplets of water resemble sparks at night (rātrau sāgarasya salilaśīkarā agnicūrṇā iva dṛśyanta iti prasiddhiḥ). Cm explicitly attributes the luminescence of the ocean spray to the rays of the moon. (bhāsvarāmbu candrakiraṇasamparkāt. bhāsvarāṇi śīkararūpāmbūni yasya tat.) Ck, Ct, and Cr, who see the luminescence as a property of the water snakes (jalasarpāḥ—Ct, Ck), attribute it to the glowing gemstones in their hoods (jalarāśaya ūrmirūpā bhāsvarāḥ phaṇāmaṇibhir bhāsamānā ambumahoragā jalasarpā yasmiṃs tam—so Ct). See note to verses 78–80 above.

"enemies of the gods" surāri-: These are, of course, the asuras and rākṣasas, as Cg and Cm point out.

"unapproachable" -viṣamam: Literally, "uneven, rough." V1,3,D1,5,7,9–11,T1,2,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead -viṣayam, yielding "extending as far as Pātāla (pātālaparyantasthāpinam—Cr)" or "ranging to Pātāla (pātālagocaram—Ct, Ck)."

"resembled a scattered shower of sparks" agnicūrṇam ivāviddham: Literally, "like scattered fire particles." We believe that the reference is to sparks of a fire scattering into the air. However, given Cg's comment above (see note 81) that the whole description partakes of utprekṣā, one might well, like Raghunathan ("powdered fire"; 1982, vol. 3, p. 13), take the compound literally.

Cg, Cm, and Cv regard this verse as the beginning of the elaborate comparison of the sky and the ocean that extends to verse 86 below. Cg, Cv, and Cm seek at this point to demonstrate that each of the attributes of the ocean has its corresponding attribute in the atmosphere. Thus, they argue, the shining droplets of ocean spray described in this verse have their celestial parallel in the stars. (ambaraṃ ca kīrṇair nakṣatrais tathā dṛśyante. bhāsvarāmbu vimalatuhinaṃ ca—so Cg.) The shining water is paralleled by the bright moonlight (tuhina). The great serpents are common to both realms, Cg continues, as the nāgas, or great serpents, are said to roam the heavens just like the gandharvas and other celestial beings or because of the presence in the skies of serpents, such as Rāhu. (ākāśe gandharvādīnām iva nāgānām api saṃcārasaṃbhavāt. rāhvādirūporagasaṃbhavād vā.) Both the heavens and the oceans are inhabited by the enemies of the gods (surārayo 'surā rākṣasāś ca teṣāṃ viṣayam āvāsabhūtam idam apy ubhayatra tulyam—so Cg, Cm, Cv). Cg, Cv, and Cm state that both are as deep as Pātāla, and Cg and Cv say that both are dreadful (pātālaviṣamaṃ pātālavad gambhīram idam apy ubhayatra tulyaṃ ghoraṃ bhayaṅkaram idam apy ubhayatra tulyam—so Cg). Cg and Cm conclude this analysis by stating that the enumeration of these shared properties sets the stage, as it were, for the following rhetorical exposition of the impossibility of differentiating between the ocean and the sky (evam uktaviśeṣaṇaviśiṣṭaṃ sāgaraṃ sāgaro 'mbaraprakhyam ambarābham uktaviśeṣaṇaviśiṣṭam ambaraṃ ca sāgaropamam adṛśyatety ākṛsya yojanā—so Cg). Cf. note to 6.96.16, 3064*, n. 1.

83. Ct and Ck see the basis for this comparison in the shared features of expansiveness and unfathomableness (ambaraprakhyaṃ vaipulyātalatvaiḥ—so Ct), and (Ck) blueness (nailya-). Cr, evidently anticipating the next verse, understands it to be the similarity between the ocean's many gems and the stars in the sky (sāgaram ambaraprakhyaṃ tārāgaṇasadṛśamaṇyādimatvenākāśasadṛśam). Cg remarks that the point of this verse is not merely similarity between the sky and the ocean but their absolute similarity in every possible respect (na kevalaṃ sāmyaṃ sarvathā sāmyaṃ cety āha). Ct notes that the rhetorical figure is upameyopamā alaṃkāra. This figure, also called anyonyopamā, is a simile in which the comparison between the upameya and the upamāna is reciprocal. Cf. note to 6.96.16, 3064*, n. 1.

85. "waves passing in succession" vīcimālā: Literally, "garland or series of waves." We have added the participle to enhance the parallelism.

86. "ceaselessly" saktāḥ: Literally, "clinging, attached [to one another]." We agree with Ct, Cr, and Cm, who understand "without intervals (nirantarāḥ)" and thus read the adjective adverbially as "ceaselessly." Cg appears to prefer the more usual meaning of the participle, remarking, "[they] first approach [cling to] one another and then strike (prathamaṃ saktā athāhatā ity anvayaḥ)."

"of the ocean, lord of rivers" sindhurājasya: Literally, "lord of rivers."

"in battle" āhave: D10,11, and printed editions of Ct read instead ambare, "in the sky."

87–88. "the great monkeys" mahātmānaḥ: Literally, "the great ones."

"the . . . sea," jalāśayam: Literally, "the abode of waters."

"the wind-whipped sea, the abode of waters, as if one with the raging gale. Whipped by the wind" viṣaktam iva vāyunā . . . vātāhatajalāśayam . . . aniloddhūtam: Literally, "as if attached by the wind . . . the abode of waters struck by the wind . . . tossed up by the wind." The poet's repetitive allusion to the force of the wind in this passage has attracted the attention of Cg, who attriibutes the redundancy to the requirements of this particular description (etan nirūpaṇārtham evāniloddhatam iti punaruktiḥ). The second of these expressions, viṣaktam iva vāyunā, "as if one with the raging gale," is slightly obscure in its meaning. Ct, Cr, and Ck gloss viṣaktam, normally, "attached, clinging to," as saṃbaddham, "connected with," by which they appear to understand something like "driven by the wind." We prefer the interpretation of Cg, Cm, and Cv. Cm understands, "mingled with, that is to say, at one with (miśrībhūtam iva ekībhūtam iti yāvat)" (Cg, Cv "at one with [ekībhūtam iva]"). This interpretation seems to us to better reflect the poet's vision of the wildly agitated mix of wind and water and to be in keeping with the tenor of the previous verses where sea and sky are merged.

"With the roaring of its waters and of its masses of precious stones" ratnaughajalasaṃnādam: Literally, "possessing a roar of masses of gems and waters." We follow Cg and Cm, who understand that since the waters are whipped up by the wind, they are making a sound as a result of their masses of gems and torrents of water. They go on to say that, by this, we are to understand that because of the excessive agitation produced by the violent winds, the gems that lie within the ocean are being hurled up. (aniloddhūtam ata eva ratnaughajalasaṃnādaṃ ratnaughajalaughayoḥ saṃnādo yasmiṃs tam. anena vegavad vāyujanitakṣobhātiśayāt tadantargataratnānām udgamanam avagamyate—so Cm.)

"in fury" kruddham: Literally, "angry." Cm sees the apparent rage of the ocean to derive from the fierce sea creatures swarming in its waves (kruddhaṃ yādogaṇasamākulam ity anena krūrayādogaṇasamākulatvāt kruddham iva sthitam).

"seemed to have gone mad" pralolam iva: We prefer the interpretation of Cg and Cm, who gloss, "as if wildly agitated or mad (udbhrāntam iva)," to that of Ct and Ck, who gloss, "shaken or moving on (pracalad iva—Ct; pracalam iva—Ck)."

Following 88cd, Ñ2,V3,B,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [98*]: "Then the tawny monkeys, filled with amazement, gazed upon [the ocean]."

Sarga 5

2. "stood picket duty to protect the army on all sides" viceratuś ca tāṃ senāṃ rakṣārthaṃ sarvato diśam: Literally, "the two walked about the army in every direction for the sake of protection."

3. "the ocean, lord of rivers and streams" nadanadīpateḥ: Literally, "the lord of nadas and nadīs." It is difficult to distinguish absolutely between these differently gendered synonyms for river (nadaḥ—masculine; nadī—feminine). Apte (s.v. nadaḥ) gives as one meaning "great river" (such as the Indus), so the issue may be one of size. On the other hand, there is a tradition that the feminine is used for rivers flowing to the east (except the Narmadā) and the masculine for those flowing to the west. See Mallinātha on ŚiśuVa 4.66 (prāksrotaso nadyaḥ pratyaksrotaso nadāḥ narmadā vinety āhuḥ). See also note to 1.31.8. Probably the compound is employed here for its metrical and alliterative effect. Compare 5.1.33; 5.2.14–15; 5.24.2,11; 5.31.9; 5.34.8; 5.35.63; and notes. See, too, 6.2.4; 6.4.41; 6.7.5; 6.8.10; 6.9.20; 6.41.28; 6.47.16; 6.54.25; 6.110.1; and notes; and note to 6.13.15, 223*, n. 2.

4. "But . . . mine" mama ca: Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm see Rāma as making a distinction between the grief engendered by the loss of ordinary objects, grief that passes with time, and his sorrow for his beloved, which to the contrary only increases. (gacchatā kāleneṣṭāntaraviyogajaḥ śoko 'pi gacchatīti prasiddhiḥ. mama priyāvirahaje śoke tu viparītam ity āha—so Ct.)

5. Cg feels that Rāma's relative lack of concern for Sītā's abduction and her absence are to be explained by the fact that he sees them as remediable, the first by Sugrīva's expedition and the second through his own killing of Rāvaṇa. He grieves for Sītā's passing youth, however, precisely because it can never be recovered. (duḥkham iti priyā dūre sthiteti me na duḥkhaṃ sugrīveṇa prasthānena tasya nivartyatvāt. prabalarakṣasā hṛteti me duḥkhaṃ nāsti tasya tacchiraḥ kṛntanāpanodyatvāt. etad evānuśocāmīdam ekam eva śokanimittaṃ vayo 'syā hy ativartate gataṃ yauvanaṃ na pratyāhartuṃ śakyam iti bhāvaḥ.) Ct and Ck feel that Rāma is able to distance himself emotionally from Sītā's absence as he would during her menstrual period and her abduction, through the rationalization that it must be the result of some overpoweringly evil karma. (priyā dūre sthiteti duḥkhaṃ me nāsti strīdharmadivasavat. tathā hṛtety api na duḥkhaṃ prabaladuṣkarmavaśaṃ prāptatvāt—so Ct.)

"youth" vayaḥ: Cm alone unambiguously understands this term to refer to Sītā's period of youthful sexual attractiveness. He glosses the term as "the means of my [Rāma's] enjoyment (madbhogasādhanam)." Cg understands similarly but qualifies his understanding in light of the theological context of the story. He argues that, although Rāma is indeed lamenting the fruitless passing of Sītā's period of sexual attractiveness, we are not to understand the verb ativartate, "it passes or goes by," literally, since Sītā [as a divinity] is forever young; rather, he feels Rāma is merely regretting the fact that time [that he could have spent with her] is passing fruitlessly. He does, however, note that Rāma may well be speaking here in conformity with his human nature. (atra yauvanam ativartata iti nārtho nityayauvanatvāt tasyāḥ kiṃ vayo 'tivartate vyarthatayaiva yātīti bhāvaḥ. mānuṣabhāvānusāreṇa cedaṃ vacanam.) On this point, see Pollock 1984b. Ct, Cr, and Ck prefer to see no hint of sexuality in this passage and instead interpret the reference to be to the period of two months remaining for Sītā to live before the end of the grim deadline set by Rāvaṇa (see 5.20.8–9 and notes). Ct and Ck, however, propose an alternative: the possibility that Rāma may be speaking here like a common man and therefore referring to Sītā's youth. (api tv asyā vayaḥ prāṇāvasthitikālo 'tivartate. māsadvayamātraṃ jīvanam ity ukteḥ. tatrāpi bahudivasātyayāt. yadvā vayo yauvanam iti prākṛtavad vādaḥ.) Cf. Rāvaṇa's words at 5.18.12, where the reference to the passing of Sītā's youth is unambiguous. Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1120) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1389) follow the interpretation of Ct, Ck, and Cr.

6. "For the touching of our limbs now depends on you, as on the moon depends the meeting of our glances." tvayi me gātrasaṃsparśaś candre dṛṣṭisamāgamaḥ: Literally, "the touching of my limbs [is] on you, on the moon, the meeting of glances." Following the commentators, especially Cg and Cm, our translation fleshes out the elliptical original. The verse plays on the conventional capacities of the breeze and moonlight to soothe, literally cool, the anguish of separated lovers. As Cg and Cm explain here, Rāma implicitly refutes the conventional wisdom in stating that neither the touch of the wind nor the moonlight has the capacity to allay his torment unless the former has actually first touched her body and the latter been gazed upon by her eyes. (dṛṣṭisamāgamaś candre yathā candrādhīnas tathā me tadgātrasaṃsparśo 'pi tvayi tvadadhīnaḥ. yathā tadavalokitaṃ candraṃ paśyaṃs tat praṇālikayā tāṃ dṛṣṭavān asmi tadvat tadaṅgasparṣṭaṃ tvāṃ spṛśaṃs tām eva spṛṣṭavān bhaveyam ity arthaḥ—so Cg.) In this way, Rāma hopes to use the wind and the moon as intermediaries through whose intercession he can experience the pleasure of Sītā's touch and glance. Ct regards the figure implicit in the second half of the verse to be an example of the poetic figure nidarśanā, a type of negative illustration. See Gerow 1971 s.v. nidarśanā (II.2), p. 202. Cf. KāvyaPra 10.97 (the example given is from RaghuVa 1.2). Cr remarks that it is out of the excess of his grief that Rāma addresses the breeze (atyantaśokāveśād vātaṃ pratyāha). Compare the elaborate description of Rāma's madness where he addresses all manner of animate and inanimate beings. See Pollock 1991, pp. 8, 55–67 and 3.60.18–61.4. These passages may be the earliest example of, and indeed the inspiration for, the familiar literary trope of the lovelorn appeal to an inanimate object to serve as a messenger to the beloved, a trope made famous by Kālidāsa in his Meghadūta.

7. "lodged in my heart" āśaye: Literally, "in the receptacle." We follow the commentators, who generally gloss some term meaning "heart (hṛdaye)," "mind (citte or buddhau)," or "seat of emotions (antaḥkaraṇe)." In addition to the interpretations of the other commentators, Cm alone offers an alternative, "in the stomach (udare)," reading the term as the locus (adhikaraṇa) of the poison rather than of Sītā's imagined cry. Following the commentators' suggestion, we have added the word "lodged (sthitaḥ)."

"must have cried out . . . 'Alas, my protector!' " hā nātheti . . . yad abravīt: Literally, "that she said, 'Alas, protector!' " Ct and Ck note that Rāma is merely inferring what Sītā must have said, since obviously he was not present at her abduction. In fact, the word nātha, "protector," which Rāma finds so poignant here, is never attributed to Sītā at the moment of her abduction. At the four instances in the text where reference is made to the words Sītā says during her abduction (3.50.3–5,8,12,40cd; 4.6.8; 4.57.16; 4.58.22), Sītā only cries out the names of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (at 3.5.50, kākutstha). The poignancy of the term nātha here derives from its connotation of guardian or protector, a role in which Rāma feels himself, in this case, to have been singularly deficient. Cg highlights this issue by quoting Sītā's words to Rāvaṇa in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.20.20; see, too, 3.35.64 and 3.37.29) to the effect that she could have defended herself through the power of her chastity but did not do so, because it would have been more fitting for Rāma, as her husband, to protect and rescue her from the rākṣasa. He concludes that we are to understand that Rāma's grief consists precisely in his compassionate feeling for Sītā's pain (etena rāmaśokaḥ sītāviṣayakāruṇyam ity avagamyate).

8. "towering" -vipula-: Literally, "large, expansive." B1,D10,11,T1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck substitute -vimala-, "bright."

"my constant brooding on her" taccintā-: Literally, "thinking or brooding about her." The compound is somewhat ambiguous. It can be understood as we have done or as her [Sītā's] brooding. Several translators choose this second, and to our mind much less plausible, alternative (Dutt 1893, p. 1120, "her thoughts for its flame"; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 15, "sa pensée pour flammes"). As suggested by Cg, we have added the word "constant" to flesh out the meaning (saṃtatatvena cintāyāḥ).

9. "without you" bhavatā vinā: Ct, Ck, and Cr understand Rāma to be instructing Lakṣmaṇa to stay while he goes off to the ocean (saumitre tvam atraiva tiṣṭheti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Cr expands on this, claiming that the words suggest that Lakṣmaṇa is to remain awake to keep others away from Rāma, who has no desire to see anyone other than Sītā. (bhavatā vinety uktyā jāgrad eva tvaṃ tiṣṭheti sūcitam. tena tvadbhinno mannikaṭe nāgacchatv iti hetuḥ sūcitas tena sītātiriktaviṣaye tadānīṃ didṛkṣābhāvaḥ sūcitaḥ.) Cg understands that Rāma wishes to exclude Lakṣmaṇa because he reminds him of Sītā. Cg goes on to argue that, in telling Lakṣmaṇa that he will take his repose in the ocean, Rāma is alluding to the fact that Lakṣmaṇa is an incarnation of the cosmic serpent

Śeṣa, upon whom Viṣṇu reposes during the intervals between creations. For, he argues, it is only Viṣṇu who takes his rest upon the ocean. (saumitre kāntāsmarakeṇa bhavatā vinārṇavam avagāhya svapsye. anena lakṣmaṇasya śeṣāvatāratvam uktam. arṇava-śayanaṃ hi śeṣiṇaiva.) Cs, typically original, understands Rāma to be telling Lakṣmaṇa to stay back because he would suffer from the cold [of the water] (tava śītabādhā bhavet).

"For it would be hard for the flame of desire to burn me were I to sleep in its waters." kathaṃcit prajvalan kāmaḥ samāsuptaṃ jale dahet: Literally, "blazing desire would only with difficulty burn [me] asleep in water." The idea, as expressed by Cg, Cv, and Cm, is that Rāma wishes to enter the waters in the hope that they will at least dampen the fires of love that afflict him. (kṛcchrād dahet. mandībhaved ity arthaḥ—so Cg.) B1,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (pace critical apparatus) read evaṃ ca, "in this way," for kathaṃcit, "with difficulty." The reading samāsuptam is marked as doubtful. Cg, Cv, Cm, and Crā break up the critical reading as sa mā suptam. This reading and that of the critical edition result in no great difference of meaning. Ś1,Ñ, V1,B1,2,D6,10–12,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead na māṃ suptam. With these two variants, the line in Ct's text yields the sense "and in this way blazing desire would not burn me asleep in the water."

10. "long for her so much" bahv etatkāmayānasya: Literally, "of [me] longing so much for her." We agree with Ct, Ck, and Cr in understanding bahu as an adverb governing the participle kāmayānasya. Cg, Cm, and Cv read bahu as an adjective modifying the pronoun yat, for which they gloss jīvanasādhanam. The sense is thus "a major means of survival."

"that lady . . . and I still share the same earth" yad ahaṃ sā ca . . . ekāṃ dharaṇim āśritau: Literally, "that I and she rest on one earth." Cg notes that, by the maxim of "sleeping on a single bed," we are to understand the intention here to be that the sharing of a single resting place, in this case, the earth, is the means by which the two lovers can survive (ekaśayyāśrayaṇanyāyena kāminor ekadharaṇyāśrayaṇam api jīvanasādhanaṃ bhavatīty abhiprāyaḥ).

11. "And like a parched rice paddy, drawing water from a flooded one, I live on through knowing that she lives." kedārasyeva kedāraḥ sodakasya nirūdakaḥ / upasnehena jīvāmi jīvantīṃ yac chṛṇomi tām: The verse is based on a slightly elliptical and somewhat awkward agricultural metaphor. A literal translation would be: "Hearing that she is living, I live as does a field without water through the moisture of a field with water." The idea apparently is that Rāma, cut off from the source of his existence, Sītā, manages to survive on the trickle of hope engendered by the news [brought by Hanumān] that she lives, just as a dry paddy field might remain fruitful through the trickling runoff of a neighboring, flooded one. A critical term here is upasnehena, which we read, with Cg, Cm, and Cv, in the sense of "secondary moistening (upa-kledena)." The term also strongly suggests the emotional realm since sneha can mean either "moistening or love," thus suggesting that, like the field, Rāma lives on through some derivative connection with the source of his longing. Ct and Cr simply gloss, "contact (saṃbandhaḥ—Ct; saṃsargaḥ—Cr)." Compare 6.4.42 and notes.

12. "as if upon splendid Śrī herself" sphītām iva śriyam: Literally, "like the bounteous Śrī." Ct glosses sphīta, literally, "abundant, prosperous, fat," as "the prosperous [goddess of] royal splendor (saṃṛddhāṃ rājyalakṣmīm iva)." Cr understands similarly.

13. "when shall I . . . kiss . . . might drink" kadā nu . . . pāsyāmi: Literally, "When will I drink?" Ñ,V3,D6,10,11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read for the emphatic particle nu, "indeed," su-, "very," which is in compound with their variant cārudantoṣṭham. See below.

"full and lovely lips" cārubimboṣṭham: Literally, "lips like lovely bimba fruit." Ś1,Ñ,V3,B,D2,8–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck, read instead -cārudantoṣṭham, "with its lovely teeth and lips." This, combined with the variant su-, "very," mentioned above, yields the compound sucārudantoṣṭham, "with its exquisite teeth and lips."

"powerful tonic" rasāyanam: A tantric and medicinal term for the universal tonic generally consisting of, or compounded with, mercury. See White 1996. Ct glosses, "[compounds] such as mercury, etc. (pāradādi)." Cr is more specific, explaining, "appropriate medicinal compound of mercury (yuktasiddhapāradam)." Cg and Cm, on the other hand, understand, "herbal medication effective for healing the body (śarīrasiddhikaram auṣadhaviśeṣam)."

14. "pressed against me" māṃ bhajiṣyataḥ: Literally, "those two will have recourse to or resort to."

"as she laughs" hasantyāḥ: D6,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Crā read instead śliṣyantyāḥ, "as she embraces [me]."

15. "I am the protector of that dark-eyed woman." asitāpāṅgī . . . mannāthā: Literally, "[that woman] of the dark eye-corners has a protector in me." Reference to corners of a woman's eyes is usually made to stress their length, considered a sign of beauty. Therefore, a possible translation of this compound could be "with her long, dark eyes."

"in the clutches of the rākṣasas" rakṣomadhyagatā satī: Literally, "[she] being situated in the midst of rākṣasas."

Following verse 15, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [101*]: "How can my beloved, the daughter of King Janaka and daughter-in-law of Daśaratha, find any repose in the midst of the rākṣasa women."

16. "When will she outwit the rākṣasas, evade them" kadā vikṣobhya rakṣāṃsi sā vidhūya: Literally, "she, having shaken off the rākṣasas [and] having spurned or evaded." The syntax of the two gerunds seems slightly strange, especially since the ranges of meaning of the two verbal roots overlap and the second gerund is repeated in pāda c. An additional problem here is that the text lends itself to ambiguity as the same syllables can be and are broken up differently by the critical editors and some of the commentators. Thus, Cg and Cm break the sequence kadāvikṣobhyarakṣāṃsi into two words kadā avikṣobhyarakṣāṃsi and understand avikṣobhya- as an adjective modifying rakṣāṃsi in the sense of "unshakeable or unassailable rākṣasas." They would thus read the first half of the verse as follows: "When, having evaded those unassailable rākṣasas, will she escape?" As most manuscripts run all the words together, it is not clear on what basis the critical editors have decided to divide them. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead avikṣobhyāṇi rakṣāṃsi sā vidhūya, which has the same meaning as that of Cg and Cm. Ct comments on this reading, noting, "defeating the unassailable rākṣasas by means of me (maddvārā teṣāṃ vidhūnanaṃ kṛtvā)." Many northern manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ1,V1,3,B,D1–4,8,9,12) avoid the sequence of gerunds by substituting sā vadhūḥ, "she, that daughter-in-law," for sā vidhūya.

"crescent of the hare-marked . . . moon" śaśīlekhā: Literally, "line or digit of the one with the hare."

17. "naturally slender . . . truly emaciated" svabhāvatanukā . . . bhūyas tanutarā: Literally, "naturally slender, even more slender."

"reversal of her fortunes" deśakālaviparyayāt: Literally, "through the inversion of place and time." We understand with Cg, Cm, Cv, and Crā that the reference is to Sītā's loss of her former joyful circumstances and to her current wretched state (sukhāvahayor deśakālayor apagamāt tadviruddhayor upagamāc cety arthaḥ—so Cg). Ct and Ck understand Sītā's wretchedness as having been brought about as a result of her evil past karma (prācīnaduṣkarmavaśaprāptaduḥkhasādhanadeśakālasaṃbandhāt—so Ct).

18. "I may bring Sītā back . . . anguish" sītāṃ pratyāharisyāmi śokam: Literally, "I will bring back Sītā . . . sorrow." B4,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read śokam, "grief," for sītām, resulting in the repetition of the word śokam, "sorrow." This awkward reading yields a translation something like "when shall I dispel [Sītā's] sorrow [and thus dispel] the sorrow [of my heart]." This is the reading followed by those translators who follow the text of Ct, except for Dutt (1893, p. 1121), who fails to render the phrase.

19. "immortal gods" amara-: Literally, "immortal ones."

"clasp her arms . . . about my neck, shedding tears of joy" kaṇṭham ālambya mokṣyaty ānandajaṃ jalam: Literally, "having hung on the neck, will she release water born of joy."

20. "as one might a soiled garment" vāsaḥ śukletaraṃ yathā: Literally, "like a garment that is other than white." We follow the commentators, who gloss, "dirty (malinam)."

21. "its radiance fading" mandavapuḥ: Literally, "its form diminished." Cr, alone among the commentators, notes, "its brilliance occluded (tirohitatejāḥ)."

22. Cg, evidently disturbed that Rāma should have spoken so freely in front of another, especially his brother, argues that there is no real impropriety here because of the latter's performing every kind of service for Rāma (bhrātur api lakṣmaṇasya purato raghunāthasyaivaṃvidhavacanaprayogas tasya sarvavidhasevakatvād ato nānaucityam).

"evening sandhyā rite" sandhyām: See note to 5.12.48.

Sarga 6

1. "meanwhile" tu: Literally, "but." The commentators generally note that the poet, who had been describing Rāma's adventures [up until his arrival at the seashore], now reverts to Rāvaṇa's activities from the moment of Hanumān's departure [from Laṅkā] (evaṃ rāmavṛttāntam uktvā hanumannirgamakālānantarakālikaṃ rāvaṇavṛttāntaṃ vaktum upakramate—so Cg).

"havoc . . . had wrought" kṛtaṃ karma: Literally, "act or feat performed or accomplished."

"great Hanumān, the equal of Śakra" hanumatā śakreṇeva mahātmanā: The phrase lends itself to two interpretations. It can be read as a simile, yielding the sense "[wrought by] Hanumān, as if by great Śakra" or, as we have done following Cg, in the sense of "who was equal to Śakra (śakreṇeva śakratulyena—Cg)." Cs, appearing to expand on this understanding, argues that the epithet mahātmanā is applied to Hanumān to suggest that his feat, although potentially accomplishable by Indra, is beyond the power of Rāvaṇa's son, whom he calls Jitendra [= Indrajit]. He sees the epithet as being applied in the manner of the vedic verse "indro vṛtraṃ hatvā mahān āsa (Having slain Vṛtra, Indra became great)" (mahātmanā śakreṇevety anena hanumatkṛtakarmaṇaḥ "indro vṛtraṃ hatvā mahān āsa" ity uktarītyā mahendrakṛtisādhyatve 'pi rāvaṇasutajitendraprayatnāviṣayatvaṃ sūcayati).

2. "this mere monkey" tena vānaramātreṇa: We are inclined to agree more or less with Cg, who takes the word -mātreṇa in its usual sense of "merely or only." However, we do not agree with Cg's further explanation that the expression amounts to saying "one of the smaller monkeys (vānareṣv alpena)," since Hanumān wrought the destruction of Laṅkā and its champions in a colossal body, a form he abandons momentarily after his interview with Rāvaṇa only to escape from his bonds, resuming it immediately (5.51.36–37) to set fire to the citadel. Ct, Cm, and Cr understand the word to suggest that the monkey is alone and unarmed or (Cr) unassisted. Ck seems to offer both explanations, glossing, "alone unarmed, a mere animal (ekena nirāyudhena mṛgamātreṇa)."

3. "domed palace" prāsādaḥ . . . caityaḥ: On the identification and destruction of Rāvaṇa's domed and pillared palace, see 5.13.15–17; 5.41.1; and notes. The commentators differ in their identification of this structure and also differ from their identification of it in their commentaries on the Sundarakāṇḍa. Here Cr calls the building "a palace inhabited by some form of divinity (devaviśeṣāviṣṭaḥ prāsādaḥ)," i.e., a shrine or a temple. At 5.13.16 (=GPP 5.15.16), he had understood the building to be, "a kind of rounded or domed structure (vartulākāraprāsādaviśeṣam)." Cg here calls the structure "the principal palace or edifice in the city (nagarapradhānabhūtaḥ prāsādaḥ)," whereas at 5.13.16 (=GPP 5.15.16) he had called it "a palace or building in the form of a Buddhist temple or stūpa because of its height and length. (caityaprāsādaṃ caityaṃ buddhamandiraṃ tadākāraṃ prāsādaṃ. prāṃśubhāvatvād dīrghasvabhāvatvāt.)" Furthermore, at 5.56.99 (=GPP 5.58.118) he understands it to be a palace in the middle of the city rather than the principal palace of the city. Ct, who at 5.13.16 had defined the building as "a palace resembling a Buddhist stūpa because of its roundness (vartulākāratvād buddhāyatanam iva prāsādam)," is silent. Ck understands, "round like a shrine (caityavartī)." See 6.30.24 and note; cf. 6.7.13; 6.115.2; and notes.

"reduced . . . to chaos" āvilā . . . kṛtā: Literally, "made turbid or soiled." Ct, Cr, and Ck gloss āvilā as "shaken, agitated, or disturbed (kṣubhitā)." Cg understands it to mean "devastated through burning (dāhenākulā)."

4. "pray . . . Or" bhadraṃ vaḥ . . . vā: Literally, "bless you . . . or." The formulaic phrase bhadraṃ vaḥ or te, literally, "auspiciousness or blessing to you [plural or singular, respectively]," is a commonly used epic phrase indicating politeness. See 6.102.9; 6.103.5; 6.107.29; and 6.109.9. It can serve as a blessing, a marker of polite imperative, or, as in this case, simply a marker indicating respect or attention. For a discussion of this formula and its various meanings, see Tubb 2006. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead vaḥ . . . vaḥ, "you . . . for you," yielding the meaning "[bless] you . . . [what would be an appropriate next step] for you?" Dutt (1893, p. 1122), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1391), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 16), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 17) all follow this reading.

5. "Those who are venerable and wise say" prāhur āryā manasvinaḥ: Literally, "the noble [and] wise say." V1,D7,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read pravadanti, "they say," for prāhur āryāḥ, "the venerable ones say." Ck, in rare agreement with the reading of Cg's text (as opposed to Ct's), understands the term a bit unusually as "learned in nīti or polity (nītividaḥ)." He glosses manasvinaḥ as "heroes (śūrāḥ)." The texts of Ct and Crā have only the second term, which Ct glosses as "heroes (śūrāḥ)."

"cornerstone" -mūlam: Literally, "root, basis, or foundation."

"mighty warriors" mahābalāḥ: Literally, "ones of great strength."

6. "the highest, the lowest, and those in between" uttamādhamamadhyamāḥ: Ct, Cg, Cm, and Ck understand that the highest type of man possesses only virtues (guṇas), the lowest only defects (doṣas), and the man in between both (guṇadoṣau—so Ct). Compare MBh 5.33.56. See Sternbach 1965–1967, vol. 2, p. 429, no. 137.

"each of them" teṣāṃ . . . samavetānām: Literally, "of them grouped together." Ct, Cg, and Cm understand this as "intermingled with one another (saṃkīrṇarūpāṇām)," and they, along with Cr, explain that, without a clear knowledge of their individual characteristics, it is impossible to distinguish their respective strengths and weaknesses (lakṣaṇajñānaṃ vinā vivektum aśakyānāṃ guṇadoṣau—so Ct). This interpretation is interpolated into the translation of Dutt (1893, p. 1122), who translates, "This distinction cannot be perceived without a knowledge of the signs."

7–8. "with those counselors intent upon his welfare" mantribhir hitasaṃyuktaiḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead mantras tribhir hi saṃyuktaḥ, "counsel connected with those three."

"or . . . who wish him well" vā hitaiḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vādhikaiḥ, "or with superior [kinsmen]."

"such that his efforts are in harmony with the will of the gods" daive . . . yatnam: Literally, "effort with respect to fate or the divine." Ct understands, "with the assistance of fate or with divine assistance (daivasahāye)," while Ck glosses, "with the assistance of the gods (devasahāyena)." Cr glosses, "with respect to the purpose of the gods (devakārye)," and Cg understands, "relying on fate or the gods (daivasamāśrayeṇa)." The context makes it difficult to decide whether to understand daiva in its sense of "fate, destiny," or "that which pertains to the gods." Although the latter seems more appropriate to this particular context, the discussion does call to mind the recurrent epic concern with the dichotomy of daiva, "fate," and puruṣakāra, "individual effort." The peculiarity of having Rāvaṇa, the archenemy of the gods, discourse in this fashion can perhaps be explained by the gnomic quality of the passage. See 6.98.23; 6.103.5; and notes.

9. "The man who stands in between" madhyamaṃ naram: Literally, "the middle man."

"directs his thoughts to righteous action" dharme prakurute manaḥ: Literally, "places [his] mind in righteousness." Cg here understands manaḥ, "mind," to mean "thoughtful action (manaḥpūrvaṃ yatnam)." Cg further understands the reference to righteousness to be to the reliance upon divine will (daiva), alluded to in the preceding verse. In keeping with the notion he expressed earlier that the intermediate type of man combines both virtues and defects, Ct notes here that his merit (guṇa) consists of deliberation and his demerit (doṣa) consists of disregard for [the advice of] others. (vicāro 'sya guṇaḥ. itaranirapekṣatā doṣaḥ.)

10. "undertakes an action . . . and then fails to carry it through" kāryam upekṣet: Literally, "he would neglect the action." Here we follow the interpretation of Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm, who understand that the inferior person's defect lies in his failure to complete the actions he begins. In order to do this, they understand that the person, having first undertaken an action, saying, "I will do it," fails to complete it, that is, follow through (kariṣyāmīty upakramya yaḥ kāryam upekṣed upekṣeta na samāpnuyāt—so Cg). A simpler reading of the verse, and the one proposed by Cr and found in many translations, would be to take the word kāryam, "action," as somehow implicitly part of the quote "I will do," that is, "I will undertake an action." He suggests adding the phrase "having said." According to this reading, the person fails even to undertake the action he has said he would do (kāryaṃ kariṣyāmīty utkveti śeṣaḥ. upekṣet tyajet). The problem here is that such an interpretation accords poorly with the subordinate clauses in the verse, which seem to presuppose the undertaking of some kind of action. B,D9, and the printed edition of Gorresio (5.77.10) avoid this problem by substituting the reading kurute, "he carries out," for upekṣet, "he would neglect," and substituting vyaktam, "certainly," for tyaktvā, "having abandoned [without regard to]." Thus Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 147) understands that the defect referred to consists in a man's carrying out an action without regard for its merits or demerits, relying entirely on fate (daiva), and translates, "Colui che senza considerare i pregi e i difette d'un' impresa e tutto commettendosi al destino e dicendo: 'Or pur farò!' pon mano all 'opra."

"without relying on the will of the gods" daivavyapāśrayam: See note to verses 7–8 above. M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read dharma- for daiva- lending the phrase the sense "without relying on dharma or righteousness."

11. "of three types . . . of the same three types": The verse parallels verse 6 above, and we have added the phrases to reflect this.

12. "consistently" niratāḥ: Literally, "devoted, dedicated." We agree with Ct and Ck, who understand, "fixed or firm [in their counsel] (pratiṣṭhitāḥ)."

"are . . . of one mind" ekamatyam upāgamya: Literally, "having reached unanimity." Despite the gerund's suggestion of a process, we believe the next verse makes it clear that the best counselors are always unanimous in their advice.

"through insight informed by the śāstras" śāstradṛṣṭena cakṣuṣā: Literally, "with a vision found in or through the śāstras." Cg reads the compound as paranipāta, and glosses, "through properly studied śāstra (svabhyastaśāstreṇa)." As Ct and Ck note, the śāstras in question are undoubtedly the texts on polity (nītiśāstra).

13. "The counsel that is known as that which is in between, they say, is when counselors, having adopted many different opinions, subsequently reach unanimity as to how to decide a matter." bahvyo 'pi matayo gatvā mantriṇo hy arthanirṇaye / punar yatraikatāṃ prāptaḥ sa mantro madhyamaḥ smṛtaḥ //: Although the meaning of this verse in its several variations is not in doubt, the text as it appears in the critical edition is impossible to construe grammatically. The textual evidence for the verse is complicated and confusing, although the critical reading does find support among a number of southern manuscripts. The major grammatical problem is that no clear syntactic relation can be established between the nominative plural matayaḥ, "opinions," and the nominative plural mantriṇaḥ, "counselors." The texts of the southern commentators present several variant readings that are, if not perfectly lucid, at least somewhat easier to construe. B,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Gorresio 5.77.13 read the accusative plural bahvīr api matīḥ for the critical text's bahvyo 'pi matayaḥ with the gerund gatvā, "having gone" (Gorresio—dattvā, "having given"), and, in addition, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the genitive plural mantriṇām, "of counselors," for the nominative plural mantriṇaḥ, and read the nominative singular arthanirṇayaḥ, "resolution of a matter," in place of the critical edition's locative singular. These variants would lend the verse the following sense: "When the resolution of a matter on the part of the counselors, after first having been divided among many opinions, subsequently comes to the point of unanimity, that counsel is known as the one in between."

M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg substitute the gerund bhūtvā, "having become," for gatvā, "having gone"; the genitive plural mantriṇām, "of counselors," for the nominative singular of the critical edition; and the nominative plural prāptāḥ, "[they] have reached," for the nominative singular prāptaḥ. This sequence yields the sense: "When, with regard to the resolution of a matter, the counselors have many opinions but subsequently reach unanimity, their counsel is known as in between." This variant is more or less rendered in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 16).

Cm, the only commentator to acknowledge the reading that appears in the critical text, notes it as a variant and analyzes it by suggesting that one effectively has to read the nominative plurals (bahvyaḥ and matayaḥ) in pāda a as accusatives. Ct remarks that these quarreling counselors are brought to agreement only through such devices as fear of the king, etc. (rājabhītyādyupādhitaḥ).

14. "when counselors go on debating" saṃpratibhāṣyate: Literally, "it is spoken in turn." The verb saṃpratibhāṣyate, like other words and phrases in this elliptical verse, is somewhat ambiguous. We understand the passive in its general sense of the root "to speak in turn." The idea, which we believe is supported by the sense of the northern variant (bruvate sadā, "they speak incessantly"), is that the counselors debate endlessly without reaching any collective decision. Ck, Ct, Cm, and Cr place greater emphasis on the upasarga prati, "against." Thus, Ct understands, "it is spoken in rivalry (pratispardhayā bhāṣyate)." Cm glosses, "contradictory speech is made (viruddhabhāṣaṇaṃ kriyate)." Cg, in the same vein, glosses vyavahriyate, by which we understand him to mean "to engage in disputation."

"no conclusive argument can bring about unanimity" na caikamatye śreyo 'sti: Literally, "with respect to unanimity there is no good." This phrase is particularly enigmatic, and commentators as well as translators differ as to how to understand it. Ct, Cr, and Ck understand that, even though agreement may be achieved with difficulty, no good or benefit comes of it (kathaṃcit kaṣṭenaikamatye 'pi śreyaś ca nāsti—so Ct). In this opinion they are followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1122) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1391). We find this interpretation dubious, for if the counselors are able to reach agreement after their debate, the situation would be no different from that described in the preceding verse. Cg understands śreyaḥ to mean "pleasure (prītiḥ)" and thus explains, "when the counselors take no pleasure in agreement (ekamatye teṣāṃ mantriṇāṃ śreyaś ca prītiś ca nāsti)." Our translation follows the explanation of Cm, who understands śreyaḥ as "that good which has as its object unanimity (aikamatyaviṣayaṃ śreyaḥ)," explaining that the phrase means, therefore, "that there is no conclusive argument capable of producing consensus (aikamatyajanakapratipādanaṃ nāsti)."

15. "eminent counselors" mantrisattamāḥ: V1,D10,11,T1,3,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read matisattamāḥ, "eminent in wisdom." Printed editions based on the text of Cg (VSP and KK) read the similar matimattamāḥ, "most sagacious."

"some excellent and appropriate counsel for me to follow" sumantritaṃ sādhu … kāryam: These words lend themselves to a variety of readings. We read sumantritam, "well advised or good advice," nominally and sādhu, "excellent," as well as kāryam, "[what is] to be done or deed," adjectivally. Ct, Ck, and Cr tend to reverse this, explaining, instead, "well advised (sumantritam) and therefore excellent (sādhu) course of action (kāryam)."

"I will follow it faithfully." kṛtyatamaṃ mama: Literally, "is to be done by me to a great extent." D6,10,11,T2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead kṛtyaṃ mataṃ mama, "I will accept that [i.e., approve that] action."

16. "will soon march on" abhyeti: Literally, "he is approaching." Several of the commentators, no doubt recalling that this is a flashback (see note to verse 1 above), remark that we are to read the present here as an immediate future (vartamānasamīpe laṭ), glossing, "he will soon arrive (acirād āgamiṣyati—Ct)."

"heroic" vīrāṇām: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dhīrāṇām, "steadfast or wise."

17. "power, which is equal to the task" tarasā yuktarūpeṇa: Literally, "appropriate power." Ct and Ck see the power (tarasā) referred to here as distinct from that which Rāma possesses by virtue of his austerities, that which he possesses innately, and from the power of his divine weaponry (astras) (tapobalasahajabaladivyāstrāṇām anyatamenety arthaḥ). Cr understands that this power is suitable to Rāma's inherent nature (svasvarūpayogena), while Ck regards it as appropriate to the time and place (kāladeśocitena). Cm merely says that it is "highly appropriate (atyantam ucitena)."

"his troops, and his allies" sabalānugaḥ: Literally, "with troops and followers." We agree with Ct that bala, "troops, army," refers to the monkey hosts, and -anuga-, "followers," to their leaders, such as Sugrīva, etc. Cm understands similarly. For some reason, most translators who follow this reading render the dvandva as though it were a single collective term for the monkey troops.

Following verse 17, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [112*]: "He [Rāghava] will dry up the ocean with his might, or employ some alternative.[1]"

[1]"employ some alternative" anyat karoti vā: Literally, "or do something else." Cg, Ct, and Ck see this as a reference to the construction of a causeway (anyatsetubandhanam—so Ct).

18. "This being the case and hostilities with the monkeys being imminent" asminn evaṃgate kārye viruddhe vānaraiḥ saha: Literally, "since the matter has come to such [a pass] and hostility with the monkeys [is at hand]." Ñ2,V1,3,B1–3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead tasminn evaṃvidhe kārye, "since the matter [is] of such a sort." Ct, Cr, and Ck flesh out this phrase variously. Ct and Ck take the pronoun tasmin, "in that [one]," to refer elliptically to "in reference to that single monkey," i.e., Hanumān, and the adjective evaṃvidhe, "of such a sort," to refer to the kind of havoc he had wrought upon Laṅkā. They then render the first half of the verse to mean "that single monkey, having accomplished such a deed, and Rāma prepared to carry out hostilities along with many monkeys (tasminn ekasmin vānara evaṃvidhavyāpāre sati bahubhir vānaraiḥ saha rāme viruddha kārye viruddhaṃ kartum udyate sati)." Cr, on the other hand, takes evaṃvidhe to refer to Rāma himself and renders, "Rāghava, who is of such a nature, that is, whose power is such as I have described, is standing in opposition to us with the monkeys in order to accomplish his own objective [kārye] (evaṃvidha uktapratāpavati tasmin rāghave kārye svakāryārthaṃ vānaraiḥ saha viruddhe sati)." Our translation follows the explanation of Cg and Cm, who read with the critical edition. As

Cg explains, the reference is to the matter of the blockade of Laṅkā in the manner described and the impending conflict with the monkeys (asmiṃl laṅkānirodhanarūpe kārya evaṃgata uktarītyā pravṛtte vānaraiḥ saha viruddhe virodhe ca prāpte).

"of the city" pure: Literally, "in regard to the city." Curiously enough, Cr appears to read purā, which he glosses as ādau, "at the outset." Neither the critical apparatus nor any printed edition or variant shows this reading.

Sarga 7

1. Following verse 1, D5,T1,G2,3,M2,3,5 insert a passage of two lines [117*], while D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G1,M1, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the first line only: "Those foolish [rākṣasas] ignorant of sound policy, and underestimating the forces opposing them."

"lord of the rākṣasas . . . him" rākṣasendreṇa . . . rākṣaseśvaram: Literally, "by the lord [Indra] of the rākṣasas . . . [to] the lord of the rākṣasas."

2. "iron clubs, javelins, broadswords, lances, and spears" parighaśaktyṛṣṭiśūlapaṭṭasa-: For a discussion of these and other weapons, see notes to 5.3.30,32. A ṛṣṭi is a broad, double-edged sword (see 6.46.3–4). We understand paṭṭasa, unattested in the dictionaries consulted, as a variant of paṭṭiśa, "spear." Cg claims that his variant paṭṭiśa is "a kind of sword (khaḍgaviśeṣa)."

Following verse 2, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [118*]: "Entering Bhogavatī, you defeated the great serpents in battle."

3. "Inflicting massive slaughter" sumahat kadanaṃ kṛtvā: We agree with most translators in taking kadanam in its normal sense of "slaughter, havoc." The commentators understand the term in its other sense of "war (yuddham)."

"Kubera, bestower of wealth" dhanadaḥ: Literally, "giver of wealth." See note to 6.4.16.

4. "Despite his boasting of his alliance with Maheśvara" maheśvarasakhyena ślāghamānaḥ: Literally, "[he] praising because of a friendship with Maheśvara." Ct and Ck understand the verb to be used reflexively in the sense of "praising himself by reason of his alliance (maheśvarasakhyena hetunā svayaṃ ślāghamāno 'pi—Ct)."

5. The episode referred to here is described in detail at Uttarakāṇḍa 15. Rāvaṇa takes Kubera's Puṣpakavimāna at 7.15.29. See 6.28.21 and notes. Cf. 6.109.22–27 and 6.110.23 and notes.

"Slaughtering, baffling, or capturing" vinihatya ca . . . vikṣobhya ca vigṛhya ca: Literally, "having slaughtered, having agitated, and having captured." Actually these three terms overlap considerably in their meanings, thus constituting one of those sets of near synonyms of which the poet is so fond. (See note to 6.2.14.) Any or all of them can mean "to overcome or defeat." We read the gerunds distributively with the understanding that the various actions are inflicted upon different sections of the yakṣa forces, and thus translate the conjunction ca, "and," here as "or."

D5–7,10,11,T1,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read vinipātya, "having thrown down, having overthrown," for vinihatya, "having slaughtered."

"this flying palace" vimānam idam: The reference here is, of course, to Rāvaṇa's magical flying palace Puṣpaka. See 5.6.5–14; 5.7.9–15; and notes. See, too, 6.109.22–27; 6.110.23; and notes.

6. The episode in which Maya gives his daughter Mandodarī to Rāvaṇa in marriage is described at Uttarakāṇḍa 12. Notably that episode portrays the dānava lord as quite willing, even eager, to marry his daughter to the rākṣasa lord. There is no mention of his doing so out of fear. Cg, the only commentator to note the seeming contradiction, remarks that, "although the poet will later state in the Uttarakāṇḍa that Maya gave the girl away with the composure born of his noble breeding, the ministers refer to fear here as part of their panegyric on Rāvaṇa's valor (yady api mayenābhijātyabhramād dattety uttare vakṣyati tathāpy atra praśaṃsāyāṃ bhayād dattety uktam)." Curiously, at the later passage (GPP 7.12.21), Ct mentions Maya's fear of capture at the hands of the cruel Rāvaṇa as one of his motives for giving him Mandodarī. See, too, notes to 6.99.25, where Mandodarī's lineage is discussed.

7. The reference here is to an episode narrated at Uttarakāṇḍa 25 in which the rākṣasa or dānava lord Madhu, in Rāvaṇa's absence, carries off the rākṣasī princess Kumbhīnasī to be his bride. Rāvaṇa mounts a punitive expedition to crush Madhu but is dissuaded by the entreaties of Kumbhīnasī. Rāvaṇa then makes Madhu his ally in his ongoing war against the gods.

"Madhu" madhur nāma: Literally, "Madhu, by name." Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,7–12,T1,G1,3,M5, the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, and the edition of Gorresio read instead the vocative mahābāho, "O great-armed one."

"the bringer of joy to Kumbhīnasī" kumbhīnasyāḥ sukhāvahaḥ: Kumbhīnasī's precise relationship to Rāvaṇa is somewhat ambiguous. Cr, Cg, Cm, and Cv call her his sister here, although Ct is content to attribute this identification to Cm. Ck alone understands Kumbhīnasī to be Rāvaṇa's daughter (rāvaṇasutā). In the Uttarakāṇḍa account of the episode, Vibhīṣaṇa describes her to Rāvaṇa at 7.25.25 as "the daughter of our mother's sister and so by law [dharmataḥ] our sister." The commentators generally agree that "bringer of joy" is a kenning for husband (sukham āvahatīti sukhāvahaḥ bhartā—so Cg).

8. "great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one."

"Vāsuki" vāsukiḥ: This episode is described at 7.23.2–4.

"Takṣaka" takṣakaḥ: The abduction of Takṣaka's wife is also mentioned in the epic (3.30.13). See note ad loc.

"Śaṅkha" śaṅkhaḥ: A nāga of this name is mentioned at MBh 1.31.8; 5.101.12; and 16.5.14.

"Jaṭin" jaṭī: The name does not appear to occur elsewhere in connection with nāgas. We tentatively follow the practice of the translators in seeing this as the proper name of a nāga lord. The commentators who address this name—Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm—are unanimous in understanding it to be that of a type or species of snake (sarpaviśeṣasya—Cg).

9–10. The incident is mentioned by Śūrpaṇakhā at 7.24.21, where it emerges that her husband was among her brother's victims.

"you waged war" yuddhvā samare: Literally, "having fought in battle."

"indestructible" akṣayāḥ: Cg remarks that the indestructibility of the dānavas is evidenced by their capacity for regenerating themselves even after being ground to a powder (cūrṇīkaraṇe 'pi punar utpattimattvena kṣayarahitā ity arthaḥ). It is not clear whether Cg is alluding to a specific incident or thinking of the often-mentioned ability of the dānavas' purohita Uśanas Kāvya, or Śukrācārya, to bring them back to life when they are slain by the gods in battle (MBh 1.71 and MatsyaP 47). In the former passage

Uśanas does revive Kaca, the son of Bṛhaspati, who has been killed and ground to a powder by the dānavas. See 6.11.42; 6.40.28; 6.115.51; and notes.

"with their powerful boons" labdhavarāḥ: Literally, "having obtained boons." Cg notes that their boons were acquired from Brahmā (brahmaṇā iti śeṣaḥ). Cf. note to 6.28.28–29.

"dānava heroes" śūrāḥ . . . dānavāḥ: Ct, Ck, Cv, Cg, and Cm identify these particular dānavas as the Kālakeyas. Vidyujjīhva, husband of Śūrpaṇakhā, is the leader of this group of demons (7.12.2). Rāvaṇa is said to travel to the capital city of the Kālakeyas, Aśmanagara, and defeat its inhabitants (7.23.15; see also Shukla 2003, p. 139). Their extermination is again mentioned by Śūrpaṇakhā at 7.24.21. According to the Uttarakāṇḍa passage (7.24.21), Rāvaṇa is said to have slaughtered them in battle (see also Shukla 2003, p. 139). Arjuna is said to have fought them in battle (MBh 5.155.27).

"there . . . many magical powers" māyāḥ . . . tatra bahavaḥ: Literally, "many māyās [were acquired] there." Ct, Cr, and Cm understand that Rāvaṇa acquired these powers during a period when he lived among the dānavas (tatra taiḥ [dānavaiḥ] saha vāsān māyāś cādhigatā prāptāḥ—so Ct). These are the illusory powers that will be employed by Rāvaṇa and other rākṣasas at various points in the epic (see, for example, 6.22.6–43). At 7.23.12–14, we are told that Rāvaṇa learns illusory powers from the Nivātakavacas. See S. Goldman 2006a and 2006b.

Following verse 10, M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg (VSP 6.7.10, in brackets; KK 6.7.11, in brackets) insert a passage of two lines [123*]: "In [your] fury, [you] conquered in battle the immensely powerful world guardians. Then, having gone from here to the world of the gods, [you] conquered even Śakra."

11. The episode of the defeat of the sons of Varuṇa referred to here is told at Uttarakāṇḍa 23.

"great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed one." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahābhāga, "O fortunate one."

"four divisions of their army" caturvidhabala-: See note to 6.3.24.

12–13. Rāvaṇa's battle with Yama's army is detailed at Uttarakāṇḍa 21 and his battle with Yama at Uttarakāṇḍa 22.

"Yama's host, a veritable ocean" yamasya balasāgaram: Literally, "the army-ocean of Yama." Those translators who render the term, with the exception of Raghunathan, understand bala here in its sense of "strength or power," although many seem to extend this meaning to the sense of "realm or domain," and translate variously: Dutt (1893, p. 1124), "dominion"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1393), "realm"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 20), "le monde"; and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 149), "possanza." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 17), like us, reads the term in its sense of "army." We believe that this word is more appropriate both rhetorically, as the ocean is commonly used as a metaphor for an army in epic poetry, and in the context of Rāvaṇa's elaborately described destruction of Yama's army at Uttarakāṇḍa 21. Cg and Cm implicitly understand "army." See below note to verse 15, 127*, where the metaphor is repeated.

"islands in the form of śālmali trees" śālmalidvīpamaṇḍitam: Literally, "ornamented with śālmali-islands." The reading here appears to be suspect. The great majority of manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V3,B,D1–4,6–12,T2,3,G,M3) collated for the critical edition, including the texts of all the commentators, read instead druma-, "tree," for dvīpa, "island." Given the principles upon which the critical edition has been based, one would think that the reading should, at least, be marked as uncertain. The substitution of druma- would yield the meaning "set about with śālmali trees."

Ct, who reads the variant śālmalī, explains that this means that the ocean is adorned on its islands (dviṗeṣu) by śālmalī trees, the trees of "hellish torment (yātanāvṛkṣa)." Cr glosses similarly. (śālmalīdrumair yātanāvṛkṣair maṇḍitaṃ sāgaro 'pi dviṗeṣu vṛkṣamaṇḍito bhavati.) Cg and Cm understand śālmalī to refer to a weapon so named because of its resemblance to the thorny śālmalī tree, and thus read the compound as part of the compound metaphor, i.e., "having śālmalī weapons for its trees." This interpretation is represented in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 17), who renders, "which had . . . spiked racks fashioned like the silk-cotton tree for ornamental park trees of death."

The śālmali, or silk-cotton tree (Salmalia malabarica), has sharp thorns growing from its trunk, which are apparently used to torture the denizens of hell. It is also the name of a river in Pātāla (Apte s.v.). Shukla notes that the śālmalī tree, according to the Araṇyakāṇḍa, has "iron thorns" and is "covered under golden flowers and leaves of excellent cat's eye gem" (Shukla 2003, p. 211; see 3.51.18–19). Interestingly, śālmali-dvīpa, the reading adopted by the critical edition, is the name of one of the seven principal continents, or dvīpas, of traditional Indian geography (Bhattacharyya 1991, pp. 7, 265; Narayan 1980, p. 10). See note to 6.76.28, where the red flowers of the śālmali tree are compared to blood.

"warding off" pratiṣedhitaḥ: Cr glosses, "made to flee (palāyanaṃ prāpitaḥ)," while Cg glosses, "made to withdraw from battle (yuddhād apakrāmitaḥ)." Ct understands, "made to turn away (parāṅmukhaḥ kṛtaḥ)." The reference is to Yama's withdrawal from the battlefield when forbidden by Brahmā to kill Rāvaṇa (7.22.32–38).

"All the worlds were pleased with your brilliant fighting there" suyuddhena ca te sarve lokās tatra sutoṣitāḥ: The reference is most likely to the epic convention that gods and other celestial beings assemble to watch great feats of combat. See, for example, 6.91.5–6. At 7.22.15, in fact, the celestials do so gather to watch the battle between Rāvaṇa and Yama. Ct, evidently concerned at the thought that the worlds would be gratified by the victory of the monstrous Rāvaṇa, takes lokāḥ in its other sense of "people," explaining, "by you all these people, that is all the rākṣasas, were delighted (te tvayā sarve lokāḥ sarve rākṣasāḥ sutoṣitāḥ prīṇitāḥ)."

D6,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read vilolitāḥ, "were shaken or agitated," for sutoṣitāḥ, "were pleased." This variant is rendered only in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 17), who translates, "With but a brief fight, you put whole worlds in a state of turmoil."

Following12ab, D5,7,10,11,T1,G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of two lines [124*] (D5,T1,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg—KK, in brackets 6.7.14ab—omit line 2) continuing the compound metaphor of Yama's forces as an ocean: ". . . with the noose of Kāla for its great waves,[1] and the servants of Yama for its great serpents, the mighty ocean of Yama's realm, unendurable because of its many torments.[2]"

[1]"great waves" mahāvīcim: Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 17) inexplicably renders, "[the noose of death] was the shark."

[2]"unendurable because of its many torments" mahājvareṇa durdharṣam: Literally, "unapproachable because of its great fever or affliction." The exact meaning of the phrase is unclear. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1393) renders, "difficult to overcome on account of the mighty Jwara (the spirit presiding over fevers)." The commentators are silent.

14. According to Cg, the warriors referred to here are those such as Anaraṇya, the Ikṣvāku dynast slain by Rāvaṇa at Uttarakāṇḍa 19.

15. Following verse 15, B,D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of fourteen lines [127*]: "Better yet, stay here, mighty king. Why exert yourself? Great-armed[1] Indrajit will destroy the monkeys by himself.[1–2] For, mighty king, having performed a sacrifice to the unsurpassed Maheśvara, he has received a boon all but impossible to obtain in this world.[3–4] And he, encountering that great[2] ocean of the army of the gods—with its javelins and iron cudgels for its fish, its scattered missiles for its seaweed, filled with elephants for its turtles, and horses for its frogs, with the Rudras and Ādityas for its great crocodiles, and the Maruts and Vasus for its great serpents, with the chariot, cavalry, and elephant corps for its surging waters, and infantry for its great sandbanks—captured Indra, lord of the gods,[3] and brought him back to Laṅkā.[4][5–10] That slayer of Śambara and Vṛtra was released on the order of Grandfather Brahmā[5] and then returned to the triple heaven, your majesty, honored by all the gods.[11–12] He is the one, mighty king, your son Indrajit—the conqueror of Indra—whom you must dispatch so that he may lead the army of the monkeys along with Rāma to destruction.[13–14]"

[1]"Great-armed" mahābāhuḥ: D5–7,10,11,T,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahārāja, "O great king" (with hiatus).

[2]"great" mahat: We follow Cm, Ck, and Ct, who gloss the masculine mahāntam to modify sāgaram, "ocean," for the text's neuter mahat.

[3]"Indra, lord of the gods" daivatapatiḥ: Literally, "lord of the gods." Cs thinks that the use of the neuter daivata instead of the more usual masculine "deva" in this epithet of Indra is to suggest the emasculation of the divinities [at Rāvaṇa's hands] (daivata-śabdagrahaṇena teṣāṃ napuṃsakatvaṃ dhvanyate).

[4]For a similar comparison of the battlefield with a river, see 6.46.25–28 and note.

[5]"Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmaha-: Literally, "grandfather." Ck and Ct, who quotes him, are at pains to insist that the reference here is to the four-faced Rudra, whom they regard as the grandfather of all worlds. See note to 4.42.56, where Ck, while attacking Cg, says that Brahmā is Rudra. See also note to 4.50.15, where Ck brands Cm as a Brahmā-hater and the "lowest of brahmans."

16. "it is unimaginable that any harm" āpad ayukteyam āgatā: Literally, "an inappropriate calamity has arrived." We agree with the commentators that the thought of a calamity that could proceed from these ignoble enemies is improper for Rāvaṇa, not the calamity itself. Cg, whom we follow, glosses asaṃbhāvitā, "impossible or inconceivable," for ayuktā, "inappropriate." The syntax is rather unclear.

"such vulgar folk" prākṛtāj janāt: Whereas Ct and Ck understand jana, "person or people," as a plural and take the compound to refer to the men and monkeys [poised to assault Laṅkā], Cg takes it as a singular and sees the compound as a reference to "the insignificant Hanumān (kṣudrād dhanumatah)."

"You ought not entertain any such thought in your heart." hṛdi naiva tvayā kāryā: Literally, "It should not at all be done by you in the heart." We agree with Ct and Ck, who add the substantive cintā, "worry, concern, or thought."

Sarga 8

1. "Prahasta" prahasto nāma: Literally, "Prahasta by name." This is the same rākṣasa whose mansion is mentioned at 5.48.2 and whose son, Jambumālin, was slain by Hanumān at 5.42.15–17.

2. "are unable to withstand you in battle. What then of mere monkeys?" na tvāṃ dharṣayituṃ śaktāḥ kiṃ punar vānarā raṇe: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sarve dharṣayituṃ śakyāḥ kiṃ punar mānavau raṇe, "All of them are capable of being overcome [by us] in battle. What then of two mere men?"

3. "negligent and overconfident" pramattā viśvastāḥ: Cm, Ct, Ck, Cr, Cg, and Cv understand that the negligence of the rākṣasas is a result of their abandoning themselves to sensual pleasures and that they were overconfident in their belief that they were immune to attack. (pramattā bhogādiparavaśāḥ. viśvastāḥ śatrudharṣaṇāsaṃbhavabuddhyā niḥśaṅkatayā sthitāḥ—so Ct.) Crā understands their overconfidence in a more restricted sense, saying that it derived from the contemptuous thought, "What can a single monkey do?" (viśvastā eko vānaraḥ kiṃ kariṣyatīty avajñayā visrabdhāḥ). Ct, Cm, and Cg note that the thrust of the counselors' argument is that to be bested when off guard does not mean that one is inferior to one's adversary (prāmādikaśatruparibhavo na nyūnatām āpādayatīti bhāvaḥ). See note to 6.9.9.

"will not escape with his life again so long as I live" na hi me jīvato gacchej jīvan sa: Literally, "while I am living, he will not go, living."

5. "night-roaming rākṣasa" rajanīcara: Literally, "O night-ranger." This particular kenning for "rākṣasa" seems to have a somewhat pejorative or contemptuous connotation. Sītā appears to use it in this way in the S*undarakāṇḍa* (5.19.7), whereas here, Cs argues that it is only through his intoxication with his own valor that Prahasta dares to address his monarch in this fashion (śauryamadena rajanīcarety uktiḥ). Cf. the more common variant, niśācara.

"transgression" -aparādha-: As several commentators point out, this refers to the abduction of Sītā.

6. "Next . . . in a towering rage" ca susaṃkruddhaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP) read instead tam asaṃkruddhaḥ, "not angry [said] to him."

7. "outrage against the city, the inner apartments, and the majestic lord of the rākṣasas himself" paribhavaḥ . . . purasyāntaḥpurasya / ca śrīmato rākṣasendrasya: According to Ct and Cr, the outrage to the city and the inner apartments consists in Hanumān's having set them on fire (5.52.6–14) (purasyāntaḥpurasya cāyaṃ paribhavo dāharūpaḥ—Ct). According to Cm, the outrage against Rāvaṇa consists in his slaying of Akṣa, and so forth (5.45.32–39) (rākṣasendrapradharṣaṇam akṣavadhādirūpam). Although we read the verse as an independent sentence, Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cm think that it should be subordinated syntactically to the gerundive na kṣamaṇīyam in verse 6 above, thus understanding, "this attack . . . this outrage . . . must not be tolerated." A number of translators follow this interpretation.

8. "I shall . . . repulse" nivartiṣyāmi: We read the form as a causative with the sense of "I shall drive back, I shall repulse," as do Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 21), "relancer les Vānaras"; Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, pp. 150–51), "li forzerò ben io a retrocedere"; and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, pp. 1395), "I shall repulse the monkeys." Other translators understand the verb to mean "kill, destroy": Dutt (1893, p. 1125) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 20), "exterminate"; and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 18), "destroy." Ct and Ck understand the verb to mean something like "expunge, wipe out," and see its object as the unexpressed injury caused by (Hanumān's) attack (pradharṣaṇaduḥkham). This interpretation forces Ct to supply the gerund hatvā, "having killed," which is absent from his text. See note below. The verbal sequence in the critical edition could also be interpreted to mean "having slain the monkeys . . . I shall return," as does Crā, who clearly reads the form as a simplex and corrects it (nivartiṣye, "I will come back").

"slaying them" hatvā: D10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead gatvā, "having gone."

"even if they should seek refuge" praviṣṭān: Literally, "entered into." Ct and Ck indicate that the monkeys would have done so out of fear (bhītyā) [of Durmukha].

9. "all smeared" rūṣitam: B3,D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dūṣitam, "stained, fouled."

10. "contemptible and miserable" kṛpaṇena tapasvinā: This is yet another of those sets of near synonyms of which the poet is very fond. The commentators attempt variously to differentiate them. Most (Ct, Ck, Cm, Cg, Cv) agree that Hanumān is contemptible (kṛpaṇa) in that he is afraid of moving about openly and thus had to carry out his mission at night (5.2.31–33; 5.3.46) (prakāśasaṃcāre bhayād rātrau kṛtakāryeṇa—Ct). They differ somewhat on the interpretation of tapasvin. Ct, Cg, and Cm simply gloss, "pitiable (śocyena)." Cr believes that the term refers to the pains that Hanumān (as a monkey) must endure to seek out his food (tapasvināhārādyanveṣaṇārthaṃ saṃtāpayuktena hanūmatā). Crā says the term is used because he eats the same fruits that are the normal fare of ascetics (tapasvinā tapasvyāhārabhūtaphalāśinety arthaḥ). Cv believes that the reference is to Hanumān's possessing the deceptive power of taking on various forms (tapasvinā rūpavaividhyakaraṇakuhakaśaktiyuktena). Ct and Ck, indicating that their usage is like that of vile pejoratives, such as "one who sleeps with his mother (mātṛgāmin)," note that these terms are purely abusive and not substantive (kṛpaṇādiśabdānāṃ pāruṣyamātre tātpāryaṃ na tv arthe mātṛgāmyādigālidānavat). See notes to 5.7.12 and 40. See note to 6.2.14.

11. Following verse 11, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of fourteen lines [131*]: "And if it please your majesty, hear now my further words. For he who is skilled in strategy and ever vigilant will defeat his enemies.[1–2] Lord of the rākṣasas, you have thousands of heroic and resolute rākṣasas, terrifying, terrible to look upon, and able to take on any form at will.[3–4] Let them all take on[1] human form and, betraying no agitation, approach Kākutstha and speak as follows to that foremost of the Raghus:[5–6] 'We have been dispatched by your younger brother, Bharata.' For his part, he [Rāma] will mobilize his army[2] and come here at once.[3][7–8] Then we will set out swiftly from here and proceed there in haste, bearing lances, javelins, and maces and with bows, arrows, and swords in hand.[9–10] Stationing ourselves in the sky, troop upon troop, we will crush the host of tawny monkeys with a great hail of stones and weapons and send them to the house of Yama.[11–12] If Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa should fall for this trick,[4] then through their mistaken policy they will surely lose their lives. [13–14]"

[1]"take on" bibhrataḥ: Literally, "bearing." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vivṛtam, "clear, manifest." Ct glosses, "clear or evident (spaṣṭam)," and adds the gerund dhṛtvā, "having taken on a body (vapur dhṛtveti śeṣaḥ)."

[2]"will mobilize his army" senāṃ samutthāpya: Literally, "having caused the army to rise." We believe that the sense here is that, according to Vajradaṃṣṭra's stratagem, Rāma, thinking he has received reinforcements from Bharata, will break camp and march immediately upon Laṅkā. Similarly, Ct explains that Rāma will combine this new army with his own army of monkeys under the mistaken impression that they are loyal to him, and then begin to march. (senāṃ vānarasenāṃ samutthāpya yuñktvā svīyabuddhyā kṣipram evopayāsyati. asmān iti śeṣaḥ.) Cr, however, glosses, "having abandoned (saṃtyajya)," and seems to think that Rāma, upon hearing Bharata's [spurious] message, will abandon his monkey allies in favor of the army of disguised rākṣasas (sa śrutabharatasaṃdeśo rāmaḥ senāṃ samutthāpya saṃtyajyety arthaḥ kṣipram evopayāsyati).

[3]Following line 7, M3 and the printed editions of VSP and KK (following 6.8.15ab, in brackets) insert a passage of one line [131(A)*]: "There are things to be done urgently requiring your return."

[4]"If . . . fall for this trick" evaṃ ced upasarpetām anayam: Literally, "if those two should approach this deceit in this fashion."

12. "Nikumbha Kaumbhakarṇi" kaumbhakarṇiḥ . . . nikumbhaḥ: The counselor Nikumbha, here identified as one of the sons of Kumbhakarṇa, is mentioned at 5.47.11. He engages in battle with Hanumān and is killed at 6.64.1–23. See, too, notes to 6.10.1; 6.33.34; 6.45.6; 6.47.21; and notes.

"Rāvaṇa, who makes the worlds cry out" rāvaṇaṃ lokarāvaṇam: This is one of the common etymological epithets that Vālmīki likes to apply to his central characters. For a discussion of this term, see notes to 3.30.20 and 6.10.1. See, too, 6.17.4; 6.25.8; 6.53.19; 6.57.17; 6.87.31; 6.99.38; 6.114.24; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, pp.105–6.

13. Following verse 13, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [134*]: "as well as Sugrīva, Hanumān, and all the monkeys here."

14. "chops" vaktram: Literally, "mouth." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ṣṛkkām, "corner of the mouth." Licking the corners of the mouth is normally a sign of fear in the epic. See MBh 3.124.23 (lelihañ jihvayā vaktraṃ vidyuccapalalolayā / vyāttānano ghoradṛṣṭir grasann iva jagad balāt), where it is a sign of appetite, as appears to be intended here. But see R. Goldman 1977, p. 58.

15. The critical edition marks pāda d as uncertain. Ś1,Ñ1,D1–4,6–8,10–12,T2, 3,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead tāṃ sarvāṃ harivāhinīm, "the whole army of tawny monkeys."

16. "their leader in battle" raṇakuñjaram: Literally, "an elephant in battle." The term kuñjara is frequently used to refer to anything that is the most outstanding in its class, and we have taken it in this sense here. One might also translate, "a war-elephant in battle." Raghunathan, for example, translates, "who fights like an elephant (1982, vol. 3, p. 10). D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute instead sarvāṃś caivātra vānarān, "and all the monkeys here."

Sarga 9

1–5. Like many of the epic lists, this one is subject to variation in the different subrecensions.

"Indrajit—the mighty and immensely powerful son of Rāvaṇa" indrajic ca mahātejā balavān rāvaṇātmajaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead indraśatruś ca balavāṃs tato vai rāvaṇātmajaḥ, "and Rāvaṇa's mighty son, the foe of Indra."

"Nikumbha . . . Atikāya" nikumbhaḥ . . . atikāyaś ca: Cg notes that the list begins with Nikumbha in order to suggest that the other rākṣasas all agree with him (i.e., Nikumbha) in the matter (ādau nikumbhopādānaṃ nikumbhamatānusaraṇasūcanārtham). D7,10,11,G, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct repeat the name Nikumbha in pāda 3c in place of the critical edition's Atikāya. This redundancy has not escaped Cr's attention. He rationalizes this repetition by noting that there are many rākṣasas with the same name (nikumbhādināmatvena bahūnāṃ sattvān na paunaruktyam). See, too, note to 6.8.12.

"leapt to their feet" samutpatya: Literally, "having leapt up." Cg glosses, "having risen from [their] seats (āsanebhyaḥ samutthāya)."

6. "who dared to assault Laṅkā" laṅkā yena pradharṣitā: Literally, "by whom Laṅkā was assaulted."

7. "as they all stood there, weapons in hand" tān gṛhītāyudhān sarvān: Literally, "all of them by whom weapons had been seized."

"bade them be seated once again" punaḥ pratyupaveśya tān: Literally, "having once more made them sit."

8. "The learned have prescribed as appropriate the use of force only on those occasions where one's object cannot be achieved by means of the other three stratagems, dear brother." apy upāyais tribhis tāta yo 'rthaḥ prāptuṃ na śakyate / tasya vikramakālāṃs tān yuktān āhur manīṣiṇaḥ //: A literal translation would be: "For that end, dear [brother], which is incapable of being achieved by the three stratagems, the learned have specified the appropriate occasions for force."

"Use of force" vikramakālān: Literally, "occasions for valor." The term vikrama, "valor, strength," is used as a synonym for the more conventional term daṇḍa. See notes to verse 9 below.

"the other three stratagems" upāyais tribhiḥ: As the commentators note, these are the standard three nonviolent means specified in the nītiśāstra by which kings achieve their objectives: viz., conciliation (sāma), gifts or bribery (dāna), and the sowing of discord (bheda). See notes to 5.2.27 and 5.34.16; cf. 5.39.2,3. The set of four upāyas, "strategic means," of sāma, dāna, bheda, and daṇḍa (violence or coercion) is a commonplace of the nīti literature and the Arthaśāstra (9.6.56–61 and 9.7.68–80). Cg here, as well as in the following verses, quotes the appropriate verses from the Kāmandaka treatise (tad uktaṃ kāmandakena—sāmādīnām upāyānāṃ trayāṇāṃ viphale naye / vinayen nayasaṃpanno daṇḍaṃ daṇḍyeṣu daṇḍabhṛd iti) (Kāmandaka 10.14 or 18.1). See Sternbach 1965–1967, vol., 2, pp.171–72. See 6.51.11–13; 6.59.28; 6.71.12; and notes. Cf. notes to 6.31.48–49.

9. "the use of force" vikramāḥ: Literally, "prowess, strength, valor." Cg glosses, "acts of war (vigrahāḥ)." This constitutes the fourth stratagem set forth in the śāstras that is to be used when the three peaceful means (sandhi) fail. This is, of course, the equivalent of the stratagem of daṇḍa, "coercive force." See notes to verse 8 above.

"those who are off guard" pramatteṣu: Literally, "negligent." The commentators agree that this term means "unvigilant (anavadhāneṣu—so Cg)." Cg further suggests that it refers to those who are addicted to sensuality (viṣayasakteṣu). Cf. 6.8.3 and note.

"preoccupied" abhiyukteṣu: The commentators generally agree (Cg as second alternative) that this refers to kings who are engaged in hostilities with third parties (śatrvantarākrānteṣu). As his first alternative, Cg curiously suggests that the reference is to renunciant sages or scholars (jñāniṣu virakteṣv iti yāvat).

"stricken by misfortune" daivena prahateṣu: Ct and Cr, who read with the critical edition, understand this phrase to refer to those who are afflicted with serious illnesses, etc., (mahārogādineti śeṣaḥ—Ct). D7,T3,G2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cg, and Cm read prahṛteṣu, "carried away," for prahateṣu, "struck or seized." Cm gives the critical edition's reading as his gloss. Cg interprets, "those whose prosperity has been carried away, i.e., diminished by fate (daivena bhāgyena prahṛteṣu kṣīyamāṇasaṃpatsv ity arthaḥ)." Cg understands Vibhīṣaṇa's list here to be merely a pratīka for the longer catalogue of opponents against whom the use of force, as opposed to peaceful means, is appropriate. Thus, he sees the conjunction ca, "and," as a kind of ellipsis here and quotes a passage from Kāmandaka in which twenty such opponents are enumerated. They include a child, an old man, one who is chronically ill, one who has been expelled by a kinsmen, a cowardly person, one whose citizens are cowardly, one who is avaricious, one whose citizens are avaricious, one whose subjects are disaffected, one who is excessively addicted to sensual pleasures, one whose advisers are not of one mind, one who reviles gods and brahmans, one who is stricken by misfortune, one who is fatalistic (an astrologer?—daivacintaka), one whose country has been afflicted by famine, one whose army has suffered a crushing defeat, one who is away from his homeland, one who is beset by many enemies, one who is doomed, and one who is devoid of truth and righteousness (yathāha kāmandakaḥ—bālo vṛddho dīrgharogī tathā jñātibahiṣkṛtaḥ / bhīruko bhīrukajano lubdho lubdhajanas tathā // viraktaprakṛtiś caiva viṣayeṣv atisaktimān / anekacittamantraś ca devabrāhmaṇanindakaḥ // daivopahatakaś caiva daivacintaka eva ca / durbhikṣavyasanopeto balavyasanasaṃyutaḥ // adeśastho bahuripur yukto 'kālena yaś ca saḥ / satyadharmavyapetaś ca viṃśatiḥ puruṣā amī // etaiḥ sandhiṃ na kurvīta vigṛhṇīyāt tu kevalam iti).

10. "can you all hope to assail" pradharṣayitum icchatha: Literally, "you desire to assail." The word "all" has been added to clarify the change in the text to the plural. As Cg and Cm note, Vibhīṣaṇa, who had previously been addressing Rāvaṇa, is now addressing the entire [assembly]. (pūrvaṃ rāvaṇaṃ prativacanam. atra sarvān pratīti bahuvacanam.) This interpretation, according to Cm, is supported by the use of the plural vocative niśācarāḥ, "O night-roaming rākṣasas," in verse 12 below.

"intent upon victory" vijigīṣum: According to Ct, this suggests Rāma's lack of any other enemies [than Rāvaṇa] (anena śatrvantararāhityam).

"firm in his strength" bale sthitam: Ct and Ck gloss, "firm in power of divinity or fate (daivabale sthitam)." Cg suggests, "of unwavering strength (sthirabalam)."

"master of his anger" jitaroṣam: Literally, "who has conquered anger." Ct and Ck understand this to mean that Rāma is "free from any foolishness (maurkhyarāhityam)."

Cg understands that he is "free from anger at inappropriate times (akāle roṣarahitam)." Cm suggests that the term refers to Rāma, who, being utterly without sin, is therefore free from the vagaries of fate. He goes on to remark that the other three adjectives suggest that Rāma is not to be stopped by anyone. (anena pāpābhāvād daivopahatatvābhāva uktaḥ. itaraviśeṣaṇatrayeṇānyoparuddhatvābhāvaḥ.)

"utterly unassailable" durādharṣam: Ct and Ck see the adjective as suggesting Rāma's possession of divine missiles (durādharṣatvena divyāstrasaṃpad uktā).

11. "feat that Hanumān accomplished, leaping" lañghayitvā . . . kṛtaṃ hanumatā karma: The syntax of the verse is slightly ambiguous. Normal Sanskrit syntax would lead one to take the gerund and the participle as referring to separate actions occurring sequentially. By this reading, "the impossible feat accomplished by Hanumān" should be the destruction of Laṅkā, etc., after his crossing of the ocean. Nevertheless, the context here and the sense of the unimaginable lead us to feel that the impossible feat is the monkey's uncanny flight over the ocean. This interpretation is perhaps supported by a widely distributed variant for pāda cd. For pāda 11cd, Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6–12,T2,3,M1,2,5 substitute, while G2 inserts after 11, a passage of one line [139*]: "Who in the world could have imagined (cintayitum arhati) Hanumān's path?" Given the textual evidence, 11cd should probably be considered doubtful. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv. D7,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read a variant of 139*: "Who in this world could have known or even imagined Hanumān's path or flight (gatiṃ hanūmato loke ko [na—D7] vidyāt tarkayeta vā)?" 139* and its variant strike us as an example of the glossing tendency of some, particularly northern, manuscripts, focusing, as it does, explicitly on Hanumān's mode of travel (gati). See Pollock 1984a, pp. 85–86. The translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 20), the only other translator to read with the critical text (i.e., Cg), is similar to ours.

"the lord of rivers and streams" nadanadīpatim: See note to 6.5.3.

14. On the episode of Khara's death, see Araṇyakāṇḍa 29.

"who was attacking him" ativṛttaḥ: Literally, "transgressive, offensive." The commentators are at pains to show that Khara (and Dūṣaṇa) were the aggressors in their conflict with Rāma, who thus killed them in self-defense. Ct and Ck explain, "[who] having transgressed the boundaries of his own territory and having proceeded into Rāma's, began (pravṛttaḥ) to assault him (svasthānam atikramya taddeśaṃ gatvā tatpīḍāyai pravṛtta iti tena sa hataḥ)." Cr simply explains, "having come to kill (hantum āgataḥ)."

Following this verse, D5–7,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg (KK 6.9.15; VSP 6.9.15; GPP, in brackets between 6.9.14 and 6.9.15) insert a passage of two lines [140*]: "The violation of another man's wife is a terrible thing, for it leads to the loss of one's reputation, one's wealth, and one's life. It is simply another form of sin.[1]"

[1]"another form of sin" pāpasya ca punarbhavam: Literally, "a reincarnation of sin." Our translation follows Cg, who glosses, "another birth, that is to say, another form (janmāntaraṃ mūrtyantaram iti yāvat)." Cm understands, "the source of sin (pāpasya ca bhavam utpattisthānam)."

15. "For this reason" etan nimittam: Ct, Cr, and Ck understand this to be a reference to the casus belli mentioned in the preceding verse: "Vaidehī, who was abducted for this reason, i.e., because of the slaying of Khara, etc. (kharādivadhanimittam āhṛtā vaidehī—so Ct)." Cg and Cm consider the phrase to be a reference to the general rule concerning abduction posited in 140* (see above). Although various commentators take up the issue of whether Khara or Rāma began the hostilities, none of them makes any mention of the disfigurement of Śūrpaṇakhā (see 3.17.20–22), which leads Khara to attack Rāma in the first place.

*"Vaidehī . . . danger" vaidehībhayam: The critical edition prints the two words as if they constituted a compound. This would literally yield the awkward sense "the danger posed by or from Vaidehī." D6,7,G2,3,M1,2, and Cg, Cm, as well as VSP (6.9.16), read vaidehyā bhayam, "the danger from Vaidehī." Ct, Ck, and Cm [variant], as well as KK (6.9.16), GPP (6.9.15), NSP, and Gita Press, read vaidehī bhayam, "Vaidehī, [who is] the danger," which strikes us as most probable, and is, in any case, indistinguishable in manuscripts from the critical reading. We have translated accordingly.

*"There is no point in acting" kṛte na kim: The critical reading, as printed, appears awkward and elliptical at best. D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Cv substitute the particle nu for the negative na, which Ct explains by supplying the word phalam, "benefit," thus yielding the sense "What benefit would there be in some action [kṛte] merely for the sake of a quarrel? (kalahārthe kalahaphalake kasmiṃś cit karmaṇi kṛte kiṃ nu phalam iti śeṣaḥ. anartha evety arthaḥ—Ct.)" The texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the same as the critical edition, but do not separate kṛte and na, understanding instead the instrumental kṛtena, and explain the passage to mean "what is the point in an action merely for the sake of a quarrel? (kalahārthe kṛtena kim iti. kalahārthe viṣaye kṛtena karmaṇā kim ity arthaḥ.)" We feel that this is an appropriate reading. No printed edition other than the critical one reads kṛte na, and we feel that once again, as in the case of vaidehī bhayam, the critical editors have broken up the words incorrectly. We have translated the sequence as kṛtena kim.

16. "for us" naḥ: D10,11,T1,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the particle tu. This reading leaves the subject of the infinitive ambiguous. Translators such as Dutt (1893, p. 1128) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 22) understand that it is Rāma who would never engage in pointless hostility.

17. "its myriad precious things" bahuratnasamākulām: Literally, "filled with many jewels." We take ratna, "jewel," here, in its sense of "excellent or precious thing."

18. "storms" avaskandati: The commentators understand the sense of this verb variously. Thus, Cr glosses, "it destroys (vināśayati)"; Cg, "it blockades (ruṇaddhi)"; and Cm, "it scales or overwhelms (ārokṣyati)."

20. "salutary and beneficial" hitaṃ pathyam: This is yet another pair of near synonyms of which the poet is so fond. See note to 6.2.14.

21. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

22. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Following verse 22, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [151*]: "When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, had heard that speech of Vibhīṣaṇa, he dismissed all those present and withdrew into his own residence."

Following sarga 9, D5–7,10,11,S and all printed editions of the southern text insert a passage of four hundred seventeen lines [App. I, No. 3, 417 lines] (= GPP, VSP, KK, Gita Press, and NSP 6.10–15). Some N manuscripts also insert segments of this passage (see critical edition, p. 905). Following is a summary of the passage (see Introduction, p. 107): [Lines 1–65 = GPP 6.10]: On the dawn of the next day, Vibhīṣaṇa, having come to a decision as to what was in the interest of righteousness and policy, enters Rāvaṇa's palace, which is densely described as being like a great mountain peak, with splendid rooms, and filled with wise and devoted ministers and capable rāksasas. It is replete with elephants, and resounding with the sound of conches and musical instruments. Crowded with beautiful women and covered with gold and precious gems, it resembles a palace of the gandharvas or a mansion of the great serpents.[1–14] There he hears the holy sounds of the recitation of the vedas and hymns invoking victory for Rāvaṇa, and sees many brahmans.[15–18] Honored by the rākṣasas and shining with his own blazing energy, he makes his obeisance to his mighty brother, who is seated on the throne.[19–20] Knowing proper etiquette, he takes a seat that his brother, with his glance, indicates for him.[21–22] Then, in that chamber containing only the two brothers and Rāvaṇa's ministers, he offers his wholesome advice to the king.[23–24] He ingratiates himself with Rāvaṇa and then delivers a speech that is appropriate to the time and place.[25–26] He tells Rāvaṇa that, ever since the time of Sītā's arrival, evil omens have been seen.[27–28] The sacrificial fires are smoky and throw out sparks, even though they are properly fed; lizards have appeared in the fire shrines, and the oblations are swarming with ants.[29–32] Milk trickles out from the udders of the cows, while the war-elephants seem listless. The horses neigh disconsolately and take no pleasure in their fodder. Donkeys, camels, and mules have their hair bristling, and weep, and, despite being looked after solicitously, they do not recover their normal state.[33–36] Savage crows flock on every side, cawing continually. They are seen gathering on the roofs of palaces.[37–38] Flocks of vultures descend upon the city, and jackals howl ominously at dawn and dusk.[39–40] Beasts of prey mass at the city gates, and their loud and harsh cries are heard continually.[41–42] This being the case, Vibhīṣaṇa argues, it would be appropriate to make some expiation. Rāvaṇa should resolve to return Sītā to Rāma.[43–44] He begs Rāvaṇa not to be angry with him, even if he feels that he is speaking out of delusion or personal interest, since these calamitous portents have been noted by all the male and female rākṣasas of the town and inner apartments.[45–48] Vibhīṣaṇa tells Rāvaṇa that all the counselors are hesitant to give him this counsel, but he himself is obligated to report what he has seen and heard. Vibhīṣaṇa advises Rāvaṇa that he must act in the proper fashion after due consideration.[49–51] Upon receiving this beneficial and cogent advice, Rāvaṇa becomes annoyed and replies.[52–57] He says that he sees no danger from any quarter and vows that Rāghava shall never recover Sītā. He boasts that Rāma cannot withstand him even were he to be accompanied by the gods, including Indra.[58–61]. Having spoken in this fashion, mighty Rāvaṇa, who had destroyed the armies of the gods, dismisses Vibhīṣaṇa.[62–65]

[Lines 66–141 = GPP 6.11]: Having become emaciated in his unfulfilled desire for Sītā, and because of the disdain in which he has come to be held by his friends because of his sinful actions, Rāvaṇa, obsessed with Sītā for a long time, at last summons his council of ministers and friends.[66–70] He mounts a great bejeweled and gilded chariot that rumbles like a great storm cloud and proceeds to his assembly hall accompanied by armed soldiers.[71–74] He is accompanied by well-dressed and richly adorned rākṣasas on every side, along with great chariot-warriors mounted in chariots and those mounted on rutting elephants and swift horses.[75–80] His retinue is armed with all manner of weapons, and his passage is heralded by thousands of musical instruments and conches which make a mighty sound.[81–84] His great chariot rolls splendidly along, making the royal highway resound with the rumbling of its wheels.[85–86] His royal umbrella is as bright as the full moon, while to his right and left, yak-tail flywhisks are adorned with gold and crystal. As he passes, Rāvaṇa is rendered obeisance by the rākṣasas, who cup their hands in reverence and bow their heads to him, praising him with hymns of victory.[87–93] Mighty Rāvaṇa reaches his splendid assembly hall, all covered with gold, silver, and crystal. Blazing with its own splendor and covered with gold and fine fabrics, it is guarded by six hundred piśācas.[94–97] He enters his council hall, which was built by Viśvakarman, and there takes his seat on a great, splendid lapis throne, covered with costly deerskins and cushions.[98–100] He then orders swift messengers to assemble quickly all the rākṣasas at that place, telling them that some very important matter is at hand.[101–103] On hearing his commands, those rākṣasas move about Laṅkā, through all the houses, gardens, and parks, fearlessly mustering the other rākṣasas.[104–106] The rākṣasas come by horses, elephants, and chariots, and by foot. Filled with their speeding chariots, elephants, and horses, the city resembles the sky filled with birds.[107–110] Parking their various mounts and vehicles, the rākṣasas enter the assembly hall on foot, like lions entering a mountain cave.[111–112] After touching the king's feet and being honored by him, they sit, some on seats, some on mats, and some on the bare ground.[113–114] Assembled at the king's command in the assembly hall, the rākṣasas attend upon their lord in due order.[115–116] All the king's ministers and counselors, who are endowed with every virtue and learned in all matters, assemble by the hundreds as do many warrior-heroes, gathering in the gilded assembly hall for the well-being and happiness of all.[117–121] At this point, the illustrious Vibhīṣaṇa arrives mounted in a splendid chariot.[122–125] Vibhīṣaṇa praises his elder brother and bows at his feet.[126–127] Śuka and Prahasta arrive and are given seats according to their rank. The fragrance of the garlands, aloe, and sandalpaste, worn by those exquisitely dressed and richly ornamented rākṣasas in the assembly hall, wafts on all sides.[129–133] They do not chatter idly, and none of them tells a falsehood; they do not speak loudly. All those champions of fierce valor, who had accomplished their goals, gaze at the face of their lord.[134–136] In that assembly of armed, haughty, and powerful warriors, haughty Rāvaṇa shines with his own splendor as does Indra, wielder of the vajra in the midst of the Vasus.[137–141]

[Lines 142–229 = GPP 6.12]: Gazing at the assembly, Rāvaṇa, conqueror in battle, commands the general of his army, Prahasta.[142–143] He tells him that he is to order the troops of all the fourfold divisions under his command to defend the city.[144–145] Prahasta, obedient and wishing to carry out his orders, disposes his troops both inside and outside the palace.[146–147] Then, having disposed his troops for the protection of the city, Prahasta returns and takes his seat, telling the king that his forces have been disposed both inside and outside so that Rāvaṇa can, without any concern, do as he pleases.[148–152] Upon hearing the reassuring words of Prahasta, Rāvaṇa, eager for happiness, speaks in the midst of all his friends, telling them that they are the authorities with respect to what is pleasurable and what is not pleasurable, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, what is beneficial and harmful, in all difficult matters of righteousness, pleasure, and polity.[153–155] He reminds them that all of his undertakings performed with them and assisted by their counsel and actions have always proven successful. He expresses confidence that together with them he will attain glory, just as did Vāsava together with the moon, the planets, the constellations, and the gods.[156–159] He announces that he was prepared to inform them fully but that he could not fully discuss the matter because Kumbhakarṇa had been asleep.[160–161] He notes, however, that mighty Kumbhakarṇa, who has been asleep for six months[1] and is the foremost of all those who bear arms, is now present.[162–163] Rāvaṇa then tells the assembly how he had abducted Sītā from the Daṇḍaka Forest but that she refuses to come to his bed.[164–165] He goes on at some length about how he regards her as the most beautiful woman in the three worlds, listing her many charms, including her slender waist, her broad hips, her moonlike face, her golden complexion, and so on. He confesses that the sight of her beautiful red-soled feet kindled a blazing passion within him and that he has become a slave of love where she is concerned.[166–173] He describes his pangs of passion for the beautiful woman and tells his counselors that she begged a year's grace period[2] from him in the hopes that her husband might come. He remarks that he has granted this request but is now exhausted from his constant desire, like a horse that has traveled a long road.[174–181] He expresses doubts as to whether Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and the monkeys can possibly cross the vast ocean filled with great creatures but acknowledges that, on the other hand, a single monkey was able to wreak great havoc in his city. He confesses that the outcomes of affairs are difficult to know and urges each of his counselors to speak his mind.[182–185] He notes that he has no fear of men but, nonetheless, urges his counselors to reflect. He reminds them that with their help he has achieved victory in his wars with the gods and the asuras.[186–187] He notes that Sugrīva and his monkeys have reached the farther shore of the sea with Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and that, having discovered Sītā's whereabouts, they are camped by the sea.[188–190] He urges his counselors to devise some strategy in keeping with good policy such that Sītā will not have to be given up and the two sons of Daśaratha can be slain.[191–192] Rāvaṇa notes that he can conceive of nobody in the world as having the ability to cross the ocean with monkeys and so he is sure of victory.[193–194] At this point, Kumbhakarṇa, having listened to the complaints of Rāvaṇa, who was overwhelmed with lust, grows angry and addresses him.[195–196] He tells Rāvaṇa that he should have taken the advice of his ministers before so rashly abducting Sītā.[197–200] Kumbhakarṇa lectures Rāvaṇa on the proper behavior of kings, reminding him that he should have consulted with his ministers earlier and telling him that a king who carries out his royal duties according to proper policy will not have reason to regret them afterward.[201–204] He reminds Rāvaṇa that actions taken without recourse to proper means are as fruitless as oblations made in an impure sacrifice.[205–206] He argues that someone who does later what he should have done first, and vice versa, is unable to distinguish good from bad policy.[207–208] He notes that an unstable person who acts only on the basis of his superior strength is taken advantage of by others, as is the gap in the Krauñca mountain by the birds [who fly through it].[3] [209–210] He adds that, in having thoughtlessly undertaken this action, Rāvaṇa is lucky that Rāma did not kill him on the spot as would poisoned meat.[211–212] Then, despite this critique, Kumbhakarṇa vows to rectify the situation by slaying Rāvaṇa's enemies,[213–214] promising to root them out, even should they be Śakra, Vivasvān, Agni, the purifier, Māruta, Kubera, or Varuṇa.[215–217] For he claims that even Indra himself, smasher of citadels, would fear him, with his mountainous body, his great iron club, and his sharp fangs as he roars in battle.[218–219] He reassures Rāvaṇa that even if Rāma should strike him with a second arrow, he, Kumbhakarṇa, will still drink his blood.[220–221] He promises that he will make every effort to bring victory to Rāvaṇa by killing Rāma and that, once he has slain him and Lakṣmaṇa, he will devour all the leaders of the monkey troops.[222–225] Kumbhakarṇa concludes his speech by telling Rāvaṇa to enjoy himself and do as he pleases, for once he, Kumbhakarṇa, has sent Rāma to the abode of Yama, Sītā will be under Rāvaṇa's control forever.[226–229]

[Lines 230–273 = GPP 6.13] Now the powerful rākṣasa Mahāpārśva, seeing how angry Rāvaṇa is, thinks for a moment and then addresses him.[230–231] He asks Rāvaṇa why, since he has nothing and no one to fear, he does not force himself upon Sītā, arguing that a person who does not, for example, avail himself of the honey he finds in the woods is a fool, and then advising Rāvaṇa that he should force himself upon Sītā in the manner of a rooster, placing his foot, as it were, on his enemies' head.[232–237] He reassures Rāvaṇa that after taking his pleasure with Sītā, if he still faces danger, the rākṣasas, including Kumbhakarṇa, Indrajit, etc., who are capable of driving off even the vajra-wielding Indra, will come to his aid.[239–241] He urges Rāvaṇa to reject the nonviolent means of dealing with one's rivals and to accomplish his ends through force.[242–243] He reassures him that he and the other rākṣasas will deal with any enemies that come.[244–245] Upon hearing the words of Mahāpārśva, Rāvaṇa praises him but then relates by way of explanation a secret tale.[246–248] He tells of how long ago he spied the woman Puñjikasthalā[4], who was on her way to the abode of Brahmā. Rāvaṇa stripped and raped her so that she arrived at Brahmā's abode in a disheveled state.[249–253] As a result of this transgression, Brahmā cursed Rāvaṇa to the effect that should he ever from that day forward take a woman by force, his head would shatter into one hundred pieces.[254–257] It is in fear of this curse, Rāvaṇa continues, that he does not force Sītā to his bed.[5] [258–259] Rāvaṇa then begins to boast about his own enormous strength and prowess, vowing to slay Rāma in battle with his immensely powerful arrows and claiming that his forces will annihilate the host of his enemies. He boasts that not even the gods can defeat him and remarks that he had earlier conquered the city of Laṅkā, which had been ruled by Kubera Vaiśravaṇa.[260–273]

[Lines 274–361 = GPP 6.14. This section is composed entirely in upajāti meter.] Upon hearing the speech of Rāvaṇa and the blustering of Kumbhakarṇa, Vibhīṣaṇa once more addresses the rākṣasa king with beneficial and sensible words.[274–277] He asks why Rāvaṇa has chosen to abduct Sītā, whom he likens metaphorically to a venomous serpent.[278–281] He urges Rāvaṇa once more to return Sītā to Rāma before the monkeys overrun Laṅkā [282–285] and before Rāma's swift and powerful arrows behead the rākṣasa champions.[286–289] He argues that none of the great rākṣasa warriors, Kumbhakarṇa, Indrajit, and so forth, are able to withstand Rāma in battle.[290–293] He warns Rāvaṇa that he will not be able to escape Rāma alive, even should he be protected by Savitṛ, or the Maruts, or even should he seek shelter with Indra or the god of death himself, or even should he flee into the sky or the underworld.[294–297] Prahasta then replies to Vibhīṣaṇa's words by noting that the rākṣasas have never been afraid of anyone, not even the gods, dānavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, great serpents, or mighty birds.[298–303] How then, he continues, should they ever fear in battle Rāma, the son of a mere lord of men.[304–305] Vibhīṣaṇa, whose mind was fixed in righteousness, polity, and pleasure, however, desiring only what is good for the king, responds to Prahasta's pernicious speech with very meaningful words.[306–309] He chides Prahasta, saying that the things that he and the other rākṣasas are saying in regard to Rāma are as impossible as it would be for an evil person to obtain heaven.[310–313] He claims that he himself or Prahasta or indeed all the rākṣasas could no more compass the death of the supremely competent Rāma than can a person cross the mighty ocean without a boat.[314–317] He notes that even the gods would be baffled by the great chariot-warrior Rāma, a king born in the race of the Ikṣvākus and competent in all actions.[318–321] He tells Prahasta that he is only able to boast because Rāma's sharp and irresistible arrows fletched with heron feathers have not yet ripped through his body.[322–329] Vibhīṣaṇa states once again that none of the powerful rākṣasas, such as Kumbhakarṇa, Indrajit, and the others, are able to withstand Rāma, the equal of Śakra, in battle.[330–337] He argues further that the king, who is by nature impetuous, given to acting without reflection, and a victim of addictions, is being counseled by friends who are, in effect, acting as enemies.[338–341] He argues that the counselors should, instead, be striving to free, by force if necessary, Rāvaṇa from his disastrous situation, which he likens to the coils of a mighty, terrifying thousand-headed serpent.[342–345] He tells the rākṣasas that, as his friends, they should all collectively save their king, even to the point of dragging him by the hair, as one might a person possessed by powerful spirits.[346–349] He goes on to advise them that it is fitting that they should join forces to rescue their master, who is drowning in the deep waters of the ocean that is Rāghava and on the point of falling into the pit of Pātāla, that underworld that is Kākutstha.[350–353] Vibhīṣaṇa then offers his own opinion, which he believes to be highly beneficial to the king, his friends, as well as the city and its rākṣasas. He argues that they should give the prince back his wife.[354–357] He concludes by stating that a counselor should always give suitable and beneficial advice to his master after duly taking into consideration the strength of one's enemy, one's own strength, and the advisability on behalf of one's own party of advancing, retreating, or maintaining the status quo.[358–361]

[Lines 362–417 = GPP 6.15; This section is composed entirely in upajāti meter.] Indrajit, foremost general of the rākṣasas, having barely controlled himself while listening to the words of Vibhīṣaṇa, who was the equal in wisdom of Bṛhaspati, now responds,[362–365] asking how dare his dear junior uncle utter such senseless and timid words, when even a person not born in their great lineage would not do so.[366–369] He tells his father that Vibhīṣaṇa is the only one in the family that lacks the virtues of strength, valor, courage, fortitude, heroism, and blazing energy.[370–373] He asks why Vibhīṣaṇa is so fearful as to try to frighten them, when these two princes could be easily killed by any ordinary rākṣasa.[374–377] He boasts that he himself had dragged Śakra, king of the gods and lord of the three worlds, down to earth while all the hosts of the gods had fled in all directions in fear of him,[378–381] that he had thrown down Indra's mighty war-elephant, Airāvata, who trumpeted discordantly as his tusks were ripped out, and that he had thus terrified all the hosts of the gods.[382–385] He concludes by asking how he, who was so powerful as to crush the pride of the gods and bring grief to the foremost among the daityas, would not be able to deal with these two ordinary human princes.[386–389] But Vibhīṣaṇa, foremost among those who bear weapons, gives a sensible reply to that irresistible warrior, the equal of Indra.[390–393] He chides Indrajit as an immature child, unskilled in counsel, who is prattling senseless words to his own destruction.[394–397] He tells him that in speaking as Rāvaṇa's son he is really an enemy in the guise of a friend, since he is encouraging his father even after hearing about the destruction that awaits him at the hands of Rāma.[398–401] He claims that Indrajit is a fool who deserves to be put to death, as does whoever brought him, rash child that he is, into the assembly of counselors.[402–405] He reviles Indrajit as an undisciplined, hot-headed, and ignorant fool, who speaks only childish nonsense.[406–409] He asks who can withstand the blazing arrows loosed in battle by Rāghava, which glow like the staff of Brahmā, resemble the staff of Yama, and look like death itself.[410–413] Vibhīṣaṇa concludes by telling Rāvaṇa that they should give back queen Sītā, along with gifts of wealth, jewels, ornaments, divine garments, etc., so that the rākṣasas can live happily.[414–417]

[1]"who has been asleep for six months" suptaḥ ṣaṇmāsān: The wakefulness of Kumbhakarṇa and his participation in the council accords poorly with the latter passages where Kumbhakarṇa must be awakened from his long slumber and shows no awareness of his having been involved in prior deliberations about Rāvaṇa holding Sītā captive. This only serves to confirm that this passage cannot be part of the oldest stratum of the text. See 6.49.26 and notes. See R. Goldman 2003b and 2006b.

[2]"year's grace period" saṃvatsaraṃ kālam: In the Sundarakāṇḍa we are told of the two months [remaining of the year]. See 5.20.8–9 and notes.

[3]"gap in the Krauñca mountain" krauñcasya kham iva: Literally, "the space in the Krauñca." See 6.51.19 and notes.

[4]"Puñjikasthalā" puñjikasthalām: See notes to 1026*, following notes to 6.48.7, where Cm identifies Puñjikasthalā as Varuṇa's daughter. See, too, 4.65.8–9, where an apsaras named Puñjikasthalā is identified with Hanumān's mother. Cf. S. Goldman 1999.

[5]This episode is parallel to, but seems to contradict, the better-known story found at Uttarakāṇḍa 26, where it is the apsaras Rambhā, whom Rāvaṇa assaults, and Nalakūbara who issues the curse. Cs is greatly concerned by the discrepancy and discusses it at length, citing passages from the Uttarakāṇḍa and the Rāmopākhyāna of the Mahābhārata (MBh 3.275.32: nalakūbaraśāpena); MBh 3.275.33: yadi hy akāmām āsevet striyam anyām api dhruvam / śatadhāsya phaled dehe ity uktaḥ so 'bhavat purā). He rationalizes the contradiction on the grounds that the two events must have taken place in different kalpas (kalpe kalpe). See notes to 1026*, following notes to 6.48.7.

Sarga 10

1. "sound" suniviṣṭam: Literally, "concentrated, fixed, settled." We generally follow the interpretation of Ct and Ck, who gloss, "valid (arthatattvam)." Cm explains the term as "properly grounded in good conduct (suṣṭhu vinītiniṣṭham)." Cg expends considerable effort explaining why Rāvaṇa should react so harshly to such excellent and well-intended advice. This explanation leads Cg into a brief discussion of the etymology of Rāvaṇa's name, a favorite topic of the commentators. He explains that it can be understood in two ways, that is, "he who causes others to weep (rodayati) since he is known throughout the world as engaging in injury to others (parahiṃsāyāṃ jagadviditaḥ), and he who roars or bellows (rauti)." See, too, notes to 6.8.12.

"impelled as he was by his own impending doom" kālacoditaḥ: Literally, impelled by Kāla. See note to 6.57.8.

2. "with one's enemy" sapatnena: The idea, as articulated by Cg, for example, is that living with an internal enemy is even more to be avoided than living with an [avowed] enemy or a serpent (śatrusarpasahavāsād api sahajaśatrusahavāsaḥ sudūraṃ parihartavya iti bhāvaḥ). Cg understands the implication of this remark to be that Vibhīṣaṇa should leave the city at once (atas tvayāsmān nagarāt sadyo gantavyam iti dyotyate).

"false friend" mitrapravādena: Literally, "one who declares himself as a friend."

"in the service of one's foes" śatrusevinā: Ct understands this term to suggest Vibhīṣaṇa's devotion to the Lord [Rāma] (anenāsya bhagavadbhaktatvaṃ sūcitam). Cr takes the term to suggest that Rāvaṇa has already determined that Vibhīṣaṇa is an ally of Rāma (etena vibhīṣaṇo rāmasaṃsargīti rāvaṇasya niścayo dhvanitaḥ).

3. "Kinsmen . . . in one another's" jñātīnāṃ jñātayaḥ: Literally, "Kinsmen . . . in kinsmen's."

4. "leader" pradhānam: Literally, "first, foremost." Ct and Ck understand this to be a reference to Rāvaṇa, who holds the kingship because he is the eldest (jyeṣṭhatvādīnāṃ prāptarājyam). Cr understands similarly. Cg explains, "the most outstanding in his family (svajātiśreṣṭham)." This interpretation is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 33).

"competent" sādhakam: Literally, "effective, efficient." Ct, Ck, and Cr see this as a reference to Rāvaṇa's discharging the functions of the king (rājakāryanirvāhakam—so Cr). Cg, Crā, Cv, and Cm, who read the variant sādhanam, explain similarly.

5. "affecting pleasure in one's company" anyonyasaṃhṛṣṭāḥ: Our translation follows the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "outwardly manifesting affection (bahiḥsnehavanta iva sthitāḥ)." Ct, Cr, and Ck, and the translators who follow them construe the adjective with the locative vyasaneṣu in pāda b, yielding the sense "delighting in one another's calamities."

"they turn on one in times of trouble" vyasaneṣu ātatāyinaḥ: Literally, "inimical or murderous in calamities." As a consequence of their reading of the previous phrase, the two "schools" of southern commentators must read this phrase differently as well. As noted above, Cg, whom we have followed, construes vyasaneṣu with ātatāyinaḥ, yielding "they are hostile in [times of] trouble." Ct, Ck, and Cr construe vyasaneṣu with the previous phrase, as noted above. This reading leaves ātatāyinaḥ as a separate modifier in its basic sense of "malicious, inimical, hostile." Ct and Ck quote a verse in which the six ātatāyins are catalogued as "the arsonist, the poisoner, an armed person, the thief of property, one who steals land, and a wife-stealer—these are the six inimical ones (agnido garadaś caiva śastrapāṇir dhanāpahaḥ, kṣetradāraharaś caiva ṣaḍ ete ātatāyinaḥ)." Apte (s.v. ātatāyin) cites a similar verse from the Śukranītiśāstra.

"Concealing their true feelings" pracchannahṛdayāḥ: Literally, "whose hearts are hidden."

6. "There are these well-known verses" śrūyante . . . ślokāḥ: Literally, "verses or ślokas are heard." Cr suggests that Rāvaṇa heard these verses from the lips of his elders (vṛddhānāṃ mukhato 'śrauṣam ity arthaḥ), while Cg understands that they have been passed down by word of mouth (vaktṛparaṃparayā).

"in the Padmavana by some elephants" hastibhiḥ . . . padmavane: Literally, "by elephants . . . in the lotus forest." Ct and Ck explain that these are elephants of the heavenly forest, dwelling in the Padmavana, which we may then assume to be a heavenly forest (padmavanavartidivyavanagajaiḥ).

"ropes to snare them" pāśa-: Literally, "snare, noose." Cg glosses, "ropes to capture elephants (pāśāḥ gajagrahaṇarajjavaḥ)."

7. In our opinion, all the dangers alluded to are parts of the process of capturing wild elephants for domestication. Since the process relies on the use of previously domesticated elephants to corral their wild cousins, the verse focuses on this perceived betrayal as more perilous than the mere tools of men.

"intent on their own self-interest" svārthaprayuktāḥ: Literally, "focused on their own goals." The idea, of course, as indicated by Cr and Ct, is that the tame elephants betray their wild kin in order to obtain the excellent food, etc. [doled out by their keepers] (uttamabhojanalābhādisvārthaparāḥ—so Ct).

8. "they who point out" ete vakṣyanti: Literally, "they will declare."

9. D6,10,11,T2,3,G, and the texts and printed editions of Ct transpose pādas 9b and 9d.

"wealth" sampannam: Literally, "arrived at, possessed of." Cg and Cm gloss, "prosperity, wealth (saṃpattiḥ)." Cattle are, of course, a major index of wealth in traditional India. Ct, Cr, and Ck understand the reference here to be the wealth that enables the performance of sacrificial rites to the gods and deceased ancestors (havyakavyasādhanasaṃpat—so Ct).

"self-restraint" damaḥ: D10,11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute tapaḥ, "asceticism."

10. "dear brother" saumya: Literally, "dear or gentle one." Crā, noting what seems apparent in this context, suggests that this term of endearment here is an example of the figure of speech called ākṣepokti, "indirect," or, in this case, "ironic." See Gerow (1971, pp. 124–25) for a full discussion of the rhetorical device ākṣepa.

"that I have attained universal sovereignty" aiśvāryam abhijātaḥ: Literally, "[that] I was born to lordship." We follow Cg and Cm, who gloss abhijātaḥ as "obtained, attained (prāptaḥ)."

"I have set my foot on the heads of my enemies" ripūṇāṃ mūrdhni ca sthitaḥ: Literally, "[I] stand on the head of my enemies."

D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of ten lines [156*]: "Just as drops of water that have fallen on lotus leaves do not adhere, so is it with affection lavished upon the unworthy.[1–2] As it is with the honeybee, which in its thirst sips at the kāśa flower but finds no nectar there, so is it with affection lavished upon the unworthy.[3–4] As it is with the elephant who having first bathed then takes up dust with his trunk to soil his own body, so it is with affection lavished upon the unworthy.[5–6] As it is with the honeybee who in its thirst finds nectar and then departs—and you are just the same—so it is with affection lavished upon the unworthy.[7–8] As it is with clouds in autumn, which sprinkle and rumble but fail to produce any heavy rain,[1] so it is with affection lavished upon the unworthy.[9–10]"

[1]"heavy rain" ambusaṃkledaḥ: Literally, "wetting or soaking with water."

Various manuscripts and the printed editions of the southern commentators transpose several of the lines of this passage.

11. "would have died" na bhavet: Literally, "he would not exist." As Cr and Cg note, Rāvaṇa is saying that he would have had anyone else killed on the spot (vinaśyeta nāśayeyam iti yāvat).

"To hell with you" tvāṃ tu dhik: Cg explains this common curse here to mean, "I renounce you (tyakṣyāmīty arthaḥ)." Ct notes that, since Vibhīṣaṇa cannot be executed because he is Rāvaṇa's brother, this curse is to be considered his punishment (sodaratvena vadhānarhatvād dhikkṛtir eva te daṇḍa iti bhāvaḥ).

12. "four other rākṣasas" caturbhiḥ saha rākṣasaiḥ: According to Ct and Ck, these are Vibhīṣaṇa's counselors. They are named below at 6.28.7 (see ad loc. and notes). See, too, 6.11.3 and notes.

13. "hovering in midair" antarikṣagataḥ: Literally, "gone into the atmosphere." It is not uncommon for supernatural beings, when wronged, to prophesy their oppressors' doom from a position in the sky. Compare BhāgP 10.4.9–12, where Yogamāyā rises into the sky to foretell the destruction of Kaṃsa.

"to his brother" bhrātaram: B1,D10,11,M2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhrātā vai, "his brother [Vibhīsaṇa spoke]."

14. "brother" bhrātā: T1 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhrāntaḥ, "in error or deluded."

Following 14ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [158*]: "An elder is to be respected just as is one's father, but [you] have not followed the path of righteousness."

15. "ten-headed Rāvaṇa" daśānana: Literally, "O ten-faced one."

17. "burning house" pradīptaṃ śaraṇam: Here the word śaraṇam, which normally means "refuge, resort," is used in its less common meaning, "dwelling, house, abode." See 6.12.11 and note. Cf. note to 6.13.13.

19. D5–7,10,11,S insert one line [163*]: "So, as my elder, please excuse what I said, in my desire for your welfare."

21. "in my desire for your well-being" mayā hitaiṣiṇā: Literally, "by me desiring well-being [for you]."

"whose time is at hand" parītakālāḥ: Literally, "whose time has lapsed." Ñ1,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead parāntakāle, "in [their] final moments."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 11

1. Cg is greatly concerned about what could be argued to be Vibhīṣaṇa's betrayal of Rāvaṇa. He takes this verse as a starting point for a lengthy disquisition on the Śrī-vaiṣṇava doctrine of taking refuge with the Lord, even though it may involve the betrayal of other venerable but flawed figures, such as Daśaratha, in the case of Lakṣmaṇa, and Rāvaṇa, in the case of Vibhīṣaṇa. He describes the loyalty to elders as the general, or sāmānya, dharma over which the special, or viśeṣa, dharma, or worship of the Lord, must take precedence. Cm, much more concisely, expresses the same points.

"The moment . . . had finished speaking . . . he went" ity uktvā . . . ājagāma muhūrtena: Literally, "having spoken, he came in a moment."

2. "standing on the ground" mahīsthāḥ: Ctś offers two explanations. The first is that the monkeys are on guard duty all around the encampment, and their looking into the sky is a sign of their extraordinary watchfulness. The second is that the monkeys, who had been resting in trees, etc., come to earth to surround Rāma [protectively]

when they see Vibhīṣaṇa approaching. (mahīsthā bhūmau parito rakṣaṇaniyuktā ākāśastham api dadṛśur iti jāgarūkatvātirekaḥ. yadvā mahīsthās tatra tatra vṛkṣādiṣu sthitāḥ sarve tadātva eva gaganasthaṃ dṛṣṭvā rāmaṃ paryavārayan.)

"there in the sky" gaganastham: Cg notes that this suggests that the monkeys were able to see Vibhīṣaṇa from a considerable distance and indicates that Vibhīṣaṇa may have been hesitating to "land" out of anxiety that the monkeys, who were devoted to Rāma, would not admit him (rāmabhaktā vānarā nāsmāt praveśayiṣyantīti kampaḥ).

"resembling the peak of Mount Meru and blazing like lightning" meruśikharākāraṃ dīptām iva śatahradām: The various commentators point out that the basis for the first simile is Vibhīṣaṇa's height, breadth, and abundance of jewels, and the second, his radiance and location in the sky (unnatatvapīvaratvaratnabahulatvādibhir meruśikharatulyam . . . tejiṣṭhatvagaganasaṃcārābhyāṃ vidyuddṛṣṭāntaḥ).

Following verse 2, Ñ2,V1,3,B,D7,9–11,G2,3,M (D6 inserts after 6.10.20), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators (NSP and GPP 6.17.3–4, and the verses are inverted; VSP, bracketed unnumbered verses between 6.17.2 and 3; KK 6.17.3–4, in brackets) insert a passage of four lines [167*]: "Black, with the shape of a man, and resembling a cloud or a mountain, that majestic rākṣasa[1] was flying through the air carrying a noose, the weapon of Dharma.[2] [1–2] And those four followers of his, fearsome in their valor, were similarly equipped with armor and weapons and glittered with their ornaments.[3] [3–4]"

[1]"majestic rākṣasa" śrīmān: Literally, "the majestic one."

[2]"carrying a noose, the weapon of Dharma" dharmāyudhadharaḥ: Literally, "bearing the weapon of Dharma." The reading is awkward. Variants include "bearing excellent weapons (varāyudhadharaḥ)" and "bearing every weapon (sarvāyudhadharaḥ)."

The texts and translations of the southern commentators read a substantially different version of lines 1 and 2. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sa ca [hi—D7] meghācalaprakhyo vajrāyudhasamaprabhaḥ / varāyudhadharo vīro divyābharaṇabhūṣitaḥ, "Resembling a cloud or a mountain, and as lustrous as the vajra weapon, holding an excellent weapon, that hero adorned with divine ornaments." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read mahendrasamavikramaḥ, "equal in valor to great Indra," for vajrāyudhasamaprabhaḥ, "as lustrous as the vajra weapon," and sarvāyudhadharaḥ, "holding every [sort of] weapon," for varāyudhadharaḥ, "holding an excellent weapon."

[3]"glittered with their ornaments" bhūṣaṇaiś ca babhāsire: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead bhūṣaṇottamabhūṣitāḥ, "adorned with the finest ornaments."

3. "his four companions" tam ātmapañcamam: Literally, "him, who had himself for a fifth." The reference is to Vibhīṣaṇa's four rākṣasa companions mentioned at 6.10.12. According to Cg, the names of the companions are Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa. See, too, 6.10.12; 6.13.2; 6.28.7,32; 6.71.2; and notes.

6. "sāla trees" sālān: Shorea robusta or Vatica robusta. These are stout trees with hard wood about a hundred feet tall. In the remainder of the battle the monkeys often use them as weapons.

7. "evil-minded creatures" durātmanām: Literally, "of evil-minded ones."

"Let them fall . . . slain" nipatantu hatāś caite: D3,10,11,M1,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nipatanti hatā yāvat, "so that they fall, slain."

"their lives cut short" alpajīvitāḥ: Literally, "who have little life [remaining]." The latter element of the compound, -jīvitāḥ, is marked as uncertain in the critical edition. Ś,Ñ1,D1–5,8,12,T1,M1,2 read -cetasaḥ, "mind," while D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -cetanāḥ, "mind," both of which lend the compound the sense of "stupid." D6,7,T3,G1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read -tejasaḥ, "energy, power," giving the compound the sense of "weak, feeble." Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D9 read rudhirokṣitāḥ, "splattered with blood." The various translators follow different readings here: Dutt (1893, p. 1145), "limited as is the tenure of their life"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 37), "weaklings"; Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 35), "puny creatures"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 42), "peu de sens"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1419), "endowed as they are with poor vitality"; and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 176), "bagnati del loro sangue."

8. "Now, as they were conversing with one another" teṣāṃ saṃbhāṣamāṇānām anyonyam: Ct, Cm, and Cg read the absolute as the genitive of disrespect (anādare ṣaṣṭhī), arguing that, in his profound faith in Rāma's compassion, Vibhīṣaṇa pays no attention to the monkeys despite their words and actions (tān anyonyaṃ saṃbhāṣamāṇān anādṛtya rāmasya bhagavataḥ paramadayālutvabhāvanayā teṣām anādaraḥ—so Ct). Crā understands this as a vyatyayena ṣaṣṭhī, or a genitive of opposition. Ck understands it as a bhāvalakṣaṇe ṣaṣṭhī and reads it as equivalent to a locative absolute, sati saptamī.

"hovered there in the sky" khastha eva vyatiṣṭhata: Ct, Cg, and Cm argue that the repetition of the forms derived from $\sqrt{}$sthā suggests the calm and fearless way in which Vibhīṣaṇa waits, facing the hostile monkeys (khastha eva vyatiṣṭhateti tiṣṭhater dvihprayogo nirbhayatvenāvasthānasūcanāya—so Ct).

9. "and the other monkeys" tāṃś ca: Literally, "and them."

10. Ct, Cg, and Cm are eager to demonstrate that each of the terms used by Vibhīṣaṇa here has a specific connotation and that, in making this declaration, Vibhīṣaṇa is opening with a statement of his own flaws (doṣas) and is not to be construed as boasting of his relationship with Rāvaṇa. According to Ct and Cg, Rāvaṇa's name suggests its bearer's oppression of all the worlds, while the term "evil (durvṛttaḥ)" indicates his commission of wrongful acts. The generic term rākṣasa shows that he is cruel by nature, while the designation "lord of the rākṣasas" indicates that he has evil followers as well. The commentators further feel that Vibhīṣaṇa's self-identification as the younger brother of Rāvaṇa is an admission of his implication in his brother's crimes and his abjection in abandoning his pride. (rāvaṇatvena sarvalokapīḍakatvam. durvṛttatvenākṛtyakartṛtvam. rākṣasatvena jātikrauryam. rākṣaseśvara ity anena bhṛtyakrauryam. tadbhrātṛtvena svasyāpi doṣavattvakathanād garvahānirūpakārpaṇyam uktam.)

11. "closely guarded by rākṣasa women" rākṣasībhiḥ surakṣitā: Ct advances a curious notion that this phrase suggests the preservation of Sītā's fidelity to her husband. For, he argues, if her chastity had been compromised, what purpose would have been served by guarding her (anena sītāpātivratyāhāniḥ sūcitā tad dhānau hi tābhī rakṣaṇānupayoga iti bhāvaḥ).

Cg notes that Sītā is so well guarded that even someone learned in the nine systems of grammar would not have been able to gain access to her (āśvāsakanavavyākaraṇapaṇḍitasyāpi yathā na praveśas tathā rakṣitā). The term "knowing substance of the nine systems of grammar"(navavyākaraṇārthavettṛ) can also be found as a qualification of Hanumān, in praise of his wisdom, at Uttarakāṇḍa 36.41 (in an interpolation found in a southern manuscript, M3 [730*]).

12. Ctś attempts to fill what he sees as a gap in Vibhīṣaṇa's statement, saying that Vibhīṣaṇa is anticipating and accepting that he should have come to Rāma the moment Rāvaṇa abducted Sītā and that it was wrong of him to stay and argue with his brother (sītāharaṇasamakālam evāgamanaṃ mamocitaṃ tathā kṛtvā tasya hitaṃ vaktuṃ vilambito 'ham eva pāpīyān iti).

13. "dying man" viparītaḥ: The term almost invariably means "perverse, inverted." Nonetheless, given the context, we have accepted the universal interpretation of the commentators, who gloss, "about to die (mumūrṣuḥ)."

15. "great" mahātmane: In keeping with their strongly theological reading of this verse, Śrīvaiṣṇava commentators are inclined to read this common epithet in a vedāntic sense. Thus Cm glosses, "Supreme Spirit (paramātmane)."

"the refuge of all the worlds" sarvalokaśaraṇyāya: Ct, Cg, Cm, and Ck indicate that Vibhīṣaṇa is aware of Rāma's salvific power as a result of the boon given by Brahmā's son Viśravas to his wife, Vibhīṣaṇa's mother, Kaikasī, that her son would be supremely righteous. See Uttarakāṇḍa 9.

"have come to him for shelter" upasthitam: Literally, "has come or is waiting upon." Given the tenor of the verse with its prior reference to Rāma as "the refuge of all the worlds," Vibhīṣaṇa's statement in verse 14 above ("I have come seeking refuge with Rāghava—rāghavaṃ śaraṇaṃ gataḥ"), and following the commentators, we feel that the reference to shelter here is amply justified.

16. Following verse 16, all southern manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators insert, in whole or in part, a passage of fourteen lines [177*]. The passage, however, is located somewhat differently in the two commentarial traditions of the southern texts. The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr place the passage immediately after verse 16 (= GPP 6.17.19–25), while the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, and Cg insert lines 1–2 following verse 19 and lines 3–14 following verse 16 (177* lines 1–2 = VSP 6.17.26; 177* lines 3–14 = VSP 6.17.18–23; 177* lines 1–2 = KK 6.17.28; 177* lines 3–14 = KK 6.17.20–25). "Having previously entered the forces of the enemy, he has now come[1] here as an unrecognized foe, who, finding an opportunity, will slay us as an owl would crows.[1–2] Bless you, scorcher of your foes, you must therefore be vigilant with respect to counsel, the disposition of your forces, leading your troops, and the dispatching of spies both in regard to the monkeys and to your enemy.[3–4] For these rākṣasas can take on any form at will and even make themselves invisible. They are bold and skilled in deception. One must never trust them.[5–6] He must be a spy of Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas. Once he joins us, he will, without doubt, sow discord among us.[7–8] On the other hand, this clever fellow, having entered our midst and found an opportunity, might kill us himself, once we had come to trust him.[9–10]. Troops from one's allies, from the forest,[2] hereditary retainers, or mercenaries—all of these one may accept, but one must avoid forces that come from one's enemy.[11–12] He is a rākṣasa by nature and the brother of your enemy to boot, lord. He comes straight from the opposing side; how can one possibly trust him?[13–14]"

[1]"has . . . come" prāptaḥ: D6,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, Cr, and the translators who follow their texts read instead prājñaḥ, "clever, wise."

[2]"Troops from one's allies, from the forest" mitrāṭavibalam: The sense of the compound and its slight variant mitrāṭavībalam is not perfectly clear, and commentators as well as translators differ on its interpretation. Ct and Ck understand the compound mitrāṭavi- as a kind of pūrvanipāta compound and read it as "sent by a forest ally (mitreṇāṭavikenāraṇyakena preṣitam) (Ck—āṭavikapreṣitabalam)." Cr reads the compound mitrāṭavi as a dvandva and explains aṭavi as meaning "those who dwell in the forest (aṭavīnivāsīnām)," which he then glosses as udāsīnānām, "neutrals." Cg and Cm understand aṭavi to mean "consisting of forest people (āṭavika [āraṇya-—Cm] janarūpam)." Dutt (1893, p. 1146) sees Sugrīva's advice not as a general maxim but as relevant to the moment, understanding, "we should now collect the forest rangers." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 36) has "one should utilize the resources . . . of the forest belt round one's kingdom." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 43), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 38), understands the reference to be to the monkeys themselves, translating, "d'un habitant des bois (comme nous)" (Shastri: "an inhabitant of the woods like ourselves"). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1420) translates merely "foresters."

17. Following verse 17, D5,T1,G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Crā, Cm, and Cg insert 177*, lines 3–14. See note 16 above.

18. Verse 18 = App. I, No. 8, lines 28–29. See notes to 6.12.3.

"sent . . . as a spy" praṇihitam: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead praṇītaṃ hi, "sent, dispatched."

"You always know what is appropriate . . . appropriate" kṣamaṃ kṣamavatāṃ vara: The formulaic epithet is actually a vocative here, "O you who know what is appropriate," and is probably used largely for the alliterative effect with kṣamam. Cs proposes two other alternative readings. One is to take kṣama in the sense of "powerful beings (śaktāḥ)" and thus understand the suggestion to be that Rāma's powerful generals can easily capture Vibhīṣaṇa and that Rāma, himself, can do so even more easily. The other alternative is to take kṣama with an irregular shortening of its final vowel in the sense of kṣamā, "patience, forbearance." (kṣamāḥ śaktā eṣāṃ santīti kṣamavantas teṣu vara. etena tvatsenānayakair asmābhir api tannigrahaḥ susādhyaḥ kim u tvayeti sūcayati. "kṣamaṃ yukte kṣamānvite / vācyavac chaktahitayoḥ kṣamā bhūmititīkṣayoḥ" iti viśvaḥ. etena titīkṣārthaṃ kṣamaśabdam aṅgīkṛtya hrasvatvasyārṣatvavarṇanaṃ parāstam.) Some translators follow this reading: Dutt 1893, p. 1146, "foremost of forgiving persons"; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1420, "foremost of the indulgent"; and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 177, "o uom di gran pazienza." In the context, such a reading could be construed as ironic, as if Sugrīva is alluding to Rāma's reputation for forbearance, a virtue he would find misplaced here. Note the parallel usage at sarga 12.3, App. I, No. 8, lines 28–29.

"take him prisoner" tasya . . . nigraham: Literally, "his imprisonment." The term nigraha, "imprisonment," can also be taken, as suggested by Cr, to mean physical punishment including execution (daṇḍam). This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1146, "worthy of being slain") and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 36, "he should be put to death").

19. Verse 19ab = App. I, No. 8, line 30 (cd variant of 31). See notes to 6.12.3.

"comes seeking refuge" upasthitaḥ: See note to verse 15 above.

"with instructions to kill you" saṃdiṣṭaḥ . . . prahartum: We follow the suggestion of Cg, who construes the participle in pāda b with the infinitive in pāda c. Ct, Cg, and Cm supply the phrase "by Rāvaṇa" after the participle "instructed (saṃdiṣṭaḥ)."

20. Verse 20ab is a variant of App. I, No. 8, line 32. See notes to 6.12.3.

Verse 20cd = App. I, No. 8, line 33. See notes to 6.12.3.

"harsh torture" tīvreṇa daṇḍena: Literally, "with severe punishment." Cg rises to the occasion by suggesting the specific tortures that should be applied. He interprets Sugrīva's general advice to mean that, "since it would not serve the purpose either to drive Vibhīṣaṇa off, as was done with Mārīca (1.29.14–15), or kill him humanely with a single arrow, as was done in the case of Vālin (4.16.34), they should set a wick or oily cloth on Vibhīṣaṇa's head and then set him alight, like a lamp, having first severed the heads of his retainers and placed them in his hands. (vadhyatāṃ kevalanirasane kṛte mārīcavad anarthakārī syād iti bhāvaḥ. tīvreṇa daṇḍena vālivad ekena bāṇena na hantavyaḥ. kiṃtu śirasi vartiṃ kṛtvā dīpāropaṇaṃ kāryam. sacīvaiḥ saha prathamaṃ teṣāṃ śirāṃsi chittvā vibhīṣaṇahaste dattvā tato 'yam vadhyatām.)

21. 21ab is a variant of App. I, No. 8, line 34. See notes to 6.12.3.

21cd = App. I, No. 8, line 35. See notes to 6.12.3.

22. "powerful Rāma" rāmo mahābalaḥ: D5,6,T1,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "of great renown, illustrious."

24. "by a friend" suhṛdā: D6,10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suhṛdām, "among friends, of [one's] friends." The sense then would be "[wishing the lasting well-being] of his friends."

"by . . . who is . . . virtuous" satā: We read this word adjectivally rather than simply as a participle. D5,6,10,11,T1,3,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sadā, "always."

26. "Rāma, out of friendship . . . in order to show us honor" ātmānaṃ pūjayan rāma . . . suhṛttayā: Literally, "Rāma, honoring the self with friendship." One would normally expect the reflexive construction here to refer to Rāma's own self, but the context seems clearly to preclude such an interpretation. The commentators suggest a variety of interpretations of this slightly enigmatic expression. Ct offers two interpretations. In the first, which he shares with Ck, he reads the instrumental suhṛttayā with the participle pūjayan, "honoring," and takes it in the sense of "demonstrating your [i.e., Rāma's] friendly nature." For him, then, the expression means "you honor us by manifesting your friendly nature (asmākam ātmānaṃ suhṛttayā suhṛdbhāvaprakāśanena pūjayann ity arthaḥ)." According to Ct's second interpretation, the word ātmānam refers to Rāma, and the expression suhṛtayā, "out of friendship," refers specifically to Sugrīva, the lord of the monkeys. Thus the phrase would mean "spreading his own fame or glory by regarding the lord of the monkeys as his friend or ally (yadvaivaṃ vānareśvaro 'py ayaṃ suhṛd ity ātmanaḥ kīrtiṃ prathayann ity arthaḥ)."

Cr understands the phrase simultaneously in two different ways such that the term ātmānam refers both to the monkeys and to Rāma himself. He explains that Rāma, in asking as a friend, honors himself in that the monkeys have become his own body. In this case, the singular has to be taken in the sense of an entire class. Moreover, he is praising [himself] since, in asking the monkeys, he builds his reputation as someone who observes all the rules of propriety in that he does nothing without being counseled (suhṛttayātmānaṃ svaśarīrabhūtavānaram ity arthaḥ pūjayann asmān pṛcchasy ātmānam ity atra jātyabhiprāyeṇaikavacanam. kiṃcātmānaṃ svaṃ pūjayann ayam atīvamaryādāpālako yad amantritaṃ kiṃcin na karotīti praśaṃsayan pṛcchasi).

Cg and Cm, for whom pūjayan is a variant reading, see the singular as an indicator that Rāma is asking each monkey individually (pratyekaṃ pūjayan mānayann asmān pṛcchasi). Their second interpretation takes ātmānam in the sense of ātmasvabhāvam, "one's true nature," which they see as a reference to Rāma's instinctive grasp of the conduct of statecraft (rājanīti). They then gloss pūjayan as "observing, keeping (pālayan)," so that the phrase would mean "observing the rules of statecraft." Cg offers a third interpretation according to which Rāma is using his friendliness to demonstrate his own superior powers of judgment. According to this interpretation, Rāma solicits the monkeys' opinions only to supersede them with his own superior judgment (asmanmatāni pūrvapakṣīkṛtya svamatam eva siddhāntayitum iti bhāvaḥ).

M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read sūcayañ jānan, "indicating [and] knowing," for pūjayan rāma, "honoring, O Rāma." According to this reading, the line would mean "even though you know, you ask us out of friendship in order to point out your true nature." This is explained by Cg and Cm as "Your question is [asked] in order to spread throughout the world your fame as a friend to the monkeys (ayaṃ vānarāṇāṃ suhṛd itīmāṃ kīrtiṃ loke khyāpayituṃ tavāyaṃ praśna ity arthaḥ)."

27. "faithful to your vows" satyavrataḥ: Ct, Cg, and Cm understand this conventional epithet here to refer to Rāma's adherence to a vow of providing refuge to all who seek it, even rākṣasas (rakṣaḥsv api śaraṇāgatarakṣaṇavratapālakaḥ—Ct).

"act judiciously" parīkṣyakārī: Literally, "acting only after examination."

"trust your friends wholeheartedly" niṣṛṣṭātmā suhṛtsu: Literally, "who has consigned one's self to one's friends." Ct and Ck understand, "[you] who trust your friends (suhṛtsu kṛtaviśvāsaḥ)." Cr, Cg, and Cm interpret more strongly in the sense of "[you] who make yourself dependent upon your friends (suhṛdaparatantrīkṛtātmasvarūpaḥ—so Cg)."

28. "your advisers" sacivās tava: Normally, we render the word saciva as "minister." However, since the monkey counselors here are not, strictly speaking, Rāma's ministers but rather those of Sugrīva, we have used the more general term.

"speak . . . on this matter" bruvantu: Literally, "let them speak."

"giving . . . sound arguments" hetutaḥ: Literally, "reasonably, logically."

"various" punaḥ . . . punaḥ: Literally, "over and over again."

29. "When they had spoken in this fashion" ity ukte: Literally, "when it had been spoken in this fashion." As noted by Ct, Cr, and Ck, the unexpressed subjects are the monkey ministers, Hanumān, etc.

"was the first to speak" agrataḥ . . . uvāca: Literally. "he spoke from the beginning." According to Ct, Cg, and Ck, Aṅgada has the right to speak first (after Sugrīva—Cg) because of his position as heir apparent to the monkey kingdom (4.25.35) (aṅgado yuvarājatvād agrata uvāca—Ct, Ck). See note to 6.51.10.

"concerning the interrogation of Vibhīṣaṇa" vibhīṣaṇaparīkṣārtham . . . vacanam: Literally, "speech for the purpose of the test or trial of Vibhīṣaṇa."

31. "To trust him" saḥ: Literally, "that." We have provided the phrase for the sake of clarity, following Cr, who glosses, "trusting one's enemies (ripujanaviśvāsaḥ)."

32. "advantages and disadvantages" arthānarthau: The compound occurs in ManuSm 8.24, where Bühler's translation (1886, p. 256) reads, "what is expedient or inexpedient." Doniger (1991, p. 154) renders, "what is intrinsically just and unjust." Cf. ArthŚā 1.1.11; 1.2.11; and 9.7.37–57. See, too, verse 44 and note below.

"if he is virtuous . . . if he is evil" guṇataḥ . . . doṣataḥ: Literally, "on the basis of good qualities . . . on the basis of bad qualities."

33. "preponderance of evil . . . preponderance of virtue" doṣo mahān . . . guṇān . . . bahūn: Literally, " a great defect . . . many virtues." As Cg makes clear, it is a question of weighing the relative good and evil since it is difficult to find someone who is either wholly good or wholly bad (nanu sarvātmanā guṇī doṣī vā durlabhaḥ).

34. "But" tu: Cg and Cm claim that this particle tu indicates that Śarabha's advice is offered in contradiction to that of Aṅgada (tuśabdaḥ pūrvasmād vailakṣaṇyaparaḥ).

"sensible" sārtham: Literally, "meaningful." The critical edition here follows the texts of Ct, Ck, and Cr. D7,T2,3,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Cv read instead sādhyam, "practicable."

"spy" cāraḥ: See ArthŚā 1.11–12 and Dikshitar 1944, pp. 353–63. See 6.17.5 and note, and note to 5.3.27.

35. "would it be appropriate to accept Vibhīṣaṇa" kāryo yathānyāyaṃ parigrahaḥ: Literally, "an acceptance should be made [by one] according to the proper policy."

37. "at the wrong time and to the wrong place" adeśakāle: The commentators offer various explanations. Ct (so, too, Ck) says it is the wrong place because Vibhīṣaṇa has come to enemy territory without any message from his master (leaving his master's country—Ck), and it is the wrong time because one should not abandon one's lord at a time of trouble. (svāmisaṃdeśaṃ [deśam—Ck] vihāya ripudeśa āgamanenānucitadeśaprāptatvam. svāminaḥ saṃkaṭakāle tatprahāṇānaucityād anucitakālaprāptaḥ.) Cg says it is the wrong place in that there is no purpose in Vibhīṣaṇa's coming because he has come from afar when there is no imminent danger, and it is the wrong time for him to abandon his lord. (dūratayā sāṃpratikabhayābhāvenāgamanaprayojanarahite. akāle svāmiparityāgānarhakāle.) Cm believes that it is the wrong place because it is near one's enemies (śatrusamīpadeśe). Cv believes that it is the wrong place because the proper place would be the seashore near his own country (apadeśe svadeśe pratyāsannasamudratīre). Both Cm and Cv agree with Ct that the time is wrong because it is nighttime (rātrau), but Cm offers as an alternative the same explanation given by Cg. See verse 47 and note below.

38. At Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa 38.23, Mainda and Dvivida are said to be the sons of the Aśvins. In the Sundarakāṇḍa they are also said to have been granted invulnerability by Brahmā. See 5.58.12–16 and notes.

39. "interrogated" pṛcchyatām: Ct, Cg, and Cm, evidently influenced by verse 50 below, indicate that Mainda intends this questioning to be carried out by undercover agents (gūḍhadūtamukhena—Ct, Cm; ajñātapuruṣamukhena—Cg). Although Mainda himself makes no such specification of this condition, Cg believes that this is in keeping with Hanumān's suggestion, articulated at verse 50 below (tathaiva hanumatānuvādāt). See note to verse 50 below.

"regarding what Rāvaṇa has to say" vacanaṃ nāma tasya . . . rāvaṇasya: Literally, "the very words of Rāvaṇa." D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read anujaḥ, "younger brother," for vacanam, "words," yielding the sense "the younger brother of Rāvaṇa ought to be interrogated."

40. "accurately . . . then" tatas tattvam: We read this adverbially with Cg and Cm, who gloss, "truly (tattvataḥ)." V1,D5,10,11,T1,G,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Cv, and Ck read instead tattvatas tvam, "accurately . . . you."

41. "highly cultivated" saṃskārasampannaḥ: The commentators are in general agreement that this term refers to the cultivation that arises from knowledge of all the śāstras (sakalaśāstrajñānajasaṃskārasaṃyuktaḥ—so Ct).

42. "Bṛhaspati" bṛhaspatiḥ: Bṛhaspati, the legendary purohita of the gods, is held up here as an example of extraordinary learning. See App. I, No. 3, lines 362–65 (following notes to 6.9.22), where the name is employed similarly. See 6.7.9–10; 6.40.28; 6.115.51; and notes.

"besting you in argument" bhavantam . . . atiśāyayitum . . . bruvan: Literally, "surpassing you while [he is] speaking."

"capable" samartham: According to Ct and Ck, this term refers to Rāma's ability to ascertain the essence of all śāstras (sakalaśāstrārthatattvanirūpaṇasamartham—so Ct).

43. "Rāma, it is not in order to demonstrate my skill in disputation, my desire to outshine the others, a wish to prove myself the best, or fondness for the sound of my own voice that I shall say the following truthful words. Rather, your majesty, it is because of the gravity of the situation." na vādān nāpi saṃgharṣān nādhikyān na ca kāmataḥ / vakṣyāmi vacanaṃ rājan yathārthaṃ rāma gauravāt //: Literally, "Not from debate, or from rivalry, or from superiority, or from desire will I speak [this] truthful speech, O king, but from gravity." The verse is somewhat elliptical, and we have had to flesh it out a bit for the sake of intelligibility, in keeping with the fairly unanimous opinions of the commentators.

"in order to demonstrate my skill in disputation" vādāt: Literally, "because of debate." Ct explains, "in order to demonstrate my skill in debate (tarkakuśalatvaprakaṭanād dhetoḥ)." Other commentators explain similarly.

"my desire to outshine the others" saṃgharṣāt: Literally, "from or out of rivalry." Ct explains, "in the grip of rivalry with the other ministers (sacivāntaraspardhāvaśāt)." Other commentators explain similarly.

"a wish to prove myself the best" ādhikyāt: Literally, "from or out of superiority." Cm explains, "out of pride in [my own] superiority, which takes the form of the thought, 'I am the most intelligent, I am the most skilled in policy, I am the most eloquent, etc.' ('ahaṃ dhīmān nītimān vāgmī ca' ity ādhikyābhimānāt)." The quote, which is similar to Cg's, appears to be a paraphrase of the description Nārada gives of Rāma at 1.1.9. The idea, for these commentators, seems to be that Hanumān does not want to claim that he is superior to Rāma.

"fondness for the sound of my own voice" kāmataḥ: Literally, "out of desire." Ct explains, "out of a desire to speak (vacanecchātaḥ)." Cg and Cm gloss, "out of a desire to speak freely (svairabhāṣaṇecchātaḥ)." Cr offers "out of a desire whose focus is simply to say something (kiṃcidgrahaṇādiviṣayakecchātaḥ)." Cg provides an alternative explanation: "or it could mean 'out of favoritism for Vibhīṣaṇa' (vibhīṣaṇapakṣapātād vā)."

"gravity of the situation" gauravāt: Literally, "because of seriousness." We follow the commentators, who offer different ways of expressing "because of the gravity of the thing to be done (kāryagauravād dhetoḥ—Cm)." Cm offers, as an alternative, "or it could mean 'for the sake of [gaining] your respect' (yadvā tvatkṛtāt sammānāt)."

44. "ministers" sacivaiḥ: According to Ct, Cg, and Cm, Hanumān is specifically criticizing Aṅgada's advice offered above in verses 30–33. Cg comments that Hanumān avoids mentioning Aṅgada's name and uses the plural in order to avoid any transient animosity [on Aṅgada's part] (sacivair aṅgadena tādātvikasaṃrambhaparihārāya nāmānuktir bahuvacanaṃ ca).

"advantages and disadvantages" -arthānartha-: See notes to verse 32 above.

"impossible to put it into practice" kriyā na hy upapadyate: Literally, "action is not possible." Ct explains that the proposal of Aṅgada and the others to regard Vibhīṣaṇa as suspect until interrogated is fine as far as it goes, but it lacks any effective follow-up (so, too, Ck). (śaṅkitavyaḥ parīkṣaṇīyaś ceti yad uktaṃ tad yuktam eva kiṃ tv evaṃ niścaya ity anukter idam anuttaram. tad evāha kriyā na hy upapadyate kriyottararūpā—Ct.) He suggests, as an alternative, that even the action of investigation is not feasible (yadvā parīkṣaṇarūpā kriyedānīṃ nopapadyata ity arthaḥ). This alternative is reflected in the opinions of Cr, Cg, and Cm.

45. "whether he is trustworthy" sāmarthyam: Literally, "[his] capacity." Ct and Ck understand, "the propriety of either rejecting or accepting him (hānopādānaucityam)." Cr understands, "the power to do good or cause harm (hitāhitasaṃpādakasamarthatvam)." Cg and Cm, whom we have more closely followed, offer, "honesty (sādhutvam)" and "virtue (sadguṇavattvam)," respectively.

46. "your ministers" sacivais tava: The reference is to the advice of Śarabha in verses 34–35 above. See note to verse 44 above on the issue of Hanumān's diplomatic use of the generic plural when criticizing the advice of a particular individual.

"strategy" kāraṇam: Literally, "cause, valid reason." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the term in its usual, literal sense, but we view this as somewhat redundant in light of the term artha, "purpose," in pāda c. Cv avoids this problem by arguing for the propriety of the variant reading cāraṇam, in the sense of "the dispatching or the movement of spies." Cg and Cm, whom we follow, acknowledge the variant but prefer the critical reading, understanding kāraṇam in its most basic sense of "action," which they take as a reference to strategy (upāyaḥ).

47. "Vibhīṣaṇa has come at the wrong time and to the wrong place" adeśakāle saṃprāpta ity ayaṃ yad vibhīṣaṇaḥ: Hanumān is paraphrasing Jāmbavān's words in verse 37 above. See, too, notes to verse 37 above.

"Consider it from my perspective." tāṃ nibodha yathāmati: Literally, "know or consider that in accordance with opinion." The phrase is slightly ambiguous in that one might also take the sequence to mean "Consider it according to your own way of thinking."

48–49. "For him to have left an evil person to come over to a virtuous one, in light of their vices and virtues, respectively" puruṣāt puruṣaṃ prāpya tathā doṣaguṇāv api: Literally, "having reached a man from a man and vice and virtue as well." Following the commentators, our translation fleshes out the elliptical clause. Thus, for example, Ct notes, "Having come to you, an excellent person, from an evil person, Rāvaṇa, and considering in his mind, that is, having considered in his mind the vices and virtues, respectively, of the two (pāpāt puruṣād rāvaṇād uttamaṃ puruṣaṃ tvāṃ prāpya buddhyā niścitya tathā dvayos tayor doṣaguṇāv api prāpya buddhyā niścitya—so Ct)."

"that is, having perceived the wickedness" daurātmyam . . . dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen the wickedness." As the various commentators note, the reference is to Rāvaṇa's abduction of another man's wife (paradārāpaharaṇād rāvaṇe daurātmyam—so Ct) and his refusal to return her (-tatpratyarpaṇāpekṣitvāt—so Cg).

"heroism" vikramam: Cg sees this term as a reference to Rāma's having killed the foremost among the rākṣasas, having given the kingdom to Sugrīva, having first slain Vālin, and having made the effort to cross the ocean, so difficult to cross (tvayi vikramaṃ kharadūṣaṇapramukharākṣasavadhādikaṃ vālivadhapūrvakasugrīvarājyapradānam atidustarasamudrataraṇodyogaṃ ca). Ct understands that Rāma slew Vālin—who himself, having first put Rāvaṇa under his armpit, made a circumambulation of the four oceans (Uttarakāṇḍa 34)—with one arrow (tvayi vikramaṃ ca kakṣapuṭe rāvaṇaṃ kṛtvā catuḥsāgarīṃ pradakṣiṇaṃ kṛtavato vālina ekenaiva bāṇena tvayā hananāt). Cr understands similarly.

"in keeping with his excellent judgment" tasya buddhitaḥ: Literally, "according to intellect."

50. "undercover agents" ajñātarūpaiḥ puruṣaiḥ: Literally, "men whose [true] appearances are unknown." Ct, Cr, Cg, Cm, Cv, and Ck, keeping to the order of the speakers who preceded Hanumān, understand him to be refuting Mainda's suggestion here, although Mainda had made no explicit reference to the use of undercover agents (see verse 39 and note above). In fact, it was Śarabha who suggested the use of spies (see verses 34–35 and notes above). According to Ct and Ck, the reference is to "spies whose families, activities, and purposes are unknown (ajñātakulaśīlaprayojanaiḥ puruṣaiḥ)." According to Cg and Cm, these are "people whose appearance and true nature are unfamiliar [to Vibhīṣaṇa] (aparicitasvarūpasvabhāvaiḥ)." Cv observes that these are "monkeys whose appearance would be unfamiliar (anabhyastarūpair vānaraiḥ)."

51. "questions" vacaḥ: Literally, "word, speech."

"alienated" praduṣyeta: Literally, "he would be spoiled, corrupted."

52. "confident in his own ability" naipuṇyaṃ paśyatā bhṛśam: Literally, "by one who clearly sees cleverness." The phrase is somewhat obscure. Cg and Cm understand the reference to be to the deceitful interrogator who perceives his own skill or cleverness (bhṛśam atyarthaṃ svasmin naipuṇyāṃ paśyatāpi mithyā praṣṭrā). This is plausible, and our own translation is not very different. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 39), the only other translator rendering the critical reading, offers, "however clever he might fancy himself." One could also reasonably understand, "who clearly sees through the cleverness [of the suspected enemy]." D10 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read paśyatām, "you, sir, must see," for paśyatā, yielding such translations as "determine . . . his secret motive" (Dutt 1893, p. 1148) and "you should fully discover the good intentions" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1423). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 40), following Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 45), translates in such a way as to make it unclear how the phrase is read.

"on the basis of what he says about himself" antaḥsvabhāvair gītais taiḥ: Literally, "through those inner feelings, which are sung out." Cg, Cv, and Cm read with the critical text but understand the phrase differently. Cg understands, "inner intentions of a stranger that are expressed in words (antarhitasvābhiprāyaiḥ . . . parasya gītair bhāṣitaiḥ)." Cm and Cv understand these to be "the inner intentions [of the interrogator] expressed in the form of questions (gūḍhābhiprāyaiḥ tair gītaiḥ praśnarūpabhāṣitaiḥ—Cm)." Texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead antareṇa svarair bhinnaiḥ, "by different sounds in the midst [of questioning]." According to Ct and Ck, what Hanumān is saying is "In the midst of the interrogation you, sir, should find out, that is, determine, the cleverness, that is, the virtue or vice, [of the subject] on the basis of different sounds, i.e., distorted sounds, such as hemming and hawing. You, sir, should determine the truthfulness or dishonesty of a person by such verbal manifestations as a tearful voice and stammering through fear. (antareṇa vyavahāramadhye bhinnaiḥ svarair vilakṣaṇasvaraiḥ kaṇṭhadhvanibhir naipuṇyaṃ sadasadanyataratvaniścayaṃ paśyatāṃ kurutāṃ bhavān iti śeṣas tatra bāṣpakaṇṭhatve bhītyā pūrvāparāsaṃgatakathane cāsann anyathā sann iti niścīyatām—so Ct.)" Ct and Ck insist that this is the correct reading. Cr understands that the stranger placed in the midst (antareṇa) of one's own forces may speak variously, sometimes favoring one's own side and sometimes that of one's enemies, and from this one could determine his intentions on the basis of these various utterances. (svasainyamadhye sthāpaneneti śeṣaḥ. bhinnair asmatpriyaviṣayatayā ripupriyaviṣayatayā ca bhedaviśiṣṭaiḥ svarair vāgvyāpāraiḥ.)

53. "signs of a wicked nature" duṣṭabhāvatā: Literally, "the state of having evil feelings." As Ct notes, a person's inner feelings can be determined by outward physical manifestations. He glosses, "the state of having an evil heart [as manifested] by speech, gestures, etc. (vacanaceṣṭādibhir duṣṭāntaḥkaraṇatā)."

"facial expression" vadanam: Literally, "face."

"composed" prasannam: This could also mean "open, clear, or kindly."

54. "A deceitful person" śaṭhaḥ: Literally, "rogue, villain." Cr, against the other commentators, glosses, "knavery (śaṭhatvam)" and takes this as the subject of the verb parisarpati, understanding, "therefore, knavery does not approach him (śaṭhatvaṃ na parisarpati asmin prāpnoti)." Cg, Ck, and Ct understand, "a person whose hostile actions [intentions—Ct, Ck] are concealed (gūḍhavipriyakārī—so Ct; -dhī—so Ck)."

"without hesitation" aśaṅkitamatiḥ: Literally, "whose mind is without doubt or fear." Ct and Ck offer a Śrīvaiṣṇava interpretation of the term, explaining that it should be understood to indicate that Vibhīṣaṇa has firmly resolved that the best path of action for him is to seek refuge with Rāma (niścitaśaraṇagamanamatī rāmaśaraṇagamanam eva mameṣṭasādhanam iti supratiṣṭhitacittaḥ—so Ct).

"Moreover, he is well spoken" na cāsya duṣṭā vāk: Literally, "and his speech is not corrupt." Ct and Ck read the compound duṣṭavāk, "corrupt speech," and gloss, "speech containing defects of both sound and sense (śabdārthadoṣavatī vāk)." See notes to 6.14.5.

"one should harbor no doubts about him" nāstīha saṃśayaḥ: Literally, "there is no doubt here." D7,10,11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read me nāsti for nāstīha, which is a repetition of the closing phrase of the preceding verse and yields the sense "I have no doubt."

55. "facial expression" ākāraḥ: We follow Cg in taking this term in its common sense of facial expression, particularly as betraying inner emotions (Apte s.v.). Compare RaghuVa 1.20. Ct, Cr, and Ck take the term to mean "the inner emotions (āntaro bhāvaḥ—Ct, Ck)" or "one's own intentions (svābhiprāyaḥ—Cr)." Cr then takes the term ākāra to function as the object of pādas ab and the subject of pādas cd. He thus understands the verse to mean "that the ākāras, i.e., inner emotions, are impossible to conceal and these same ākāras, i.e., inner emotions, betray one's intentions (ākāraḥ svābhiprāyaḥ . . . sarvathā chādayituṃ na śakyo 'ta eva nṛṇām antargataṃ bhāvam abhiprāyaṃ . . . vivṛṇoti)." Otherwise, like Ct and Ck, we are obliged to provide a deus ex machina, as it were, in the form of one's inner presiding divinity (antaryāmidevatā—Ct).

56. "foremost of those who know what action should be taken" kāryavidāṃ vara: Literally, "O best among those who know what is to be done." This epithet echoes the word kārya, "action," which immediately precedes it. See below.

"action" kāryam: We, like Cg, understand this verse to embody an exhortation to Rāma based on the rules of nītiśāstra. It appears to us that in adducing this general principle, Hanumān is implicitly urging Rāma to act expeditiously to accept Vibhīṣaṇa as an ally, as he will urge explicitly in verse 58 below. Ct, Ck, and Cr, however, understand the verse to be a comment on the propriety of Vibhīṣaṇa's action in having come over to Rāma at this particular time and place (asyedam atrāgamanaṃ rūpaṃ kāryaṃ deśakālopapannam eva).

57–58. "mighty undertaking" udyogam: Literally, "effort." As several commentators (Ct, Ck, Cs) point out, this word refers to Rāma's campaign to destroy Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇavadhaviṣayam—Ck, Ct).

"vainglory of Rāvaṇa" mithyāvṛttaṃ ca rāvaṇam: Literally, "that Rāvaṇa acts in vain or falsely." Commentators are divided as to how to interpret the adjective. Ct and Ck suggest that it encompasses both Rāvaṇa's false pride in his power as well as his evil conduct (mithyābalagarvitaṃ pāpavṛttaṃ ca). Cr takes it to refer only to the vanity of Rāvaṇa's undertakings, while Cs sees it as a reference only to his evil ways.

"seeks the kingship for himself" rājyaṃ prārthayamānaḥ: As Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cs suggest, Vibhīṣaṇa, seeing the parallels between the political situations in Laṅkā and Kiṣkindhā, assumes that Rāma will kill the wicked older brother and consecrate the virtuous younger brother in his place (rāvaṇād apy adhikabalaṃ vālinaṃ hataṃ śrutvā buddhipūrvaṃ vālivad eva rāvaṇaṃ haniṣyati sugrīvavad eva mahyaṃ rājyaṃ dāsyati—so Ct).

"Keeping all this foremost in mind" etāvat tu puraskṛtya: Literally, "putting this much forward."

59. "that the rākṣasa is trustworthy" rākṣasasyārjavaṃ prati: Literally, "with reference to the honesty of the rākṣasa."

"of what is to follow" śeṣasya: Literally, "of the remainder." Cr glosses, "the decision as to what ought to be done (kṛtyanirṇayasya)."

Sarga 12

1. "his mind composed" prasannātmā: Literally, "whose mind was calm." Cm and Cg argue, not implausibly, that we should understand that Rāma's thoughts, which had been confused by the differing opinions of the monkeys who spoke before Hanumān, have now been clarified by the latter monkey's advice (sugrīvādivākyaiḥ kaluṣīkṛte manasi sati hanumadvākye prasannamanāḥ—so Cg).

"speech of Hanumān, son of Vāyu" vāyusutasya: Literally, "of the son of Vāyu." We have supplied, as do the commentators, the missing word for speech (vāyusutasya vacanam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct) and have added the name Hanumān.

"unassailable" durdharṣaḥ: Cg suggests that this more or less standard epithet refers here to Rāma's inability to be shaken "by the imperfect arguments of his advisers (pūrvapakṣair akṣobhyaḥ)."

"learned" śrutavān: Ct and Cr give the normal interpretation, "learned in all the śāstras (sakalaśāstraśravaṇavān—so Ct)." Cg, however, understands this term to be a reference to parables such as those of the dove and of the sage Kaṇḍu (verses 11–18 below), which he would have heard from Vasiṣṭha and others (vasiṣṭhādibhyaḥ śruta-kapotakaṇḍūpākhyānādimān).

"with his own thoughts" ātmani sthitam: Literally, "what was situated in his mind." This apparently refers to Rāma's decision and is glossed by Cg as "what was firmly fixed in his thoughts (cittāvasthitam)."

2. "that I would like you . . . to hear in its entirety" śrutam icchāmi tat sarvaṃ bhavadbhiḥ: Literally, "I want all that heard by you." B4,D6,7,9–11,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm read the slightly syntactically awkward infinitive śrotum, "to hear." Commentators who share the variant reading come up with various paraphrases to express the desired meaning.

3. Not surprisingly, Cg takes Rāma's pledge as the inspiration for an extensive and close analysis of the verse in terms of its Śrīvaiṣṇava significance. He is particularly eager to stress the idea, often encountered in the devotional literature, that it makes no difference to the Lord if those who seek refuge with him have faults and that, moreover, it is more virtuous for him to take in the wicked than the virtuous.

"Under no circumstances would I turn away . . . For the virtuous would condemn such conduct." na tyajeyaṃ kathaṃcana / . . . satām etad agarhitam: Literally, "I would by no means abandon . . . that is not condemned by [of] the virtuous." The double negative construction makes a literal rendering in English somewhat opaque. What Rāma means is that turning away a suppliant would be condemned by the virtuous. We have therefore rendered agarhitam, "not condemned," as "condemned." See note to 6.37.10 for other examples of double negatives in the text.

Following verse 3, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of thirty-five lines [App. I, No. 8 = GPP, NSP, KK, VSP 6.18.4–20]: "Then Sugrīva, bull among the tawny monkeys, repeating those words to himself and reflecting on them, spoke these excellent words:[1–2] 'What do we care for this night-roaming rākṣasa, whether he is good or evil, a person who would abandon his own brother who is confronting such a calamity?[3–4] Who would he then not abandon no matter what their relationship might be?'[1] Upon hearing those words of the lord of the monkeys, truly valorous Kākutstha gazed at them all and, with a faint smile, addressed these words to Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks:[5–8] 'Unless someone has deeply studied the śāstras and attended upon his elders, he could not possibly speak the way the lord of the tawny monkeys has spoken.[9–10] But there is, it seems to me, a practical[2] but subtle matter that is openly known to all kings.[11–12] In times of crisis, one's kinsmen and one's neighbors become known as enemies and strike at one. He must have come here for that reason.[13–14] Virtuous rulers of good family hold their kinsmen who wish them well in high esteem. Yet it often happens that kings come to view a virtuous man with suspicion.[15–16] Now as to the error of which you spoke, that is, accepting one of the enemy's forces, I will tell you something on that subject that is in keeping with the śāstras. Please listen.[17–18] We are not of his lineage, and this rākṣasa covets the kingship. Some rākṣasas, moreover, are shrewd; therefore we should accept Vibhīṣaṇa.[19–20] They may assemble[3] calmly and happily, but still some great disagreement[4] may erupt and, for that reason, fear has arisen in him.[5] In this way, dissension arises among them. Therefore we should accept Vibhīṣaṇa.[21–23] Not all brothers, dear brother, are similar to Bharata. Not all sons act toward their fathers as I have done. Not all friends are like you, sir.'[24–25] Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, wise Sugrīva, along with Lakṣmaṇa, rose and humbly spoke these words:[26–27] 'You must realize that Rāvaṇa has sent Vibhīṣaṇa as a spy. You always know what is appropriate, but I think it would be appropriate to take him prisoner.[28–29] Cloaking himself in deception,[6] this rākṣasa has come seeking refuge with deceitful intent and with instructions to kill you once he has gained your trust or mine, or Lakṣmaṇa's, blameless and great-armed one. [30–31] He should be put to death together with his ministers. For he is Vibhīṣaṇa, the brother of cruel Rāvaṇa.'[32–33] When Sugrīva had spoken in this fashion to the foremost of the Raghus, himself skilled in speech, that eloquent leader of the troops fell silent.[34–35]"

[1]"no matter what their relationship might be" ko nāma sa bhavet tasya: Literally, "indeed who would he be to him."

[2]"practical" laukikam: Literally, "pertaining to this world."

[3]"They may assemble" te bhavisyanti saṃgatāḥ: D6,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read the negative particle na, "not," for the nominative plural pronoun te, "they." This lends the line the sense "they [the rākṣasas] will not assemble happily and peacefully."

[4]"disagreement" pravādaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,G3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions (VSP reads with the critical) of Cm, Cg, Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead praṇādaḥ, "uproar." All translators consulted render this variant as either referring to the loud outcry of Vibhīṣaṇa (so Cg) or the loud cry of conflict (so Ct).

[5]"for that reason . . . in him" tato 'sya: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead anyonyasya, "of one another."

[6]"Cloaking himself in deception . . . once he has gained your trust or mine" viśvaste pracchannaḥ: Literally, "[once you and I] trust [him] . . . [he,] concealed." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct repeat the participle viśvaste, yielding the sense "once [you] trust [him] . . . [and I] trust [him]."

Lines 28–35 closely parallel or duplicate verses 6.11.18–21 above.

4. = GPP 6.18.35.

D5–7,10,11,S read verses 4–7 after verse 21 (= GPP, KK = 6.18.35–38; VSP = 6.18.37–40).

5. = GPP 6.18.36; see note to verse 4 above.

6. = GPP 6.18.37; see note to verse 4 above.

Cg and Cm note, perhaps not without some irony, that this is the same Sugrīva who moments before suggested that Vibhīṣaṇa be tortured to death (see 6.11.20 above) (mama vadhyatām eṣa tīvreṇa daṇḍenety uktavato 'pi—Cg). As Ct notes, Sugrīva's change of heart is attributable to the opinion expressed by Rāma (tvadvākyaśravaṇāt).

"on the basis of his probable intentions" bhāvāt: The word has a broad range of meanings, two of which are perhaps relevant here: "emotion or intention" and "condition or state of being." We follow Cg's first of two alternatives. In the first, he glosses, "from signs such as the calmness of his face, which betray his true feelings (bhāvabodhakān mukhaprasādādiliṅgāt)." The second alternative understands bhāvāt as "because of that state of being or nature," that is, "through his gentle nature, which is illuminated by his piteous tone (ārtadhvaniprakāśitamṛdusvabhāvāt)."

7. = GPP 6.18.38; see note to verse 4 above.

8. = GPP 6.18.21; see note to verse 4 above.

9. "is . . . not . . . incapable . . . ?" kim . . . aśaktaḥ: Northern and some southern manuscripts (D9,10,11,G,M1), as well as the printed editions of Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, and NSP, read śaktaḥ, "capable," for aśaktaḥ. This reading yields the sense of "what harm . . . is he capable of causing me." Cr regards the question to be ironic (kākuḥ), with the sense of "he cannot cause me any harm." The interrogative kim in the critical reading, if it is to have any sense at all, must be taken—as we have done—as an indeclinable, which makes the entire sentence a question, rather than pronominally with ahitam, "harm," as in the variant reading.

10. Ct and Ck, anticipating the question as to why Rāma does not, in fact, destroy Rāvaṇa and the rākṣasas himself since he is so powerful, allude to the conditions of the boon of Rāvaṇa, noting that Rāma himself, i.e., Viṣṇu, has granted the rākṣasa his invulnerability to the powers of the divinities. He also notes that Rāma wishes to remain within the limits of the human birth he has chosen, as illustrated by his weeping over his separation from Sītā, his alliance with the monkeys, etc. (svadivyabhāvaṃ svaśaktyaivāntardhāya mānuṣamaryādāyāṃ sthityā tadbhāvaprakaṭanāyaiva sītāviyogaprayuktarodanavadbhavādṛśasahāyamelanam). On Rāvaṇa's boon, see note to 6.28.28–29. Ck, citing "Yadvābhaṭṭa"—apparently paraphrasing Cg's comment ("from an absence of desire, not from an absence of ability, is there an absence of killing him [icchābhāvād eva tadvadhābhāvo na tv aśaktyeti bhāvaḥ])"—remarks that the reason Rāma does not kill all the rākṣasas of Laṅkā is not because of his lack of power but because he does not wish to do so (yadvābhaṭṭas tu kimartham aṅgulyagreṇa tān sarvān rākṣasān ity atrāha—icchann iti mama tathāhanana icchā nāsti na tu śaktyabhāvād ity arthaḥ). Compare 6.67.37, where Rāma expressly forbids the killing of all the rākṣasas. On the relationship among the commentators, see Introduction, pp. 99–107. See, too, Lefeber 1994, p. 24 and footnote 77; and notes to 3.2.56 and 3.33.15,44. Cf. note to 5.1.77. See, too, notes to 6.52.10 and 6.80.1.

11. = MBh 12.141.4 [pūjitaḥ for arcitaḥ]: The story of the virtuous and self-sacrificing dove is narrated at length at MBh 12.141–145. (The story is also known to the Hitopadeśa 1.41; Pañcatantra III.140,141; and MBh 3.130.19–20; 3.131ff.). Since the story is alluded to so elliptically here, the commentators flesh it out. According to the tale, a hunter, suffering from cold and hunger, cages a dove hen that has gone out to seek food for its mate. Eventually the starving hunter, seeking shelter, arrives at the tree where the waiting male resides. The virtuous dove, urged by his wife and seeing the suffering of the hunter, manages to build him a fire for warmth and, at length, hurls himself into it to offer the hunter a cooked meal of his own flesh. The hunter is overwhelmed by the bird's extraordinarily righteous behavior, which is followed by the bird's mate promptly hurling herself into the fire as the world's first, and perhaps only, avian satī. The birds ascend to heaven lauded by gods and sages. Upon seeing their celestial bliss, the hunter resolves to give up his evil way of life and adopt the life of a religious mendicant. After some time, he hurls himself into a forest fire and is thus able to rejoin his feathered friends in heaven. Cg sees in this story a parallel to the tale in the Rāmāyaṇa of the sage Śarabhaṅga, who immolates himself after receiving the darśan of Rāma and so ascends to the highest heaven (3.4.31–36).

"There is a well-known story" śrūyate: Literally, "it is heard."

"about a dove" kapotena: Dave (1985, pp. 24–27, 250–64) notes that the term kapota may refer to pigeons (pārāvata) and doves, as well as nuthatches. He notes, too, that many varieties of doves and pigeons are mentioned in Sanskrit literature.

"showed great hospitality" arcitaś ca yathānyāyam: Literally, "[the hunter] was honored according to custom."

"enemy" śatruḥ: As the commentators note, it is the capture of the dove's wife that has made the hunter his enemy (bhāryāhartṛtvāt kapotaśatrur vyādhaḥ).

"had come seeking shelter" śaraṇam āgataḥ: Cm, Ct, Cr, Ck, and, as a second alternative, Cg take the term in its sense of "home, abode," which they explain as the tree in which the male dove was dwelling (vanaspatirūpagṛham). See 6.10.17 and note. Cf. 6.13.13 and note. These commentators are apparently uncomfortable with the idea of a man seeking refuge with a bird. Cg's first interpretation is that the hunter is actually not seeking refuge with the bird but rather addressing himself to the tree divinity that presides over the doves' nesting spot (svāvāsavanaspatidevatāṃ pratyuktavān na tu kapotam). This interpretation is in keeping with the Mahābhārata story, where the hunter takes shelter for the night under the tree and seeks refuge from the divinities that inhabit it. To this end, Cg quotes a variant of MBh 12.141.26.

"He even offered him his own flesh" svaiś ca māṃsair nimantritaḥ: Literally, " He [the hunter] was invited with his [the bird's] own flesh."

12. "best of monkeys" vānaraśreṣṭha: Cg understands that the story is to remind Sugrīva that, since he is the overlord of the monkeys, he, too, should adhere to the dharma of protection of those who come to him for refuge (bhavān vānarādhipatye sthitaḥ san svajātidharma iti śaraṇāgatarakṣaṇam). Cg illustrates this theme of animals' adherence to the dharma of protection by narrating a story about a monkey (vānara) who saved a tribal hunter from a tiger by granting him shelter in his tree. Even after the evil-minded hunter had obliged the tiger by trying to throw down his sleeping protector, the monkey refused to yield up his refugee. This story is alluded to later in the critical edition (6.101.34–35 = GPP 6.113.4), where several of the commentators repeat a variant of the story of the virtuous monkey/bear (ṛkṣa).

"wife's abductor" bhāryāhartāram: Cg sees the reference as an indication that Rāma's intention is to suggest that, even if Rāvaṇa himself were to come seeking refuge, Rāma would grant it (evam eva rāvaṇa āgataś ced asmābhiḥ kārya ity abhiprāyaḥ).

"person such as I" madvidho janaḥ: Various commentaries take this as an allusion to Rāma's noble birth (uttamakulaprasūtaḥ—Cr), his knowing the secret of all dharma (sakaladharmarahasyavettā—so Ct), his being an authority on all śāstras (sakalaśāstrādhikārī—so Cm), and his belonging to the dynasty of the Raghus, who are noted for their devotion to the protection of all (śaraṇāgatarakṣaṇāya samucchritadhvaje raghuvaṃśe jātaḥ—so Cg).

13. Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs argue that Rāma repeats the verses of the sage Kaṇḍu in anticipation of an objection that the virtues of a mere animal, a dove in this case, cannot be regarded as exemplary. Cs goes so far as to regard the virtuous bird's "conduct as purely accidental, like 'the scribbling of an ant' (pipīlikālipivad yādṛcchikatvān na tacceṣṭā dharme pramāṇī syāt)."

"verses . . . chanted long ago" gāthāṃ pūrā gītām: Literally, gāthā means "chant, stanza." The term normally refers to metrical verses of a religious or moral nature that are not found in the vedas. Cg notes that "because of the musical quality of the stanza[s] that was present long ago, they are capable of being sung even now (ṛca eva sāmatvāt pūrā vidyamānām evedānīṃ gīyamānāṃ gītām)." He further comments that, because the verses were sung long ago, we should not imagine that they were composed by Kaṇḍu (purā gītāṃ kaṇḍukalpiteyam iti na mantavyam).

"by . . . Kaṇḍu" kaṇḍunā: A sage of this name is mentioned at 4.47.10–12 (see ad loc. and note), where he is said to have cursed the forest where his young son died.

"great . . . seer" paramarṣiṇā: Cs observes that this epithet, which indicates that Kaṇḍu is a greater seer than his father, suggests that one should give great respect to the verses being chanted (pitur ṛṣitvam etasya paramarṣitvam iti tadgītā kathādartavyety anena sūcayati). He notes that the epithet is specifically added in keeping with the maxim that "a son does not become learned through the learning of his father (na hi pituḥ pāṇḍityena putraḥ paṇḍito bhavati)."

14. "scorcher of your foes" paraṃtapa: Cg and Cm remind us that this vocative refers to whomever (a king—according to Cg) Kaṇḍu was addressing. Cg adds that the sense is that Kaṇḍu was saying to his auditor, "What is the use of your valor in the case of a person who has come to you for refuge? You should save that for your enemies." (kaṇḍur api kaṃcid rājānaṃ pratyuktavān iti gamyate. paraṃtapa śaraṇāgate kiṃ pauruṣa-prakaṭanena pratyarthiṣu khalu tat kartavyam iti bhāvaḥ.)

"begging for protection" yācantam: Literally, "begging." Ck, Ct, and Cr supply an object, such as "his own protection (svarakṣaṇam—Cr)" or "refuge (śaraṇam—Ck, Ct)."

15. "Even at the cost of his own life" prāṇān parityajya: Literally, "having abandoned life breaths."

"magnanimous" kṛtātmanā: Cf. 5.6.17 and 5.34.47 and notes.

16. "and the limits of one's strength" yathāsattvam: Ś,Ñ1,D1,2,8,10–12,T3,G1,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Cr, and Ct read instead yathānyāyam, "properly."

"greed" kāmāt: Literally, "out of desire." We interpret according to Cm, who glosses, "out of expectation of some reward from one's enemies (śatroḥ sakāśāt kiñcitphalāpekṣaṇāt)."

17. As the commentators point out, this verse shows that someone who fails to offer protection to a refugee suffers for his inaction not only in this world, as indicated in verse 16 above, but in the next as well by losing all his previously accumulated merit.

The verse is somewhat elliptical, and we have had to paraphrase to make it intelligible.

"should die for want of protection" vinaṣṭaḥ . . . arakṣitaḥ: Literally, "is destroyed unprotected."

"while the person who could have saved him merely looks on" paśyatas tasya rakṣiṇaḥ: Literally, "of a protector looking on or watching [i.e., without doing anything to save the supplicant]."

"the former would depart from this world" gacchet: Literally, "he would go."

"the latter's" tasya: Literally, "his."

18. Ct and Ck understand this verse to be Rāma's speech, the gāthās of Kaṇḍu having ended with verse 17. Cg explicitly states that, in this verse, the speaker, i.e., Rāma, is summing up the essence of the four-verse speech of Kaṇḍu (verses 14–17 above). Cm seems ambiguous on this point.

"it blocks the path to heaven" asvargyam: Literally, "unheavenly."

"destroys one's reputation" ayaśasyam: Literally, "inglorious."

"strength and valor" balavīrya-: This is another of those pairs of close synonyms of which Vālmīki is so fond (see notes on 5.7.12 and 5.7.40). The commentators explain the terms variously. Thus, Ck and Ct read this pair as a karmadhāraya rather than a dvandva in the sense of "that power, i.e., the capacity to punish or reward that is produced through the power of asceticism (tapobalajaṃ yad vīryaṃ nigrahānu-grahasāmarthyam)." Cr, reading a dvandva, understands, "physical strength and sensory acuity (śarīrendriyabalayoḥ)." Cg reads the compound as we do, glossing, "physical strength and valor (śarīrabalavīryayoḥ)." See note to 6.2.14.

19. "at the time of one's final reward" phalodaye: Literally, "at the arising of fruit or reward."

20. Cg, Ct, and Ck naturally take this verse as an occasion for a discussion of the Lord's compassionate nature.

"always" sakṛd eva: Literally, "one time, always, at once." Cr, Cg, and Cm all take the adverb in its sense of "once or one time (ekavāram eva)," which they then construe with the adjective prapanna, "seeking shelter," yielding the sense "who come for shelter even once." Ct understands similarly. One could also take the adverb in its sense of "at once, immediately," thus yielding the sense "I grant protection at once."

"to all beings" sarvabhūtebhyaḥ: Cg, Ck, and Ct want to read this as an ablative (pañcamī) as well as a dative (caturthī), that is, "from all beings," as well as "to all beings."

"protection" abhayam: Literally, "freedom from fear or security." Ck and Ct argue that Rāma's protection is twofold. It is both eternal, as it grants one freedom from the fear of rebirth, and temporal, in that it grants freedom from the fear of death arising from such creatures as Rāvaṇa. The latter, they argue, is a synecdoche for all dangers in this world, such as the depredations of thieves, enemies, etc. (atra tātkālikam ātyantikaṃ cety ubhayavidham apy abhayadānaṃ pratijñāyate. tatrātyantikaṃ saṃsārabhayoparatirūpam. dvitīyaṃ tu rāvaṇād ita utthitamṛtyubhayanivṛttirūpam idaṃ corārigrahanimittakābhayadānasyāpy upalakṣaṇam.)

"I place myself in your hands." tavāsmi: Literally, "I am yours." Ct and Ck interpret this as a statement of total worshipful submission to the Lord, fleshing the phrase out with terms indicative of various critical relationships of inequality, such as "I am the servant, you are the master; I am the disciple, you are the guru; I am the seeker of protection, you are the protector, etc. (ahaṃ sevakas tvaṃ me svāmī, ahaṃ śiṣyas tvaṃ guruḥ, ahaṃ rakṣyas tvaṃ rakṣakaḥ, ity evam upāsanāṃ kurvate)."

21. "I will grant" dattam . . . mayā: Literally, "I have given."

"Vibhīṣaṇa or Rāvaṇa himself" vibhīṣaṇo vā . . . rāvaṇaḥ svayam: Ct, Ck, and Cm understand that Rāma is entertaining the possibility that Rāvaṇa, through his power of taking on forms at will (or in disguise [vibhīṣaṇaveṣadhārī—Cm], may have assumed the appearance of Vibhīṣaṇa (kāmarūpatayākārāntarāvaṣṭambhavān iti śeṣaḥ). Cg gives this as one of his alternative explanations. His others are:

1) Rāma would like to grant refuge to Rāvaṇa because to grant refuge to such a cruel creature as he is would demonstrate his [Rāma's] superior powers to a far greater extent than the protection of virtuous Vibhīṣaṇa and, moreover, would have the desirable consequence of saving all the inhabitants of Laṅkā rather than only the four ministers who have accompanied Vibhīṣaṇa. (vibhīṣaṇas tu dharmātmeti vibhīṣaṇasvīkāro karmavatsvīkāratayā notkarṣāya. rāvaṇasya nṛśaṃsasyeti rāvaṇasvīkāra evotkarṣaḥ syād iti. vibhīṣaṇasvīkāre tatparikarāś catvāra eva rakṣitāḥ syuḥ. rāvaṇasvīkāre tu laṅkāsthāḥ sarve 'pi rakṣitāḥ syur iti mahān lābhaḥ.)
2) Because of Vibhīṣaṇa's close relationship to Rāvaṇa, he himself is still seriously suspect (yadi vā rāvaṇaḥ svayaṃ yatsaṃbandhena vibhīṣaṇe 'py atiśaṅkā sa evāstu).
3) He may be Rāvaṇa himself who has come here without bringing Sītā (svayaṃ sītām apuraskṛtya svayam āgato rāvaṇo vā vāstu).

Cg concludes this discussion by suggesting that what Rāma means to say to Sugrīva is that he is simply to fetch their visitor without announcing "You are really Rāvaṇa and not Vibhīṣaṇa. (tvam api rāvaṇo 'yaṃ na tu vibhīṣaṇa iti vijñāpanāyāpi punar nāgaccheḥ. kiṃ tv ānayaivety arthaḥ.)"

On the order of the verses in the vulgate, see notes to verse 4 above.

22. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

The placement of this verse in the critical edition and/or the placement of Sugrīva's speech appear to be highly suspect both on contextual and textual grounds. The longer meter is, of course, normally found at the end of a sarga, and the placement of this verse seems reasonable in the southern recension and the devanāgarī manuscripts aligned with it. In those manuscripts and editions, the arrangement of verses (see notes to verses 3 and 4 above) places the speech of Sugrīva (= critical edition verses 5–7) immediately before this longer-metered verse (critical edition verse 22), thus making the narrative sequence plausible. Ś1,Ñ,B,V1–3,D1–4,8,9,12 read this after verse 7 (Ś2 omits). The Lahore edition substitutes a completely different verse (213* = Lahore 5.92.56 [vol. 5, p. 588]). Gorresio omits this verse entirely. No manuscript or printed edition appears to have the sequence found in the critical edition. One can only think that the critical editors have either improperly located verses 3–8 or have placed this verse at the end on the basis of its metrical and rhetorical features. See Sutherland 1992.

"welcomed" jagāma saṃgamam: Literally, "went to union or meeting [with]." Cg suggests that, by mentioning "meeting" as grammatically "the most desired object of the agent [i.e., Rāma]," we are to understand that the phrasing suggests that the meeting is to be regarded as Rāma's gain (saṃgamo 'pi kartur īpsitatamatvakathanena rāmasyāyaṃ lābha iti gamyate) (see Pā 1.4.49). Cg offers two alternative interpretations in which we are to take the verb jagāma, "went," literally, and thus understand that Rāma physically rushed off to meet Vibhīṣaṇa. Cg's explanations for this unusual violation of protocol is that Rāma is so intent on fulfilling his vow of never abandoning a suppliant and so unwilling to brook any delay by further argumentation on the part of Sugrīva and the other monkeys that he simply rushes off to meet the rākṣasa (na tyajeyaṃ kathaṃcanety ādibhiḥ sugrīvādivākyarūpavirodhinirasanapūrvakaṃ śrīvibhīṣaṇasvīkāraṃ pratiśrutya kathaṃcit sugrīvādivākyajanitaṃ vilambam aviṣahya tvarayā rakṣituṃ svayam eva tena saṃgata ity āha vibhīṣaṇenāśu jagāma saṃgamam iti).

"had been advised" abhihitam: We are following the interpretation of Cm, who takes this as a reference to Sugrīva's final support of the idea of an alliance with Vibhīṣaṇa as expressed in verses 6 and 7 above. Ct understands the term to be a reference to Sugrīva's speech to Rāma, who, having brought the rākṣasa, announces, "This is Vibhīṣaṇa (tam ānīyāyaṃ vibhīṣaṇa iti bodhitam)." Cg takes it as a reference to Sugrīva's speech to Vibhīṣaṇa: "Vibhīṣaṇa, Rāghava has granted you protection, you must approach Rāghava (he vibhīṣaṇa rāghavas tavābhayaṃ dattavān rāghavam upayāhy evaṃ sugrīvoktam)."

"just as Indra, smasher of citadels, might welcome Garuḍa, the king of birds" patattrirājena yathā puraṃdaraḥ: Literally, "just as the smasher of citadels, the king of the birds." The precise mythological reference is unclear, since Indra has little direct involvement with Garuḍa, who is the mount and associate of Viṣṇu. Cs understands the simile to allude to Indra's having formed an alliance with Garuḍa at the time of the theft of the amṛta in the story of the churning of the ocean (see MBh 1.29.22–33; 1.30.7) (patattrirājena garuḍena puraṃdaro yathāmṛtaharaṇakāle sakhyaṃ jagāma tadvat). Ct, Cr, and Ck understand the term patattrirājena to refer elliptically or, perhaps, by lakṣaṇā, to Indra's younger brother (Upendra) Viṣṇu, who was brought to him by Garuḍa, although no specific episode is mentioned (patattrirājena garuḍānitenopen- dreṇa saṃgamam puraṃdaro yathā—so Cr). Cg comments that the intention of the illustration is to show that Rāma regarded his union with Vibhīṣaṇa to be his own gain, just as Indra did in the case of Garuḍa (puraṃdaro yathā patattrirājena saṃgamaṃ svalābham amanyata tathāyam apīti dṛṣṭāntābhiprāyaḥ). Alternatively, Cg sees the illustration as showing that Rāma rushes off to meet Vibhīṣaṇa fearing that if Sugrīva's mind is still opposed to Vibhīṣaṇa's acceptance, he might undermine his [Rāma's] purpose (yadvā sugrīvasya buddhiḥ punar viparītā cet kāryahānir iti śīghraṃ jagāma). Cs offers a rather different interpretation: he understands harīśvareṇa, "by the lord of the tawny monkeys," to refer not to Sugrīva but to Hanumān, and then interprets "he formed an alliance in his mind as had been advised by Hanumān (harīśvareṇa hanumatābhihitaṃ vibhīṣaṇena saṃgamaṃ sakhyaṃ jagāma manaseti śeṣaḥ)." On the story of the churning of the ocean, see 6.40.29; 6.41.17; 6.53.23; 6.80.19; 6.105.19; and notes.

Sarga 13

1. "devoted" bhaktaiḥ: Cg argues that, through their devotion to their master, Vibhīṣaṇa's attendants now have devotion for Rāma equal to his own (vibhīṣaṇasyaikasyaivopāyānuṣṭhānaśravaṇe 'pi tadanubandhināṃ tadbhaktivaśād eva rāmaparicaraṇaṃ samānam ity ucyate).

Following 1ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [215*]: "[Rāvaṇa's younger brother] wise Vibhīṣaṇa, fixing his eyes on the ground, [descended]."

2. "Seeking refuge" śaraṇānveṣī: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead nipapātātha, "then he descended or fell."

"four rākṣasa companions" caturbhiḥ saha rākṣasaiḥ: Literally, "with four rākṣasas." The names of Vibhīṣaṇa's attendants as given by Cg are listed in the note to 6.11.3 above. Cs offers an idiosyncratic interpretation in which Vibhīṣaṇa alone bows at Rāma's feet, after which Rāvaṇa, accompanied by the four rākṣasas Kumbhakarṇa, Mahāpārśva, Indrajit, and Prahasta, bows down. (atha vibhīṣaṇasya rāmapādanipatanānantaram. sa rāvaṇaś caturbhī rākṣasaiḥ kumbhakarṇamahāpārśvendrajitprahastaiḥ saha nipapāta.) See, too, 6.10.12; 6.28.7,32; 6.71.2; and notes.

3. "fitting" yuktam: Ct and Cm explain, "replete with reasonable argument (yuktiyuktam)." Cg interprets, "fitting by virtue of their falling within the scope of what is suitable to a situation requiring effective and compassionate refuge (samarthakāruṇikaśaraṇyaviṣayatayā yogyam)." We follow Cr in taking the term in its basic sense. He glosses, "proper to say (vaktuṃ yogyam)."

"timely" sāmpratam: Cr, Cm, Ck, and Ct take this word adverbially with saṃpraharṣaṇam, "delightful," to mean, "bringing instant gratification (tatkālaṃ saṃtoṣakaraṇam)." Cg appears to understand it in the adverbial sense of "now," explaining that previously the announcement that Vibhīṣaṇa was seeking refuge with Rāghava was bitter to the ears of Sugrīva and the other monkeys but that now, [after the speeches of Hanumān and Rāma], it was delightful to them all (pūrvaṃ rāghavaṃ śaraṇaṃ gata ity uktidāśāyāṃ sugrīvādīnāṃ śrutikaṭukaṃ jātam idānīṃ sarvasampraharṣaṇam). We, however, understand it in the sense of "suitable to the moment or occasion."

4. Cg and Cm are concerned that Vibhīṣaṇa is repeating himself here, having already stated his situation and his purpose to the monkeys at 6.11.14 above. Cg argues that there is no impropriety in this repetition, as his previous announcement was to Rāma's monkey subordinates and this report is directly to Rāma himself, who is the direct source of refuge (pūrvaṃ nivedayatety atra puruṣakārabhūtān pratyuktam idānīṃ sākṣāccharaṇyaṃ pratīti na punaruktiḥ). Cm thinks that he repeats himself in order to increase Rāma's pleasure (tyaktvā putrāṃś ca dārāṃś ca rāghavaṃ śaraṇaṃ gataḥ [6.11.14] ityādisugrīvādisarvavānarasannidhau kṛtaṃ pralapanaṃ śaraṇyarāmaprītivardhanāya punar apy anusaṃdhatte).

"refuge of all beings" sarvabhūtānāṃ śaraṇyam: Ct, Ck, and Cs argue, not implausibly, that Vibhīṣaṇa's use of the epithet demonstrates that he, Vibhīṣaṇa, is aware of Rāma's status as an avatāra of the Lord (sarvabhūtānāṃ śaraṇyam ity anena tasya rāme bhagavadavatāratvāvagamaḥ sūcitaḥ). Cg comments that the epithet derives from Rāma's resolution to offer refuge even to Rāvaṇa (6.12.21), but he does not indicate how he thinks Vibhīṣaṇa could have become aware of this (sarvabhūtānāṃ śaraṇyaṃ rāvaṇasyāpi śaraṇaṃ bhavāmīti kṛtasaṃkalpaṃ bhavantam). See 5.36.26–29 and notes. See, too, 6.31.56; 6.47.43; 6.59.8; 6.81.14; 6.105.15; and notes.

5. "everything I own" dhanāni: Literally, "properties, wealth."

"homeland" rājyam: Literally, "kingdom, country." Given the immediate context, we believe that Vibhīṣaṇa here is alluding to his exile from his native land rather than to any hopes he may have of succeeding his brother on the throne of Laṅkā. Ck and Ct, however, understand that by virtue of his omniscience, Vibhīṣaṇa has determined that Rāma will kill Rāvaṇa [and place Vibhīṣaṇa on the throne] (sarvajñatvena rāmo rāvaṇavadhaṃ kariṣyaty eveti niścitam iti gamyate). Cg avoids the touchy political question here by explaining rājyam as a synecdoche (upalakṣaṇam) for all of Vibhīṣaṇa's possessions. Translators have generally rendered the term as "kingdom" (Dutt 1893, p. 1152; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 43); as "empire"(Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 50); as "sovereignty" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1428); or, to avoid the problem raised by the fact that Vibhīṣaṇa is not currently a king, as "hopes of kingdom" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 43) or "speranza di regno" (Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 183).

Cs reverts to his fondness for breaking up Vālmīki's words peculiarly, reading the phrase "parityaktā mayā laṅkā (Laṅkā is abandoned by me)" as parityaktāmayā laṅkā, explaining the bahuvrīhi compound as follows: "Laṅkā, which has fought off (parityaktaḥ) its illness (āmayaḥ), that is, Rāvaṇa in the form of a disease (rāvaṇo rogarūpī), who had brought about the destruction of the various parts of the city, its ramparts, etc. (prākārādyaṅgabhaṅgakāritvāt)."

Following verse 5, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of thirty-three lines [App. I, No. 9]: "Upon hearing those words of his, Rāma replied, comforting him with his words and drinking him in, as it were, with his eyes[1–2]: 'Describe to me accurately the strengths and weaknesses of the rākṣasas.' Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, tireless in action, the rākṣasa began to describe all the forces of Rāvaṇa [3–5]: 'Prince, as a result of a boon from self-existent Brahmā, ten-necked Rāvaṇa is not to be killed by any of the powerful beings, such as gandharvas, great serpents, and rākṣasas.[1] [6–7] The next younger brother of Rāvaṇa is my elder brother, the valorous and immensely powerful Kumbhakarṇa, whose strength in battle rivals that of Śakra.[8–9] And, Rāma, Rāvaṇa's[2] field marshal is well known as Prahasta. It was he who defeated Māṇibhadra[3] at the battle of Kailāsa.[10–11] When his wrist and finger guards are strapped on,[4] when he is wearing his impenetrable armor, and when he takes up his bow to stand in battle, Indrajit becomes invisible.[12–13] Once his forces are arrayed at the time of battle,[5] he makes an offering to the fire, eater of oblations; then, having become invisible, Indrajit slaughters his enemies,[6] Rāghava.[14–15] Then there are his generals:[7] Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, and the rākṣasa Akampana, who are the equals of the world guardians in battle.[16–17] In the city of Laṅkā dwell ten billion rākṣasas, who feed on flesh and blood and can take on any form at will.[18–19] Together with them, the king made war upon the world guardians, who, along with the gods, were crushed by evil-minded[8] Rāvaṇa.'[20–21] When Rāma, firm in his valor,[9] had heard Vibhīṣaṇa's words, he considered all of this in his mind and then said these words: [22–23] 'I know all about those magnificent deeds of Rāvaṇa, which have been narrated fully, Vibhīṣaṇa.[24–25] Still, I shall slay ten-necked Rāvaṇa along with his son and Prahasta, and then I shall make you king; this is the truth I am telling you.[10][26–27] Rāvaṇa may enter the underworlds known as Rasātala or Pātāla or even the presence of Grandfather Brahmā himself; still, he will not escape me alive.[28–29] I swear by my three brothers that I shall not reenter Ayodhyā until I have slain Rāvaṇa in battle along with his sons, his troops,[11] and his kinsmen.[30–31]' When he had heard this speech of Rāma, tireless in action, righteous Vibhīṣaṇa[12] bowed his head and began to speak.[32–33]"

[1]"any of the powerful beings, such as gandharvas, great serpents, and rākṣasas" sarvabhūtānāṃ gandharvoragarakṣasām: Literally, "of all beings, gandharvas, uragas, and rākṣasas." Given the terms of Rāvaṇa's boon, we must understand that the reference is to superhuman beings. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read -pakṣiṇām, "[great] birds," for -rakṣasām, "rākṣasas." D5,T1,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead -[a]sura-, "asuras," for -[u]raga-, "[great] serpents." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 43).

See note to 6.28.28–29.

[2]"Rāvaṇa's" tasya: Literally,"his."

[3]"Māṇibhadra" māṇibhadraḥ (v.l. maṇibhadraḥ): Cg identifies this character as a general of Kubera (kuberasenāpatiḥ). Cr identifies him as a [yakṣa] defeated by Prahasta (yena māṇibhadraḥ parājitaḥ sa prahastas tasya rāvaṇasya senāpatiḥ). Shastri has two separate entries: Manibadra [sic], whom he identifies as "one of Kuvera's warriors who was slain by Prahasta," and Manibhadra, whom he identifies as "a Yaksha defeated by Dashagriva" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 662). He cross-references this latter figure to a figure called "Parshva-mauli," a name he takes as an epithet of Maṇibhadra. A story is told in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.15.6–10) of a fight between Rāvaṇa and a yakṣa named Māṇibhadra (v.l. Maṇibhadra). Māṇibhadra first bests Prahasta in battle. But Rāvaṇa, seeing this, attacks him and knocks his diadem askew. As a result, the yakṣa receives the epithet Pārśvamauli, "he of the skewed diadem." See also Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 667.

[4]"his wrist and finger guards are strapped on" baddhagodhāṅgulitrāṇaḥ: See note to 1.21.8. See, too, note to 6.66.23; and 6.67.25; 6.76.2,24; 6.81.26–27; and notes. Also see 1701* at note to 6.77.30.

[5]"Once his forces are arrayed at the time of battle" saṃgrāmasamayavyūhe: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃgrāme sumahadvyūhe, "in the midst of a great array in battle."

[6]"enemies" śatrūn: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śrīmān, "majestic [Indrajit]."

[7]"generals" anīkasthāḥ: Literally, "standing in battle, warriors." We follow Cg, who glosses, "generals (senāpatayaḥ)." D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead anīkapāḥ, "protectors of the army, generals."

[8]"evil-minded" durātmanā: D6,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read mahātmanā, "great, mighty." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 44) alone renders this variant.

[9]"firm in his valor" dṛḍhaparākramaḥ: D7,10,11,G2,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read [with other minor variants] raghusattamaḥ, "foremost of the Rāghus."

[10]"I am telling you" bravīmi te: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śṛṇotu me, "[let you, sir,] hear," misprinted in the critical apparatus as śruṇotu me.

[11]"his troops" -bala-: D7,10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead -jana-, "people."

[12]"righteous Vibhīṣaṇa" dharmātmā: Literally, "righteous one."

6. "so long as breath remains in my body" yathāprāṇam: Literally, "to the extent of my life breaths." Cg glosses yathābalam, "with all my strength."

"I shall penetrate their forces" pravekṣyāmi ca vāhinīm: We are following Ct, Cr, and Ck in seeing this as a reference to Rāvaṇa's army. The phrase is, however, ambiguous. It could also mean "enter, i.e., join, your army." Northern manuscripts and printed editions substitute nayiṣyāmi or neṣyāmi tava, "I shall lead or I shall lead your," which would then yield the sense of "I shall be the leader of your army" (saro condottiero dell'esercito—Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 183).

7–8. "bestower of honor" mānada: Literally, "giver or destroyer of honor or pride." We follow Cg, who glosses, "bestower of honor," and indicates that the sense of the epithet here is that Lakṣmaṇa provides the [concrete] rewards when he, Rāma, is gratified or pleased (mānada bahumānaprada matprasāde sati phalapradas tvam iti bhāvaḥ). See note 1 to 3310* following 6.108.5. See, too, 6.110.6; cf. 6.104.10 and notes.

9. "anointed Vibhīṣaṇa" abhyaṣiñcad vibhīṣaṇam: This appears to be a sort of provisional consecration as the formal consecration of Vibhīṣaṇa will not take place until nearly the end of the kāṇḍa at sarga 100 (6.100.12–16). Nevertheless, Vibhīṣaṇa is referred to as king at 6.19.26–27 below. See notes to 6.19.26,27. See, too, notes to 6.100.9. Cf. 6.39.22 and App. I, No. 72, lines 3–5 and n. 2, at note to 6.111.114.

10. "suddenly" sadyaḥ: Several translators (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 44; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1430; and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 183) take the adverb adjectivally with prasādam, in the sense of "the quick grace of Rāma."

"began chattering loudly" pracukruśur mahānādān: Literally, "they cried great sounds." Ct and Ck understand, "they made a kilakilā in their satisfaction (saṃtoṣāt kilakilām akurvan)." For a discussion of the simian vocalization kilakilā, see notes on 5.55.22 and 5.62.34. Cr describes the sound as the noise made by their species to indicate joy. Cf. note 10 to 75* following 6.4.52.

D5–7,10,11,T,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read mahātmānam for mahānādān, yielding the sense "cried out to that great man [Rāma or Vibhīṣaṇa]." This reading is reflected in the translations of those who follow the text of Ct, for example, Dutt (1893, p. 1154), "eulogized the high-souled one"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 54), "acclamèrent le magnanime (Rakshasa)"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 45), "acclaimed that magnanimous titan"; and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1430), "hailed Śrī Rāma in the words."

11. Cg argues that Hanumān and Sugrīva have taken Vibhīṣaṇa aside at a slightly different time to pose their questions as to how the monkey army is to cross over the ocean (atha samayāntare kutracid ekānte pradeśe hanumatsugrīvau sthalajñaṃ vibhīṣaṇaṃ vānarasenātaraṇopāyam apṛcchatām iti). This argument on Cg's part is necessary because the southern recension contains a passage [223*], which will be discussed in the notes to verse 15 below, in which, after his conversation with Vibhīṣaṇa, Sugrīva goes to report it to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, who are not, as in the critical text, present during their interview.

Following verse 11, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [221*]: "[How are we] all of us, surrounded by the forces of the immensely powerful monkeys."

12. "Please tell us the means whereby all of us might approach" upāyair abhigacchāmaḥ . . . sarve: Literally, "through [what] means we might all approach." The critical reading is elliptical, providing no wording that indicates either that this phrase is a question or that the monkeys are explicitly requesting information. D10,11, and Ct and Ck read abhigacchāma (the imperative [loṭ]) for abhigacchāmaḥ (the present indicative [laṭ]). Cr, who reads with the critical edition, glosses, "we have reached (abhyagacchāma—the imperfect [laṅ])." He understands the whole utterance to be indirect (bhaṅgyantareṇa), as well as elliptical, and explains, "We have reached [the ocean], please tell us the means whereby we may cross. Moreover, you should tell us not only the means whereby we may cross the ocean, but by which we might obtain (abhigacchāma) Sītā as well. (varuṇālayam abhigacchāma abhyagacchāma prāpnuma te vayaṃ tarasā upāyair yathā tarāma tathā brūhīti śeṣaḥ. kiṃca varuṇālayaṃ yathā tarāma yathā copāyair abhigacchāma sītāṃ prāpnuyāṃ tathā brūhi.)" Cm reads adhigacchāmaḥ (laṭ) and glosses it with the future (lṛṭ) adhigamiṣyāmaḥ, explaining, "We reach, that is, we shall reach, the lord of streams and rivers by some means or other. You must tell us the means whereby all [of us] may cross the abode of Varuṇa together with the troops. (upāyaiḥ kaiścid upāyair nadanadīpatim adhigacchāmo 'dhigamiṣyāmaḥ. sasainyāḥ sarve tarasā varuṇālayaṃ yathā tarāma tādṛśopāyān vadeti śeṣaḥ.)" Ñ2,D1–4,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg (Cm and Crā as an alternative) read the variant upāyaṃ nādhigacchāmaḥ, which Cm explains as "We do not understand, that is, we do not know of a means such that we might cross the abode of Varuṇa (varuṇālayaṃ yathā tarāma tādṛśam upāyaṃ nādhigacchāma na jānīma ity arthaḥ)." Northern texts avoid the ellipsis and ambiguity but substitute various alternate readings. Thus, for example, Gorresio's edition (5.92.6–7) reads upāyaṃ brūhi naḥ saumya yathā nadanadīpatim . . . uttarema ("Please tell us, dear friend, a means whereby we may cross the lord of rivers and streams").

13. "who knew what was right" dharmajñaḥ: Ñ2,V1,3,B2–4,D5–7,9–11,T1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ct, and Ck read instead dharmātmā, "righteous."

"must solicit the help of" śaraṇaṃ gantum arhati: Literally, "he must go to for assistance or refuge." The most common usage of the term śaraṇa, especially in the present context in which Vibhīṣaṇa has sought śaraṇa with Rāma, the refuge of all the worlds, is, of course, "refuge or shelter." In this verse, however, we believe that the word must be taken in another of its meanings, that of "aid, succor, assistance." Cr, perhaps disturbed by the prospect of the refuge of all the world, Rāma, seeking refuge with such a minor deity as Samudra, takes śaraṇa in yet another of its meanings, that of "home," understanding that the ocean is practically Rāma's own home (svagṛha-prāyam), a notion he clarifies further in his comments to verse 14 in connection with the legend that the ocean was dug out under the orders of Rāma's ancestor King Sagara (see note to verse 14 below). See notes to 6.10.17 and 6.12.11. See, too, MBh 3.130.19–20 and 3.131ff.

14. The story of King Sagara and the circumstances under which his sons excavate the earth to create the cavity that will become the ocean when filled by the descent of the celestial Gañgā is narrated at great length in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.38–41). The idea underlying this verse is that, since the ocean divinity Sāgara can thus be regarded as the creation, or "child," of Sagara, one of Rāma's ancestors, he would look upon Rāma as his kinsman. For another expression of this idea, see 5.1.103.

"great . . . ocean" mahodadhiḥ . . . mahodadhiḥ: Literally, "great ocean . . . great ocean." A few manuscripts (B2,3,D6,7) and the texts and printed editions of Cg substitute mahāmatiḥ, "highly intelligent," for mahodadhiḥ in pāda d, thus avoiding the repetition.

15. "When . . . Vibhīṣaṇa had spoken in this fashion, Rāghava . . . found what he said to be agreeable" evaṃ vibhīṣaṇenokte . . . rāghavasyāpy arocata: Literally, "when it had been spoken thus by Vibhīṣaṇa, [it] was agreeable to Rāghava as well." The critical reading provides no clear grammatical subject for the verb arocata, "to be pleasing to," and we have therefore added the words "what he said." In his comments on 223.3*, Cm argues that it is the idea of propitiating the ocean that pleases Rāma (sāgarasyopaveśanam upāsanaṃ rāghavasyāpy arocata). Cg and Ct interpret similarly. Cr, however, understands the reference to be to Vibhīṣaṇa's speech as reported by Sugrīva (rāmasamīpāgamanānantaraṃ sāgarasyopaveśanaṃ vibhīṣaṇavacaḥ sugrīva ākhyātum ārebhe). Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1–4,7,8,10–12, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the neuter nominative uktam, "what was said," for the locative ukte, which variant provides a grammatical subject for the verb arocata. D6,T2,3,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read the nominative masculine uktaḥ, "addressed," which construes with the proper noun sugrīvaḥ in the southern insert 223.1*.

D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read rāmasyāsyāpi, "of [to] that Rāma as well," for rāghavasyāpi.

"wise rākṣasa" rākṣasena vipaścitā: Cg claims that, by the term "wise," the poet suggests Vibhīṣaṇa's possession of timely knowledge, and by the term "rākṣasa," he suggests Vibhīṣaṇa's knowledge of the [rākṣasas'] territory. (rākṣaseneti sthalajñatoktā. vipaścitetī tātkālikabuddhimattā.)

Following 15ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of three lines [223*]: "[When the wise rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa had spoken in this fashion (15ab)], Sugrīva came to[1] where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were.[1] Then broad-necked[2] Sugrīva began to report on Vibhīṣaṇa's excellent advice concerning the winning over of[3] Sāgara.[2–3]"

[1]"came to" ājagāma: Cg, repeating his remarks from verse 11 above, understands the verb to indicate that the questions directed by Sugrīva and the others were asked at a different time and place (anena kālāntare deśāntare sugrīvādipraśna iti gamyate). Cf. verse 11 above.

[2]"broad-necked" vipulagrīvaḥ: This is another of the epithets that echo the name of a character (see note on 5.7.12 and 5.7.40). Cg evidently understands it to mean

"having a long [i.e., extended] neck" and claims that the epithet is used to indicate the monkey king's eagerness (kutūhalitvam). Perhaps he has in mind the term utkaṇṭha, literally, "with upraised or extended neck," which is often used to express eagerness, anxiety, or anticipation.

[3]"concerning the winning over of" upaveśanam: Literally, "the winning over of." We understand the term here to be synonymous with śaraṇam in the sense that it was used in verse 13 above (i.e., "aid, succor, help"). The literal meaning of the word is "sitting near," but it often has the sense in Sanskrit of sitting near in order to cajole or coerce someone as in the usage prayopaveśanam, "to sit and fast against someone whom one wishes to coerce." Ct glosses, "seeking refuge with or the help of (śaraṇagamanam)," while Cg glosses, "sitting near, attending upon, worshiping (upāsanam)."

16. "skillful" kriyādakṣaḥ: Literally, "skilled or competent in action." Cg understands the compound to mean "even though he was capable of carrying out the undertaking by himself (svayaṃ kāryakaraṇasamartho 'pi). The compound is doubtless employed here for its echoing effect with the adverb satkriyārtham that precedes it. D1,10,11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the accusative kriyādakṣam, which then modifies Sugrīva in pāda b. See note below.

"Rāma . . . to Lakṣmaṇa and Sugrīva" sa lakṣmaṇam . . . sugrīvaṃ ca: Literally, "he . . . to Lakṣmaṇa and Sugrīva." The printed editions of Ct (NSP, GPP, and Gita Press [6.19.34]) read instead the opening words of the verse sa lakṣmaṇam, "he . . . to Lakṣmaṇa," as a compound adjective, salakṣmaṇam, "together with Lakṣmaṇa."

"in order to honor them" satkriyārtham: Literally, "for the sake of honor." The commentators differ as to whom or what Rāma wishes to honor in the speech that follows. Ct says it is to honor Vibhīṣaṇa; Cg says it is Vibhīṣaṇa's counsel; Cr understands that it is "Sugrīva, etc."; and Cm claims that it is Lakṣmaṇa and Sugrīva whom Rāma wishes to honor. We have followed Cm because, in the following verses, Rāma is clearly attempting to bolster the egos of Sugrīva and Lakṣmaṇa in asking for their opinions.

17. "Now, you, together with Sugrīva, should tell me if it pleases you as well." brūhi tvaṃ sahasugrīvas tavāpi yadi rocate: Ñ1,V3,D8,10,11,T1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr omit this line.

19. "courteous" samudācārasaṃyuktam: Literally, "joined with courtesy." The word can be read, as we have done, as an adjective modifying vacanam, "words," or, as suggested by Cg, as an adverb modifying the verb ūcatuḥ, "those two said or responded,"and having the sense "responded with every gesture of civility, such as cupping the hands in reverence, etc." (añjalibandhādyupacāraḥ tatsaṃyuktam iti kriyāviśeṣaṇam).

20. "advice" uktam: Literally, "what was said."

"at this moment" asmin kāle: Cg explains, "at [this] time of considering without any plan (upāyam antarā darśanakāle)."

"seems the most feasible plan" sukhāvaham: Literally, "bringing happiness or ease." Cg explains, "a means of accomplishing our purpose effortlessly (ayatnena kāryasādhakam)."

21. "reaching" āsāditum: This could also mean "attacking or assaulting" and has been so rendered by some translators.

22. "You should petition" niyujyatām: Literally, "let [the ocean] be enjoined or employed." We believe the context supports the interpretation of Cg and Cm, who gloss,

"should be petitioned [for the construction of a bridge—Cm] ([setubandhāya] prārthyatām)." Ck and Ct interpret,"you yourself should be enjoined to petition Sāgara. (sāgaraprārthanārthaṃ niyujyatām. svātmā iti śeṣaḥ.)"

Following verse 22, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [227*]: "So that we may proceed with our army to the city guarded by Rāvaṇa."

23. "sat down" saṃviveśa: Cr notes that Rāma is practicing the rites appropriate to a pilgrimage spot [such as the seashore] (rāmasya tīrthavidhikaraṇam).

"on a bed of kuśa grass that had been spread on the shore" kuśāstīrṇe tīre: Literally, "on the kuśa-strewn shore."

"like fire, eater of oblations, installed upon an altar" vedyām iva hutāśanaḥ: Literally, "like the oblation eater on an altar." Cg notes that the simile suggests the imminent blazing splendor of Rāma (anena jvalisyamāṇatvaṃ vyajyate), while Cm, perhaps concerned at the notion of Rāma coming as a suppliant to the ocean, remarks that the simile suggests not only Rāma's blazing energy but his absence of abjection (hutāśanadṛṣṭāntena tattejoyuktatayā kārpaṇyābhāvaḥ sūcitataḥ).

Following sarga 13, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one hundred three lines [App. I, No. 10; GPP; VSP; KK, NSP = sargas 20, 21.1–9]. In this sarga one of Rāvaṇa's rākṣasa spies, Śārdūla, observes Sugrīva's army encamped on the shore and, after reconnoitering, hastens back to Laṅkā to report to Rāvaṇa.[1–5] He informs the king that there is a vast host of apes and monkeys, ten leagues in extent, encamped on the opposite shore and, with them, are the two well-armed sons of Daśaratha who are on the trail of the missing Sītā.[6–11] He urges Rāvaṇa to send out messengers to spy on the army and recommends that he consider one of three strategies: the restoration of Sītā, conciliation, or an attempt to sow dissension in his enemies' ranks.[12–14] Hearing the words of Śārdūla, Rāvaṇa becomes agitated and decides to send a rākṣasa named Śuka to deliver a message to Sugrīva forthrightly but in soothing words.[15–19] Śuka is to flatter Sugrīva, saying that Sugrīva has nothing to gain or lose in this affair and that he is like a brother to Rāvaṇa. Rāvaṇa's message goes on to say that his abduction of Rāma's wife has nothing to do with Sugrīva and that the latter should therefore go back to Kiṣkindhā. Moreover, he argues that, if the gods and the gandharvas themselves are unable to conquer Laṅkā, how then would it be possible for mere men and monkeys?[20–27] Śuka turns himself into a bird and swiftly flies across the ocean, where, hovering in the sky, he conveys the message to Sugrīva as it had been given to him by wicked Rāvaṇa.[28–32] While Śuka is delivering his message, the monkeys leap up into the sky and begin to tear off his wings and pummel him with their fists. Violently seized by the monkeys, the messenger is hurled out of the sky to the earth.[33–36] Assaulted in this fashion, he addresses Rāma, arguing that it is wrong to kill a messenger and urging him to call off his monkeys. He notes that the only messenger who deserves death is he who departs from the instructions of his master and speaks on his own behalf.[37–40] Hearing the lamentation of Śuka, Rāma instructs the monkeys to spare him. Released by the monkeys, Śuka flies up once more into the sky and from there addresses Sugrīva, asking him what he is to report to Rāvaṇa.[41–46] Sugrīva responds, saying that Śuka is to report his [Sugrīva's] response as follows. Sugrīva sends the message to Rāvaṇa that he is no friend of his and that he deserves no mercy from him. He has not helped him in any way nor is he dear to him. Rāvaṇa, along with his kinsmen, on the other hand, is an enemy of Rāma and, like Vālin, deserves to die. He vows to slay Rāvaṇa and all his kinsmen and to reduce

Laṅkā to ashes.[47–58] Sugrīva goes on to vow that Rāvaṇa will not escape Rāghava even should he gain the protection of the gods along with Indra, or if he should hide himself in the path of the sun or in the underworld Pātāla, or if he were [to take refuge] at the lotus feet of Śiva himself.[59–64] Sugrīva goes on to say that he can see no being in all the three worlds, whether piśāca, rākṣasa, gandharva, or asura, that will be able to save Rāvaṇa. He then taunts Rāvaṇa for his cowardice in killing the aged vulture king Jaṭāyus and in abducting Sītā in the absence of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. He says that Rāvaṇa does not understand the enormous power of Rāma, who will kill him.[65–71] Next Aṅgada speaks up, saying that he thinks Śuka is not a messenger but a spy who has taken advantage of his presence there to evaluate the strength of Rāma's forces. He says that he feels that Śuka should be taken prisoner.[72–75] Thus, on the orders of their king, the monkeys spring up and once more bind the wailing Śuka. The rākṣasa cries out to Rāma, complaining that the monkeys are tearing out his wings and poking out his eyes. Śuka threatens that, if he should be killed, his tormentor will then have to bear the burden of all the evil deeds that he, Śuka, has performed during his lifetime. Hearing this lamentation, Rāma once again makes the monkeys desist from killing Śuka and tells them to release him since he has indeed come as a messenger.[76–85] [Colophon GPP 6.20]

[GPP 6.21.1–9] Rāma spreads darbha grass on the seashore and lies upon it after making reverential gestures toward the ocean. Resting his head on an arm of which the beauty, ornamentation, and romantic and martial associations are elaborately described [86–100], Rāma, controlling his senses, vows either to cross the ocean or die in the attempt.[101–103]

Sarga 14

Before verse 1, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of eighteen lines (App. I, No. 10, lines 86–103 = GPP, VSP, KK, and NSP sarga 21.1–9). See note to 6.13.23 for a summary of the passage.

1. "on a bed of kuśa grass spread on the ground" kuśāstīrṇe mahītale: Literally, "on the surface of the earth, which was spread with kuśa grass."

Following verse 1, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [230*]: "And, dwelling there for three nights, Rāma, who knew statecraft and was devoted to righteousness, attended upon Sāgara, lord of rivers."

2. Cg is evidently disturbed at the whole notion of Rāma, refuge of all worlds, seeking refuge with some minor divinity, let alone his being rebuffed by the latter. He entertains the objection that, although Rāma properly takes refuge with the ocean, he does not obtain the desired results, as he lacks the right to seek refuge, like a brahman attempting to perform the rājasūya rite. Cg refutes this objection, however, by saying that, although it is true in general that Rāma lacks the right to seek refuge, in his present state of destitution (akiṃcanaḥ) he has gained this right. (nanu rāmeṇa samyakkṛtā śaraṇāgatiḥ kuto na phalitocyate 'nadhikāriṇā kṛtatvād brāhmaṇakṛtarājasūyavat. na ca śaraṇāgatāv adhikārī rāmo 'kiṃcano hi tatrādhikārī.)

"being obdurate" mandaḥ: The term has two meanings that may be applicable here: 1) "sluggish, tardy, unresponsive"; and 2) "dull, foolish." We believe the context better supports the first of these. Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cg offer the second (mandabuddhiḥ—Ct, Ck, or mandamatiḥ—Cr, or ajñaḥ—Cg), although Cr proposes the alternative "characterized by excessive joy (atipramodaviśiṣṭaḥ)." Cr understands that Sāgara refuses to appear before Rāma, because he [Sāgara] is eager to have Rāma demonstrate his supernatural power (sāgaro rūpaṃ svasvarūpaṃ rāmasya na darśayate 'darśayad etena tasya rāmaprabhāvadarśanākāṅkṣitvaṃ vyaktam). Translators vary in their interpretation. Some, like us, see it as a reference to the ocean's stubbornness or sluggishness, interpreting it to mean indolent, etc. (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1436; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 49; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 56; and Pagani 1999, p. 917). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 48), following Cg, translates, "dull-witted." Only Dutt (1893, p. 1159) sees the term as a reference to moral turpitude, translating, "wicked," a possible but relatively rare meaning of the term.

"would not manifest himself" na ca darśayate: Literally, "does not show." Cv, Cg, and Cm supply the word ātmānam ("himself").

3. "Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaṃ śubhalakṣaṇam: This alliterative formulaic epithet of a type dear to Vālmīki is used frequently for Lakṣmaṇa. See 6.67.37; 6.71.20; 6.73.5; 6.75.16; 6.79.1; 6.89.4; and notes. Cf. 6.31.1 and note. See also R. Goldman 1984, p. 105. An epithet of this type used in conjunction with Lakṣmaṇa's matronymic Saumitri is mitranandana ("who delights his friends") as at 6.74.7 and 6.72.31 and notes.

4. "just see the arrogance of this ignoble Samudra . . . even though I have worshiped him" paśya tāvad anāryasya pūjyamānasya lakṣmaṇa / avalepaṃ samudrasya: D5–7,10,11,T,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators omit 4ab. G3 is damaged for verse 4. Thus, the entire available southern recension omits this line. Therefore, the inclusion of 4ab in the critical edition is highly suspect. In addition, in 4c, these same manuscripts substitute the nominative avalepaḥ for the critical edition's accusative avalepam, yielding the sense, as suggested by the commentators, of "in that he will not show himself, that is the arrogance of Samudra."

5. "straightforwardness" ārjavam: Literally, "straightness." Cg gives the standard interpretation but also suggests an alternative, that is, "amenability to the wishes of others (paracittānusāritvam)." Cm defines it as "uniformity among the three faculties (karaṇatrayaikarūpyam)," presumably thought, speech, and external gestures. See notes on 6.11.54 above.

"taken for signs of weakness" asāmarthyaṃ phalanty ete: Literally, "These bear the fruit of incapacity." We follow Cg and Cm, the only commentators to read with the critical edition, who gloss, respectively, "produce an impression of weakness (asamarthatvabuddhiṃ janayanti)" and "evil people regard one who, though he may possess omnipotence, is devoted to calmness, etc., as weak (duṣṭajanāḥ sarvaśaktiyukto 'pi praśamādiparaś cet tam asamarthaṃ manyanta ity arthaḥ)." Cm goes on to say that the conclusion to be drawn from this interpretation is that the current situation calls for the use of force (ato 'yaṃ daṇḍasyaiva viṣaya iti bhāvaḥ). Ct, although he has a variant reading (asāmarthyaphalā hy ete for asāmarthyaṃ phalanty ete), repeats Cm's comments here.

"by those who lack them" nirguṇeṣu: Literally, "among those who lack virtues."

6. "People" lokaḥ: Cr and Cg appear unwilling to accept this word as a general comment on humanity and so add a pejorative adjective. Thus, Cr understands, "arrogant people (garvavāñ janaḥ)," and Cg, "ignorant people (ajño janaḥ)."

"insolent" dhṛṣṭam: Commentators differ as to the precise meaning of the adjective here. Ck and Ct gloss, "reckless in unrighteous conduct (adharmapravṛttau sāhasikam)."

Cr suggests, "devoid of a sense of shame arising from being the source of evil actions (duṣkarmasādhanahetukalajjāhīnam)." Cg suggests, "cruel, pitiless (nirdayam)."

"person" naram: Literally, "man." Cr glosses, "king (rājānam)."

"who runs about praising himself" ātmapraśaṃsinam . . . viparidhāvakam: Literally, "self-praising . . . running about." We follow Ct, Cr, and Ck, who explain this to mean "habitually running here and there in order to trumpet his own virtues (itas tataḥ svaguṇakhyāpanāya paridhāvanaśīlam—so Ct)." Cg appears to understand this as a derivative of the ṇijanta (causative) of the root √dhāv, "to run," and thus glosses, "causing everyone to run away (sarvapalāyanakaram)." Cm explains, "going on the wrong path (amārgavartinam)," while Cv understands, "going by his own special path (viśeṣavartinam)."

7. "Peaceful means can no more lead to fame or glory . . . than they can to victory" na sāmnā śakyate kīrtir na sāmnā śakyate yaśaḥ / prāptum . . . jayo vā: Literally, "it is not possible to obtain fame through peaceful means; it is not possible to obtain glory through peaceful means . . . or victory."

The pair kīrti, "fame," and yaśaḥ, "glory," constitute another set of close synonyms that are so frequent in the Rāmāyaṇa. Commentators struggle to differentiate the terms, offering a variety of seemingly idiosyncratic distinctions. Thus, Ck and Ct define kīrti as "international fame (deśāntarakhyātiḥ)," and yaśaḥ as "national or local fame (svadeśakhyātiḥ)." Cr defines the two similarly as "widely spread (digantarakhyātiḥ)" and "minor or local (alpakhyātiḥ)," respectively. Cg glosses yaśaḥ with "fame gained through strength (balakṛtā prathā)," and kīrti with "fame gained through valor (parākramakṛtā prathā)." Cm takes kīrti to mean "fame won through the possession of virtues (guṇavattāprathā)," and yaśaḥ to mean "fame produced through generosity (dānajanitā prathā)." Cv defines yaśaḥ as "the causes of kīrtiḥ, such as pure conduct and so on (kīrteḥ kāraṇam apadānādikam)," and kīrti as "the praise of such actions on the part of their beneficiaries (tasya [yaśasaḥ] jalpanaṃ bhoginām)." See note to 6.2.14.

8. "abode of sea monsters . . . with the dead bodies of those very creatures" makarair makarālayam: Literally, "the abode of sea monsters with sea monsters." We have added the words "with the dead bodies," following Ct, who explains, "fish and so on pierced by my arrows, and, therefore, having died, are floating everywhere (madbāṇanirbhinnair ata eva mṛtvā sarvataḥ plavadbhiḥ matsyādibhiḥ)." See notes on 5.7.6 and 5.34.7 for the term makara. Cf. notes to 6.4.78–80.

"choked" niruddha-: Literally, "blocked, obstructed." Ct glosses, "covered (pracchādita-)," while Cg understands, "pervaded (vyāpta-)."

9. According to the apparatus on verse 9, only T1 appears to read as does the critical edition. D7,10,11,T2,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct transpose pādas ab and cd, which Cv notes in his commentary.

"Here and now" iha: Literally, "here."

"bodies of gigantic fish" mahābhogāni matsyānām: Literally, "the huge bodies of fish."

"trunks of sea elephants" kariṇāṃ . . . karān: Literally, "the trunks of elephants." We use the term "sea elephant" here in a general sense and not to refer specifically to the elephant seal (either the northern elephant seal [Mirounga angustirostris] or the southern elephant seal [Mirounga leonina]), which is sometimes referred to by the term "sea elephant." Some commentators (e.g., Cr) and translators (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 49 and Dutt 1893, p. 1159) seem content to see a reference to actual elephants here. Other commentaries (e.g., those of Ct, Ck) are more ambiguous as to what sort of creature is intended, glossing jalakarin, "water or sea elephant." This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1436), which renders "(sea) elephants." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 57) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 49) appear to depart somewhat from this reading, understanding an implicit simile, thus Roussel offers, "Ces grandes articulations des poissons ainsi que la trompe des éléphants (de mer)" and Shastri, "the limbs of the great fish like unto the trunks of elephants." Pagani (1999, p. 917) understands similarly. We are inclined to agree with Cg, who understands the reference to be to a fish that resembles an elephant (gajākāramatsyānām) and possesses some kind of trunklike protuberance (śuṇḍādaṇḍa). He supports this view with an observation from the lexicon of Halāyudha, which says, "the makara is a type of fish and the elephant makara is one of its subtypes (matsyaviśeṣo makaraḥ karimakaro bhavati tadviśeṣaś ca)." Perhaps something like the bottlenose dolphin (Tursiops truncatus) is intended or, less likely because of its range, the Gangetic dolphin (Platanista gangetica). Cf. notes to 6.4.78–80.

10. "launching a powerful assault" yuddhena mahatā: Literally, "with a great battle." Since no real battle is envisaged here, we are inclined to follow the suggestion of Ct and Cm, who gloss yuddhena as "the strikes or blows [of arrows] ([Cm bāṇa-]prahāreṇa)."

"with my arrows" śaraiḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tathā, "and, as well as." See Slatin 2006.

"sea monsters" -makaram: This could also mean crocodiles. See note to 6.14.8 above.

11. "This lord of the ocean, abode of sea monsters, thinks" makarālayaḥ . . . vijānāti: Literally, "the abode of sea monsters thinks." Cg sees the use of the epithet here as a kind of sarcasm on the part of Rāma who, he argues, is suggesting that the lord of the ocean thinks to himself, "This is merely the lord of Ayodhyā, the overlord of the Kosalas," when, in fact, he [Sāgara] is nothing but a hole for catching some fish and therefore knows nothing. (vijānāti makarālayaḥ. ayodhyādhipatiḥ kosalādhipatir itivat. svam ātmānaṃ manyate. katipayamīnagrahaṇagarttā iti na jānāti.)

"To hell with forbearance" dhik kṣamām: See Introduction, p. 46, n. 5.

"for people like this" īdṛśe jane: Cg suggests that the ocean has become corrupted from living in such close proximity to the rākṣasas (prāptarakṣaḥsahavāsadoṣe).

Following verse 11, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [236*]: "Sāgara will not manifest himself to me through peaceful means."

12. Here, as in the previous verses, Cg feels compelled to explain the most subtle nuances of each word. Thus, he offers some punning explanations of the phrase "fetch my bow," saying, "The inner intention is 'bring my bow with its bowstring (saguṇam) so I may subjugate that person lacking all virtues (nirguṇam); bring my bent (namram) bow so that I may remove his insolence (anamratva).' (cāpam ānaya nirguṇaṃ vaśīkartuṃ saguṇam ānayety āśayaḥ. cāpam ānayāsyānamratvaṃ nivartayituṃ namraṃ cāpam ānaya.)" Cg also, relying on the popular Vaiṣṇava, but post-Vālmīkian, representation of Lakṣmaṇa as an incarnation of the great serpent Śeṣa, claims, "He [Lakṣmaṇa] hesitates for a moment in carrying out Rāma's instructions out of his affection for the ocean, which is the resting place of the great serpent." It is because of this hesitation, Cg argues, that Rāma invokes the authority of Lakṣmaṇa's mother by choosing the matronymic epithet Saumitri. This is because Lakṣmaṇa would have to obey his mother's instructions if not those of his elder. (samudrasya śeṣaśayyātvena tasmin kiṃcitsauhārdavatā lakṣmaṇena kṣaṇaṃ vilambaḥ kṛtaḥ. ata āha saumitra iti. sumitrāvacanam eva kartavyaṃ jyeṣṭhavacanaṃ tu na kartavyam iti niyamo 'sti.) Cg provides an alternative explanation, according to which Rāma's use of the matronymic suggests that Lakṣmaṇa must not forget his mother's instructions not to be neglectful of Rāma (yadvā saumitre rāme pramādaṃ mā kārṣīr iti mātropadiṣṭaṃ mā vismārṣīḥ).

Following 12ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [238*]: "I shall dry up the ocean so that the leaping monkeys can proceed on foot."

13. "to overflow them violently" sahasā . . . nirmaryādaṃ kariṣyāmi: Literally, "I will violently render it without bounds."

Following verse 13, D5–7,10,11,T,G1,2,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [239*]: "I shall convulse the mighty ocean filled with great sharks.[1]"

[1]D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators substitute mahādānavasaṃkulaṃ, "filled with great dānavas," for the second pāda of 239*, mahānakrasamākulam, "filled with great sharks."

14. "eyes flashing with anger" krodhavisphāritekṣaṇaḥ: The adjective visphārita can have three different meanings, each of which can be applied to the eyes. Thus, the compound can mean "his eyes wide or dilated with anger" (so Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1427; Dutt 1893, p. 1160; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 49; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 57; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 50); "eyes rolling or trembling with anger"—so Cg (see notes to 5.20.23); or "eyes blazing or flashing with anger" (Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 186, "corruscanti"). We feel that the last of these definitions is most appropriate in view of the simile of fire.

15. "Bending" saṃpīḍya: Literally, "having pressed or having crushed." We follow Ct and Ck, who understand that Rāma is bending his bow in order to string it (saṃpīḍanapūrvaṃ sajyaṃ kṛtvā). We believe that this interpretation is supported by the apparent glossing of the reading in the northern recension, which generally offers various forms of the root $\sqrt{nam}$, "to bend." Cg, on the other hand, understands the gerund to refer to Rāma's firm grasp of the middle portion of his bow (dṛḍhamuṣṭinā madhyam avalambya). Among the translators consulted, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 49), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 57), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 50), and Pagani (1999, p. 917) follow this interpretation.

"made the world quake" kampayitvā . . . jagat: Among the commentators, only Cg remarks on this phrase, understanding it to mean that Rāma caused the creatures inhabiting the world to tremble with fear. (kampayitvā bhayakampitaṃ kṛtvā. jagaj jagatsthajantūn.) Northern manuscripts and printed editions of the northern recension generally substitute a clearly geological term such as talam, "surface of the earth," (Lahore 5.95.15) or medinīm, "earth," (Gorresio 5.103.16) for the ambiguous jagat, "world."

"with his arrows" śaraiḥ: D1,5–7,10,11,T1,3,G2,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the adverb śanaiḥ, "slowly, gently," which they construe with the gerund saṃpīḍya. Among the translations we have consulted, this reading is followed by only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1437, "gently stringing"). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 57), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 50), understands, "de plus en plus." Pagani (1999, p. 917), alone among the translators consulted, appears to read the adverb with the gerund kampayitvā, paraphrasing the construction as "semant une terreur croissante."

"his thunderbolts" vajrāṇi: Cg, who, like the other southern commentators, reads the masculine vajrān for the critical edition's neuter vajrāṇi, regards the figure here as an abhūtopamā, i.e., a simile with a nonexistent object of comparison, since, in mythology, Indra has only one vajra.

16. "plunged into the waters of the sea, terrifying its great serpents" praviśanti samudrasya salilaṃ trastapannagam: Literally, "entered the ocean's water in which the serpents were terrified." See Slatin 2006 for a discussion of the significance of this episode in Indo-European mythology.

17. "Then" tataḥ: A number of manuscripts (Ñ2,V3,D10,11,M3,5), as well as the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cg, read instead toya[vegaḥ], "[agitation] of the waters." Cg glosses this reading with "a series of waves (taraṅgavitatiḥ)."

"along with a howling gale" samārutaravaḥ: Literally, "accompanied by the sound of the wind." Ct and Cr note that the wind is whipped up by the passage of the arrows themselves (bāṇavegahetukapravartitamārutaśabdasahitaḥ—so Ct).

"carrying with it sharks and sea monsters" sanakramakaraḥ: Literally, "along with sharks and sea monsters." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr substitute for -nakra-, "sharks," -mīna-, "fish."

18. "covered with garlands of towering waves" mahormimālāvitataḥ: Cg reads the participle vitataḥ, "covered," in another of its basic meanings, "stretched, extended," understanding that the ocean was extended onto the shore through the force of its waves. D6,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read -jālacalitaḥ for -mālāvitataḥ, lending the compound the sense of "agitated with masses of towering waves."

"filled with conch and oyster shells" śaṅkhaśuktisamākulaḥ: Cg (reading āvṛtaḥ for samākulaḥ) understands that the shells have been tossed up by the violence of the waves. Ñ2,V1,3,B2–4,D6,7,9–11,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śaṅkhajālasamāvṛtaḥ, "covered with masses of conch shells."

"vaporous haze" sadhūma-: Literally, "with smoke or mist." Cr and Cg understand the reference to be to the steam arising from the contact of Rāma's blazing arrows with the water (sajvālaśarapraveśena sadhūmaḥ—so Cg).

19. "who dwell in the underworld known as Pātāla" pātālatalavāsinaḥ: Literally, "inhabitants of Pātāla." Cg indicates that the intention of this verse is to show that Rāma's arrows can penetrate even into the underworld (āpātālaṃ śarāḥ praviṣṭā iti bhāvaḥ).

"were in agony, flames shooting from their mouths and eyes" vyathitāḥ . . . āsan dīptāsyā dīptalocanāḥ: Literally, "they were agitated, with flaming mouths and with flaming eyes." Although the context would appear to suggest that the condition of the serpents is a result of the conflagration caused by Rāma's blazing arrows, we should note that it is a characteristic mark of these supernatural cobras to emit flames from their mouths and eyes. Compare 6.15.1 below, where the serpents accompanying Sāgara are described in exactly these terms.

20. "sharks and sea monsters" -nakramakarāḥ: See note to 6.11.8 above.

21. "Such was the state of the ocean, the repository of all waters" saṃvṛttaḥ salilāśayaḥ: Literally, "[so] was the repository of waters." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read saghoṣo varuṇālayaḥ, "[the ocean,] abode of Varuṇa, emitted a sound," for pāda cd.

"crocodiles" -grāhaḥ: Cf. note to 5.7.6. See, too, 6.3.14; 6.4.78; 6.15.6,7; 6.62.20; and notes.

Following verse 21, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of twelve lines in the upajāti meter [244*]: "Then, as Rāghava, breathing hard, was drawing his incomparable bow with enormous force, Saumitri sprang up crying, 'Don't! Don't!' and seized the bow.[1] [1–4] 'The purpose of so powerful a person as you will be achieved this very day even without this treatment[2] of the ocean. People of your caliber never give way to anger. Sir, you must consider the immemorial[3] behavior of virtuous people.'[5–8] Then brahman-seers and divine seers, who hovered invisibly in the sky, raised a great uproar in the sky, crying, 'Woe!' and crying loudly, 'Don't! Don't!' [9–12]"

[1]D5,6,T1,3,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg omit lines 5–12. Among the translators of the southern recension consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 50), who generally renders the text of Cg, omits these lines.

[2]"even without this treatment" etad vinā: Literally, "without this." Ct understands, "without this agitation (etad vināpi kṣobhanam)," while Cr glosses, "destruction (etad vināśanam)."

[3]"immemorial" dīrgham: Literally, "long."

Sarga 15

Before sarga 15, Ś,D1–8,10–12,S insert a passage of thirty-two lines [App. I, No. 11]: "Then, the foremost of the Raghus addressed harsh words to Sāgara, 'This very day, mighty ocean, I will dry you up[1] all the way to the underworld Pātāla.[2] [1–2] A great cloud of dust will arise from you, Sāgara, once I have dried you up, your waters burnt off, and your creatures desiccated.[3] [3–4] By virtue of the hail of arrows released from my bow, Sāgara, the leaping monkeys shall this very day reach your farther shore[4] on foot.[5–6] You do not know enough to recognize[5] my power or my valor, and so, abode of the dānavas, you will come to grief at my hands.'[6] [7–8] The immensely powerful hero invoked the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā and, with it, charged an arrow that resembled Brahmā's staff. Then, nocking his superb bow, he drew it.[9–10] When that bow had been forcefully drawn by Rāghava, heaven and earth seemed to shatter and the mountains shook.[11–12] Darkness engulfed the world, and the directions became obscured. Lakes and rivers immediately overflowed.[13–14] The sun and the moon together with the constellations moved obliquely. Though illuminated by the rays of the sun, bringer of light, the sky was shrouded[7] in darkness.[15–16] Ablaze with hundreds of comets, the heavens glowed, while thunderbolts fell from the sky with an incomparable sound.[17–18] Gusts of heavenly wind sprang up in the sky. They broke down trees and caused the storm clouds to pour forth their rain.[8] [19–20] They shattered[9] the mountaintops, smashing[10] their peaks; huge thunderclouds gathered, reaching up to the heavens and thundering loudly.[21–22] With great claps of thunder, they released fiery bolts of lightning. All creatures that could be seen cried out as loudly as the claps of thunder.[23–24] Those who were invisible unleashed terrifying cries. Overwhelmed and terrified, they trembled and cowered.[11] Deeply pained, they remained frozen in fear.[25–27] Then all at once the ocean became fearsomely agitated through this agitation. And together with its waves of water, its creatures, its great serpents, and its rākṣasas, it flooded and washed over its boundaries for a distance of a league.[28–30] But Rāma Rāghava, slayer of his enemies, did not give any ground even as the ocean, lord of rivers and streams, surged, swollen beyond its boundaries.[12] [31–32]"

[1]"mighty ocean, I will dry you up" tvāṃ śoṣayiṣyāmi . . . mahārṇava: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative aham, "I," for tvām, "you," and the accusative singular mahārṇavam, "mighty ocean," for the vocative, yielding the sense "I will dry up the mighty ocean."

[2]"all the way to the underworld Pātāla" sapātālam: Literally, "along with Pātāla." Cr glosses, "together with Pātāla (pātālasahitam)." A number of translations render accordingly. We, however, prefer the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "to the limit of Pātāla (pātālaparyantam)," since the underworld Pātāla is thought to lie underneath the sea and Rāma has no particular grievance with it or its inhabitants.

[3]"your creatures desiccated" śoṣitasattvasya: We follow Ct and Cr here in taking the polysemic term sattva- in the sense of "living being" or, here, "aquatic creature." D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read nihata-, "slain," for śoṣita-, "desiccated, dried up."

[4]"this very day . . . farther shore" pāraṃ te 'dya: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead paraṃ tīram, "the other shore."

[5]"You do not know enough to recognize" vicinvan nābhijānāsi: Literally, "reflecting, you do not understand." The construction is ambiguous, but we believe that Cg and Cm have understood the sense best. Cg glosses, "you do not know to reflect upon or investigate particularly (vicinvan viśeṣeṇa paryālocayituṃ nābhijānāsi)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 50) interprets accordingly. Ct and Cr understand the verb vi $\sqrt{ci}$ in its other sense of "collect, gather" and take the phrase here to mean that the ocean, because of the great mass of water it has collected, [thinks itself immune to Rāma's power] (vipulajalādiparigṛhṇaṃs tvam—so Cr).

[6]"you will come to grief at my hands" saṃtāpaṃ matto nāma gamiṣyasi: Literally, "you will surely go to suffering from me." G2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Crā and Cg read nādhigamiṣyasi (nāvagamiṣyasi—so Cm), "you do not understand [the suffering]," for nāma gamiṣyasi, "surely you will go."

[7]"Though illuminated . . . the sky was shrouded" ādīptam . . . samāvṛtam: Literally, "illuminated . . . shrouded." Following the suggestion of Ct and Cr, we have supplied the word "sky (ākāśam—Ct; nabhaḥ—Cr)."

[8]"Gusts of heavenly wind sprang up in the sky. They broke down trees and caused storm clouds to pour forth their rain." puṣphuruś ca punar divyā divi mārutapaṅktayaḥ / babhañja ca tadā vṛkṣāñ jaladān udvavarṣa ca //: Literally, "Heavenly groups or rows of winds burst forth in the sky. It then broke trees and it made the clouds rain." The lines are both grammatically and contextually problematic. The construction of the verse is peculiar since the subject, mārutapaṅktayaḥ, "gusts [lines] of winds," appears to construe logically with the two singular verbs, babhañja, "broke down," and udvavarṣa, "made rain." Ct and Cr read vapuḥprakarṣeṇa vavur divyamārutapaṅktayaḥ, "gusts of heavenly wind blew because of the strength of their form," for the first line, and udvahan muhuḥ, "driving forth repeatedly," for the critical edition's udvavarṣa ca in the second line. They understand that the second line has an unexpressed singular subject, mārutapañktiḥ, "a line or mass of clouds" (Ct), or mahāvātaḥ, "mighty wind" (Cr). Cg understands the compound mārutapañktayaḥ to refer to the seven winds or layers of air that are supposed to characterize the atmospheric realm between heaven and earth (āvahodvahādivātaskandhāḥ). He then takes the adjective divyāḥ, "heavenly," in the sense of "praiseworthy or venerable (ślāghyāḥ)."

[9]"They shattered" ārujan: The form is ambiguous. It can be interpreted either as a plural imperfect of the sixth gaṇa verb ā $\sqrt{}$ruj, or as the nominative singular masculine of its present participle. In keeping with the prevailing syntax of lines 20–21 where the other verbal and nominal forms are singular, we suppose that this form is also intended to be singular, although, given that the logical subject remains the plural noun mārutapañktayaḥ of line 19, we have rendered it as if it were plural. Cg reads the unambiguously plural imperfect arujan, which he then hastens to inform us is an irregular plural, i.e., that we should understand it as a singular (bahuvacanam ārṣam).

[10]"smashing" prabhañjanaḥ: Literally, "the breaker or smasher." The poet concludes this awkward sequence with a singular noun in place of the expected plural verbal element.

[11]"they . . . cowered" śiśyire: Literally, "they lay down."

[12]"did not give any ground . . . surged, swollen beyond its boundaries" samatikrāntaṃ nāticakrāma . . . tam uddhatam: Literally, "he [Rāghava] did not transgress or cross [the ocean], which, swollen, had transgressed." Like several translators, we understand the phrase nāticakrāma, as does Cr, to mean that, despite the dramatic surging of the ocean, Rāma stood his ground (tatraiva tasthau). Cg, however, understands the phrase to mean that Rāma did not attack the ocean by using his weapons (śastraprayogarūpātikramaṃ na cakāra). Ct understands simply, "he did not budge (na cacāla)."

1. "Samudra Sāgara . . . he" sāgaraḥ . . . samudraḥ: Cs identifies the ocean divinity as Varuṇa, a vedic divinity who presides over the waters and is often identified with Sāgara.

"flames shooting from their mouths" dīptāsyaiḥ: See note above on 6.14.19.

"from the great mountain Meru" mahāśailān meroḥ: Cs cites the lexicon Viśvakośa, whose listing of "bow" as one of the meanings of Meru inspires him to suggest as an alternative that Sāgara is rising because of his fear of Rāma's weapon. (meror dhanuṣo bhayād utthita iti vā. "merur bhūdharadhanvanoḥ" iti viśvaḥ.)

2. "His complexion was that of polished lapis" snigdhavaidūryasaṃkāśaḥ: Literally, "having the appearance of glistening or smooth lapis." The idea is that Sāgara's complexion is as dark and shining as polished lapis. A dark blue and/or black complexion is not uncommon among the Hindu divinities, such as Viṣṇu. Compare 1.1.11; 5.33.16; and UttaRāC I.15.5. See note to 6.73.13. On lapis, see note to 6.3.13.

"he was adorned with jāmbūnada gold" jāmbūnadavibhūṣitaḥ: Cg identifies jāmbūnada as gold produced in the Jambū River, one of the seven heavenly rivers (jāmbūnadaṃ jambūnadīprabhavaṃ svarṇam). See 6.19.22–23; 6.47.21,41; 6.55.115,121; 6.67.13. See Vyas 1967, p. 244; cf. p. 247. See, too, 5.2.53; 5.3.8–11; 35–37; 5.5.32–33,39; 5.6.13; 5.9.20–21; 5.45.3–4; and notes. Cf. note on 5.34.27.

"His garlands and robes were red" raktamālyāmbaradharaḥ: Literally, "wearing red garlands and clothing." See 6.67.5 and notes.

Following verse 2, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of four lines [247*] in which Sāgara is further described: "On his head he wore a celestial wreath consisting of every type of blossom, together with ornaments made of burnished gold. Adorned with the most exquisite ornaments made of gems produced within himself, he resembled the Himalaya mountain adorned with his various mineral ores.[1–4]" Various northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ2,D1–4,8,9,12, while B4 continues after line 1 of 246*) insert 247* after verse 1.

Following this insert, some southern manuscripts (D7,G2,M3,5) and the texts and printed editions of Cg and the edition of Gita Press (6.22.21cd–22ab) add another passage of two lines [249*]: "On his broad chest he wore a glittering rose-colored gem, which lay at the center of his pearl necklace. It was the twin of the Kaustubha gem.[1]"

[1]"Kaustubha gem" kausthubhasya: The Kaustubha gem is one of the magnificent jewels produced at the time of the churning of the primal ocean. It is one of the accoutrements of Lord Viṣṇu.

Following this passage, all southern manuscripts except M4 insert a passage of three lines [250*]: "His masses of waves were swirling, his waters were agitated by the stormy winds.[1] He was accompanied by the rivers among whom the foremost were the Ganges and the Indus.[1] [2] His rākṣasas and great serpents were terrified, and his huge crocodiles were tossed about.[3]" Compare 6.14.21.

[1]"the Ganges and the Indus" gaṅgāsindhu- Literally, "the Gaṅgā and the Sindhu." We are, of course, to understand that it is the goddesses presiding over the rivers that are meant.

Following this, a few southern manuscripts (G2,M3,5,T2 [after 3ab]) and the texts and printed editions of Cm [VSP unnumbered in brackets between 6.22.23 and 24] and Gita Press (6.22.24ab) insert a passage of one line [251*] further describing the rivers: "[accompanied by the rivers] who had taken on the various forms of beautiful goddesses . . . that lord."

3. Cs notes an apparent contradiction between this version of Rāma's meeting with Sāgara and that found in the Rāmopākhyāna (MBh 3.267.32cd and 33), where the text indicates that Rāma has a vision of the ocean god in a dream as he lies sleeping on the shore. Citing a parallel passage from the Bhāgavatapurāṇa (9.10.13) and the different contexts of the three versions, Cs concludes that there is no real contradiction, for although Rāma may have slept, Sāgara and his sea creatures appear to him in the flesh in the Mahābhārata version as well as in our passage.

4. "All the elements . . . earth, air, ether, water, and fire" pṛthivī vāyur ākāśam āpo jyotiś ca: The reference is to the five irreducible elements [pañcamahābhūtas] of traditional Indian philosophy. We have added the phrase, "all the elements," to convey this idea. See notes to 6.15.4; 6.55.127; 6.81.20; and 6.97.7. Cf. 6.39.7; 6.89.4; and notes.

"gentle Rāghava" rāghava . . . saumya: Cg glosses, "propitiated or pacified (prasanna)" for saumya. He argues that the epithet shows that Rāma has been pacified by Sāgara's having cupped his hands in reverence (anenāñjalikaraṇānantaram eva rāmaḥ prasanna iti gamyate). It is more likely that Sāgara's use of the term here is intended to accomplish the propitiation of Rāma.

"must abide by their respective natures" svabhāve . . . tiṣṭhanti: Literally, "they stand in their own nature." The commentators give different explanations as to the inherent nature of water, which is relevant to the current passage. Ct, Ck, and Cr understand that it is "movement (syandanam)" and "contact (śleṣaṇam)." Cg and Cv, adhering to the context made clear in verse 5 below, stress the fathomless depth (-agādha-) of the ocean as one of its inherent qualities.

"eternal path" śāśvataṃ mārgam: Ck, Ct, and Cr explain that this refers to the rule of abiding by one's inherent nature, which was set down by the creator, Brahmā (anādiṃ brahmasṛṣṭaṃ svarūpasthitiprakāram āsthitāḥ santaḥ sve sve bhāve tiṣṭhanti).

5. "impossible to cross" aplavaḥ: Literally, "impossible to jump or swim."

"I tell you that" etat te pravadāmy aham: By the grammatical rule vartamānasāmīpye laṭ, the present indicative may indicate near past or near future time. All commentators understand the present (laṭ) here as either a reference to what Sāgara has already told Rāma or to what he is just about to tell him. Thus Cg, Cm, and Cv understand the verb to be a preterit (laṅ), seeing it as a reference to what Sāgara has already told Rāma about the natural qualities of the elements. Cg mentions a variant reading pradadāmi, "I give," unattested in the critical apparatus, which he claims would have the same meaning. Cm sees this as Sāgara's explanation as to why he did not previously appear before Rāma. Ct, Cr, and Ck understand it to be a near future and supply the word upāyam, "means [for crossing]," understanding, "I will now tell you the means."

"it would violate that nature" vikāras tu bhavet: Literally, "it would be a transformation."

6. "desire, greed" kāmāt . . . lobhāt: Ct, Cg, and Cm distinguish the two, defining the former as "the desire for objects (arthecchayā—Cg)" and the latter as "the inability to bear giving up one's own things (svavastuparityāgāsahiṣṇutayā—Cg)."

"make solid" stambhayeyam: The verb is slightly ambiguous. It can be understood either as we have understood it in our translation or in the sense of "to immobilize," that is, in the present context, to calm or still the ocean's turbulent waters. Both the commentators and the various northern readings more or less unanimously support the notion that it is the actual freezing or solidification of the water that is at issue here. Ct and Ck say that the ocean will not solidify his waters because that would be the occasion for doing violence to his inherent nature since that nature is to be watery, i.e., liquid (jalarūpasya me svarūpapīḍāprasaṅgāt). Cg is somewhat ambiguous, saying that the ocean refuses because to do so would do harm (pīḍākaratvāt). Cm and Cv are more explicit, claiming that the ocean refuses so as to avoid harming the aquatic creatures (jalacarajantupīḍā). Cm explicitly glosses the root √stambh with the term ghaṇībhavanena, "becoming solid or congealed." Northern variants are entirely unambiguous (see 258* and apparatus). Thus, the Lahore edition (5.96.28, vol. 5, p. 606) reads, "I will solidify my waters, Rāma, and thus create a footpath, whereby the tawny monkeys will be able to cross without obstruction (stambhayeyaṃ jalaṃ rāma padbhyāṃ caiva tathā gatim / gaccheraṃs tena harayo na tu stambho bhaviṣyati //)." Gorresio's edition (5.104.8) has a variant, which reads, "Solidify my waters, Rāma, and I will provide you an excellent path by which the tawny monkeys may proceed. There will be no [need of a] bridge (stambhayaitaj jalaṃ rāma dadyāṃ te mārgam uttamam / gaccheyur yena harayo na ca setur bhaviṣyati //)." Both go on to say that the appearance of dry land in the ocean would be a great miracle. In the end, however, as in our text, Sāgara declines to perform this miracle, not because of the violation of his inherent nature or the possible injury to marine life but because of his fear that other beings as powerful as Rāma, taking this as a precedent, might compel its repetition. Translators have disagreed as to how to understand the root √stambh. Some (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1440; Roussel 1903, vol. 3 p. 60; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 52) understand as we have. Dutt (1893, p. 1163) understands, "deprive my waters . . . of their (perpetual) motion." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 51) seems to straddle the issue slightly, rendering, "freeze into immobility my waters." This latter interpretation is not entirely unreasonable, as the commentators explain in reference to the preceding verse that one of the immutable characteristics of water is its constant motion (syandanam).

"crocodiles and sharks" grāhanakra-: Some southern manuscripts (D6,10,11,T2,3), including the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr, read rāgāt for grāha-, thus adding another inducement, "passion, affection," to those that Sāgara claims cannot influence him to still his waters. See note on verse 7 below.

7. "I shall . . . devise some means" vidhāsye rāma yenāpi: Literally, "I shall arrange . . . whereby . . . Rāma." Some southern manuscripts (D7,10,11,G2,3), including the texts of Ct, Cr, and Ck, read yena gantāsi, "whereby you will proceed," for rāma yenāpi.

"sea monsters" grāhāḥ: Here we interpret the term as generic for predatory sea creatures rather than as a specific type of animal. Cf. note on 5.7.6. See, too, 6.3.14; 6.4.78; 6.14.21; 6.15.6; 6.62.20; and notes.

"will not attack" na praharisyanti: D10,11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read na . . . vidhamisyanti, "they will not scatter, destroy."

Following verse 7, many northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ2,D1–4,8,9,12) insert 261*, 263*, 265*, 266*, 267*, App. I, No. 12, and 268*, while all southern manuscripts (D5–7,10,11,S) insert 262*(missing in KK and VSP), 263*, 264*, 265*, and 269*. The southern insert appears in the published editions of GPP (6.22.26de–40), VSP (6.22.28–43), and KK (6.22.28–42).

In 262*, a passage of five lines, Sāgara continues his speech to Rāma: " 'In order that the tawny monkeys may cross, Rāma, I shall create some dry ground.'[1] Then Rāma said to him, 'Listen to me, O god of the ocean, abode of Varuṇa. This great arrow of mine can never be taken up in vain.[1] On which place shall I let it fall?'[2–3] When the mighty lord of the ocean, of immense blazing energy, had heard Rāma's words and seen that great arrow, he said these words to Rāghava.[4–5]"

[1]"taken up in vain" amoghaḥ: Literally, "in vain, unerring." See also 5.36.30, where the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā similarly may not be loosed in vain, and 1.75.8, where the divine arrow of Viṣṇu is said to never fly in vain." Cf. note to 6.88.22, where the javelin of Rāvaṇa is considered to be renowned for its infallibility.

In 263*, a passage of eleven lines, Sāgara responds: " 'Away to the north lies one of my most beautiful tracts. It is called Drumakulya[1] and is as famous throughout the world as you are, sir.[1–2] In that place, drinking up my waters, are many savage tribes, the Ābhīras, etc., whose practices are frightful to see.[3–4] I cannot bear the defiling touch of those evildoers. Please use your great and unfailing arrow against them, Rāma.'[5–6] When Rāghava had heard his words, he released that supreme, blazing arrow in keeping with the instructions of Sāgara.[2] [7–8] At the spot famed throughout the earth as Marukāntāra,[3] 'The Wasteland,' he caused his arrow, whose splendor was equal to that of a blazing lightning bolt, to fall to the earth, the bestower of treasures. Stricken by that shaft, the earth itself gave a loud roar.[9–11]"

[1]"Drumakulya" drumakulyaḥ: Literally, "associated with a group or family of trees." This name contrasts with the subsequent name of the place, Marukāntāra, and appears to suggest that Rāma's fiery arrow has deforested or defoliated the once densely forested region.

[2]"in keeping with the instructions of Sāgara" sāgaradarśanāt: Literally, "from the sight of Sāgara." The word darśana is polysemic and is used here in its sense of "mentioning, judgment, teaching" rather than in its more common sense of "sight, vision, or appearance."

[3]"Marukāntāra, 'The Wasteland'" marukāntāram: Literally, "desert-wilderness." A tract known as Marubhūmi is described as "a desert area around the Jodhpur region" (Narayan 1980, p. 145). See also MBh 5.19.29.

In 264*, a passage of six lines, the story continues: "From the opening of the resulting wound (vraṇa), water spurted up from the underworld known as Rasātala, and that became the well famed as "The Wound (vraṇa)." A geyser of water is seen constantly to rise there, as if from the ocean itself, accompanied by a terrifying sound of something being torn apart.[1–4] By virtue of the [destruction caused by the] impact of his arrow, [Rāma] dried up the standing waters in low-lying places, and that place became famous throughout the three worlds as Marukāntāra, 'The Wasteland.'[5–6]"

In 265*, a passage of six lines, the narrative continues: "Once Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, had drained the low-lying places, that wise man, whose valor was like that of the immortals, conferred a boon on that wasteland.[1–2] By virtue of Rāma's bestowal of his boon, that wasteland became a prosperous region, forever possessed of these many virtues: it had ample pasturage and was virtually free of disease, it was richly endowed with fruits and roots and honey,[1] rich in ghee[2] and milk, and fragrant with various aromatic herbs.[3–6]"

[1]"honey" -rasa-: The precise sense of the polysemic term rasa here, "juice, sap, essence, water, flavor," and the like, is difficult to determine. We follow the gloss of Cg, who understands madhu, "honey."

[2]"rich in ghee" bahusnehaḥ: Literally, "having much oil or grease." We follow Cg, who glosses ghṛtam, "ghee," for snehaḥ. Cr understands more literally, "things characterized by oil or grease (snehaviśiṣṭavastūni)."

269* is a passage of two lines: "When those low-lying places had been parched, Samudra, lord of rivers, said these words to Rāghava, who was expert in all the śāstras.[1–2]"

8. "equal of Viśvakarman" pratimo viśvakarmaṇaḥ: This reading is apparently found only in V2,B1,M3,G2,3. KK 6.22.43 and VSP 6.22.46 also read with the critical edition; KK notes, however, that six of its manuscripts read prītimān, "affectionate," while two read dhṛtimān, "resolute," for pratimaḥ, "equal." The critical reading is an otherwise unattested masculine form of the expected feminine pratimā. The reading should be considered doubtful at best. A number of southern manuscripts (D6,7,10, 11,T2,3,M4), including the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Cs, substitute prītimān, "affectionate," for pratimaḥ. Ct, Cr, and those translators who follow this reading understand, "affectionate toward you [that is, Rāma]." We understand that the quality referred to here is Nala's ability to build things, a quality that he shares with his father, the divine architect.

"granted a boon" dattavaraḥ: Ct, Cr, and Ck understand that the boon confers the power to construct anything. Ck adds the quality of invulnerability to all beings. Cg understands that the boon consists in Viśvakarman's promise to his [son's] mother that his son will be his equal (dattavaraḥ mattulyaḥ putras te bhaviṣyatīti mātre dattavaraḥ) (Cv similarly). Cm amplifies upon this, saying that the son will have equal ability with his father, who is skillful enough to construct solid buildings on top of water and even in the sky (pitrā viśvakarmaṇā dattavara ākāśajaloparisthāyigamanaśīlavimānādinirmāṇādisvakarmakuśalena sadṛśasāmarthyaḥ). Most interesting in this context is that the former group of commentators accepts one additional line [276* = GPP 6.22.47cd], which specifies the terms of the boon as equality with Viśvakarman, whereas Cg, Cm, Cv, and the critical edition do not read this line. Cv, on the other hand, acknowledges that the substance of the line must be understood in order for the passage to make sense (mama mātur varo datta iti mayā sadṛśaḥ putraḥ tava bhaviṣyatīty evaṃ rūpo 'yam arthaḥ). See note to verse 12 below.

9. Cm, commenting upon 307(C)* (see notes to verse 11 below for the translation), raises the interesting question as to why, since the ocean was a kinsman of Rāma and had already provided assistance to Hanumān through the agency of Mount Maināka (5.1.75–120), he did not propose this solution when Rāma first came and had a pleasant frame of mind. Cm's response is that Sāgara has planned his delay deliberately in order to arouse Rāma's anger, which could then be used to destroy his, i.e., the ocean's, enemies [the dasyus]. He had planned all along to propitiate Rāma once the latter had accomplished this feat. Cm finds no fault with this strategy. (nanu rāmasambandhitvamātreṇa hanumate mainākadvāreṇa kṛtopakāraḥ sāgaraḥ sākṣād rāme samāgatya prasanne saty amūm upāyaṃ prathamata evāvilambena kim arthaṃ nopadiṣṭavān iti cet? satyam. mayā ca vilambe kriyamāṇe vilambam asahamāno rāmo mayi kopād astraṃ sandhāsyaty etasminn antare taṃ prasādayitvā saṃhitenāstreṇa mama śatrūn mārayitvā paścād upakariṣyāmīti dhiyā sthita iti na doṣaḥ.) Ct understands similarly.

10. "mighty" mahābalaḥ: D5,7,10,11,T,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the masculine singular accusative, mahābalam, which then modifies Rāma.

11. "abode of Varuṇa" varuṇālaye: A number of manuscripts, both northern and southern (Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1,4,8–12,G2,3), including the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr, read makara-, "sea monster," for varuṇa-.

Virtually all the northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1–4,8,9,12) insert a passage of twenty lines [307*] following verse 23. A number of southern manuscripts (D6,7, 10,11,T2,3,G,M), including the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, insert four of these lines following verse 11 [307* lines 5,6,307 (C) ,8]: "It seems to me that, in this world, force is the best thing to use upon the wicked.[1] [5] To hell with forbearance,[2] conciliation, and bribery when it comes to ingrates.[6] It was only out of eagerness to see[3] the construction of a bridge and his fear of force that this dreadful Sāgara, great receptacle of waters, granted shallow passage to Rāghava. [307(C), 8]"

[1]"use upon the wicked" durjane pratibhāti naḥ: The southern manuscripts and commentators (D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G,M) read instead puruṣasyeti (D6 puruṣasyaiva) me matiḥ, " '. . . against a man' is my opinion."

[2]"To hell with forbearance" dhik kṣamām: See 6.14.11 and note.

[3]"out of eagerness to see" didṛkṣayā: Literally, "with a desire to see." Ct argues that Sāgara's desire to see the bridge built is a product only of his fear of Rāma's use of force against him, since he is an ingrate in that he does not acknowledge the fact that he was made to grow by Rāma's ancestors, the sons of King Sagara (yato 'yaṃ sāgaro rāmapūrvaiḥ sagaraputrair vardhito 'py akṛtajñatayā daṇḍabhayād eva saṃjātayā didṛkṣayā tajjanyadarśanena rāghavāya setuṃ kartuṃ gādhaṃ dadau). See note to verse 9 above. He continues his argument in a fashion similar to Cm's discussion on verse 9 above.

12. "boon" varaḥ: The actual boon is not mentioned in the critical edition (see note to verse 8 above). This deficiency is made up in a passage of one line [276*], which is found in D7,10,11,G2,3, and Ct after 12ab: "Your son, my lady, shall be my equal."

"legitimate son" aurasaḥ . . . putraḥ: Literally, "born from the breast." The term is frequently used to indicate a biological or legitimate child as distinct from a stepchild or an adopted child. Ct is explicit in this regard, stating that the term here means "a son created through the emission of his [Viśvakarman's] semen while he was embracing (Nala's) mother (mātur āliṅganapūrvaṃ svatejoniśekadvārānirmitaḥ putra ity arthaḥ)." It is this genetic relationship, Ct argues, that explains the fact that Nala shares Viśvakarman's ability to create extraordinary constructions. See 5.49.14 and note.

13. "I could not proclaim . . . without being called upon" na cāpy aham anukto vai prabrūyām: Literally, "unaddressed I could not announce or speak out." As Ck and Ct explain, Nala has not spoken up previously because he would have been ashamed to indulge in self-praise (ātmapraśaṃsālajjayeti). See Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 27, 76, and 5.64.25 and note.

"Very well" kāmam: We have read the term here as an interjection. It could also be read adverbially in the sense of "at will." Two devanāgarī manuscripts (D10,11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tasmāt, "on account of that, therefore."

Following 13ab, D5–7,10,11,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Ct insert a passage of one line [278*]: "And I am certainly capable of building a bridge across the ocean, abode of Varuṇa." Following this D5 continues, while D7 and M3 insert following verse 12, a passage of one line [275* line 2]. The verse as it is found in the southern recension (the second pāda differs from the northern version) reads: "I was reminded of this by him. The ocean, that great receptacle of waters, has told you the truth (= 11d)." Printed editions that read this text are GPP 6.22.48cd; Gita Press 6.22.52ab; KK 6.22.50ab; and VSP 6.22.52ab.

15. "monkeys, bulls among the hosts of tree-dwelling monkeys" śākhāmṛga-gaṇarṣabhāḥ . . . vānarāḥ: Literally, "monkeys . . . bulls among the hosts of branch-animals." The word śākhāmṛga, literally, "branch-deer, branch-animal," is a kenning for monkey. See note to 6.47.43. See, too, 6.17.32; 6.19.20; 6.40.64; 6.61.2; 6.65.11;

6.73.6; and notes. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct avoid the redundancy here by substituting pādapān, "trees," literally, "foot-drinkers." See the following note.

"resembling mountains . . . trees" nagān nagasaṃkāśāḥ: The first pāda exploits the repetition of the word naga. The term is ambiguous, however. A kenning meaning, "that which does not move," naga can refer equally to trees and mountains. We have chosen "resembling mountains" for the phrase nagasaṃkāśāḥ, both because it is the universal choice of the commentators and because mountains are a common upamāna for the giant vānaras throughout the poem. For nagān, the ambiguity is greater. We chose "trees" because, in the following two verses (16 and 17), there is a list of the names of the different kinds of trees the monkeys throw into the water. This idea is supported by Cg, who reads with the critical edition. The other southern commentators substitute pādapān, "trees," for vānarāḥ, "monkeys," in pāda c. This reading, found in D7,10,11, and Ct, Ck, and Cr, opens up yet another area of ambiguity. The verse can now be read to mean that the monkeys break up "mountains (nagān)" and "trees (pādapān)" and drag them to the sea. The southern commentators Ct, Ck, and Cr, however, propose to read the second "n" of nagān as the sandhi form of the final "t" of the ablative (pañcamī) singular nagāt. They would thus read, "broke down trees and dragged them from the mountain to the sea." Most translators who follow this reading (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 62; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, pp. 53–54; Pagani 1999, p. 921; and Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1443) understand that the monkeys break up both rocks and timber. In any case, all recensions indicate that both trees and mountains are used in the construction of the bridge.

16–17. Cg claims that the poet enumerates all these trees in order to show that the ones named have achieved their purpose, which is to assist in the construction of the bridge (setubandhanasāhyakṛtāṃ vṛkṣāṇāṃ kṛtārthatāṃ vyañjayituṃ tān parigaṇayati).

"sāla, aśvakarṇa" sālaiś cāśvakarṇaiś ca: Both names normally refer to the tree Vatica robusta. According to Ck and Ct, they refer to subspecies of the same plant (sālāśvakarṇayor avāntarajātikṛto bhedaḥ). Ck understands that one, presumably the sāla, has white flowers, whereas the aśvakarṇa has red flowers (śvetaraktapuṣpādibhedena). Since the two terms usually appear in close proximity in the Rāmāyaṇa, Brockington argues that aśvakarṇa ("horse-eared") was at one time an adjective for sāla or that they are two different trees (1984, p. 102).

18. "tree trunks . . . trees" pādapān . . . tarūn: Literally, "trees . . . trees." We have translated the first as "tree trunks," in keeping with the simile of the flagstaffs as well as to avoid repetition. Cf. 6.30.26 and note.

"the foremost among the tawny monkeys" harisattamāḥ . . . harayaḥ: Literally, "the foremost among the tawny monkeys . . . the tawny monkeys. We have collapsed the two terms to avoid repetition.

Following verse 18, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of Ct insert a passage of four lines [293*]: "They carried off from various places palmyras, clusters of pomegranate, coconut palms, vibhītakas, bakulas, khadiras, and neem trees. After smashing the mountains, those huge and powerful monkeys with the aid of various conveyances[1] carried off boulders the size of elephants."

[1]"with the aid of various conveyances" yantraiḥ: Literally, "with machines, devices." The commentators understand that these are devices that facilitate easy transport (sukhāharaṇasādhanaiḥ—so Ct). Cg glosses, "with carts, etc. (śakatādibhiḥ)." Cf. 6.3.11; 6.30.26; 6.49.11; 6.80.19; and notes.

19. "boulders" acalaiḥ: Normally, "mountains." The context, however, supports the less common usage.

Following verse 19, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [295*]: "Hurling[1] them from every side, they whipped up the ocean. Meanwhile, others held lines[2] stretching one hundred leagues in length."

[1]"Hurling" nipatantaḥ: Literally, "falling." This would appear to refer to the boulders in verse 19. However, since the second half of the verse clearly refers to other monkeys, we follow Cr, who reads the simplex participle as a causative.

[2]"lines" sūtrāṇi: Commentators differ as to the purpose of the lines. Ck and Ct see them as used for hauling [the rocks and trees, etc.] (ākarṣaṇārtham iti śeṣaḥ). Cr, Cg, and Ct, as his second option, argue that they are stretched out to ensure that the bridge is straight (setor avakratvāyeti vā śeṣaḥ—Ct). Cm and Cs envision them as measuring tapes to ensure that the bridge is neither too long nor too short (śatayojanadīrghaparyantasya nyūnātiriktaparihārārtham—Cm) or to make the bridge exactly one hundred yojanas in length (śatayojanam āyataṃ dīrghaṃ setuṃ kartum—Cs).

20. "Nala constructed" nalaś cakre: Cr comments that in saying here that Nala built the bridge and elsewhere that the other monkeys built it, the poet intends us to understand that the monkeys gather the materials for the construction while Nala is responsible for putting them together to form the structure (nalo mahāsetuṃ cakre sa setuḥ tadā vānarair itarakapibhir api kriyata etena pāṣāṇādisaṃghaṭṭanaṃ nalāyattaṃ samāgrīsaṃpādanaṃ tu tad itarāyatam iti sūcitam). We believe we are to understand Nala to be the architect or chief engineer of the project while the monkeys are the laborers.

The textual history of this passage is complex and rather confusing. No known version reads with the reconstruction of the critical edition. Pādas ab of this verse correspond to GPP 6.22.72cd (VSP 6.22.77ab; KK 6.22.76ab) and pādas cd correspond to GPP 6.22.59ab (VSP 6.22.63ab; KK 6.22.61ab). The vulgate text of the southern recension (GPP 6.22.59–72; VSP 6.22.63–77; and KK 6.22.61–76) is represented in the critical text and apparatus by the following sequence: 6.15.20cd; 299*; 6.15.21; App. I, No. 13, lines 1–2; 303*; 6.15.22; 6.15.23; 6.15.20ab; and 296*. As a result of this, some events as rendered in our translation will occur in a different sequence than the same events represented in other editions and translations. See Sutherland 1992.

Following 20ab, V1,3,B2 (after 26),D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [296*] (= GPP 6.22.72cd): "And the gods and the gandharvas gazed upon Nala's bridge, all but impossible to build."

Following 20cd, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of seven lines [299*] (= GPP 6.22.59cd–62): "Thus was the bridge built by those monkeys of awesome deeds.[1] Some held rods,[1] while others gathered materials.[2] [2] Hundreds of monkeys, obedient to Rāma's command and resembling great clouds and mountains, built it with straw and logs.[3–4] The monkeys built the bridge out of trees with flowering tips. Monkeys resembling great elephants could be seen racing about, carrying boulders that were like mountains and even the peaks of the mountains themselves.[5–7]"

[1]"rods" daṇḍān: Cr understands these to be some kind of measuring or surveying rods. Cg offers two suggestions: that they are the rods to which the surveyors' lines [in 295* above] are attached or that they are used, as he delicately puts it, to speed up the monkeys [presumably by flogging them].

[2]"gathered materials" vicinvanti: Literally, "they gather."

21. = GPP 6.22.63.

Following verse 21, D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern edition insert a passage of two lines [App. I, No. 13, lines 1–2] (= GPP 6.22.64): "On the first day, the monkeys, resembling mountains and engrossed in their work on the bridge,[1] completed fourteen leagues."

[1]"monkeys, resembling mountains and engrossed in their work on the bridge" vānarair nagasaṃkāśaiḥ setukarmaṇi niṣṭhitaiḥ: D5–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead prahṛṣṭair gajasaṃkāśais tvaramāṇaiḥ plavaṅgamaiḥ, "the leaping monkeys resembling elephants, hastening in their great excitement."

Following this insertion and before verse 22, the same manuscripts insert a passage of ten lines [303*] (= GPP 6.22.65–69): "On the second day, the powerful leaping monkeys of terrifying forms swiftly completed twenty leagues.[1–2] On the third day, those huge monkeys, hastening, completed twenty-one leagues.[3–4] On the fourth day, the very swift monkeys, hastening, completed twenty-two leagues.[5–6] On the fifth day, the leaping monkeys, working swiftly, completed [the remaining] twenty-three leagues, reaching the splendid shore.[7–8] And thus did the foremost of monkeys, Viśvakarman's majestic and mighty son—who was just like his father—construct a bridge over the ocean. [9–10]"

Cs notes that the various versions of the story of the building of the bridge, found in the Mahābhārata, Padmapurāṇa, etc., give different numbers of days for its construction. Thus, according to him, the Mahābhārata says that the bridge was completed on the fourth day, a reference not known to the critical or the vulgate text of the Mahābhārata (daśayojanavistaraṃ triṃśadyojanam āyatam / babandhur vānarāḥ setuṃ prathame divase tadā / sandhyām arvāg dvitīye tu triṃśadyojanavistaraḥ / evaṃ tribhir dinair viraiḥ setur navatiyojanam / caturthe tu dine sārdhe yāme te ca valīmukhāḥ / dṛṣṭā laṅketi rāmāya śaśaṃsuḥ). Cf. MBh 3.267.40–45 (= Citraśāla edition 3.283.40–45) and apparatus. Cs quotes the Padmapurāṇa, which claims that the project was completed in three days (PadmaP I.38.63: eṣa setur mayā baddhaḥ samudre vāruṇālaye / tribhir dinaiḥ samāptiṃ me nīto vānarasattamaiḥ). Citing several other cases of variation in purāṇic legends, Cs concludes that this one, too, is best attributed to "kalpabheda," that is, the slight differences that occur in the same events as they recur in different kalpas.

22. = GPP 6.22.70.

"the path of the constellation Svātī" svātīpathaḥ: Svātī is the name of the thirteenth or fifteenth of the nakṣatras, or lunar mansions, and is identified with the star Arcturus. See GaruḍaP 1.59.2–9; AgniP 130.2–17; Dange 1986–1990, pp. 298–313; Kane 1941–1975, vol. 5, pp. 501–4; and Hopkins 1903. Cm (and to a lesser extent Cg and Cv), citing the Vāyupurāṇa, understands this to be one of the constellations that travel along the madhyama, or middle, path of the heavenly bodies (sarvagrahāṇāṃ triṇy eva sthānāni dvijasattamāḥ . . . tad evaṃ madhyamottaradakṣiṇamārgatrayaṃ pratyekaṃ vīthitrayeṇa tridhā bhidyate. aśvinī kṛttikā yāmyā nāgavīthīti śabditā . . . hastaś citrā tathā svātī govīthīti tu śabditā). This detail seems to provide a basis for the simile since Nala's bridge bisects the ocean, just as the path of Svātī does the heavens. The Vāyupurāṇa passage gives as a synonym for svātī, govīthī, which, according to Apte (s.v. govīthī), "is a name of that portion of the moon's path which contains the asterisms Bhādrapadā, Revatī, and Aśvinī or, according to some, 'hasta, citrā, and svātī.' " Apte cites Bṛhatsaṃhitā 9.2 for this information. The commentators, however, are of two minds as to the exact meaning of this compound. Ct, Cm, and Cg, as their first alternative, gloss, "chāyāpatha," literally, "the path of radiance." Cg's second alternative, and the explanation of Cm and Cv, is the same as ours. The term chāyāpatha is somewhat obscure but has been taken by several translators to mean the Milky Way. Mallinātha explains the term chāyāpatha at Raghuvaṃśa 13.2—where Kālidāsa uses it again as an upamāna for Nala's bridge—as "a certain horizontal space located in the midst of the circle of heavenly bodies (jyotiścakramadhyavartī kaścit tiraścīno 'vakāśaḥ)." Cāritravardhana on the same passage equates this term with the svātīpatha. Lexical entries for chāyāpatha include "the galaxy, the atmosphere" (Apte s.v., citing Raghuvaṃśa 13.2); "the Milky Way" (Monier-Williams s.v.); "der luftraum" (PW s.v., citing Trikāṇḍaśeṣa 1.1.97 and Hemacandra's Abhidhānacintāmaṇi). Of the translators consulted, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1444) and Dutt (1893, p. 1166) translate "Milky Way."

23. = GPP 6.22.71.

Following verse 23, D5,T1,M1,2 repeat 20ab, while following 23ab, D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G,M3,5 repeat 20ab ("ten leagues in width and one hundred in length"). Here many northern manuscripts insert a twenty-line interpolation [307*] in which the gods and sages praise Rāma for his justifiable violence against the ocean, which cowed the latter into complying with Rāma's wishes. D6,7,10,11,T2,3,G,M insert lines 5, 6, and 8, which follow the critical edition's verse 11 (see note to verse 11 above).

24. = GPP 6.22.73.

The syntax of this three-line verse is slightly ambiguous and has given rise to some disagreement among the commentators. The problem has three possible solutions: 1) take plavaṃgamāḥ, "leaping monkeys," (pāda a) and sarvabhūtāni, "all beings," (pāda e) as a joint subject of the verb dadṛśuḥ, "they gazed upon," in pāda e, as proposed by Ct, Cm, and Crā (first alternative); 2) read plavaṃgamāḥ and the participles in agreement with it (āplavantaḥ, plavantaḥ, and garjantaḥ) as the objects of dadṛśuḥ, despite their case forms, as Cr proposes, thus making the monkeys, as well as the bridge, part of the spectacle observed by the assembled celestials; or 3) provide a copula abhuvan, "were," making pādas ab an independent sentence, as Crā proposes as a second alternative. We have followed the last option.

"bounding . . . and leaping" āplavantaḥ plavantaś ca: Cr, the only commentator who attempts to differentiate these two terms, explains, "Some monkeys made extraordinary leaps, while others made ordinary ones (āplavanto 'dhikaplutiṃ kurvantaḥ ke cit sādhāraṇaplutim)." The verbal root √plu can also refer to flying and/or swimming. Thus Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 63) renders, "plongeaient, nageaient" (followed by Pagani 1999, p. 922); and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 55) translates, "dived, and swam." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 54), however, prefers "flying and leaping over it."

"inconceivable" acintyam: Ct, Cm, and Ck explain, "the construction of which was inconceivable (acintyam acintyaracanam)." Cg glosses, "impossible to be conceived of, even mentally, before this [time] (itaḥpūrvaṃ manasāpi cintayitum anarham)." Cr understands, "the means to which were inconceivable (acintanīyopāyam)."

"seemingly impossible" asahyam: Ct, Cm, and Ck explain, "impossible for anyone without a relation to the Lord (bhagavatsaṃbandhaṃ vinā kenāpy aśakyakaraṇam)." Cg understands, "beyond the scope of anyone's effort (kasyāpi yatnāviṣayam)." Cr interprets, "bearing the form of the imagination of a construction that is impossible (asahanīyanirmitisaṃkalparūpabharam)." He sees this condition as a logical consequence of the inconceivability of the project and as the cause of its therefore being a miracle (adbhutam).

25. "those hundreds of billions" koṭisahasrāṇī: Literally "thousands of koṭis." A koṭi is a crore, or ten million.

26. "well-built" sukṛtaḥ: Cr and Cg gloss, "beautifully built (śobhanaṃ kṛtaṃ kṛtir yasya)" and "firmly built (dṛḍhatayā kṛtaḥ)," respectively. All translators consulted follow this interpretation. Cg, however, offers as an alternative the option of taking sukṛtaḥ in its nominal sense of "good fortune, auspiciousness" and glosses, sukṛtakaro vā, "bringing good fortune."

"smooth-surfaced" subhūmiḥ: Cr glosses, "whose surface (bhūmiḥ) was beautiful." Cg believes it means "devoid of high or low spots (nimnonnatatvarahitaḥ)," that is, level.

"beautifully proportioned" susamāhitaḥ: Cr explains, "well-paved (samyagviyastaḥ)." Cg glosses, "devoid of potholes (nirvivaraḥ)."

"resembled a dividing line" aśobhata . . . sīmanta iva: Literally, "it shone or was as beautiful as a dividing line." The word sīmanta also commonly refers to the line made by parting a woman's hair. Among the commentators, only Cr addresses this term. He glosses, "like a tress of hair (keśaveśa iva)" (s.v. Apte, MW, PW), by which he appears to mean the parting-line of hair, normally keśaveṣṭa. This interpretation, as a partial metaphor for the head of the personified ocean or of a woman, has been adopted and fleshed out by several translators, including Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1445), Dutt (1893, p. 1166), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 54), and Pagani (1999, p. 922). Only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 63) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 192) see the reference simply to a geographical feature. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 55) tries to have it both ways, translating, "like unto a line traced on the waves, resembled the parting of a woman's hair." We are inclined to reject this metaphor as it is, at best, highly defective here. In any case, it does not accord well with the masculine ocean divinity.

27. Following verse 27, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of four lines [314*]: "But now Sugrīva addressed truly valorous Rāma saying, 'Please climb up on Hanumān's shoulders and let Lakṣmaṇa do the same with Aṅgada.[1] For the ocean, abode of sea monsters, is wide, hero, and these two flying monkeys will carry you across it.' "

[1]"Please climb up on Hanumān's shoulders and let Lakṣmaṇa do the same with Aṅgada" hanūmantaṃ tvam āroha aṅgadaṃ cāpi lakṣmaṇaḥ: Literally, "you must mount Hanumān and Lakṣmana, Aṅgada." This passage is in all likelihood the origin of the popular tradition that depicts the heroes being carried on the shoulders of their monkey companions. See Introduction, p. 64.

28. "marched . . . accompanied by Sugrīva" jagāma . . . sugrīveṇa samanvitaḥ: The southern commentators, all of whom read 314* (see note to verse 27 above), naturally assume that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are flying ahead of the army. In this context, they note that we can infer from the verse that Sugrīva, too, is capable of flight.

29. "Some . . . marched down the center of the bridge, while others moved along the edges" anye madhyena gacchanti pārśvato 'nye: Literally, "some went by the center, others along the sides." We have fleshed out the elliptical sentence on the assumption that the reference is to the bridge. One could also, like many translators, take this to be a reference to a military formation, understanding that some marched in the main formation while others marched along the flanks.

"others could find no space in which to march" mārgam anye na lebhire: Literally, "some could find no road." We assume that the reference is to the enormous crowding of the monkeys during their passage via bridge, sea, and air. Cg, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, explains, "Because of the unavailability of passage, some remained on the shore for some time (mārgālābhāt tīra eva kaścit kālaṃ sthitā ity arthaḥ)." D6,10,11,T2,3, as well as Ck, Ct, and Cr, read prapedire, "they followed," for na lebhire.

31. "on the shore in a spot well provided with roots, fruits, and fresh water" tīre . . . bahumūlaphalodake: Literally, "on the shore, which had abundant roots, fruits, and water." We have added the word "fresh" to indicate that the reference is to drinking water rather than seawater.

32. "in the company of" sahitāḥ: D7,10,11,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead sahasā, "all at once."

"anointed . . . with holy water" samabhyaṣiñcan suśubhair jalaiḥ: Ct and Cm claim that what is taking place here is, in fact, Rāma's royal consecration at the hands of the gods, like Vibhīṣaṇa's at the hands of Rāma. Ck sees only the latter. Ct and Ck argue that the waters used are those of such sacred bodies as the celestial Gaṅgā, etc., while Cr contends that it is seawater (samudre setubandhanahṛṣṭair devais tadānīm eva rāmasya rājyābhiṣekaḥ kṛto rāmeṇa vibhīṣaṇasyaiva—so Ct).

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

33. "May you conquer" jayasva: Cg believes that the verbal form here is the parasmaipada loṭ jaya, and that the ending -sva of the ātmanepada should instead be prefixed to the following term, śatrūn ("enemies"), giving it the sense of "your own enemies," which he interprets to mean "those enemies who have taken refuge [with Rāma]."

"lord of men . . . gods and men" naradeva . . . naradeva-: The term is a typical kenning for "king." The literal meaning is, of course, "god among men." Here it may also have a particular resonance in that it can refer both to the humanity and divinity of Rāma. Commentators are divided as to how to read the second occurrence of the term. We have followed Cv, Cg, and Cm in reading it as a dvandva, literally, "men and gods." Ct reads it as a tatpuruṣa, in the sense of "gods among men," which he sees as a kenning for brahmans much in the spirit of more common expressions such as bhūmyāṃ devāḥ, "gods on earth."

"long" śāśvatīḥ samāḥ: Literally, "for eternal years." Compare 1.2.14.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Following sarga 15, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of one hundred twenty-five lines [App. I, No. 16]. In lines 1–32 (=GPP 6.23; KK 6.23; VSP 6.23), Rāma, who is described as conversant with omens, embraces Lakṣmaṇa and begins to describe to him the numerous portents of impending destruction that he observes.[1–2] Rāma states his intention of marshaling his troops in a wooded area well provided with edible fruit and cool drinking water.[3–4] Then he details some evil portents. He foresees, he says, terrible destruction at hand and a great slaughter of the ape, monkey, and rākṣasa warriors.[5–6] Turbid winds are blowing and the earth trembles. The mountaintops tremble and mighty trees fall to the ground.[7–8] Ghastly thunderclouds, resembling beasts of prey, rumble ominously and shed drops of rain mixed with blood.[9–10] The twilight sky, the color of red sandalpaste, looks horrible, while fireballs fall from the blazing sun.[11–12] Wretched and fierce-sounding birds and beasts howl at the sun causing great fear.[13–14] At night, the moon glows faintly. Surrounded by a blackish red glow, it rises as if at the end of the world.[15–16] That glow is dim, harsh, unpleasant, and reddish. A dark spot appears on the spotless sun.[17–18] The heavenly bodies, obscured by a great dust cloud, presage the destruction of all worlds.[19–20] Crows, eagles, and vultures swoop down, while jackals howl inauspiciously and frightfully.[21–22] The ground, muddy with flesh and blood, will soon be covered with rocks, spears, and swords wielded by the monkeys and rākṣasas.[23–24] Rāma then exhorts Lakṣmaṇa, urging him that, surrounded on all sides by monkeys, they should proceed immediately and swiftly to Rāvaṇa's unassailable citadel.[25–26] So saying, righteous Rāma, armed with his bow and filled with the joy of battle, sets out toward Laṅkā at the head of his troops.[27–28] Accompanied by Vibhīṣaṇa and Sugrīva, the monkey warriors, resolved to kill their enemies, set out in his wake.[29–30] Rāma is delighted with the actions of the powerful and steadfast monkeys, which they have undertaken in order to please him.[31–32]

In lines 33–125 (=GPP 6.24; KK 6.24; VSP 6.24), the army of the monkeys is described. The assemblage of heroic monkeys, marshaled in ranks by their king, resembles the autumn sky on a full-moon night illuminated by the brilliant stars and the moon.[33–34] Pressed down by those hosts of warriors, which resembled an ocean, the earth trembled as if in fright.[35–36] The woodland creatures of Laṅkā heard the uproar and the hair-raising tumult of bherī and mṛdaṅga war drums.[37–38] But the leaders of the monkey troops were only roused by that sound and, not to be outdone by it, bellowed all the louder.[39–40] The rākṣasas then heard the bellowing of those leaping monkeys, which was like the thundering of storm clouds about to break.[41–42] When Rāma sets his eyes upon Laṅkā with its multicolored flags and banners, his thoughts travel painfully to Sītā.[43–44] "It is here that fawn-eyed Sītā is held captive by Rāvaṇa, like the constellation Rohiṇī crossed by Mars, the red planet."[45–46] Heaving long and hot sighs, Rāma turns to Lakṣmaṇa and addresses him with words that fit the occasion and suit his own purpose. He describes the beautiful city of Laṅkā, which he says is raised so high that it appears to scrape the sky, as if it had been constructed on a mountaintop through the mental effort of Viśvakarman.[47–50] It is very beautiful, filled with many mansions, and resembles the heavenly regions, covered by white clouds, where Viṣṇu set his foot. It is adorned with blossoming parklands, which resemble the heavenly garden Caitraratha and which are filled with all kinds of birds and flowering trees.[51–54] He calls Lakṣmaṇa's attention to the beauties of the park, mentioning the intoxicated birds, clinging bees, and the gentle breezes swaying the thickets filled with impassioned cuckoos.[55–56] Rāma then turns his attention to the ordering of his troops in accordance with military science. He issues his commands to the monkey army. His arrangements are as follows: Invincible Aṅgada along with Nīla should stand in the center of the monkey army. Ṛṣabha is to station himself on the right flank of the monkey army, surrounded by a large number of monkeys. Swift Gandhamādana, who is as unassailable as an indomitable elephant bull,[1] is to station himself at the left flank. Rāma himself, fully prepared, will stand at the head of the army together with Lakṣmaṇa. The three great apes Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, and Vegadarśin will guard the interior. The king of the monkeys, Sugrīva, is to guard the army's rear, just as Pracetas Varuṇa, swathed in splendor, guards the western quarter of the world.[57–69] Properly divided into formations and guarded by the foremost monkeys, the army resembles the sky filled with clouds. Seizing mountain peaks and huge trees, they march upon Laṅkā, eager to lay waste to it in battle.[70–73] The great monkeys then resolve that they will level the city of Laṅkā with mountain peaks and their own fists. Then powerful Rāma addresses Sugrīva, telling him that the troops are now properly marshaled and instructing him to release Śuka.[2] Hearing Rāma's words, the powerful king of the monkeys acts upon his instructions and frees Rāvaṇa's messenger Śuka.[74–79] Freed on Rāma's instructions and badly beaten by the monkeys, the terrified Śuka reports to the lord of the rākṣasas. Rāvaṇa laughs at him and asks him why, since he appears to have clipped wings, his wings are tied up, and asks if he has not perhaps fallen into the hands of those frivolous creatures.[80–84] Pressed by the king, the terrified Śuka responds, saying that, as instructed, he had proceeded to the northern shore of the ocean and attempted to deliver Rāvaṇa's message in a calm and soothing voice. However, the moment the monkeys spied him, they flew into a rage, leapt up, captured him, and set about tearing at him and beating him with their fists.[85–90] It was impossible to engage them in conversation, much less to question them. He tells Rāvaṇa that the monkeys are wrathful and savage by nature, and with them, following the trail of Sītā, is Rāma—the murderer of Virādha, Kabandha, and Khara—along with Sugrīva. Śuka reports that Rāma has built a bridge to cross the ocean and has already crossed.[91–95] He has now come, armed with his bow, disparaging the rākṣasas. He informs Rāvaṇa that a vast army of thousands upon thousands of apes and monkeys, resembling mountains or clouds, has covered the earth. He argues that there can be no more peace between the two opposing armies than there can be between the gods and dānavas [96–100]. He exhorts Rāvaṇa to act before the monkeys scale the city ramparts. He tells him that he should either return Sītā at once or offer battle.[101–102] Rāvaṇa is infuriated by Śuka's words and responds as if to scorch him with his gaze. He vows that he will never relinquish Sītā, even should the gods, gandharvas, and dānavas together assault him, and not even for fear of all the worlds.[103–106 (106 = 6.17.2cd)] He expresses his longing for the moment when his arrows shall rush toward Rāma, like intoxicated bees flying toward a blossoming tree in the springtime.[107–108] He wonders when, with showers of his flaming arrows which had lain in his quiver[3] and will soon be loosed from his bow, he will consume Rāma's body, as flaming meteors might an elephant. He vows that, with the assistance of his vast army, he will rob Rāma of his strength, just as the rising sun robs all other heavenly bodies of their light.[109–112] He boasts that his striking force is like that of the sea and his speed like that of the wind. It is only because Rāma is unaware of this that he dares to fight him. It is only, he says, because Rāma has never seen his, Rāvaṇa's, arrows, which had lain in his quiver and resemble venomous serpents, that he dares to fight him. He claims that, up until now, Rāma did not recognize Rāvaṇa's power in battle.[113–117] Rāvaṇa then delivers an elaborate musical metaphor. He boasts that he shall enter upon the concert stage, in the form of the opposing army, and there, in the battle, will play his dreaded lute, in the form of his bow, causing it to resound with the lute's bow, in the form of his arrow. The lute will have the twanging of the bowstring for its loud tone, the screams of the stricken for its high tones, and the striking of its iron arrows for its rhythmic accompaniment. Rāvaṇa concludes his vaunting by saying that not even the great divinities, thousand-eyed Indra, Varuṇa, Yama, or Kubera, could possibly assail him with their flaming arrows in battle.[118–125]

[1]"indomitable elephant bull" gandhahastī: Literally, "scent-elephant." See note to 5.8.12. This is a technical term for an elephant whose scent inspires fear in other elephants. See notes to 6.15.33, App. I, No. 16, lines 57–69; notes to 6.97.33, App. I, No. 67, line 52 and note 15; and 6.4.14 and notes.

[2]"Śuka": See sarga 13, App. I, No. 10, above, where Śuka was taken prisoner. Śuka had taken on the form of a bird, and the monkeys begin to tear off his wings (lines 28–36).

[3]"lain in his quiver" tūṇīśayaiḥ: D10,11, Ct, and Ck read śoṇitadigdhāṅgam, "his limbs smeared with blood."

Sarga 16

This is the opening sarga of the Yuddhakāṇḍa in the majority of northern manuscripts (all but B1,D2).

1. "son of Daśaratha" daśarathātmaje: Cg argues that the poet uses this particular epithet here to highlight Rāma's humanity (manuṣyatvoktiḥ). Perhaps the idea is to restore the ambiguity of Rāma's divinity, since his supernatural powers have been foregrounded in the encounter with Sāgara. See Pollock 1991, pp. 19–20. See notes on verse 16 below.

"majestic" śrīmān: Cg claims that this generally positive epithet is used as an allusion to Rāvaṇa's excessive and overweening pride (madātiśayoktiḥ).

"Śuka and Sāraṇa" śukasāraṇau: The southern commentators are concerned about the question of whether the former of these two ministers is the same as the spy Śuka who was captured and released by Rāma's forces and who has just reported to Rāvaṇa in the immediately preceding sarga (GPP 6.24.22–35 = App. I, No. 16, lines 74–103). See sarga 13, App. I, No. 10, lines 28–36; and sarga 15, App. I, No. 16, lines 74–103. The general consensus among the commentators is that the two are different, although the reasons given vary somewhat.

Crā and Cm argue that the two cannot be the same rākṣasa for two reasons: first, they argue that the individual named in this sarga had been sent out to report on the activities of the previously dispatched agent of the same name, and second, that the Śuka mentioned in the present verse is described as a minister (amātya) [implying that the earlier mentioned Śuka is not] (pūrvapreṣitaśukoktavṛttāntajñāpanapūrvakaṃ preṣaṇād amātyatvena viśeṣāc cātratyaśuko 'nya ity avagamyate—so Crā and Cm). Ct cites the second of these reasons and adds that the first is put forward by Kataka (Ck), etc. (katakādayaḥ). According to Ct and the critical apparatus, the first position is shared by Ck, although Ck's discussion of this passage is absent from our version of his commentary. Moreover, the critical apparatus apparently ascribes both positions to Ck. Cg argues that the two are different because the one in this sarga is teamed with Sāraṇa [whereas the other was not] (śukaḥ pūrvasmād anyaḥ sāraṇasāhityāt). Cs is uncertain on this point and is willing to entertain both positions, that of identity and that of difference. He says, like Ct and others, that this Śuka may be thought of as different from the previously mentioned spy because he is referred to as a minister. On the other hand, he admits that the two may be the same. Since the individual in question is fully familiar with the enemy's army and is also completely trustworthy, it is proper to dispatch him in this way [as a spy]. Thus, Cs argues, it would be possible for him to take on the form of a bird and infiltrate the enemy forces. Cs further argues that if one were to claim that they are different since one of them is a minister and not a spy, that argument would fail because at 329* (see note at 13cd below = VSP, KK, GPP 6.25.14), Śuka and Sāraṇa are referred to as both counselors (mantriṇau) and spies (carau), thus leading to the conclusion that a minister may also serve as a spy. On the other hand, Cs suggests that this could be the same spy as originally mentioned who is merely referred to as a minister in the same way as one may conventionally say that people are carrying umbrellas, when, in fact, only some of them are. This is the well-known chatrinyāya, "the maxim of the people carrying umbrellas." Thus, the two may be different and the minister Sāraṇa might quite properly be sent out with someone who knows the numbers, disposition, and so forth, of the army, for example, a spy like Śuka.

2. "whole" samagram: The placement of this adjective at the beginning of the line, before sāgaram, "ocean," would seem to argue for the words being in agreement, thus yielding the sense of "a monkey army has crossed the entire ocean." Only Dutt (1893, p. 1172) among the translators renders in this way. Ct and all other translations consulted read the adjective as modifying balam, "host, army," as we have done. It would also appear that northern versions avoid the slight awkwardness by shifting the adjective to pāda b, where it unambiguously refers to the army. Cg's gloss, viśālam, "broad, spacious, large," is also, perhaps, ambiguous. The term could, of course, refer to a body of troops but would far more commonly be found as a description of the ocean.

"has done something unprecedented" abhūtapūrvam: Cm, Ct, and Cr all understand that the term "unprecedented" applies to both the building of the bridge and the crossing of the ocean (vānaraṃ balaṃ dustaraṃ sāgaraṃ tīrṇam iti rāmeṇa sāgare setubandhanaṃ kṛtam iti caitad ubhayam api abhūtapūrvam iti sambandhaḥ—so Cm).

3. "I would never have believed that a bridge could be built over the ocean" sāgare setubandhaṃ tu na śraddadhyāṃ kathaṃcana: Literally, "I would not in any way believe the building of a bridge on the ocean."

4–7. "you . . . must accurately determine . . . You must also find out . . . In addition, you must determine" tattvato jñātum arhathaḥ: In the original, all three verses constitute a single sentence. For the sake of style and readability, we have broken it into three English sentences and thus have had to repeat the verb in each one.

"highly regarded" saṃmatāḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃgatāḥ, "allied with, associated with."

"over the ocean, that great body of water" sāgare salilārṇave: Literally, "on the ocean, on the ocean of water." Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss the expression as "the saltwater ocean (lavaṇajale samudre)."

8. "immensely powerful" mahaujasām: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mahātmanām, "great."

10. "inconceivably vast" acintyam: Literally, "unimaginable."

11. "filled" sthitam: Literally, "was situated in or on."

"as well as the shores of the sea, the forests, and the parklands" samudrasya ca tīreṣu vaneṣūpavaneṣu ca: D0,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this pāda.

12. "Part . . . part . . . another part . . . Part . . . another": We have broken the army into parts for the sake of readability. The original states that the entire army was engaged in all the various actions enumerated.

Following verse 12, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [326*]: "The two night-roaming rākṣasas simply stared at that imperturbable ocean of an army."

13. "recognized" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw."

Following verse 13cd, D5–7,9 (continues after 326*),10,11,S insert a passage of one line [329*]: "These two, Śuka and Sāraṇa, are counselors of the lord of the rākṣasas."

15. "gather intelligence" parijñātum: Literally, "to find out about or to observe."

16. "Daśaratha's son" daśarathātmajaḥ: Cg, as in his commentary to verse 1 above, understands that the poet uses the patronymic pointedly. He suggests that, by highlighting that Rāma is the son of a great man, Vālmīki is alluding to his innate compassion (daśarathātmajo mahāpuruṣaprasūtatvena sahajakāruṇyaḥ).

"who was devoted to the welfare of all beings" sarvabhūtahite rataḥ: As Cg notes, the idea is that Rāma is affectionate even toward his enemies (ripūṇām api vatsalaḥ).

"he smiled" prahasan: Literally, "smiling." Ct and Ck claim that Rāma is smiling at the thought that Rāvaṇa, after having seen Rāma's power—demonstrated both in his building of the bridge and in his nonchalant slaughter of Khara, etc., in the forest of Janasthāna—still did not recognize Rāma's strength (setubandhanena janasthāne nirapekṣaṃ kharādivadhena ca na madbalajñānaṃ vṛttam iti prahāsaḥ). Cg simply says that Rāma's smile is provoked by his recollection of Rāvaṇa's stupidity (rāvaṇabuddhimāndyasmaraṇāt prahāsaḥ).

17. "carefully examined" susamīkṣitāḥ: D9,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead susamāhitāḥ, literally, "concentrated, focused, well ordered." Ct glosses his reading as jñātabalāḥ, "[our] strengths revealed." Cg reads the variant suparīkṣitāḥ, which differs little in meaning from the critical reading. Cr reads with the critical edition. Cs notes the variants susamīkṣitāḥ and susamāhitāḥ. He glosses the latter as svasthacittāḥ, "of calm minds," which he glosses as "free from fear of the enemy troops (pratibhaṭabhītirahitā iti yāvat)." Cs idiosyncratically proposes a third alternative, viz., to break the sequence vā susamāhitāḥ into vā asusamāhitāḥ, which he explains as "careless because of our disdain for Rāvaṇa and his troops (vā asusamāhitā iti rāvaṇaṃ sagaṇaṃ tṛṇīkṛtyānavadhānenaiva sthitā iti vā)."

Following verse 17, D5–7,9–11,S, as well as many northern manuscripts, insert a passage of six lines [330*] in which Rāma continues his speech to the rākṣasa spies:

"Or, if there is anything that you have not yet seen, please see it now. Vibhīṣaṇa, here, will surely show you everything.[1–2] Nor need you have any fear for your lives, even though you have been captured. For messengers who have either laid down their weapons or been captured should surely not be put to death. Vibhīṣaṇa,[3–4] please release these two disguised, night-roaming rākṣasa spies, who are ever destroying the forces of their enemies.[5–6]"

18. "the city of Laṅkā" nagarīṃ laṅkām: Several manuscripts, including the texts and printed editions of Ct, read mahatīm, "great," for nagarīm.

20. "tomorrow at the proper moment" śvaḥ kāle: Literally, "tomorrow at the time." D6,13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cg, and Cm read kālye for kāle, which the commentators explain as meaning "in the morning (prātaḥkāle—so Ct)." Cm notes the critical reading as a variant. He reads kāle as pleonastic and suggests that the phrase means simply "tomorrow (śva ity arthaḥ)."

21. "Muster your forces" balaṃ dhāraya: Virtually all northern manuscripts, all devanāgarī manuscripts, with the exception of D5, and some southern manuscripts (M1,2,G2,3), read sasainye tvayi, "[I shall unleash my wrath] on you and your army." This is probably a lectio facilior in that it provides an explicit object for Rāma's wrath, thus creating a more perfect parallelism in the simile. The critical reading, however, is the appropriate choice on textual grounds.

"tomorrow at the proper moment" śvaḥ kāle: See note to verse 20 above.

"I shall unleash my dreadful wrath upon you" ghoraṃ roṣam ahaṃ mokṣye: Literally, "I shall release dreadful wrath." We have provided an object for Rāma's wrath. See note above.

22. Following verse 22, D5–7,9–l1,S insert a passage of one line [336*]: "The two of them then joyfully hailing Rāghava, who loved righteousness, [with the words], 'Be Victorious!'"

23. "although we deserved to die" vadhārhau: Literally, "[we two are] worthy of death." D6,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vadhārtham, "in order to kill [us]."

24–26. "bulls among warriors" puruṣarṣabhāḥ: Literally, "bulls among men." The expression is slightly odd here since two of the heroes described, the monkey Sugrīva and the rākṣasa Vibhīṣaṇa, are not, in fact, men. The term puruṣa, "man," can refer to the male of any species, but the translation then becomes awkward, especially in light of the redundancy implicit in the common metaphorical usage of the term ṛṣabha, "bull." We have therefore substituted "warrior" for stylistic reasons.

"skilled in weaponry" kṛtāstrāḥ: Cg points out that since Sugrīva, the monkey, is not trained in the use of weapons, the adjective here should be understood through the chatriṇyāya, or "the maxim of the people carrying umbrellas" (see note to verse 1 above). (kṛtāstrāḥ śikṣitāstrāḥ. chatriṇo gacchantītivad ayaṃ nirdeśyaḥ sugrīvasyākṛtāstratvāt.)

"Since" yatra: Literally, "where." We follow Ct and Cr in reading this normally locative adverb as the ablative (yasmād dhetoḥ). Cm, however, sees it as a locative, explaining, "in which, that is, in the action of destroying Laṅkā (laṅkāmardanarūpakārye)."

"assembled in one place" ekasthānagatāḥ: We follow Ct, who explains "gathered in one place (ekatra militāḥ)." Cm understands "are of one mind (ekamatyaṃ prāptāḥ)." Cg offers both alternatives.

"hurling it far away" saṃkrāmayitum: Literally "to transfer, to transport." Ct understands the action to be like that of digging out a column and erecting it elsewhere (nikhātaśālāstambham ivopari kṛtvā punaḥ pratiṣṭhāpayitum ity arthaḥ). We prefer the interpretation of Cg and Cm, who explain, "to throw it somewhere else (anyatra kṣeptum)."

"even without all these monkeys" sarve tiṣṭhantu vānarāḥ: Literally, "let all the monkeys stand." We follow the interpretation of Cr, who explains, "the meaning is that there is no need for the other monkeys (anyavānarāṇāṃ na prayojanam ity arthaḥ)."

27. "appearance" rūpam: None of the commentators remarks on this term, and we are inclined to take it in its basic sense of form or appearance. The idea, we believe, is that the spies have made their judgment as to Rāma's capacities on the basis of their direct observation of his awesome physique and armaments. The word rūpam can also refer to one's nature or character. Although this appears less plausible to us in the context, it has been adopted by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 61), who renders, "personality," and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 70), who translates, "la nature." Other translators use or extend one or the other of these meanings; thus Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1454) renders, "charm"; Dutt (1893, p. 1174), "figure"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 62), "capacity"; and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 198), "il suo aspetto."

"will be able to lay waste" vadhiṣyati: Literally, "he will destroy."

"even without those other three" tiṣṭhantu te trayaḥ: Literally, "let the other three stand." See note above to verses 24–26.

28. "seemed as if it were" babhūva: Literally, "it was."

29. "wildly excited" prahṛṣṭarūpāḥ: Literally, "of excited appearance." We follow Crā, who takes rūpa as an intensifying suffix. He understands, "extremely excited (atyantaṃ prahṛṣṭāḥ)," quoting Pā 5.3.66 (praśaṃsāyāṃ rūpap). Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D0,2,8–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead prahṛṣṭayodhāḥ, "having excited warriors."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 17

1. "sound" pathyam: Literally, "wholesome, fit, suitable." B3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead satyam, "truth," which has been translated as either "truthful" or "sincere" by those who translate these texts.

"Sāraṇa . . . him" sāraṇena . . . sāraṇam: Literally, "by Sāraṇa . . . [to] Sāraṇa." Only Cr seems perturbed by the temporary disappearance of Śuka, who is not mentioned again until verse 5 and will not speak again in his own right until sarga 19. He remarks that "there is no lapse here in mentioning the name of only one, since Śuka and Sāraṇa are of one mind (śukasāraṇayor aikamatyād ekatarasyaiva nāmagrahaṇe 'pi na nyūnatā)."

"courageously" aklībam: Literally, "in a not unmanly fashion." We read the term adverbially here, as we believe it better suits the context. It can also be read adjectivally with vacaḥ, "words." All translations consulted—except Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 61, "boldly")—have chosen this second alternative.

2. Pādas cd = App. I, No. 16, line 106. This verse is a close variant of 6.21.15 (= App. I, No. 16, lines 105–6), where the verse is identical except for the verb pratiyudhyeran, "they should assault," which is substituted for, and is synonymous with, abhiyuñjīran.

3. "you . . . because the tawny monkeys got the better of you . . . what rival can possibly get the better of me" tvaṃ . . . haribhir nirjito bhṛśam / ko . . . sapatno mām . . . jetum arhati: Literally, "you, completely defeated by the monkeys . . . what rival can defeat me." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cm, and Cr read pīḍitaḥ, "crushed, abused," for nirjitaḥ.

4. "Rāvaṇa . . . he" rāvaṇaḥ . . . rāvaṇaḥ: Only Cg among the commentators seems concerned by the repetition. He explains it by saying that the second occurrence of the name should be understood in its etymological sense of "he who makes [the world] cry out (atra dvitīyo rāvaṇaśabdo rāvayatīti vyutpattyā kriyānimittakaḥ)." See 6.8.12 and note.

"many tālas in height" bahutālasamutsedham: The word tāla is subject to the same ambiguity as its English equivalent, "palm," in that it may refer both to the palm of the hand and a palm tree. The term tāla has come to stand for a measure of distance in both of these senses in Sanskrit. As Cg notes, the term as used in this verse may refer either to the height of the tāla, or palmyra tree, or to the distance measured across the palm from the tips of the outstretched thumb and middle finger (anekatālavṛkṣatulyaunnatyaṃ yadvā vitatāṅguṣṭhamadhyāmitas tālaḥ). Because it is the poet's intention to indicate the loftiness of Rāvaṇa's palace, we presume that the former measure is intended.

"in his desire to see for himself" didṛkṣayā: Literally, "through the desire to see." The expression is elliptical here, and we are, of course, meant to understand, as Cg notes, that the reference is to Rāvaṇa's desire to observe the monkey army for himself (vānarabaladidṛkṣayā).

5. "two spies" tābhyāṃ carābhyām: As the commentators note, cara is an irregular form for cāra, "spy." The reference is, of course, to Śuka and Sāraṇa, although, as noted above, only the latter is specifically addressed in this sarga. See note to verse 1 above. Also see note to 6.11.24.

6. "innumerable" asaṃkhyeyam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm read instead asahyaṃ ca, "and not to be withstood."

7. "always" samantataḥ: Normally, "on or from all sides," but we follow Cr here in interpreting the word as "all the time (sarvakālam)."

"lead the way in battle" pūrvam abhivartante: Literally, "they move on before."

8. "Which one's advice does Sugrīva heed?" keṣāṃ śṛṇoti sugrīvaḥ: Literally, "of [to] which ones does Sugrīva listen?" We concur with the commentators that some object, such as vacanam, "words, advice," has to be supplied, and we have translated accordingly (vacanam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

"me all of this" me sarvam: D5,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead tattvena, "truthfully." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 62), who renders, "[give me] a full and correct picture."

9. "Upon hearing these words . . . Sāraṇa . . . began to describe" sāraṇaḥ . . . vacanam . . . ācacakṣe: Literally, "words or speech . . . Sāraṇa spoke." The sentence is elliptical, and we agree with Cr and Cg, who state that one should supply a gerund with the sense of "having heard" of which vacanam would be the object (vacanaṃ niśamyeti śeṣaḥ). Ct and Ck disagree and argue that vacanam, which they gloss as "answer (uttaram)," is the object of the verb ābabhāṣe, "spoke," [v.l. for the critical edition's ācacakṣe of pāda c] (vacanam uttaram ābabhāṣa ity anvayaḥ—so Ct). Although this, by itself, yields an acceptable syntax, it creates problems for construing the accusatives mukhyāṃs tāṃs tu vanaukasaḥ, "those principal forest dwellers," of pāda d.

"familiar with the forest-dwelling monkeys . . . them" mukhyajño mukhyāṃs tāṃs tu vanaukasaḥ: Literally, "the knower of the leaders [began to describe] those forest-dwelling leaders."

10–12. "tremble" pravepate: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read pratihatā, "smashed, stricken, shattered."

13–15. "showing his fangs" vijṛmbhate: Literally, "he gapes, yawns." See notes to 16–19 below.

"the color of lotus filaments" padmakiñjalkasaṃnibhaḥ: Literally, "resembling lotus filaments." As Cg points out, this is a reference to the monkey's tawny yellow color (padmakesaravatpītavarṇa ity arthaḥ).

"lashes his tail . . . the sound of which" sphoṭayati . . . lāṅgūlam . . . yasya lāṅgūlaśabdena: Literally, "he expands his tail . . . the sound of the tail of whom." The verb is probably used here in the sense of āsphoṭayati, "he waves about or slaps [the arms, for example]." Cg, the only commentator to discuss this term, glosses, "he strikes [it] on the earth (bhumau tāḍayati)." See notes to 6.40.62; 6.47.8; 6.48.30; 6.57.38; and 6.62.63.

"heir apparent" yauvarājye: See note to 6.51.10. Ś,Ñ,V,B2,3,D0–4,8–13,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yuvarājaḥ, "[he is] the heir apparent."

Following verse 15, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [352*] in which the description of Aṅgada is extended: "He is the son of Vālin and is his equal. But he is always very dear to Sugrīva. He is as valorous on Rāghava's behalf as is Varuṇa on Śakra's.[1–2] It was entirely through his idea that Janaka's daughter was discovered by swift Hanumān, who desires what is best for Rāghava.[3–4] Powerful and invincible, he has gathered many troops of excellent monkeys and is advancing toward you with his own forces.[5–6] And, surrounded by a large army, the hero Nala, stalwart in battle and the builder of the bridge, is following Vālin's son.[7–8]" 16–19. "And those bulls among tawny monkeys . . . leaping up and showing their fangs in rage, are dreadful, fierce, of fierce valor, and impossible to withstand. Their number is ten billion eight hundred thousand." utthāya ca vijṛmbhante krodhena hari-puṃgavāḥ // ete duṣprasahā ghorāś caṇḍāś caṇḍaparākramāḥ / aṣṭau śatasahasrāṇi daśa koṭiśatāni ca //. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr omit these lines (16cd–17).

"who are bracing their limbs" viṣṭabhya gātrāṇi: Literally, "having immobilized their limbs." Commentators and translators differ somewhat in their understanding of the gerund. Cr glosses, "propping (saṃstabhya)," an idea apparently shared by Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 200), who translates, "appoggiando le membra l'un soll'altro." Cg glosses, "raising (unnamya)." Dutt (1893, p. 1176) understands the verb literally, translating, "with their limbs lying inactive." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 62) translates, "who swing their arms," while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1456) and Pagani (1999, p. 930) render, "having stiffened [their limbs]." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 73) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 63) translate, "qui s'étirent les membres" and "stretching their limbs," respectively.

"showing their fangs in rage" vijṛmbhante krodhena: Cg understands here, "they distort their limbs in rage (kopena gātravināmaṃ kurvanti)," although he explains the virtually identical expression in verse 13 above as "he gapes (jṛmbhaṇaṃ karoti)." We see the reference here to be to the characteristic behavior of rhesus macaques and other primates of opening their jaws wide and revealing their impressive canine teeth as part of an aggressive display. See notes to 13–15 above and the note to 1.16.10 on monkeys in general.

"roaring . . . bellowing" kṣveḍayanti . . . nadanti: See notes on 5.55.29 and 6.17.13–15.

"denizens of the sandalwood forest" candanavāsinaḥ: Literally, "sandalwood dwellers." Commentators and translators are divided as to the meaning of the compound. Cr glosses, "their limbs smeared with sandalpaste (candanaliptāṅgāḥ)," a suggestion Pagani (1999, p. 930) apparently follows. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 73) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 63) understand that the monkeys are clad in saffron-colored garments. Cg and Cm, whom we follow, explain, "dwelling in the sandal forest (candanavanavāsinaḥ)." Cv has a variant reading, candanavānarāḥ, which he and Cg, who notes it, gloss as candanavāsinaḥ and interpret as above. Cs offers two explanations. In the first, he takes candana as the proper name of a particular mountain. This idea is similar to that expressed by Dutt (1893, p. 1176), "dwelling in Chandana." Dutt footnotes the name, saying, "This may mean some wood of sandals; but the commentator [Ct] is silent over it." Cs's second interpretation is that the reference is to Mount Malaya because of the abundance of sandalwood trees there. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 200) follows this idea, translating, "son venuti dal monte Malaya."

"The one whom they follow . . . Śveta" ya enam anugacchanti . . . śvetaḥ: Here, too, the commentators are divided as to which leader is followed by the monkey warriors described in this passage. Cr and Cg believe the reference is to Nala, who was described in the verses immediately preceding this passage in the southern recension (see 352*, lines 7,8 above in notes to verses 13–15). Ct and Cm, whom we follow, see the pronoun enam in 18a as a prospective reference to Śveta in 19a (compare Dutt's footnote [1893, p. 1176]). If one were to read the pronoun retrospectively in the critical text, it would then be a reference to Aṅgada. We believe that Ct and Cm are correct because of the relative pronoun yaḥ in 18a. In this passage, the relative pronouns signal descriptions of new individuals.

"silver-hued" rajatasaṃkāśaḥ: Literally, "resembling silver." The description clearly mirrors the monkey's name, which means "white, bright."

"he . . . expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces" eṣa āśaṃsate laṅkāṃ svenānīkena marditum: This phrase is repeated at 39cd below and occurs almost verbatim at 24cd below, as well as at 6.18.24cd and 6.18.39ef.

"expects" āśaṃsate: Literally, "he hopes, wishes." Cg and Cm gloss, "he begs, requests (prārthayate)."

20. "After reporting to Sugrīva" sugrīvam āgamya: Literally, "having approached Sugrīva."

"that monkey" vānaraḥ: Cr, perhaps concerned that the verse does not really specify which monkey is intended (Śveta or Nala, see notes on verses 16–19 above) and that the name Śveta can merely be a general adjective, "white," proposes to analyze the term vānara here as "he who advises [rāti = bodhayati] a particular military formation [vānam = racanāviśeṣam] (vānaṃ racanā viśeṣaṃ rāti bodhayatīty arthaḥ)."

"to marshal" vibhajan: Literally, "separating." We understand that Śveta is separating his forces into their various units. Cg explains, "splitting up the densely massed army (nibiḍāṃ senāṃ bhittvā)."

"urging . . . onward" praharṣayan: Literally, "exciting, inciting."

21–22ab. "used to roam . . . once ruled" purā . . . paryeti . . . praśāsti: Literally, "formerly roamed . . . he rules." Cg notes that by the use of the adverb purā, "formerly, long ago," we are to understand that Kumuda now resides in the company of Sugrīva (purety anenādya sugrīvasamīpa eva vasatīti gamyate).

"charming mountain" ramyam . . . parvatam: Ct believes that the word ramya is another name of Mount Saṃkocana (ramyaṃ ramyākhyām).

"Mount Saṃkocana" saṃkocano nāma . . . giriḥ: Literally, "the mountain, Saṃkocana by name." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read the variant saṃrocanaḥ, "Saṃrocana," for saṃkocanaḥ.

22cd–24. "commanding one hundred million troops" yo 'sau śatasahasrāṇāṃ sahasraṃ parikarṣati: Literally, "he leads one thousand hundred thousands." We agree with all commentators and available translators in reading the relative clause prospectively to refer to Caṇḍa. The versification in the critical edition places the line so as to suggest that one might read it retrospectively in reference to Kumuda.

23ab is a close variant of 6.18.2ab.

23cd = 6.18.2cd.

"dreadful in his actions" ghorakarmaṇaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the nominative plural ghoradarśanāḥ, "of dreadful appearance," which must then modify vālāḥ, "hair, fur," in 23a.

"sticks out . . . in all directions" prakīrṇāḥ: Literally, "scattered."

"so far" bahuvyāmāḥ: Literally, "many vyāmas [in length]." According to Cg, who cites Amarakośa 2.6.87, a vyāma is the distance between the tips of the hands of a person whose arms are extended sideways (vyāmo bāhvoḥ sakarayos tatayos tiryag antaram ity amaraḥ). Cm describes it somewhat similarly as the measure of two long arms (bahuvyāmā dīrghabāhudvayapramāṇāḥ). We have chosen to follow Cr, who avoids the technical measurement, glossing merely, "very long (atidīrghāḥ)."

"He . . . expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces." eṣaivāśaṃsate laṅkāṃ svenānīkena marditum: This phrase is repeated at 6.18.24cd and 6.18.39ef, and occurs almost verbatim at 18cd above and 39cd below.

25–26. "long mane" dīrghakesaraḥ: D5,T1,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead dīrghalocanaḥ, "long- or wide-eyed." This variant is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 63).

"glares fixedly" nibhṛtaḥ prekṣate: Literally, "he, motionless, looks." We follow the suggestion of Ct, Cr, and Cm, who understand "with single-minded attention (ekāgracittaḥ—so Cr)," and read the adjective adverbially with the verb prekṣate, "he looks at."

"beautiful" sudarśanam: We agree with those translators (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 64; Pagani 1999, p. 930; and Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 73) who understand the word as an adjective modifying the mountain Sahya. This interpretation appears to be supported by Gorresio's variant, cārudarśanam, which he translates as "dilettoso." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 201), incidentally, understands the other names to be additional adjectives, viz. "kṛṣṇagiri (black)" and "sahya (agreeable)." Dutt (1893, p. 1177) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1457) see the term as the name of yet another mountain, Sudarśana.

"Rambha" rambhaḥ: This monkey or another of the same name is described at 6.18.17 below. See note there.

27. "Three billion" śataṃ śatasahasrāṇāṃ triṃśac ca: Literally, "one hundred hundred thousands and thirty." The number is ambiguous. It can be read as one hundred hundred-thousands plus thirty hundred-thousands (i.e., 10,000,000 + 3,000,000 = 13,000,000) or, taking the numbers in the nominative as multiplication factors rather than as addends, as thirty hundred, hundred thousands (= three billion). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 73), Pagani (1999, p. 930), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 63) understand the former. Dutt (1893, p. 1177) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 64) understand, "three hundred kotis," or three billion. Gorresio's text is less ambiguous, compounding the numbers and reading triṃśacchatasahasrāṇi, or three million ("trenta centinaia di mila") (1856, vol. 9, p. 201). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1457) uniquely comes up with "one crore and thirty," which adds up to ten million and thirty monkeys, a somewhat improbable number in this context. We have chosen to read triṃśat as factorial, despite the particle ca—which would seem to indicate a conjunction—in light of how the numbers are expressed in verse 30ff. In verses 30–39 below, the numbers are increased by one million each time, from four million to seven million. In each case, the decade number, for example, catvāriṃśat, "forty," at verse 30 below, is used as a multiplicand along with śatasahasram, "hundred thousand." This is entirely in keeping with the pattern of handling numbers that we have seen earlier in the epic, as, for example, when the monkeys, one after another, declare how far they can leap (4.64) or when Hanumān engages in the contest with the mock demoness Surasā (5.1.130–155). For this reason, we chose to ignore the conjunctions here and at verse 30 to preserve what we see as a pattern. This, of course, leaves unexplained the problem of the current verse, which, in order to fit the progression, should enumerate three million rather than three billion. Although the textual evidence supports the additional śatam, "hundred," in pāda a, the progression alluded to, and the likely glossative variants proposed by some manuscripts and the printed text of Gorresio, lend some support to the notion that the number was originally intended to be three million. Cr is the only commentator to grapple consistently with the question of the numbers. He reads the decade numbers, thirty, forty, etc., as addends, thus maintaining a more modest numeric progression of ten thousand per time from verse 30 on, where he understands there to be one hundred forty thousand monkeys. His progression is, of course, also thrown off by the extra śatam in pāda a, where, by Cr's reckoning, there are thirteen million monkeys. Compare, too, 4.37.30–32 and notes; and notes to 6.19.32, 411* (following notes to 19.32) and 416* (following notes to 19.33).

27cd is a close variant of 6.18.31cd.

Following 27ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [357*], which expands on the description of the monkeys in Rambha's entourage: "whom these dreadful and fierce [monkeys], of fierce valor [follow]."

28–29. "pricking up his ears" karṇau vivṛṇute: Literally, "displays his ears." Several translators offer, "open or dilate his ears," but this makes little sense. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 64) translates, "shaking his ears," but this forces the sense of the verb and, besides, is somewhat ludicrous.

"showing his fangs" jṛmbhate: See notes to verses 16–19 above.

"immensely powerful" mahābalaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the grammatically awkward instrumental mahaujasā, "[endowed] with great power or energy," while D6,T2,G1,M1,2,5, and the texts of VSP (6.26.36), KK (6.26.34), and Gita Press (6.26.35) read mahājavaḥ, "of great speed." Translations that follow the texts and printed editions of Ct render the former, while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 63) renders, "of the immense strength and speed" and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1457) translates, "with extraordinary might."

"never flees an opposing host" na ca yūthād vidhāvati: Literally, "and does not run from the troop." The expression is slightly ambiguous, as it could also mean "does not desert his [own] troop," but, in the context, this seems to us less likely, although Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 201) translates his variant na ca yūthān nivartate in this sense, "e non si discosta dalla sua schiera." The critical reading is rare in the texts of the southern commentators. Ct and Cr read na ca senāṃ paridhāvati, "does not run to [his] army," which Ct explains as meaning "he prefers to fight alone (kiṃtv eka eva yoddhum icchatīty arthaḥ)." Cg has, instead, the facilior yuddhāt for yūthāt, yielding the sense "and does not flee from battle."

Following verse 28, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [358*]: "He shakes with fury and casts his glances sideways. Staring at his tail,[1] that immensely powerful monkey roars."

[1]"Staring at his tail" paśyan lāṅgūlam api ca: It is unclear why Śarabha is looking at his tail. The commentators are silent. This phrase is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 63). D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead paśya lāṅgūlavikṣepam [D7, -vikṣepaiḥ], "observe the lashing of his tail."

30. "He commands" etasya: Literally, "of him [there are]."

"a full four million" sarve . . . śatasahasrāṇi catvariṃśat tathaiva ca: Literally, "all the hundred thousand and forty." As in verse 27 above, the numbering of the monkeys leaves room for multiple interpretations. The number here lacks the additional mention of "hundred (śatam)," which is found in verse 27. Only Cr among the commentators mentions the number, reading it without explanation as "one hundred thousand and forty (śatasahasrāṇi catvariṃśac ca)." Like us, some translators, including Dutt (1893, p. 1177) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 64), understand catvariṃśat as a multiplicand rather than an addend, yielding a total of forty hundred thousand, or four million. Others (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 63; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 74; Pagani 1999, p. 931; and Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1457: "one lakh and forty") have totaled the number to yield one hundred forty thousand. A number of northern manuscripts as well as the text of Gorresio read śatasahasrāṇi catvāriṃśac chatāni ca (6.2.38). Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 201) understands these numbers as addends and totals them as one hundred thousand plus forty hundreds (= 104,000).

"powerful" balinaḥ: The form is ambiguous. It can be read as a genitive singular referring to Śarabha and has been translated as such by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 74), Pagani (1999, p. 931), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 64), and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 201). We, however, agree with the other translators, who read it as a nominative plural referring to Śarabha's followers on the grounds that otherwise these monkeys would be left with no descriptive adjective concerning their strength, valor, and ferocity, which would be rather unusual in this context. It would also be somewhat redundant with the adjective mahābalaḥ used to describe Śarabha in the preceding verse.

"Vihāras" vihārāḥ: The name appears to refer to these monkeys' propensity to roam at will. The word can mean something like "wanderers or vagabonds."

31–33. "of bherī drums" bherīṇām: A bherī appears to be specifically a war drum. See Vyas 1967, p. 229; 5.8.36; and 5.46.27 and notes. See 6.23.41; 6.24.19; 6.25.27;

6.26.1; 6.27.14,16; 6.34.12; 6.40.23; 6.45.24; 6.47.8; 6.48.31; and 6.65.16 and notes. Cf. 6.53.28.

"none can withstand him in battle" yuddhe dusprasaho nityam: Literally, "always irresistible in battle."

"that . . . mountain, Pāriyātra" parvatam . . . pāriyātram: It is unclear whether the reference here is to a mountain or to a mountain range. B. C. Law (1954, pp. 19–20) notes the discrepancy in his identification: "The earliest mention of the Pāripātra [v.l. Pāriyātra] is found in the Dharmaśūtra of Baudhāyana [1.1.25], who refers to it as being situated on the southern limit of Āryāvarta. The Skanda Purāṇa refers to it as the farthest limit of Kumārīkhaṇḍa, the centre of Bhāratavarṣa . . . [while] Pargiter identifies [it] . . . with that portion of the modern Vindhya range which is situated west of Bhopal in Central India together with the Aravalli mountains identified with the Apokopa by Ptolemy." Bhattacharyya (1991, p. 245) understands it to be one of the seven mountain ranges of India. He locates it in the western Vindhyas, as it is said to be where the Chembal, Betwa, and Śiprā rivers originate. The name is known from the Nāsik inscriptions of Gautamīputra Sākarṇī and is attested to in the Mahābhāṣya (Kielhorn 1.475 on Pā 2.4.10), where it is said to be on the southern boundary of Āryāvarta.

34. "Five million" śatasahasrāṇāṃ śatārdham: Literally, "half a hundred, hundred thousands." See note to verse 27 above. Cm, who has not heretofore commented on the numbers, understands the number to be half a hundred thousand, or fifty thousand (śatārdhaṃ sahasrāṇi). Cr understands one hundred fifty thousand (śatādhikapañcāśasahasrasaṃkhyākā ity arthaḥ), while Ct, whom we follow, understands fifty lakhs, or five million (pañcāśallakṣasaṃkhyam).

"each with his separate troop" bhāgaśaḥ: Literally, "by divisions." See note to 6.3.24.

"form the entourage of" paryupāsate: Literally, "they surround, accompany." Compare verse 39 below and note.

35–37ab. "surging" pravalgantīm: Literally, "leaping." Cr explains, "jumping with excitement (utsāhena plavamānām)." We have translated in such a way as to reinforce the oceanic simile (dvitīya iva sāgaraḥ) in 35cd and to avoid the somewhat comical notion of a jumping army.

"Mount Dardara" dardara-: According to Cg, this is the name of a mountain near the Ganges (dardaro nāma gaṅgāsamīpasthaḥ parvataḥ). Bhattacharyya (1991, p. 115) identifies Dardara as the name of a people who resided "in the Upper Kishenganga valley in Kashmir on the Upper Indus." Cf. 4.34.36–37. D5–7,D10,11,T, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead dardura-, which Cr explains as "[resembling] a cloud (meghasadṛśaḥ)."

"from the river Parṇāśā" parṇāśām . . . nadīm: According to the apparatus of the MBh (Sabhāparvan 103* [B1], p. 50), this is the name of a river in western India (kiṃpunā . . . caiva parṇāśā ca mahānadī). See Bhattacharyya (1991, p. 245), who identifies the Parṇāśā with either the Banas River in Rajasthan or the Rann River in Cutch. The word parṇāśā is subject to considerable variation among the various manuscript traditions. The texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yo veṇām (misprinted at GPP 6.26.41 as yau veṇām). The river watering Vinata's home territory is thus referred to as the Veṇā in translations that follow this text. Ck insists that the authentic reading here is yo vedīm, for yo nadīm, yielding the sense "[roams] the Vedī region."

"six million" ṣaṣṭiḥ śatasahasrāṇi: Literally, "sixty hundred thousands." See note to verse 27 above.

37cd. "Krathana" krathanaḥ: Ñ1,Ś,V1,B3,D4,7,8,12,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm substitute instead krodhanaḥ, which appears in several translations. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1458) renders this as the name of a monkey, while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 64) inexplicably understands the variant to be an alternate name of the river Parṇāśā.

Following verse 37, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [364*]: "[His forces] are valorous, powerful, and marshaled in divisions troop by troop."

38. "Expanding his body" vapuḥ puṣyati: Literally, "he nourishes his body." Cr reads the phrase with the ablative krodhāt, "out of anger," in pāda d, but this seems somewhat forced. Cm and Cg suggest that Gavaya is expanding his body in the joy of battle (yuddhaharṣād abhivardhayatīty arthaḥ—Cg).

Following verse 38ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [365*]: "[expanding his body, while] completely ignoring all the other monkeys, arrogant in their strength."[1]

[1]"arrogant in their strength" baladarpitān: The text of Cg reads instead the contextually superior nominative singular baladarpitaḥ, thus making Gavaya ignore the other monkeys in his own pride of power.

39. "His entourage consists of" paryupāsate: Literally, "they surround, accompany." Compare verse 34 and note.

"seven million" śatasahasrāṇi saptatiḥ: Literally, "seventy hundred thousands." See note to verse 27 above.

"he expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces" eṣa āśaṃsate laṅkāṃ svenānīkena marditum: This phrase is repeated at 18cd above and occurs almost verbatim at 24cd above, as well as at 6.18.24cd and 6.18.39ef.

40. "dreadful" ghorāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vīrāḥ, "heroes."

"powerful . . . they . . . can take on any form at will" balinaḥ kāmarūpiṇaḥ: For pāda b, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute the critical edition's pāda d, "yeṣāṃ saṃkhyā na vidyate (they are numberless)." In place of the critical edition's pāda d, these manuscripts read: "teṣāṃ yūthāni bhāgaśaḥ (each with his separate troop)" (a variant of the critical edition's 34d).

"troop leaders and leaders of troop leaders" yūthapā yūthapaśreṣṭhāḥ: Literally, "troop protectors [and] the foremost of troop protectors." Cg explains the difference in status by noting that the former are Aṅgada and his like, and the latter are Sugrīva and his equals. (yūthapā aṅgadādayaḥ. yūthapaśreṣṭhāḥ sugrīvādayaḥ.)

Ck (quoted by Ct and also quoted in parentheses after the colophon of Cm in VSP) claims that the division of sargas here is inauthentic (apāṅktaḥ) on the grounds that there is neither a break in the action nor a change in the subject (atra sargacchedo 'pāṅkto vṛttabhedābhāvād ekaprakaraṇatvāc ceti katakaḥ).

Sarga 18

1. "those troop leaders" tān . . . yūthapān: Several of the commentators attempt to distinguish the monkey leaders described in this sarga as a distinct class from those mentioned in the preceding sarga. Cr sees these monkeys as belonging to a different species, noting by way of introduction, "He [Vālmīki] now describes those monkeys, beginning with the species of langur (lāṅgūlajātiprabhṛtīn āha)." See note to 6.34.26. Cg feels that the monkeys described here are the principal troop leaders, who are superior to those mentioned previously (punaruktebhyo 'py utkṛṣṭān pradhānayūthapatīn). Cm, relying on the relative clause in pāda b, thinks that the reference is specifically to those monkeys who are willing to sacrifice their lives for Rāma (teṣāṃ prasiddhānāṃ vānarāṇāṃ madhye ye rāghavārthe jīvitaṃ na rakṣanti tān). As indicated in the note to 6.17.40 above, Ck believes that the narrative is continuous and that the sarga break here is spurious.

"risking their lives" na rakṣanti jīvitam: Literally, "they do not protect [their own] lives."

2–3. "on whose tail . . . fur" vālā lāṅgūlam āśritāḥ: Literally, "hair depending on the tail." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dīrghalāṅgūlam āśritāḥ, literally, "depending on his long tail." This reading provides no explicit substantive for the participle āśritāḥ, "depending on," leaving one to simply infer that the fur or hair of the monkey's tail is intended (keśāḥ—so Cr).

2ab is a close variant of 6.17.23ab.

2cd = 6.17.23cd.

"bristling" pragṛhītāḥ: Literally, "separated." The commentators generally explain this as meaning "standing up, erected (utthitāḥ—so Cr)."

"sticks out so far in all directions" bahuvyāmāḥ . . . prakīrṇāḥ: See notes to 6.17.23 above.

"the troop leader called Hara" haro nāmaiṣa yūthapaḥ: Ct suggests that Hara is not so much a proper name of a specific hero as a designation of a particular species of langur (haro golāṅgūlajātiḥ).

4. "Banding together" sahitāḥ: Literally, "united, grouped together." A large number of manuscripts from both recensions (Ś,V1,3,B1,D0–6,8–13,T1,M) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead sahasā, "all at once."

"scaling the ramparts of Laṅkā" laṅkārohaṇa-: Literally, "climbing Laṅkā."

Following verse 4, D5–7,9–11,T,G,M1,2,5 [M3 after verse 5], and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [375*], which continues the description of Hara's troops: "These troop leaders who are present are servants of the king of the tawny monkeys."

5. V2,D5–7,9–11,T,G,M1,2,5 all omit this verse. According to the principles upon which the critical edition is based, it should have been relegated to the apparatus (Bhatt 1960, p. xxiv, no. 4). T. R. Krishnacharya, the editor of KK, includes this verse as 6.27.5 but notes in his apparatus that it is found only in very late manuscripts and is not seen in the older ones (ayaṃ ślokaḥ prācīnakośeṣu na dṛśyate. auttarāhapāṭha eva dṛśyate). The editor of the VSP edition places this verse within brackets, between 6.27.4 and 6.27.5. Gita Press, GPP, and NSP omit the verse entirely. Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 203) renders it.

6–8. "The heroes . . . with claws and fangs for their weapons, are terrifying and fierce in their anger" nakhadaṃṣṭrāyudhān vīrāṃs tīkṣṇakopān bhayāvahān: This line (= 7ab) is omitted by D5–7,9–11,T,G1,M1,3. V2 omits verse 7 entirely. Like verse 5 above, it should have been relegated to the critical apparatus. This line is rendered only by Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 203).

"As numberless and indistinguishable as grains of sand on the far shore of the sea" asaṃkhyeyān anirdeśyān paraṃ pāram ivodadheḥ: Literally, "as uncountable and indescribable as the farther shore of the sea." Ct explains, "impossible to enumerate by name (anirdeśyā)." Cg explains, "impossible to describe individually (anirdeśyān pratyekaṃ nirdeṣṭum aśakyān)." Cr, Ct, and Ck believe that the expression "far shore (paraṃ pāram)" by metonymy refers to dust, i.e., sand, located there, and we have followed their suggestion (paraṃ pāram iva parapārastharеṇūn iva).

"apes" ṛkṣāḥ: See note to 6.4.17. See, too, note to 1.16.10 and also R. Goldman 1989.

"denizens of the mountains, hill country, and rivers" parvateṣu ca ye kecid viṣameṣu nadīṣu ca: Literally, "those who [are] in the mountains, in the uneven places, and along the rivers." We have supplied the word "denizens," following the suggestion of Cr, who adds the phrase "they previously lived (avasann iti śeṣaḥ)."

9–10. "like Parjanya" parjanya iva: This is the vedic rain god, often associated, or even identified, with Indra (parjanya indra iva—so Cr). See translations and notes to 6.41.33; 6.67.20; 6.83.33; and 6.116.88.

"where he drinks the waters of the Narmadā" narmadāṃ piban: Literally, "drinking the Narmadā." Cr sees Dhūmra as drying up the waters of the river (pibañ śoṣayan san). See 4.40.8–10. The Narmadā River, one of few major rivers in India that flow from east to west, is considered holy and thought to mark the boundary between North and South India.

11–12. "his younger brother" yavīyān asya tu bhrātā: Cs argues that the description of Jāmbavān indicates that both he and Dhūmra are sons of Brahmā. He claims, however, that in the Bālakāṇḍa's listing of the partial incarnations of the divinities (490* = GPP 1.17.7), only the former is mentioned because of his possessing superior qualities relative to those of his brother. (etena jāmbavata iva dhūmrasyāpi brahmajātatvaṃ jñāyate. bālakāṇḍe 'ṃśāvataraṇaprastāve guṇajyeṣṭhatvāj jāmbavata evoktiḥ.) As an alternative, Cs suggests that we might understand the word "brother" metaphorically so that the sense might be, "He is like a brother in his affection (sauhardād bhrāteva vā)."

"He looks just like his brother" bhrātrā samāno rūpeṇa: Literally, "equal to his brother in appearance." Cs understands this reference to be to the two brothers having the form of ṛkṣas, "apes." Cs, like many medieval and later authors, may understand the term ṛkṣa to refer to bears (rūpeṇarkṣākāreṇa). See notes to 6.4.17 and Goldman 1989.

"peaceful by nature" praśāntaḥ: Literally, "peaceful, calm." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg (GPP footnote, KK, VSP) substitute prakrāntaḥ, "valiant." This is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 65).

"obedient to his superiors" guruvartī: Literally, "conformable to or following his gurus." Cg understands, "obedient to his elders (guruśuśruṣakaḥ)," while Ck and Ct understand, "serving his true guru (sadgurūpāsakaḥ)."

13. "the wars of the gods and asuras" devāsure: Literally, "with respect to the gods and asuras." Most commentators supplement this elliptical adjective with a word meaning either battle or rivalry, and we concur.

14–15. "there are" vicaranti: Literally, "they roam about."

"shaggy apes" romaśāḥ: Literally, "hairy." We have supplied the word "apes."

"who resemble rākṣasas and piśācas" rākṣasānāṃ ca sadṛśāḥ piśācānām: Cr construes this phrase with the immediately following adjective romaśāḥ, "hairy," yielding the sense "hairy as rākṣasas and piśācas." Ct and Ck, however, with whom we are inclined to agree, read these separately and add that the apes are similar to the demons in their ferocity (rakṣaḥpiśācasādṛśyaṃ krauryeṇa).

"They scale the mountain peaks and hurl down boulders" ārūhya parvatāgrebhyo . . . śīlāḥ / muñcanti: Literally, "having climbed, they release stones from mountain peaks." For the sake of readability, we have adjusted the syntax slightly.

16–17. "standing there" sthitam: This participle, occurring at 16d, is replaced in D6,7,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg by the plural sthitāḥ, which then modifies sarve vānarāḥ, "all the monkeys."

"Rambha" rambho nāma: A number of manuscripts show variants for the name, including Ḍaṃbha (D11,G1,3), Daṃbha (T3,G2,M3,5), and Jaṃbha (D9). Pagani (1999, p. 932 and note, p. 1656) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 65) read Daṃbha. This monkey or another of the same name is mentioned above at 6.17.26.

"with his troops serves thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣaṃ paryupāste . . . balena: We follow the interpretation of Cr, who construes balena in pāda 17c with the verb paryupāste, "he honors, worships, waits upon," in pāda b, explaining, "He dispatched his own army in order to assist Indra (indrasāhāyyārthaṃ svasainyaṃ preṣayāmāsety arthaḥ)." Cg, although less explicit, expresses the same idea in glossing, "He pleases [Indra] with his army [or with his strength] (balena prīṇayati)." Translators offer various renderings, depending on how they understand the verb paryupāste and the epithet sahasrākṣa, "thousand-eyed." Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1179) renders, "dwelleth near the thousand-eyed Deity"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1460), "ministers to Indra (the thousand-eyed god) with his army"; Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 65), "he finds favor in the eyes of the Lord-of-the-thousand-eyes, whom he worships"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 76), "habite le Sahasrāksha"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 66), following Roussel, "dwells on the Sahasraksha Mountain"; and Pagani (1999, p. 932), "et au service d'Indra aux mille yeux."

"Although he is standing still, in his eagerness he appears to be leaping about." abhisaṃrabdhaṃ plavamānam iva sthitam: Literally, "agitated, he is standing as if jumping." Like Cg, we understand the apparent motion of Rambha, while he is, in fact, standing still, to be some kind of extraordinary manifestation of his energy or agitation. Cg suggests supplying "in wonder (āścaryeṇa)," to be read adverbially with the verb prekṣante, "they watch." Cm appears to understand the phrase to indicate that Rambha is a creature "who jumps by nature (plavamānatvena vartamānam)." Many manuscripts (Ñ2,V3,D0–5,7,9–11,13,T2,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cv, Crā, Ck, Ct, and Cr) substitute avasthitam for the critical reading iva sthitam. Ct and Ck explain, "leaping about for sport and then standing still for sport. (plavamānam. līlartham iti śeṣaḥ. sthitaṃ līlārtham eva punaḥ sthitam.)" Translators, other than Raghunathan, have generally followed Ct's lead, and thus Dutt (1893, p. 1179) renders, "leaping and resting (by turns)"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 76), "(tour à tour) bondit, retombe, se tient immobile"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 66), "now leaps up . . . and then stands motionless"; Pagani (1999, p. 932), "sans cesse bondit puis s'arrête sans un geste"; and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1460), "whether leaping . . . or standing."

18–19. "when he moves, rubs his flanks against a mountain standing a league away" sthitaṃ yojane śailaṃ gacchan pārśvena sevate: Literally, "in going, he attends with his side a mountain located or standing at a yojana." The commentators agree that the idea here is that Saṃnādana's body is one league in breadth. Most of them, like Cm, understand that, in moving, he touches a mountain one league away with his side (yaḥ . . . gacchan yojane sthitaṃ śailaṃ pārśvena sevate spṛśati). Cg places more emphasis on the participle gacchan, "going," explaining that, when Saṃnādana moves, his very first step places a one league distant mountain right at his side (asya gamanakāla ekapada-prakṣepadaśāyām ekayojanaparimitaḥ parvataḥ pārśvastho bhavati).

"league" yojanam: See notes to 1.5.7 and 5.1.69.

"who, when he stretches his body upward, reaches a league in height" ūrdhvaṃ tathaiva kāyena gataḥ prāpnoti yojanam: Literally, "and going upward with his body, reaches one yojana."

"His form is unsurpassed" yasmān na paramaṃ rūpam . . . vidyate: Literally, "than which no greater form is found."

"among creatures that move on four feet" catuṣpādeṣu: Literally, "among quadrupeds."

20a–d. The numbering of verses here in the critical edition is confusing and does not appear to conform to that of any printed edition or to any version known to the commentators. All commentators consulted (Ct, Cr, Crā, Cm, Ck, Cv), except Cg, understand the critical edition's 20ef (=GPP 6.27.20ab; VSP 6.27.20ab; KK 6.27.20ab) as beginning the description of the next monkey general, Krathana (v.l. Krodhana—Cr). Cg, on the other hand, sees lines 20ef–21cd as a continuation of the description of Saṃnādana, with the description of Krathana beginning only in verse 22. Printed editions of Cg's text (VSP, KK) have the critical edition's 21cd (=GPP 21ab) as an independently numbered half śloka (KK 21; VSP 21). The critical edition's division of the verses suggests that 20ef marks the end of the description of Saṃnādana, but this is not persuasive as the style of this and the previous sarga shows that relative pronouns generally mark the beginning of new descriptions. Moreover, none of the commentators, not even Cg, sees the description of Krathana beginning with the critical edition's 21ab.

"once fought a battle with Śakra himself" yena yuddhaṃ tadā dattaṃ raṇe śakrasya: Literally, "by whom combat was given in battle to Śakra (reading śakrasya as sādhāraṇa-ṣaṣṭhī)." Cg disagrees with the other commentators in seeing Saṃnādana as having fought not against Indra but rather successfully on his behalf in the god's war with the asuras. (śakrasya raṇe śakrasyāsuraiḥ saha yuddhe. yenāsurebhyo yuddhaṃ dattaṃ tadā parājayaś cāsurebhyo na prāptaḥ so 'yaṃ saṃnādana iti śruto nāma.) Cg does this, no doubt, in order to avoid a contradiction that would otherwise arise as a consequence of his belief that verses 20 and 21, where service as an ally of Indra is mentioned, constitute part of the description of Saṃnādana.

D3,6,7,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read purā, "long ago," for the critical edition's "tadā, "once [literally, "then"]. This variant is rendered in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 65).

20ef–23. The syntax of verses 22–23cd is awkward, and we have adjusted it somewhat to achieve a more lucid translation. A literal translation of the two verses would be: "That majestic, powerful bull among monkeys lives there [23cd] on that king of the lords of mountains, which is frequented by many kinnaras [22cd], which always offers the pleasures of a pleasure garden to your brother, O lord of rākṣasas, [23ab] and whose jambū trees King Vaiśravaṇa enjoys [22ab]."

"never boasts on the battlefield" yuddheṣv akatthano nityam: Literally, "always not boasting in battles." Ct explains that Krathana demonstrates his valor by deeds alone (akatthana ātmaślāghārahitaḥ kāryeṇaiva parākramapradarśakaḥ). The adjective akatthana is no doubt used here because of its alliterative effect with the name Krathana.

"Agni of the black path" kṛṣṇavartmanā: Literally, "by him of the black path." This common kenning may refer to either a path blackened along the earth or, perhaps, to the black path of smoke that the fire builds to the heavens. Compare RaghuVa 11.42 and ManuSm 2.94.

"in their wars with the asuras" devāsure yuddhe: Literally, "in the war between the gods and the asuras."

"the king of lordly mountains" yo rājā parvatendrāṇām: Literally, "the king of the lords of mountains." Ct, no doubt correctly, identifies the unnamed mountain as Kailāsa, which is regularly identified as Kubera's abode (for example, see 4.42.19–20; see also notes to 5.19.30). Ck glosses, "in the fragrant groves of Kailāsa (kailāsa-gandhamādane)."

"which always serves as the delightful pleasure garden" vihārasukhado nityam: Literally, "always giving the pleasure of a pleasure garden."

"King Vaiśravaṇa Kubera" vaiśravaṇo rājā: Literally, "King Vaiśravaṇa."

"disports himself among jambū trees" jambūm upaniṣevate: Literally, "enjoys the jambū tree." Commentators differ as to how to understand this phrase. We follow Ct and Ck, who understand King Vaiśravaṇa to be the subject of upaniṣevate, that is, that Kubera enjoys the jambū tree or trees growing on the mountain. Cg and Cm, however, take the subject to be the mountain itself. They interpret the phrase, therefore, to mean "which (mountain) is covered with jambū trees (jambūyuktaḥ)." Translators generally offer variations on these two themes. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1179) offers, "where king Vaiśravaṇa eateth rose apples"; Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1460), "takes his seat beneath a Jambū (a variety of rose-apple) tree"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 66), "sits beneath a Jambhu tree on that mountain"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 76), "à cet endroit de la Jambû"; and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 65), "where rose-apple trees grow in abundance."

Pagani (1999, p. 932), on the other hand, renders, "à côté de la Jambū," making it clear in her footnote (p. 1656) that she understands the reference here to be to the legendary river of heaven by that name. This position, however, seems hard to maintain, as the purāṇas generally locate the Jambū River on Mount Meru and/or Mount Mandara (BhāgP 5.16.19–20) or around Mount Meru (VāyuP 35.26–30). V. Mani (1975, s.v.) understands the jambū tree to be "a mythical tree growing on the southern slope of Mt. Meru. It is watered every year by the subjects of King Kubera, or Vaiśravaṇa." The jambū is commonly identified as the rose apple tree or the black plum (Syzygium cuminii L., syn. Eugenia jambos Linn, Roxb., or Eugenia Jambolana syn. Syzygium jambolanum W.). See Brandis 1874, pp. 233–34 and 1906, pp. 317; and Brockington 1984, p. 105.

24. "He . . . expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces." eṣaivāśaṃsate laṅkāṃ svenānīkena marditum: This phrase is repeated at 39ef below and at 6.17.24cd, and occurs almost verbatim at 6.17.18cd and 6.17.39cd.

25–28. "attend" abhivartate: Literally, "turns toward, approaches."

"the ancient hostility between the elephants and monkeys" hastināṃ vānarāṇāṃ ca pūrvaṃ vairam: Ck, Ct, Cr, Cg, Cm, and Cv refer with varying degrees of detail to the ancient, or purāṇic, story according to which, at the request of some sages, the monkey Kesarin, the father of Hanumān, killed the asura [rākṣasa—Cm] Śambasādana, who had taken the form of an elephant and was oppressing them. Cg and Cv add that in gratitude the sages granted Kesarin a boon whereby he received so mighty a son as Hanumān. The incident with the asura Śambasādana is mentioned in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.33.74,80 and notes). There, however, the asura is not said to have taken the form of an elephant. The hostility referred to dates, according to the commentators, from this incident. See, too, Prācīna Caritrakoṣa (s.v. Kesarin). Pagani (1999, p. 1656) provides a note explaining only that Kesarin kills an asura who had taken on the form of an elephant.

"he haunts the banks of the Ganges" gaṅgām anu paryeti: Literally, "he moves around following the Ganges."

"moves along" gacchan: Literally, "[he] going." Ñ1,B2,3,D7,9–11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead garjan, "roaring."

"of the tawny monkeys . . . foremost of monkeys" harīṇām . . . vānaraśreṣṭhaḥ: Cg remarks that, even though Pramāthin is said to be the leader of the tawny monkeys (harīṇāṃ), the poet also describes him as the foremost of monkeys (vānaraśreṣṭhaḥ) in order to dispel the erroneous notion that any difference of species is intended here (harivāhinīmukhyatve 'pi bhinnajātīyatvabhramavyudāsārthaṃ vānaraśreṣṭha ity uktam).

"Mount Uśīrabīja, the equal of Mount Mandara" uśīrabījam . . . parvataṃ mandaropamam: Mount Uśīrabīja is located in North India. See MBh 3.140.1 (uśīrabījaṃ mainākaṃ giriṃ śvetam). Ś1,V1,D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead mandaraṃ parvatottamam, "that best of mountains, Mount Mandara." This rather awkward reading forces translators who follow Ct's text either to see Uśīrabīja and Mandara in apposition (so Dutt 1893, p. 1180; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 76; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 67) or as two different mountains (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1461).

Following 26ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [386*]: "Roaring, he [Pramāthin] attacks the forest deer and trees." There are numerous variants of this verse. The most common vulgate text, that of Ct, reads, "gajān rodhayate vanyān ārujaṃś ca mahīruhān (He [Pramāthin] harasses the forest elephants and smashes the trees)." Cg's variant, which is the most readable, substitutes the critical edition's yodhayate, "fights," for Ct's rodhayati, and reads, "He [Pramāthin] fights the forest elephants and smashes trees."

Following 28ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [387*]: "He [Pramāthin] is the leader of these great bellowing monkeys, who are so powerful[1] and so proud of their strength and valor."

[1]"powerful" balaśālinām: Literally, "endowed with strength." D7,9–11,G1,3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bāhuśālinām, "having [powerful] arms."

29. This verse is somewhat elliptical and follows the northern reading more closely than the southern. In southern manuscripts and printed editions, pādas 29ab are separated by an entire śloka from 29cd. The southern commentators, in general, and some translators understand 29–30, including 387*, to refer to Pramāthin.

29–30ab. "column of dust" rajaḥ: Literally, "dust."

Following 29ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [388*]: "That frenzied army of swift monkeys [is like] red [dust] raised up on all sides by the wind." This verse, too, is elliptical, and the commentators struggle to construe it. Ct and Ck understand that the dust is raised by the army and then scattered by the wind. Cg and Cm think that the dust is raised by the wind but within the army. The southern commentators further understand an implicit relative pronoun yasya, "in whose [army]," so that the object of Rāvaṇa's vision, which resembles a great cloud, is not the army but the monkey leader, Pramāthin himself. This idea is accepted by virtually all translators who follow the text of the southern recension.

30cd–31. "Having witnessed the construction of the bridge" dṛṣṭvā vai setubandhanam: Ck, Cm, and Ct indicate that the langurs attended Nala, the architect of the bridge, as his assistants (nalasamīpe tatsahāyatayā sthitvā—so Ct). Cr argues that it was their leader Gavākṣa who aided in the construction (nalakartṛkasetubandhanasahāyībhūtaṃ gavākṣaṃ nāma).

"swift" mahāvegam: Ñ,B,D9–11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the vocative mahārāja, "O great king, your majesty."

"with their tremendous power" ojasā: Cg argues that what is suggested here is that the members of this particular troop have still greater strength than their troop leader (yūthapatyapekṣayā yūthānāṃ balotsāhādhikyaṃ vyajyate).

31cd is a close variant of 6.17.27cd.

32–34. "Kesarin" kesarī: The Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa apparently knows two Kesarins. For the one here, see 6.4.30; 6.39.26; and 6.60.38. The other Kesarin is, of course, Hanumān's father. See 4.38.17; 4.65.27; 4.66.27; 5.33.73–74; 6.19.11; and 7.35.19. See, too, MBh 3.147.27 and 8.686*. See also Bulcke 1959–1960 and S. Goldman 1999.

"lovely golden mountain" ramye kāñcanaparvate: Cr, Ck, and Ct identify the mountain as Meru or Mahāmeru, the axis mundi. Cm states further that this is the Mount Meru that is situated near the western, or sunset, mountain (astādri) and that is the residence of Manusāvarṇi, the eighth Manu (astādrisamīpavartini sāvarṇinivāsamerau). See 6.48.50; and 6.47.106 and notes.

"great seers" mahātmānaḥ . . . maharṣayaḥ: Literally, "the great, great seers."

"trees . . . bear fruit to gratify every desire" sarvakāmaphaladrumāḥ: Ñ1,B1,3,D5, 9–11,T2,3,G1,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute -kāla-, "time," for -kāma-, "desire." Translators who follow the text of Ct thus give the compound the sense "bearing fruit in all seasons." See 6.4.48; 6.108.12; 6.115.19; and notes.

"He roams about that mountain the color of which is equal to that of the sun" yaṃ sūryatulyavarṇābham anuparyeti parvatam: The reading of the critical edition is quite difficult, as it provides no apparent subject for the verb anuparyeti. Many manuscripts of both the north and the south (Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B3,D5,7,9–11,T1,M1–3), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators replace the first member of the compound, sūrya-, with the nominative singular sūryaḥ, thus yielding the sense "which mountain, the color of itself, the sun circles." This image is, of course, in keeping with the standard notion that Mount Meru is the axis around which the sun revolves. Manuscripts that read with the critical edition here generally supply the nominative singular yaḥ for the critical edition's yam, thus providing a grammatical subject, "who [Kesarin]," for the verb. Our translation has essentially followed this reading, supplying the referent "he [Kesarin]." Virtually no manuscript collated for the critical edition other than G1 seems to have the peculiar sequence of the critical text. Based on the divided nature of the readings, the critical reading probably should have been marked as uncertain. See Sutherland 1992.

"take on that color" bhānti tadvarṇāḥ: Literally, "possessing that color, they shine."

Following verse 33, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [391*]: "On which foremost of mountains, there are trees whose fruit gratifies every desire and that are constantly[1] in fruit. There are also honeys of great worth."

[1]"constantly" sadā: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarve, "all, every," modifying vṛkṣāḥ, "trees."

35. "Of the sixty thousand mountains" ṣaṣṭir girisahasrāṇām: Many manuscripts, as well as the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr, read instead ṣaṣṭir girisahasrāṇi. This reading yields the sense "There are sixty thousand [beautiful golden] mountains."

"stands among them" teṣāṃ madhye: Literally, "in their midst."

36. "These monkeys—tawny, white, red-faced, honey-yellow—" kapilāḥ śvetās tāmrāsyā madhupiṅgalāḥ: Literally, "tawny, white, red-faced, honey-yellow." It is not entirely clear whether the poet intends us to understand that individual monkeys are multicolored or whether the various monkeys are colored differently from one another.

"on that highest of mountains" uttamagirau: This could also mean "on the most excellent of mountains." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead antimagirau, "on the last or most distant mountain."

37. "four great fangs" caturdaṃṣṭrāḥ: Literally, "four-fanged."

"as fierce as Agni Vaiśvānara" vaiśvānarasamāḥ: Literally, "equal to Vaiśvānara." Vaiśvānara is a common kenning for Agni, the fire god. We follow Cg in understanding that the common quality underlying the simile is "fierceness (tadvadugrāḥ)." Cf. note to 6.61.23.

"like venomous serpents inflamed with anger" jvalitāśīviṣopamāḥ: Literally, "similar to flaming, venomous serpents." Again, we agree with Cg, who explains that the monkeys are "enraged like them [the serpents] (tadvatkopanāḥ)."

38. "arching upward" -añcita-: Literally, "curved, arching." We follow the suggestion of Cg, who glosses, "curved upward (udañcita-)." We believe, as Cg probably did, that the resemblance of the monkeys' thick, upraised tails to elephants' trunks is the basis for the simile.

"rutting elephants . . . huge mountains . . . mighty storm clouds" mattamātaṅga- . . . mahāparvata- . . . mahājīmūta-: Cg indicates that these three objects of comparison (upamānas) suggest the monkeys' great size (mattetyādinā mahākāyatvam uktam). Additionally, he notes that the second of the three upamānas suggests "unyieldingness (dārḍhyam)."

Following verse 38, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [394*]: "Terrifying, with terrifying gait and roars,[1] they stand there with their round eyes, yellow and red,[2] glaring at Laṅkā as if they were already smashing it."

[1]"Terrifying, with terrifying gait and roars" bhīmā bhīmagatisvanāḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahābhīmagatisvanāḥ, "with great and terrifying gait and roars."

[2]"with their round eyes, yellow and red" vṛttapiṅgalaraktākṣāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead vṛttapiṅgalanetrā hi, "with round and yellow eyes."

39. "He . . . expects to crush Laṅkā with his own forces." eṣaivāśaṃsate laṅkāṃ svenānīkena marditum: This phrase is repeated at 6.17.24cd and 24cd above, and occurs almost verbatim at 6.17.18cd and 6.17.39cd.

Following verse 39ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [396*], expanding the description of Śatabalin: "That powerful [monkey] eager for victory constantly worships the sun."

Following verse 39, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [398*]: "Courageous and powerful, that heroic tawny monkey is firm in his valor. In his efforts to please Rāma, he would show no concern for his own life.[1]"

[1]"he would show no concern for his own life" prāṇānāṃ dayāṃ na kurute: Literally, "he makes [shows] no mercy for [of] his life breaths." Like most translators, we follow the idea expressed by Cg, who glosses, "with regard to [his own] life breaths (prāṇeṣu)." The phrase could also quite plausibly mean "be merciless to living beings," following Cr, who glosses, "toward living beings (prāṇinām)." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 67) follows Cg's interpretation, translating, "could be pitiless." Compare 6.19.25 and note.

40. "troops" yūthānām: Ś,Ñ,V2,B,D2,3,8–12,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yodhānām, "warriors."

41. "formidable monkeys" vānaraśreṣṭhāḥ: Literally, "best of monkeys."

42. "covering the earth with the mountains they have shattered" pṛthivīm . . . kartuṃ pravidhvastavikīrṇaśailām: Literally, "making the earth one that possesses smashed and scattered mountains."

The meter is indravajrā.

Sarga 19

1. "Then" atha: Cg, citing Amarakośa (3.3.246), suggests that the significance of this common polysemic particle here is that of "completeness." The idea is that Śuka is supplementing the account of Sāraṇa (atha kārtsnyenābravīt).

"he looked out over" ālokayan: Literally, "looking." A large number of southern manuscripts (D5–7,9–11,T,M), and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead ādiśya tat, "pointing out, indicating."

"lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipam: Cg argues that the epithet is used to illustrate the humility with which Sāraṇa addresses his master (savinayoktidyotanāya rākṣasādhipam ity uktam).

2–3. "Those monkeys . . . whom" yān . . . ete: Literally, "those whom."

"along the Ganges" gāṅgeyān: Literally, "belonging to or descended from the Gaṅgā." We follow the commentators, who explain that the reference is to banyan trees growing on the banks of the Ganges (gāṅgeyān gaṅgātaṭotpannān). Ct and Ck note that this usage of the normally āpatyavācaka suffix ḍhak is irregular (anāpatye 'pi ḍhag-ārṣaḥ).

"taking up their positions" sthitān: Literally, "standing."

4. "and there are quadrillions and septillions more" tathā śaṅkusahasrāṇi tathā vṛndaśatāni ca: Literally, "and there are thousands of śaṅkus and also hundreds of vṛndas." The precise meanings of the numerical terms śaṅku and vṛnda vary from one text to another and from lexicon to lexicon. Our reckoning of the numbers follows the definitions in the progressive series of numbers at 411* below (following verse 32). According to this passage, one accepted by all manuscripts, a śaṅku equals one trillion and a vṛnda is ten sextillion (10^{22}). The Śabdakalpadruma, citing the Līlāvatī section of Bhāskara's Siddhāntaśiromaṇi, defines a śaṅku as ten trillion (10^{13}). This is the same number as given in PW (s.v.). Monier-Williams (s.v.), perhaps misreading PW's long string of zeros, understands the term to indicate ten billion (10^{10}), and, in this, he is followed by Apte (s.v.). According to the Śabdakalpadruma, a vṛnda refers to one billion (10^{9}). (Compare Whitney 1889, p. 177). According to PW, a vṛnda is either one hundred billion (10^{11}) or one billion (10^{9}). Monier-Williams (s.v.) agrees, while Apte only cites one billion (10^{9}).

Ct and Ck remind us that the huge numbers mentioned in the verse apply only to the ministers of Sugrīva, as indicated in verse 5 below, while the full tally of the monkey troops will not be given until the end of the sarga (see notes to verse 33 below) (eṣāṃ koṭīti sugrīvasacivasaṃkhyā sarvabalasaṃkhyāṃ tu sargānte vakṣyati—Ct). See, too, notes to 411* following verse 32 below.

5. "followers" -sacivāḥ: Although normally we have translated this term as "ministers," here we follow Cg, who, citing Amarakośa 3.3.205, suggests taking the meaning "ally, follower (sahāya)" in preference to "minister (mantrī)," no doubt because the numbers mentioned here seem high for ministers.

6. "youthful" kumārau: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samānau, "identical, similar."

"looking like gods" devarūpiṇau: Cg does not read this as a compound but instead as the vocative deva, "your majesty," followed by the adjective rūpiṇau, which he interprets as "handsome," by understanding the possessive suffix ini in the sense of matu[p], where that suffix indicates the possession of something to a praiseworthy extent (rūpiṇau praśastarūpau praśaṃsāyāṃ matvarthīya ini pratyayaḥ).

7. "With Brahmā's blessing they have partaken of the nectar of immortality" brahmaṇā samanujñātāv amṛtaprāśināv ubhau: Literally, "permitted by Brahmā, they are eaters of amṛta." The nectar of immortality was brought to the surface during the churning of the ocean. See notes to 6.12.22. We know of no incident of two monkeys drinking amṛta or involved in its churning in the Indian literature. However, on a bas-relief of Angkor Wat (twelfth century) in Cambodia, where the churning of the ocean is represented, one monkey, wearing a tiara of the gods, is shown supporting the snake's tail. Perhaps this is a representation of this scene. See Giteau 1951, p. 154.

Compare pāda d with 6.18.31d above.

8. This verse is not found in a variety of northern and southern manuscripts (V2,B3,4,D5–7,9–11,T,G,M1,2), including the devanāgarī manuscripts of the southern commentators. It is printed in brackets in VSP between verses 7 and 8 of sarga 28, and has no number of its own. KK also brackets the verse [KK 6.28.8] and notes (p. 116, n. 5), "This verse is not found in the older manuscripts but is found only as a latter-day reading. (ayaṃ ślokaḥ prācīnakośeṣu na dṛśyate. auttarāhapāṭha eva dṛśyate.)" Based on the critical evidence, this verse should probably have been omitted following the principles on which the critical edition is based (Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv), or at least marked as a suspicious reading.

9–10. "one who has already come to Laṅkā and sought out Vaidehī and yourself" eṣo 'bhigantā laṅkāyā vaidehyās tava ca: Literally, "this one who approaches Laṅkā, Vaidehī, and you." The agentive noun abhigantā governs the three genitives laṅkāyāḥ, vaidehyāḥ, and tava. But, as noted by Cg, it is used in a somewhat different sense in each case. Thus, Cg notes that, with reference to Sītā, the action referred to is "seeking (anveṣaṇam)," whereas, in the case of Rāvaṇa, it is "meeting [lit., seeing] (darśanam)." (vaidehīpakṣe 'bhigamanam anveṣaṇam. rāvaṇapakṣe darśanam.) B2,D5,7,10,11,T2,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read, instead of the genitive laṅkāyāḥ, the locative laṅkāyām, "in Laṅkā." Ct understands the action to be that of seeking and approaching in all three cases. (eṣa laṅkāyāṃ vaidehyās tava cābhigantānveṣī. samīpam āgataś cety arthaḥ.)

11. "the eldest son of Kesarin" jyeṣṭhaḥ kesariṇaḥ putraḥ: Cs, alone among the commentators, notes that this phrase implies the existence of younger brothers of Hanumān (jyeṣṭha ity anenānye 'py avarajāḥ santīti jñāyate). For Hanumān's father, Kesarin, see MBh 3.147.23ff. See also note to 6.18.34; Bulcke 1959–60; and S. Goldman 1999.

12. "endowed with strength and beauty" balarūpasamanvitaḥ: Cg wants to take -rūpa-, here, "beauty," as a laudatory suffix (praśaṃsāyāṃ rūpap pratyayaḥ) and thus understands the compound to mean "endowed with praiseworthy strength (praśastabalasamanvitaḥ)."

"the ever-moving lord, the wind god" satatagaḥ prabhuḥ: Literally, "the ever-moving lord."

13–15. The childhood exploits of Hanumān are also recounted in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.65.8–28) and in the Uttarakāṇḍa (sarga 35).

"he grew hungry" pipāsitaḥ: Literally, "thirsty." Cg notes that this means "yearning for the breast, which amounts to being hungry. (pipāsitaḥ stanyāpekṣaḥ. kṣudhita iti yāvat.)" D10,11,G1,2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bubhukṣitaḥ, "hungry."

"once, when he . . . swooped down a distance of three thousand leagues" triyojanasahasraṃ tu adhvānam avatīrya hi . . . puraiṣaḥ: Literally, "he formerly . . . having descended a three thousand league path." The direction of Hanumān's leap is a matter of some dispute. In the poem's other versions of this story (4.65.8–28; 7.35), the infant leaps up, as one would expect, in his effort to grasp the sun, and, indeed, Cr, reading pupluve for the critical edition's puraiṣaḥ, explains, "avatīrya [lit., 'having descended'], that is, having leapt up; he leapt, that is, he went to a higher elevation by means of his upward leap (avatīryotplutya pupluva utplavanenordhvadeśaṃ jagāma)." Cg, however, offers two explanations. According to the first, we are to take the gerund avatīrya, "having descended," literally. For the child Hanumān, living in his father's home at the summit of the Golden Mountain (Mount Meru), around the middle elevation of which the sun revolves, would naturally have to swoop down to reach that luminous body. (hanumatpituḥ kesariṇaḥ kanakācalavāsitvāt tasya cātyunattatvād ity asya tacchikharasya ca madhyamād vā trisahasrayojanaparimita ity uktam. ata evāvatīryety uktaṃ na tūtpatyeti.) Cs simply understands that Hanumān got down from his mother's hip [where he would have been carried] (avatīrya mātur utsaṅgāt). Cg's alternative explanation, which is shared by Cm, implicitly accepts the idea of Hanumān's leaping upward, but only if we take the number three thousand to stand figuratively for many thousands of yojanas, since, as he argues, the sun is, in fact, a hundred thousand yojanas from the earth. The idea evidently is that, if we take the number three thousand literally, then it would not be appropriate to think of an upward leap, since the sun is so much more distant than that (yadvādityasya bhūmer upari lakṣayojanāntaratvāt triyojanasahasram ity etad anekasahasropalakṣaṇam). In the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa version of the story, the distance to the sun is reckoned as three hundred leagues (yojanas), although the commentators Crā, Cm, and Cg also take this as a figurative illusion to a vastly greater distance. See 4.65.20 and note. At 7.35.29, Hanumān is said to have traversed "many thousand of yojanas (bahuyojanasahasram)." Cs similarly takes the number three thousand figuratively. (triyojanasahasram. upalakṣaṇam etat.)

"my hunger shall not return" na me kṣut pratiyāsyati: The idea here, as Ct explains, is that we should understand the words "for earthly fruits (bhūlokavartiphalair iti śeṣaḥ)," that is, having swallowed the heavenly fruit of the sun, Hanumān expects that he will no longer require earthly food. Cr has much the same idea.

"failing to reach" anāsādya: Cg feels that one should supply the words "because of its blazing energy" in order to explain Hanumān's failure actually to reach the sun, arguing on the basis of the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa version where it explicitly states that the monkey was driven off by the sun's brilliance (4.65.20). (anāsādyety atra tattejasety upaskāryam. tejasā tasya nirdhūta iti kiṣkindhākāṇḍokteḥ.) He notes, however, that in the Uttarakāṇḍa version, it is a blow of Indra's vajra that causes Hanumān's fall (7.35.46–47) (yady apy uttarakāṇḍa indravajreṇa patanam uktam). See verse 12 below and notes. Cg sees no real contradiction here, noting that we should understand that Indra's attack is merely an additional reason for Hanumān's failure to reach the sun (tathāpi tad api hetvantaram iti jñeyam). Cs argues that we should supply the phrase "because of Indra's vajra (anāsādya patita indravajrād iti śeṣaḥ)."

"who is beyond the reach" anādhṛṣyatamam: Literally, "most unassailable."

"upon the mountain from behind which the sun rises" bhāskarodayane girau: The reference is to the easternmost mountain, which is often viewed as the point from which both the sun and the moon rise.

16. "One of . . . jaws" hanur ekā: Cg glosses tālupradeśa, "the region of the palate," by which we understand him to refer to the upper jaw. The Uttarakāṇḍa (7.35.47) and Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.65.22) versions of this story further specify that the break is on the left side.

"slightly broken as he fell on the stone surface" patitasya . . . śilātale . . . kiṃcid bhinnā: This account of the breaking of Hanumān's jaw agrees more or less with those given in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.65.21–22) and Uttarakāṇḍa (7.35.46–47), although in both of these other versions, Hanumān is knocked from the sky by Indra's vajra.

"toughened his jaw [hanu], he came to be known as Hanumān, he of the powerful jaw" dṛḍhahanor hanūmān eṣa tena vai: Literally, "[of that monkey] who has a firm jaw, . . . because of that, he is Hanumān." The idea here appears to be that, with the healing of the fracture, Hanumān's jawbone has become somewhat thickened or strengthened (dṛḍha). The resulting visible anatomical anomaly becomes the basis for the monkey's name, on the understanding, as Cr suggests, that we are to take the possessive suffix -mant as laudatory (praśastārthako 'tra matup), yielding the sense "he of the large or powerful jaw." Ś,Ñ1,V3,B4,D6,8–13,T2,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the nominative dṛḍhahanuḥ for the critical edition's genitive singular dṛḍhahanoḥ.

17. "on the basis of this authoritative account" āgamayogena: The phrase is obscure and ambiguous. The commentators have understood it in different ways, and these interpretations are reflected in the various translations we have consulted. Our translation is based largely on the first of Cg's two alternative explanations [= Cm], although we recognize that the interpretations offered by Ct, Ck, and Cr do not contradict this. What Cg and Cm argue is that we are to understand the term āgama in its sense of "authoritative discourse (āptavākyam)," the term yoga in its sense of "means or method (upāyaḥ)," and the compound āgamayogena as an appositional karmadhāraya in the sense of "by means of an authoritative account." The reference, it would appear, is to the narrative of Hanumān's childhood, which Sāraṇa has just repeated, and the implication, we imagine, is that he recognizes Hanumān by his large jaw. Cg's second interpretation is that one should read the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying the instrumental pronoun mayā, "by me," which, he argues, we are to read in place of the text's mama. The sense of the verse would then become, "Even though I have heard an authoritative account (āptavākyaśravaṇena mayā), I am still unable to describe [him]." Ct and Ck take the compound as an instrumental of accompaniment, the sense of which is "along with the previous account, which provides the reason for Hanumān's name (hanumannāmanimittabhūtapūrvavṛttāntena saha)," by which they appear to mean "I know that monkey along with the previous account." Again, the idea is probably that Hanumān is recognizable by his jaw. Cr understands the compound quite differently. He takes āgama- in its root sense of "to come," seeing it as a reference to those monkeys, etc., who have come into the presence of Sāraṇa. He glosses -yogaḥ as yojana, which he takes somewhat idiosyncratically to mean kathana, "story, narrative." He thus understands, "I know this monkey on the basis of the story told to me by those monkeys who came into my presence (āgamināṃ matsamīpe prāptānām)." Gorresio, on the basis of his text, which reads, "ity evāgamayuktena mayaiṣa vidito hariḥ" (6.4.18), translates, "Io ben conobbe quel scimio, allor ch'ei qui venne" (Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 208), evidently, like Cr, understanding āgama- in the sense of "to come or approach (venne)." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 365, n. 98) remarks that the commentator (Cl) offers three or four alternative explanations of the phrase, one of which is to take the adjective āgamayuktena as modifying an implicit hanumatā, "by Hanumān," the sense being, "by the fact of this Hanumān's having already come here to Laṅkā (ihaiva laṅkāyām āgamayuktena hanumatāgamanayogena)." Gorresio goes on to say that he was attracted to this interpretation as it seems the most reasonable to him. But he acknowledges that the passage is susceptible to other interpretations.

"With his tremendous power, he expects to crush Laṅkā all by himself." eṣa āśaṃsate laṅkām eko marditum ojasā: Compare 6.17.18cd; 6.17.24cd; 6.17.39ef; 6.18.24cd; and 6.18.39cd.

Following verse 17, D7,9–12, KK (in brackets), and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of two lines [405*]: "He is the one who recently set a blazing smoke-bannered fire to your Laṅkā. How could you have forgotten that monkey?"

18–21. "dark, lotus-eyed" śyāmaḥ padmanibhekṣaṇaḥ: Cg, waxing somewhat poetic here, glosses śyāmaḥ, "dark," as "possessing a body as desirable as a black cloud perched upon a mountain of gold (kanakamayaśikharārūḍhakālāmbudakamanīyavigrahaḥ)." This is evidently an allusion to Rāma's being seated, in Cg's view, on the shoulders of Hanumān. He glosses padmanibhekṣaṇaḥ, "lotus-eyed," as "possessing eyes as desirable as full-blown lotuses growing in the great lotus pond, which is his divine body (divya-vigrahamahātaṭākasthavikasitakamalalobhanīyavilocanaḥ)."

"next to him" yaś caiṣo 'nantaraḥ: Literally, "the one who is next." A number of northern and southern manuscripts substitute a reading incorporating the genitive asya (yas tv asya) (Ś,V1,3,D0–4,8,12,13) or yasya (yasyaiṣaḥ) (B2,D10,11,G2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Cm, Ck, and Ct) for the yaś caiṣo of the critical edition (and Cg) referring to Hanumān. The notion that Rāma is next to Hanumān is, in any case, implicit. Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cm see Rāma as merely standing close to Hanumān, while Cg, evidently alluding to references at 315* and 6.4.15,28, understands that Rāma is actually seated on Hanumān's shoulders.

"the great chariot-warrior of the Ikṣvākus" ikṣvākūṇām atirathaḥ: Cg feels Sāraṇa is saying that Rāvaṇa should understand that Rāma is a truly invincible chariot-warrior, unlike his ancestor Anaraṇya [whom Rāvaṇa defeated]. (anaraṇyādivad ayaṃ na mantavyaḥ. kimtv ikṣvākūṇāṃ madhye 'tiratho 'tiśayitarathaḥ. aparājitaratha ity arthaḥ.) See Uttarakāṇḍa 19. Cf. 6.47.17.

"His righteousness never wavers" yasmin na calate dharmaḥ: Literally, "in whom dharma never moves." Cg sees this as an illustration that Rāma did not swerve from his duty, even when people such as Jābāli tried to confuse him (jābāliprabhṛtibhir ākulito 'py aprakampitaḥ). See Ayodhyākāṇḍa 100–101.

"nor does he ever transgress it" yo dharmaṃ nātivartate: Literally, "who does not exceed dharma." Cg illustrates this virtue by noting that Rāma did not deviate from his righteous adherence to his father's word and his own vow to live as a muni despite being pressed to do so by Bharata, Sītā, and so on (bharatasītādibhiḥ kṛte 'pi pratibandhe pitṛvacanamunipratijñādharmaṃ nātivartate). See Ayodhyākāṇḍa 96. Cg further attempts to demonstrate that Rāma does not depart from kṣatriyadharma by claiming that he gave ground in his battle with Khara only in order to find room for the flight of his arrows (3.27ff.) and that he killed Vālin from ambush only in order to carry out his vow to his suppliant [Sugrīva] (4.18.26–27). (kharayuddhe 'pasarpaṇaṃ bāṇapātāvakāśalābhārtham. chadmanā vālivadhas tv anyathānupapattyāvaśyam āśritaviṣayapratijñāyā nirvoḍhavyatayā ca.)

"Foremost among those who know the vedas" vedavidāṃ varaḥ: Cg explains this as "foremost among those who know the meaning of the vedas" and notes that Rāma is superior in this regard even to his own teachers, Vasiṣṭha, etc. (vedārthavidāṃ vara upadeṣṭṛbhyo vasiṣṭhādibhyo 'py utkṛṣṭaḥ).

"he knows . . . Brahmā's divine weapon-spell" brāhmam astram . . . veda: Literally, "he knows the astra of Brahmā." Cg observes that, even though knowledge of the mantra controlling the brahmāstra is included in the vedas, it is mentioned separately to indicate its importance in this context (brahmāstramantrasya vedāntargatatve 'pi prādhānyāt pṛthaguktiḥ). See notes to 5.36.26 and 6.35.5.

"might rend the heavens" bhindyād gaganam: Literally, "he might split the sky." Cg interprets this to mean that Rāma might destroy objects, such as flying chariots, etc., located in the sky (gaganasthavimānādi). Ct, Ck, and Cm see the point of this phrase as demonstrating that what is impossible [for others] is easily feasible for Rāma (sarvaduṣkaram api tasya sukaram iti tātparyam—so Ct).

"shatter the mountains" parvatāṃś cāpi dārayet: The word parvatān, "mountains," is marked as uncertain by the critical editors. Collated manuscripts, including the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr, as well as the printed editions of Gorresio

(6.4.22) and Lahore (6.4.21), show a variety of variant readings, many of which substitute a word for the earth, such as vasudhām, medinīm, or pṛthivīm.

"His wrath is like that of Mṛtyu" yasya mṛtyor iva krodhaḥ: Cr interprets this to mean that, "[but] when it comes to killing those enemies who have sought refuge with him, [Rāma's] unavoidable wrath is held in check (śaraṇāgataripuvidhvaṃsane gṛhītānivāryakopa ity arthaḥ)."

22–23. "standing to his right" dakṣiṇe pārśve: Literally, "on his right side." This is the position conventionally assigned to Lakṣmaṇa in painted and sculptural representations of Rāma and his court.

"the one with a complexion as radiant as pure jāmbūnada gold" śuddhajāmbūnadaprabhaḥ: Literally, "with the radiance of pure jāmbūnada gold." Note the often-stressed contrast between fair Lakṣmaṇa and dark Rāma. See Goldman 1980. On jāmbūnada gold, see also note to 6.15.2.

"reddened eyes" tāmrākṣaḥ: Cg suggests that Lakṣmaṇa's eyes are reddened "with anger toward you [i.e., Rāvaṇa] (tvadviṣayakopena)." See note to 6.31.72. See, too, 5.8.5–9; 5.8.25 and notes; 5.47.1; and 5.48.2.

"his brother . . . as dear to him as life itself" bhrātā prāṇasamaḥ priyaḥ: Compare the similar expression in verse 24 and note below. A few devanāgarī manuscripts (D7,9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead bhrātuḥ priyahite rataḥ, "devoted to his brother's welfare (hita) and service (priya)."

"adept in all the śāstras" sarvaśāstraviśāradaḥ: A few manuscripts, including the devanāgarī manuscripts and the printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr, read instead sarvasastrabhṛtāṃ varaḥ, "foremost among all who bear weapons." Cg thinks that the word śāstra here indicates scientific texts above and beyond the science of statecraft (śāstraśabdo nītiśāstravyatiriktaparaḥ).

24. "Implacable" amarṣī: Cr explains, "lacking forgiveness toward those who offend against Rāma (rāmāparādhiṣu kṣamārahitaḥ)."

"intelligent" buddhimān: D9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead ca jayī, "and victorious," which is redundant with the term jetā, "victor," in pāda a.

"like another life breath constantly moving outside his body" nityaṃ prāṇo bahiścaraḥ: Literally, "a breath constantly moving externally." Cg argues that the phrase is expressive of Lakṣmaṇa's role as the protector of [Rāma's] life (prāṇasaṃrakṣakatvam ucyate). A similar description of Lakṣmaṇa is found in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.17.17): "like another life breath outside [his body] (bahiḥ prāṇa ivāparaḥ)." The present verse is found also in the Araṇyakāṇḍa. See 3.32.13 and note ad loc.

25. "He would give his own life" na . . . jīvitaṃ parirakṣati: Literally, "he does not protect life." Compare the expression in 398* (see note above to 6.18.39).

26. "surrounded by a group of rākṣasas" rakṣogaṇaparikṣiptaḥ: Ck, Ct, Cg, and Cm, whom we follow, understand the verb pari √kṣip in one of its principal meanings, namely,"surround, encircle" and observe that we are to understand the term gaṇa, "host, troop," to refer to Vibhīṣaṇa's four rākṣasa companions mentioned at 6.10.12 above (see also note to 6.11.3). Cg, cognizant of the irony of referring to four individuals as a host, observes that the term is used here because the four are as mighty as a whole host (caturṇām eva rakṣasāṃ gaṇatulyavikramatvāt tathoktam). Cr and Cs take the participle in its other principal sense of "thrown out, rejected." Thus, Cr and Cs (second explanation) interpret, "abandoned or expelled by the rākṣasa hosts (rakṣogaṇaiḥ parikṣiptas tyaktaḥ)." Cs alternatively proposes reading rakṣogaṇa- as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "he who possesses hosts of rākṣasas" and thus as a kenning for Rāvaṇa. The sense, according to him, would then be "cast out by the lord of the rākṣasa hosts, i.e., you, Rāvaṇa." The ambiguity of parikṣiptaḥ is avoided, perhaps intentionally, in the north, where, for example, Gorresio's text substitutes rakṣogaṇavṛto bhrātā, "[your] brother surrounded by a group of rākṣasas" (6.4.27 = Lahore 6.4.27).

"none other than" hi: Cg and Cm observe that this emphatic particle, the eleventh syllable of the verse, serves as the sixteenth syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra, which is believed to be inscribed throughout the text of the poem. See note to 6.1.1.

"King" rājā: The question of Vibhīṣaṇa's kingship is a delicate one. Cs, reading ahead to verse 27, where it is indicated that Vibhīṣaṇa has already been consecrated to the throne of Laṅkā, observes that Sāraṇa, by using the word "king" in connection with Vibhīṣaṇa, is suggesting that Rāvaṇa has been deposed (tucchīkṛtaḥ, literally, "made void, diminished"). See note to verse 27 below. See 6.13.7–9 and notes. See, too, notes to 6.100.9.

27. "consecrated as king of Laṅkā" laṅkāyām abhiṣecitaḥ: Literally, "caused to be consecrated in Laṅkā." The issue of Vibhīṣaṇa's consecration is somewhat confusing here. Although Vibhīṣaṇa has been consecrated as king of Laṅkā in sarga 13, that consecration seems to be somewhat provisional. Vibhīṣaṇa's formal and uncontested installation on the throne can only take place after the death of his brother. Thus, the formal consecration will not take place until sarga 100. Cr, in an apparent effort to reconcile the seeming contradiction, describes Vibhīṣaṇa here as merely "desirous of the kingship of Laṅkā (eṣa laṅkārājyaviṣayakecchāvān)." Cg offers two readings: "[consecrated] at a ceremony in Laṅkā (laṅkāyāṃ nimitte)" (cf. MBh 12.61.6 for a similar use of nimitta) or "[consecrated] as king in Laṅkā (construing with rājā in verse 26 above) (laṅkāyāṃ rājeti vānvayaḥ)."

"by the majestic king of kings" śrīmatā rājarājena: The reference is, of course, to Rāma. Cg explains the adjective śrīmatā as meaning that "Rāma does not desire the kingship of Laṅkā for himself, as he already has accomplished all his desires (avāptasamastakāmatvena laṅkārājyānabhilāṣiṇā)." With regard to the title "king of kings," Cg explains, "Rāma realizes that unless he installs Vibhīṣaṇa and others [as lesser kings], he will not be able to attain the position of king of kings (vibhīṣaṇādirājyatvānirvāhe svasya rājarājatvaṃ na nirvahed iti manvānena)."

28. "in their midst" madhye: Cg understands this to mean that Sugrīva is standing between Rāma and Vibhīṣaṇa (rāmavibhīṣaṇayor madhye).

"The one whom . . . is Sugrīva" yam: Literally, "whom." The proper name Sugrīva has been added.

29. "In . . . intelligence" buddhyā: Literally, "with intelligence." Cg glosses, "knowledge that takes the form of thorough logical consideration (ūhāpoharūpajñānena)."

"In . . . knowledge" jñānena: Literally, "with knowledge." Cg glosses, "knowledge born of [the study of] the śāstras (śāstrajanyajñānena)." Ñ,V,B,D0–4,6,7,9–11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead balena, "with strength, power."

"all other mountains" parvatān: Literally, "mountains."

30. "densely forested" sagahanadrumām: Literally, "with dense trees." Cr glosses, "with densely [planted] trees (nibiḍadrumasahitām)."

"the . . . cavern Kiṣkindhā" kiṣkindhām . . . guhām: See 4.25.7; 4.26.1–3; 4.32.4–8, etc., where Kiṣkindhā is described as a cave. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead durgām, "inaccessible," which is redundant with the same term in pāda c.

"which is hidden in a mountain fastness" parvatadurgasthām: Literally, "situated in an inaccessible mountain location."

31. "necklace" mālā: This is the necklace that Vālin was given by his father, Indra, and that he puts on prior to his battle with Dundubhi (see 4.11.37ff. and notes). As is made clear at 4.17.4–8, the necklace functions as a kind of life index of its owner, so that Vālin cannot die so long as he wears it (see notes ad loc.). Just before his death, Vālin, mortally wounded by Rāma, confers the necklace upon Sugrīva, telling him that the Goddess Śrī, who abides in it, will depart from him upon his [Vālin's] death (4.22.16–19 and notes). The idea is that Vālin is transferring the splendor of royalty, rājyaśrī, to his brother as the new owner of the necklace.

Cg remarks that since Lakṣmī, who resides in the necklace, is the goddess of valor, vīralakṣmī, a person wearing it can never be defeated. He further notes that it is well known that Vālin always wore the necklace, and it is for that reason that Rāma had to shoot him from ambush. (lakṣmīr vīralakṣmīḥ. taddhāraṇe kadācid api parājayo na bhavatīti sadā vālī tāṃ vahati smeti prasiddhiḥ. taddhāraṇād eva hi rāmas tad anabhimukha eva vālinaṃ hatavān.) The reasoning, although not made explicit here, is that, according to Cg at 4.11.37, Indra had promised Vālin that, so long as he wore the necklace, he would acquire the strength of anyone who might approach him in battle. The implication is that, by not approaching Vālin face to face in equal combat, Rāma was able to negate the power of the necklace. See notes to 4.11.37. See R. Goldman 1997 and 2003a.

"Lakṣmī herself, coveted by gods and men" kāntā devamanuṣyāṇām . . . lakṣmīḥ: The reference here is probably to rājyaśrī or rājyalakṣmī, the incarnate goddess of royal splendor. However, Cg's gloss, vīralakṣmī, is also quite plausible. The syntax of the verse allows for a certain ambiguity. One could also interpret, "Lakṣmī herself resides in it [the necklace], and it is thus coveted by gods and men." In fact, some commentators and several translators construe the adjective kāntā, "desired, coveted," with mālā, "necklace." Cr, for example, does so but reads the compound devamanuṣyāṇām with lakṣmī, yielding the sense "Lakṣmī, the goddess of the fortunes of gods and men, resides in that coveted necklace." See Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1465), Dutt (1893, p. 1183), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 69), who all construe kāntā with mālā.

32. "Sugrīva acquired . . . through Rāma, who had slain Vālin" sugrīvo vālinaṃ hatvā rāmeṇa pratipāditaḥ: There is a difference of opinion as to how to construe the syntax here. According to Cg, whom we follow, the participle pratipāditaḥ should be understood as a causative with the sense of prāpitaḥ, "caused to obtain." In this reading, rāmeṇa is the subject both of the causative participle and the gerund hatvā, while Sugrīva is the subject of the simplex, pra $\sqrt{āp}$. According to Cr, however, we are to read the causative participle as the simplex in the sense of prāptaḥ, "acquired," and the simplex gerund hatvā as the causal ghātayitvā, "having caused to kill." According to this reading, the syntax would be "Sugrīva obtained . . . after having gotten Rāma to kill Vālin."

Following verse 32, all manuscripts and printed editions, southern and northern, read a passage of seven lines [411*], in which the astronomical numbers that are used to enumerate the monkeys are defined in sequence. Despite the abruptness of the narrative transition, it is not clear to us on what grounds this passage has been relegated to the critical apparatus: "Learned men refer to one hundred hundred thousands as a koṭi [ten million = 10^7]. One hundred thousand koṭis is called a śaṅku [one trillion = 10^{12}]. One hundred thousand śaṅkus is a mahāśaṅku [one hundred quadrillion = 10^{17}]. One hundred thousand mahāśaṅkus is said to be a vṛnda [ten sextillion = 10^{22}]. One hundred thousand vṛndas is known as a mahāvṛnda [one octillion = 10^{27}]. One hundred thousand mahāvṛndas is a padma [one hundred nonillion = 10^{32}]. One hundred thousand padmas is known as mahāpadma [ten undecillion = 10^{37}]." We are using the standard American terms for numbers over one million, as listed in Merriam Webster's Collegiate Dictionary (10th ed., 1993, p. 798). Note that these numbers do not correspond to the definitions given in Whitney (1889, pp. 177–78) and in the lexicons, nor do they necessarily reflect the numbers used in other passages.

Following 411*, many manuscripts (B2,3,D5–7,9–11,S except G1) insert an additional passage of three lines [412*] in which the sequence of astronomical numbers is continued: "One hundred thousand mahāpadmas is called a kharva [one tredecillion = 10^{42}]. One hundred thousand kharvas is called a samudra [one hundred quattuordecillion = 10^{47}]. And one hundred thousand samudras is known as a mahaugha [ten sexdecillion = 10^{52}]."

Compare, too, 4.37.30–32 and notes; 6.17.27; and 416* (at note to 6.19.33).

33. "accompanied by one hundred trillion, ten billion troops" evaṃ koṭisahasreṇa śaṅkūnāṃ ca śatena ca: Literally, "and with a thousand koṭis and a hundred śaṅkus." Our calculation of the number here is based on our understanding that a śaṅku is one trillion (see 411* above). Another possible way of construing the line would be "and with one hundred and one thousand koṭis of śaṅkus." This would yield a total of 10^{37}, that is, ten undecillion monkeys. This is the number referred to in 411* as a mahāpadma.

Following 33ab, D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of six lines [416*], which is a description of the hosts accompanying Sugrīva: "He is surrounded by Vibhīṣaṇa and his rākṣasa companions, and by a mahaugha of koṭis [of monkeys] resembling the ocean, and there are, in addition, a thousand mahāśaṅkus, a hundred vṛndas, a thousand mahāvṛndas, a hundred padmas, a thousand mahāpadmas, and a hundred kharvas." The astronomical total can be calculated on the basis of the terms given in the preceding note. Compare, too, 4.37.30–32 and notes; 6.17.27; and 411* (at notes to 6.19.32) above.

Following verse 33, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [418*] in which the description of Sugrīva is extended: "Possessing enormous strength and valor, he is always surrounded by a huge army."

34. "like some baleful planet" prajvalitagrahopamām: Literally, "like a blazing planet." Ct, Ck, and Cm explain, "resembling the glare of a blazing planet (prajvalitagrahajvālopamām)." Cg, whom we follow, glosses, "resembling a malign planet (krūragrahopamām)." Ck also offers the possibility of reading graha, "planet," as etymologically synonymous with vigraha, "strife, battle," in which case one might read the adjective to mean "like a blazing battle itself." Cf. 6.90.27; 6.114.21; and notes.

"so that you may be victorious and not suffer defeat at the hands of your enemies" yathā jayaḥ syān na paraiḥ parājayaḥ: Literally, "so that there would be victory not defeat by enemies." Cg, evidently regarding Sāraṇa's remarks to be somewhat ironic given the overwhelming host he has just described, comments, "What is suggested here is that 'you should make an effort such that you do not attain victory but rather suffer defeat at the hands of your enemies' (yathā jayo na syāt pratyuta paraiḥ parājaya eva syāt tathā yatnaḥ kriyatām iti dhvanyate)."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 20

1–3. "Rāvaṇa looked out upon . . . He saw" dṛṣṭvā . . . rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "having seen . . . Rāvaṇa."

"somewhat shaken at heart, yet flaring up with anger" kiṃcid āvignahṛdayo jātakrodhaś ca: Ct, Ck, and Cm feel that Rāvaṇa's display of anger toward his agents is intended to cover the visible signs of the fear he experiences when he sees the formidable enemy facing him (svakīyabhītākāragopanārtho 'yaṃ vyāpāraḥ—so Ct). Cg claims that Rāvaṇa's anger arises from his having heard his enemies praised (parastavākarṇanena kupita ity arthaḥ).

Following verse 2, D5,7,9–11,T1,2,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of four lines [419*] in which the list of Rāvaṇa's enemies is extended: "[He saw] Gaja, Gavākṣa, Śarabha, Mainda, Dvivida, mighty Aṅgada, the son of the son of Indra, wielder of the vajra, valorous Hanumān, invincible Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, Kumuda, Nīla, and that bull among monkeys, Nala."

4. "hanging their heads" adhomukhau: Literally, "with faces down or with lowered faces."

5. "utterly inappropriate" na tāvat sadṛśaṃ nāma: Literally, "not appropriate at all." Cr takes the emphatic adverb nāma to mean "it is well known that . . . (nāma prasiddham etat)." Cg amplifies this by saying that it indicates that this principle is well established in nītiśāstra (nāmeti nītiśāstraprasiddhiḥ). Cr reads the adverb tāvat, which we have treated as pleonastic, as part of an elliptical clausal structure with the sense "To the extent that it is [at all] unpleasant (yāvad apriyam), it is wholly unpleasant (tāvat sakalam apriyam)." Cg reads it adverbially, in the sense of "firstly (prathamataḥ)."

"when he is able" vibhoḥ: We agree with Cr and Cg [who gloss the synonymous variant prabhoḥ] in taking this term in its sense of "capable (samarthasya—Cr; śaktasya—Cg)," as opposed to reading it nominally in its sense of "lord, master," which would, in any case, make it more or less redundant with nṛpateḥ, "king's," in pāda c.

"punish or imprison" nigrahapragrahe: We follow the normal lexical meaning of this compound, which would be something like "arrest and imprison." Our understanding is that Rāvaṇa, as the context makes clear, intends to menace rather than cajole his ministers. And the dvandva (recorded as two words in the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck) may be seen as yet another of those common epic pairs of synonyms or near synonyms that we have noted elsewhere. See note to 6.2.14. Our interpretation, however, is directly counter to the unanimous opinion of the southern commentators, who gloss anugrahaḥ, "grace, favor, reward," for pragraha. This gloss is similarly apparent in virtually all northern manuscripts, including the editions of Lahore (6.5.5) and Gorresio (6.5.5), which actually read nigrahānugrahe. Cf. note to verse 9 below.

6. "How fitting" sadṛśaṃ nāma: Literally, "fitting indeed." Commentators are divided as to how to read Rāvaṇa's seemingly anomalous declaration. Ct, Cs, and Ck, whom we are inclined to follow, see the statement as sarcastic or, more specifically, as an example of the rhetorical device kāku, in which a speaker uses a change in the inflection of the voice to suggest a meaning diametrically opposed to what is actually stated. Cr, Cg, and Cm read the emphatic nāma here as an interrogative marker, turning the statement into a rhetorical question, "Is it proper?"

"at so inopportune a moment" aprastave: We follow the interpretations of Cr (prasaṅgarahitasamaye), Cg (anavasare), and Cm (stutyanarhakāle). Ct, Ck, and Cs, on the other hand, interpret the expression to mean "without having been asked to do so (praśnābhāve—Ct, Ck; tadviṣayakapraśnābhāve—Cs)." Ck and Ct elaborate on this idea, explaining that here Rāvaṇa is saying that Śuka and Sāraṇa were sent out only to discover who the monkey troop leaders were and how many troops they had and should have confined their remarks to these subjects alone. Moreover, they remark that the meaning here is that it was inappropriate for the spies, without being asked about the [monkeys'] power, to have suggested, as they did, that each individual [monkey] was capable of destroying Laṅkā on his own. (ke yūthapāḥ kiyad balam iti vicārya vaktavyam iti preṣite tāvanmātraṃ vācyam aprṣṭaṃ tu teṣāṃ prābalyam ekaiko nāśayituṃ śakta ityādi vaktuṃ na yuktam ity arthaḥ.)

"enemies . . . in such a menacing fashion" ripūṇāṃ pratikūlānām: Literally, "[my] hostile enemies." Cs and Cr explain this tautology by defining the adjective as "whose conduct [and character—so Cr] is so wrongful (viruddhācaraṇaśīlānām—Cr; viruddhācaraṇavatām—Cs)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 81), perhaps mistaking the element kūla in pratikūla for kula, "family, race," translates, "des ennemis de race étrangère." In this he is followed, as so often is the case, by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 71), "the foe belonging to an alien race." Pagani (1999, p. 937) similarly renders, "ces étrangers hostiles."

"to make war upon me" yuddhārtham: Literally, "for the sake of battle."

7. "teachers, parents, and elders" ācāryā guravo vṛddhāḥ: The polysemic term guru, "teacher, spiritual guide, parent, elder, etc.," overlaps in meaning, on the one hand, with ācārya, "teacher," and, on the other, with vṛddha, "elder." The commentators are at pains to differentiate these potential synonyms. The most elaborate of these efforts is that of Cm, who defines ācāryas as "one's teachers of the veda and vedāṅgas up until the upanayana ceremony of initiation (upanayanapūrvakaṃ sāṅgavedādhyāpakāḥ)," gurus as "fathers, etc. (pitrādayaḥ)," and vṛddhas as "those who are advanced both in learning and in age (jñānavayovṛddhāḥ)." Ct agrees but with minor modifications. Cg, however, takes ācāryas to be "instructors in the science of politics (nītiśāstropadeṣṭāraḥ)," gurus to be "distinguished or eminent persons (mahantaḥ)," and vṛddhas to be "those endowed with knowledge, age, and virtue (jñānavayaḥśīlasaṃpannāḥ)." Cs notes that, although one's principal guru is one's biological father (niṣekakṛn mukhyaḥ), the term can also be used, as he thinks it is here, to refer to one's "secondary fathers," as it were, that is, one's paternal uncles, etc. (tadbhrātrādyā amukhyāḥ).

Elsewhere in the literature, the titles ācārya and guru, along with a third common term for teacher, upādhyāya, are either differentiated as to the type of teacher or used interchangeably to refer to one's teacher. See, for example, Vāsiṣṭhadharmaśāstra 3.21–23 and ManuSm 2.141,142. See, too, S. K. Sharma 1996, pp. 24–47; and Kane 1941–1975, vol. 4, pp. 323, 361.

"which should govern your conduct" anujīvyam: Literally, "in accordance with which one should live."

8. "Or even if you had once learned it, you failed to fully comprehend it." gṛhīto vā na vijñātaḥ: The commentators are divided as to how to understand this and other portions of this somewhat ambiguous verse. Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the word gṛhītaḥ in the sense of "learned, understood (jñātaḥ)" and the phrase na vijñātaḥ to mean "completely forgotten (atyantaṃ vismṛta ity arthaḥ)." For them the sense would be "and even if you did learn it, you have completely forgotten it." Ck appears to see the two terms as synonymous, and he explains, "Either one of the words gṛhīta or vijñāta would be sufficient; the surplus word can be chucked into the sea. (tatraikena paryāptaṃ gṛhītapadena vijñātapadena vā. adhikaṃ padaṃ tu samudre prakṣiptam.) The sense is that they did not reflect on [what they learned] (tad vicaraṇaṃ na kṛtam)." Cg interprets, "If you had grasped the meaning, you did not really understand it, that is, you have forgotten it. (gṛhīto vārtho na vijñāto na viśeṣeṇa jñātaḥ. vismṛta ity arthaḥ.)" Cm, whom we more or less follow, understands, "Even if you learned it by rote [abhyastaḥ], you did not reflect upon it properly, since you did not consider what was proper (gṛhīto vābhyasto 'pi na vijñāta aucityaparyālocanayā samyañ na cintitaḥ)."

"You carry your education as mere mental baggage." bhāro jñānasya vohyate: Literally, "A burden of knowledge is borne." The commentators belonging to the two vulgate subrecensions are divided as to how to understand this sequence. Ct and Cr read the variant bhāro 'jñānasya vāhyate, "A burden of ignorance is carried," [reading the causative vāhyate for the simplex uhyate] and interpret it to mean "You bear a great burden of ignorance, the sense being you have not one whit of knowledge (ajñānabāhulyam eva vartate na jñānaleśo'pīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct)." The remaining commentators (Cg, Crā, Cm, Cv) read with the critical edition (bhāro jñānasya vohyate). Crā, however, takes the phrase jñānasya bhāraḥ as the modificand of the participle gṛhītaḥ and explains the resulting clause as, "You did not properly take away (gṛḥītaḥ) the burden of knowledge from the presence of your guru. (jñānasya bhāro na gṛhītaḥ. guroḥ sakāśāt samyañ na gṛhītaḥ.)" Cg offers two alternative explanations: 1) "Although this knowledge was produced, it did not result in any practical application (jātam apı̣ jñānaṃ nānuṣṭhānaparyavasāyīty arthaḥ)"; or 2) "Although you pride yourselves on the weightiness of your knowledge, it does not produce any results. (yadvā jñānasya bhāra uhyate. jñānabhārabharaṇābhimāna eva kriyate na tu tatkāryam ity arthaḥ.)" Cm understands jñāna to refer to the scientific texts, which are the means to acquire knowledge (jñānasādhanasya śāstrasya). Cv understands the expression to mean "The burden of action (karma) derived from knowledge is borne," and sees the expression as one of irony or sarcastic denial, ākṣepoktiḥ, perhaps in the sense of "Some learned advisers you two have turned out to be! (karmabhāro jñānasya vohyata ity ākṣepoktiḥ, literally, 'the burden of action derived from action is borne [by you two]')." Ck, alone among the commentators, indicates his awareness of the possibility of reading either jñāna or ajñāna. Reading first with Ct and Cr, he explains the phrase to mean "the great and excessive burden of inadequate familiarity with the substance of the śāstras (ajñānasya śāstrārthāparijñānasyaivādhiko bhāro bharaṇaṃ vartate)." He adds, "If one accepts the reading jñānasya, then the sense is '[you] have not grasped, that is, fully understood, the burden of the śāstras containing this knowledge' (jñānasyeti padaṃ parigṛhya jñānaśāstrabhāro na gṛhīto na vijñātaś cety āha)."

"I have retained my hold on the kingdom" dharāmy aham: Literally, "I retain or bear up." Most of the commentators see Rāvaṇa's comment here as an allusion to his ability to retain control of his realm, despite his ministers' ineptitude. They therefore read the phrase as elliptical, supplying the word rājyam, "kingdom," as the object of the verb. Given the context, with its focus on the science of politics, we are inclined to follow this suggestion. Several of the commentators (Cg, Cv, and Cm [alternative]) take the verb in its common dramatic usage of "to live, sustain life (dharāmi jīvāmīti vā—so Cg)" and thus understand pādas cd to mean "With such imbeciles as you for ministers, I'm lucky to be still alive."

9. "your sovereign, whose tongue" yasya me śāsato jihvā: Literally, "of whom, that is me, while ruling . . . the tongue." One could also plausibly take the participle śāsataḥ, "ruling," to mean "issuing commands."

"rewards and punishments" śubhāśubham: Literally, "auspiciousness and inauspiciousness." We follow Ct and Cr, who gloss, "punishment or favor (nigrahānugraham)." Cg explains similarly, "death or well-being (mṛtyuṃ śreyo vā)." Cf. note to verse 5 above.

10. "touched by a forest fire may survive" apy eva dahanaṃ spṛṣṭvā vane tiṣṭhanti: Literally, "They stand even after having touched fire in the forest."

"those whose offences have incurred the wrath of the king cannot" rājadoṣaparāmṛṣṭās tiṣṭhante nāparādhinaḥ: Literally, "Those offenders touched by the injurious character (doṣa) of the king do not stand." We follow Cm and Cg, who respectively gloss kopa and krodha, "anger," for doṣa, "fault." This interpretation seems also to be supported by a northern variant (V2,B1,2,4 and Gorresio 6.5.10) -roṣa-, "anger." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm read -daṇḍa-, "punishment."

11. "you two wretches . . . by your previous acts of service" imau pāpau . . . pūrvopakāraiḥ: Literally, "these two evildoers . . . by previous services." Rāvaṇa apparently addresses his spies here in the third person to indicate his displeasure. Ct, Ck, and Cm understand pūrvopakāraiḥ, "previous services," to refer to acts of service in war, etc., on the part of Śuka and Sāraṇa (yuddhādau kṛtaiḥ).

"who dare to praise my enemies" śatrupakṣapraśaṃsakau: Literally, "who praise the enemy's side."

12. "Go! Get out of my sight!" apadhvaṃsata gacchadhvaṃ saṃnikarṣād ito mama: Literally, "Go away, go hence from my presence." The two commands appear to be somewhat redundant, and the commentators make efforts to distinguish more clearly the two actions that Rāvaṇa is enjoining. Ct and Ck understand apadhvaṃsata to mean "You are to be barred from entry into my assembly hall (matsabhāpraveśyād bhraṣṭā bhavata)." Cr forces the syntax to construe the verb apadhvaṃsata with pāda b, skipping over the intervening verb naśyadhvam (v.l. for gacchadhvam). Thus, for him, the phrase means "Get out of my presence (mama sannikarṣāt sānnidhyād yūyam apadhvaṃsata nirgacchata)." Cg and Cm understand Rāvaṇa to be dismissing the two spies from their posts (sthānāt pracyavadhvam—Cg; adhikārād bhraśyata—Cm).

Several manuscripts (B1,D10,11,G1,M1,2) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read naśyadhvam, "vanish, perish," for gacchadhvam. Ct and Ck explain the phrase as, "Vanish from my sight (adarśanaṃ gacchadhvam)." They evidently see the sequence of commands here as being out of logical order but note that this is not a rhetorical flaw, given the force of Rāvaṇa's rage (krodhavaśād vacanavyatyāso na doṣāya—so Ct).

"you . . . are as good as dead to me" hatāv eva: Ck and Ct flesh out the phrase by adding, "Even without [my] cutting off your heads, you are [dead] merely through my utter contempt (vināpi śiraśchedaṃ dhikkārād eveti śeṣaḥ—so Ct)."

13. Ct and Cm indicate that the withdrawal and disgrace of Śuka and Sāraṇa mark the termination of a curse that caused them to become rākṣasas. This, they maintain, is made clear elsewhere (ayam eva tayo rākṣasatvaprāpakaśāpasyānta ity anyatra spaṣṭam). Śuka and Sāraṇa, along with Mahodara (see verse 14 below), are listed, at 6.34.18–19, among those who are wounded by Rāma and barely escape with their lives.

"they" tāv ubhau: Literally, "both of them." Some devanāgarī manuscripts (D9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead tau dṛṣṭvā, "those two having seen." This reading is reflected in translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1185) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1468).

14. "Hurry up and get me" upasthāpaya śīghraṃ me: Literally, "Quickly cause to attend upon me."

"spies who really understand the science of politics" cārān nītiviśāradān: Ñ,V2,B3,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead cārān iti niśācaraḥ or near variants. This variant lends the verse the sense of "Next, the night-roaming rākṣasa, ten-necked Rāvaṇa, spoke to Mahodara, who stood near him, saying, 'Hurry up and get me some spies.' "

Following verse 14, D5,7,10,T1,2,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct insert a passage of one line [425*]: "Addressed in this fashion, Mahodara quickly summoned spies."

16. "devoted" bhaktān: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead dhīrān, "bold, steadfast."

17. "plans" vyavasāyam: Literally, "resolve, intention." Cg interprets the word to mean "resolution as to what to do (kartavyaniścayam)" and sees the idea underlying Rāvaṇa's instructions as his desire to have his spies discover how firm Rāma's resolve may be. For if Rāma's resolve seems weak, Rāvaṇa will be able, he thinks, to intimidate him (śithilavyavasāyaś ced amuṃ bhīṣayāma iti bhāvaḥ).

"find out . . . Find out" parīkṣatha: Literally, "you [plural] investigate." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B1,3,D0,2–4,8–13,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the infinitive parīkṣitum, "in order to investigate." V3,D1,T1,G3, and the text of Crā read the plural imperative (loṭ), parīkṣata, "Investigate!" We follow Cg in taking the present indicative (laṭ) in the sense of the imperative (loṭ).

The second half of the verse is elliptical, consisting as it does of an unresolved relative clause. We follow Cg in supplying the correlative clause "tān api parīkṣadhvam (find out about them as well)." Both Cr and Cg further expand on the passage, explaining that the spies are also to determine the resolve of Rāma's allies. As above, Cg comments that if their resolution is weak, they will be subject to intimidation. Cs proposes reading the relative pronoun ye as the interrogative ke, yielding the sense "Who are those who have allied themselves with him out of affection and are privy to his counsel?"

18. "When does he sleep?" kathaṃ svapiti: Literally, "How does he sleep?" Cg understands the point of the question to be whether Rāma sleeps by himself or is surrounded by many [attendants] who are awake. Rāvaṇa's intention here, Cg argues, is to attack Rāma when he first falls asleep. (kim ekaḥ svapity uta jāgradbhir anekair āvṛtaḥ svapiti. ādye supte yuddhaṃ pravartayiṣyāma iti hṛdayam.)

"When does he wake?" [kathaṃ] jāgarti: Literally, "[How does] he wake?" Cg understands the question to mean "Is he consumed with anxiety or not?" For him, Rāvaṇa's intention here is to strike at Rāma when he is distracted. (kiṃ cintākula utānākula ity arthaḥ. ādye vyākṣiptaṃ praharisyāmīty ākūtam.)

"What else is he planning to do?" kiṃ anyac ca karisyati: Literally, "What else will he do?" Cg explains, "Will he lay siege to the city after some time or do so immediately?" Cg understands the intent to be that Rāvaṇa will deceive Rāma from the very outset in due course. (kiṃ kaṃcit kālaṃ vilambya nagaram uparotsyaty uta sadya iti. ādye krameṇa vañcayiṣyāmīti tātparyam.)

"accurately" nipuṇam: Cg glosses, "covertly (pracchannam)," which is equally plausible.

"when you have ascertained . . . completely" vijñāya . . . aśeṣataḥ: The somewhat unusual placement of the adverb at the end of the verse after the gerundive āgantavyam leads Cg to offer three alternatives to its most probable construction with the gerund vijñāya, "having ascertained." The first of these is to understand aśeṣataḥ to refer to the totality of the information that Rāvaṇa has requested (sarvam uktaṃ svāpādikam aśeṣataḥ sarvaprakāreṇa vijñāyāgantavyam). Cg's second interpretation understands the adverb to construe with an unexpressed noun, "with spies (cāraiḥ)," yielding "by all of the [literally, 'having no remaining'] spies (aśeṣaiś cārair iti vārthaḥ)." The third alternative is to understand aśeṣataḥ to refer to anything that remains to be done (uttaraśeṣo vā).

20. Following verse 20ab, Ś,Ñ2,B1,3,4,D2,3,5–13,S insert a passage of two lines [427*]: "Then, placing Śārdūla at their head, the spies reverently circumambulated the great leader of the rākṣasas." The southern commentators who read this verse identify Śārdūla as the chief of the spies dispatched here. Śārdūla is mentioned again at 431* following verse 22 below but is not named in the critical text until 6.21.2 below.

21. "concealed themselves" pracchannāḥ: This could also mean, as Cg suggests, "disguised (veṣāntaradhāriṇaḥ)."

"near Mount Suvela" suvelasya śailasya samīpe: Literally, "in the vicinity of the mountain Suvela." According to Apte (s.v.), Mount Suvela is another name for Mount Trikūṭa. Compare note to 5.1.189.

Following verse 21, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [428*]: "And as they observed the army, they were overwhelmed with fear."

22. Following verse 22, D1,5–7,9–11,13,S insert a passage of three lines [431*]: "However, only the rākṣasa Śārdūla was taken prisoner[1] on the grounds that he was particularly wicked. But just as Śārdūla was on the point of being killed by the leaping monkeys, Rāma had him freed. Then merciful Rāma had the other rākṣasas released."

[1]"taken prisoner" grāhitaḥ: Literally, "caused to be captured." When read in the context of the southern recension and the vulgate, the passage presents some minor logical difficulties concerning the special treatment of Śārdūla. In verse 22, all the rākṣasa spies are said to have been taken into custody; but here it appears that only their leader, Śārdūla, is seized. However, both Śārdūla and his followers are separately said to be set free at Rāma's urging. Probably, the intention here is that the entire rākṣasa party is apprehended, but only Śārdūla, because of his wickedness, is subjected to severe punishment. Cg attempts to avoid the problem by glossing nigṛhītāḥ in verse 22 as tarjitāḥ, which would have the sense here of "denounced." He then reads grāhitaḥ as "taken into custody (grāhaṇaṃ prāpitaḥ)." He next takes mocitaḥ, from 431*, line 2 [=GPP 6.29.27ab (v.l. mokṣitaḥ)], to mean "released from beating (mocitaḥ prahārād iti śeṣaḥ)." The idea for him then is that Vibhīṣaṇa merely identifies the rākṣasas, and, although the entire party is, of course, temporarily detained, only Śārdūla is subjected to serious punishment until Rāma sets him free.

23. "dazed" naṣṭacetasaḥ: Literally, "their consciousness destroyed," i.e., unconscious.

24. "mighty" mahābalāḥ: Cs, evidently struck by the seeming incongruity of this epithet in the light of the spies' pathetic performance and humiliating return, argues that the adjective is intended to show that the rākṣasas had managed to survive the attack of the monkeys (vānarair upadrutā api jīvantīti mahābalā ity uktam).

"accustomed to serving in foreign lands" bahirnityacarāḥ: Literally, "constantly moving outside." Ck, Ct, Cg, and Cm variously explain the compound to mean that these spies habitually travel in hostile countries to gather intelligence (pararāṣṭreṣu vṛttāntajñānāya sadā saṃcāraśīlāḥ—so Cg).

"terrifying army" bhīmabalam: Cs reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi referring to Rāma and having the sense of "whose bodily strength or army is terrifying (bhīmaṃ bhayaṅkaraṃ balaṃ śarīraṃ sainyaṃ vā yasya taṃ rāmam)." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rāmabalam, "Rāma's army."

"near Mount Suvela" gireḥ suvelasya samīpa-: Literally, "the vicinity of the mountain Suvela." See note above at verse 21.

The meter appears to be a defective vaṃśasthavila, whose first pāda is hypometric.

Sarga 21

The place of this sarga in the narrative is somewhat confusing. Rāvaṇa has already heard in great detail the enumeration of the monkey hosts and the identity of its leaders through the report of Śuka and Sāraṇa (sargas 16–19). Therefore, Śārdūla's shorter account here seems redundant. Moreover, the following sarga (22) begins with virtually the same two verses as this one, as though Śārdūla's report had never been made. The commentators are aware of these problems and seek to rationalize them. Thus, Cr on verse 1 (= GPP 6.30.1) remarks, by way of introduction to the sarga, "The same report is now given from another perspective for the sake of narrative consistency (saṃdarbhaśuddhaye nivedanam eva bhaṅgyantareṇāha)." Similarly, Cg on 6.22.1 (= GPP 6.31.1) remarks, "He [the poet] repeats what was said in the previous sarga for the sake of narrative consistency (kathāsaṃghaṭanāya pūrvasargoktam anuvadati)."

1. "with an unassailable army" akṣobhyabalam: Literally, "an imperturbable army." We take the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying rāghavam, in the sense of "whose army or whose strength is unassailable." Cr, on the other hand, takes the army as a separate object of pratyavedayan, i.e., "They informed . . . that Rāghava and an unassailable army were encamped (niviṣṭam akṣobhyabalaṃ rāghavaṃ ca pratyavedayan)."

"near Mount Suvela" suvele . . . śaile: Literally, "on the mountain Suvela." See 6.20.21 above.

The verse is a close variant of 6.22.1.

2. "vast army" mahābalam: See notes to 6.20.24 and 6.21.1 above.

The verse is a close variant of 6.22.2.

3. "You look pale" ayathāvat . . . te varṇaḥ: Literally, "Your color is not as it should be."

4. "Questioned" anuśiṣṭaḥ: Literally, "instructed." The context obliges us to agree with the universal gloss of the commentators "questioned (pṛṣṭaḥ)." The verb anu $\sqrt{}$śās is unusual in this sense, which is not recorded in either Monier-Williams (s.v.) or PW (s.v.). Apte (s.v.), however, gives the meaning "questioned," citing this verse.

"Śārdūla . . . tiger among rākṣasas" rākṣasaśārdūlaṃ śārdūlaḥ: Rāvaṇa's epithet here is clearly chosen to echo the chief spy's name, Śārdūla, which means "tiger." Cf. 6.52.2 and note; 6.4.66; 6.5.3; 6.8.12; 6.14.13; and notes.

"stupefied with fear" bhayavihvalaḥ: Cs offers two explanations for Śārdūla's disabling terror: 1) He is stupefied by fear of the monkeys, as were Śuka and Sāraṇa (kapibhayavihvalaḥ śukasāraṇavat); and 2) He is stupefied with fear, thinking, "What did he [Rāvaṇa] say to them [Śuka and Sāraṇa] and what will happen [to me] (kim uktau kiṃ bhaviṣyatīti bhayavihvalo vā)?"

7. "Before I even had a chance to observe the army" bale tasminn acārite: Literally, "while the army was still unspied upon." D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read vicārite, "examined." This reading, as Ct explains, would mean "Just as I had begun to examine [the army] (vicārayituṃ prakrāntaḥ)."

"many monkeys" bahubhiḥ: Literally, "by many." A number of manuscripts (V2,D5–7,9–11,T2,3,M) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead rakṣobhiḥ, "by rākṣasas." The rākṣasas in question, according to Cg, are the ministers of Vibhīṣaṇa (vibhīṣaṇasacivaiḥ). See 6.10.12 above and note to 6.11.3. This variant is rendered by all translators who follow the text of the southern commentators, except for Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 73). Ct and Ck understand similarly (vibhīṣaṇaparivāraiḥ). Cs offers two explanations: the first is similar to that of Cg; the second is to read rakṣobhiḥ as an instrumental of accompaniment (sahāgataiḥ saheti vā), thus giving the meaning "I was seized along with the rākṣasas who accompanied me." Cs further supplies the word vānaraiḥ, "by the monkeys," to serve as the subject of the participle gṛhītaḥ, "seized."

8. "paraded about" pariṇītaḥ: Ct and Ck understand that Śārdūla is led all around the monkey encampment by his captors in order to proclaim that he is a spy. They note that this is the same treatment that the rākṣasas afforded Hanumān earlier (5.51.5–34) (hanumān iva ghoṣaṇārtham itas tato nīto 'smi—so Ct).

"powerful" balavadbhiḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead balamadhye, "in the midst of the army."

9. "Rāma's headquarters" rāmasaṃsadam: Literally, "Rāma's court or assembly hall."

"my entire body covered with blood" rudhirādigdhasarvāṅgaḥ: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read rudhirasrāvidīnāṅgaḥ. Ct and Cr understand this as a karmadhāraya compound with the sense "my body bleeding profusely and thus suffering miserably." This reading is rendered variously by the translators who follow the text of Ct: thus Dutt (1893, p. 1187) renders, "bleeding, with my limbs showing sorry work"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 73), "my limbs covered with blood and wounds"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 84), "les membres couverts de sang, de meurtrissures"; Pagani (1999, p. 939), "mes membres étaient meurtris, ruisselaient de sang"; and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1470), "my limbs bleeding and afflicted."

10. "Truly, I am lucky to be alive." jīvāmi ha yadṛcchayā: Literally, "Indeed, I survive by sheer luck." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute mā meti ca, "and saying, 'Don't! Don't!' " for jīvāmi ha, "I am alive," giving the second half of the verse the sense of "Fortunately, I was spared by Rāghava, who cried, 'Stop! Stop!' " Cm reads with Cg and the critical edition but construes the verse somewhat more in the fashion of Ct. He claims the syntax is as follows: "Beaten by the tawny monkeys, I managed to survive. Then, pleading, my hands cupped in supplication, I was fortunately spared by Rāghava (haribhir vadhyamāno jīvāmīti kṛtāñjaliḥ san yācchamāno 'haṃ yadṛcchayā rāghaveṇa paritrāta iti sambandhaḥ)."

12. "immensely powerful warrior" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful one."

"arranged his troops in the garuḍa formation" garuḍavyūham āsthāya: Literally, "having recourse to the garuḍa formation." This particular military array is, no doubt, similar to the form of other constructions (such as altars, etc.) named for either the mythical bird Garuḍa or an eagle. The idea must be that the troops are spread on either side of their commander in two "wings." See ManuSm 7.187. Dikshitar (1944, p. 271) notes that Bhīṣma uses a gāruḍavyūha in the Mahābhārata (6.52.2). Ct, Cs, and Ck note that this formation is appropriate for marching or advancing (prasthānārtham—Ct, Ck). Ct further notes that earlier, when the army was encamped, it had adopted the puruṣa, or "man," formation. Cs, alone among the commentators, reads a covert theological message in Rāma's choice of this particular formation. He argues, "He [Rāma] has made this arrangement under the pretext of a military formation thinking, 'If Rāvaṇa, seeing me mounted on the real Garuḍa, were to recognize my godhead and take refuge with me, the purpose of my incarnation would not be accomplished.' That is the suggested meaning (sākṣād garuḍārohe jñātabhagavattvo rāvaṇaḥ prapannaś ced avatāravyāpārāniṣpādanaṃ syād iti vyūhamiṣeṇa taṃ viracayya tatra sthita iti dhvaniḥ)." The idea is that Rāma as Viṣṇu would normally enter battle against a demonic foe mounted upon the great bird Garuḍa. Were he to do so in this case, however, Rāvaṇa, recognizing his divinity, might throw himself upon the Lord's mercy, thus subverting the mission of the avatāra, viz., the destruction of Rāvaṇa. Rāma, one may presume, thus selects the garuḍavyūha both as a tribute to his great mount and perhaps as a cryptic message to his devotees.

13. "fierce battle" suyuddham: Literally, "good battle." A number of manuscripts (V2,B3,D5,10,11,G,M5) and texts and printed editions of Ct read yuddhaṃ vāpi, "or battle," for suyuddhaṃ vā.

14. "those grave words of Śārdūla" śārdūlasya mahadvākyam: Ś,Ñ2,V,D0–2,4,8–13,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead śārdūlaṃ sumahadvākyam, "[spoke] these exceedingly grave words to Śārdūla."

"he was stricken at heart, but he replied" manasā saṃtatāpa . . . athovāca: Literally, "He suffered in his heart or mind . . . then said." The reading of pāda a varies widely and significantly among the various manuscripts collated for the critical edition. The critical reading has mixed southern and northern support (B4,D5,7,T1,G2,3,M4). No commentator or printed edition, however, shares this reading. The southern commentators have either manasā tat tadā prekṣya ("then having reflected upon that [speech] in his mind"—Ct, Cr, Ck) or the more problematic variant manasā taṃ tadā prekṣya ("then having reflected on him [Śārdūla]"—Cg, Cm, Crā). Since the critical reading and, we believe, the logic of the passage (supported by numerous variants) shows Rāvaṇa to be pained or frightened by Śārdūla's report, we have added the conjunction "but" to indicate that, despite his inner misgivings, Rāvaṇa speaks defiantly out of pride and in order to keep up a brave front. Compare text and notes to 6.20.1–3 above.

15. This verse equals 6.17.2 except for the substitution of the synonymous verb abhiyuñjīran for pratyudhyeran.

16. "spied upon this army" cāritā . . . senā: Ct and Ck, evidently perceiving a contradiction here since Śārdūla had failed so miserably in his mission as a spy, explains that Rāvaṇa means to say here that the rākṣasa has had the opportunity to observe the army through the happenstance of his having been paraded in captivity and proclaimed a spy (see verses 8–9 above) (daivagatyā ghoṣaṇārthaṃ praṇayaneneti bhāvaḥ).

17. "What are they like? What are the powers . . .?" kīdṛśāḥ kiṃprabhāvāś ca: There is considerable variation among the various recensions for the first pāda. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read kiṃprabhāḥ kīdṛśāḥ saumya, while D5,6,T,G1,3,M3, and Cg reverse the order, reading kīdṛśāḥ kiṃprabhāḥ saumya. The meaning of these variants would literally be "What are they like? What is their radiance, my good man?" Cg glosses the term kiṃprabhāḥ as kiṃprabhāvāḥ, "What are their powers?" the reading of the critical edition. D7 and Cr read instead kiṃpramāṇāḥ, "What is their size or measure?" This obscure variant is rendered only in the translation of Pagani (1999, p. 939) as "Quelle est leur taille . . .?"

"rākṣasa" rākṣasa: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead suvrata, "virtuous one." This is rendered variously by the translators who follow Ct as "O thou of fair vows" (Dutt 1893, p. 1188); "O Faithful Friend" (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 74); "loyal ami" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 85); and "fidèle ami" (Pagani 1999, p. 939). Cs notes this reading as a variant and explains it as expressive of Rāvaṇa's suggestion that he would be able to recognize it were Śārdūla to speak untruthfully (suvratety anenānṛtabhāṣaṇe pratyaveyām iti parijñānam astīti sūcyate).

18. "take account of the opposing forces" balasaṃkhyānaṃ kartavyam: Literally, "an accounting of the forces is to be made." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute the emphatic particle khalu for bala-, "forces." This yields the sense "must indeed make a reckoning."

20. "To begin with . . . then" atha . . . atha: Literally, "now . . . now." Cg, noting the repetition, remarks that the first atha marks the beginning of Śārdūla's speech and the second, according to him, is metri causa (athety uttaravacanārambhe dvitīyothaśabdaḥ pādapūraṇe).

"your majesty" rājan: Literally, "O king." D5–7,G2,3,M3, and Cv, Crā, Cm, and Cg substitute the nominative rājā for the critical edition's vocative. This would yield the sense of "the king [of the monkeys] utterly invincible in battle."

"the son of Ṛkṣarajas" ṛkṣarajasaḥ putraḥ: The reference is, of course, to Sugrīva. For an account of Sugrīva's birth, see Uttarakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 3, lines 74–78.

"the son of Gadgada" gadgadasya . . . putraḥ: Ct, Ck, Cr, and Cm cite the passage from the Bālakāṇḍa (critical edition 490* = GPP 1.17.7) at which Jāmbavān is said to have been born directly from the mouth of Brahmā while the latter was yawning. They argue, however, that there is no contradiction, since it was actually a śakti, or "creative energy," that issued from the god's mouth and entered "the field (kṣetra)," i.e., the wife of Gadgada, thus entitling Jāmbāvan to be considered Gadgada's son. (gadgado jāmbavataḥ kṣetradvārā pitā. yady api jāmbavato jṛmbhamāṇasya sahasā mama vaktrād ajāyateti brahmamukhād utpattir uktā, tathāpi jṛmbhaṇasamaya udgatāyā brahmaśakter gadgadakṣetram āviśya tadrūpeṇa pariṇāmād adoṣaḥ—so Cm; Ct similarly.) Cg adds that, since Jāmbavān was raised by Gadgada, he can be considered his son, just as in the case of Pāñcālī (Draupadī), [who, although born directly from the sacrificial fire, is regarded as the daughter of Drupada] (pāñcālīnyāyena gadgadena poṣitatvāt tatputro jāmbavān tasya brahmaṇo jṛmbhārambhasaṃbhūtatvāt).

21. "the other son of Gadgada" gadgadasyaiva putro 'nyaḥ: The text provides no name for this individual. However, the commentators generally identify him as Dhūmra. See 6.18.9–10; 6.32.22; and 6.54.29. See also notes to 6.18.9–10,11–12; and 6.31.17. Cs's interpretation differs from those of the other commentators, which are discussed in the notes to the previous verse. He quotes Cm's and Ct's argument that Jāmbavān was actually the kṣetraja, "son," of Gadgada born from the śakti of Lord Brahmā, which had entered Gadgada's wife. However, he regards this as a less plausible explanation for the seeming contradiction involving the two sons of Gadgada, suggesting that Gadgada fathered the two sons in two different births (gadgadasya dvitīyajanmani).

"the son of the guru of Indra of the hundred sacrifices" guruputraḥ śatakratoḥ: The reference, as noted by the commentators, is to Kesarin, a son of Bṛhaspati, the famous purohita of Indra and the gods (see note to 6.18.32–34 above).

"his son who single-handedly slaughtered the rākṣasas" kadanaṃ yasya putreṇa kṛtam ekena rakṣasām: The reference here, as pointed out by the commentators, is to Kesarin's son, Hanumān, and the latter's slaughter of the rākṣasa forces described in the Sundarakāṇḍa (sargas 40–45).

22. "the son of Dharma" putro dharmasya: Cg sees the possibility of a contradiction here in light of the Bālakāṇḍa passage (491*, line 11 = GPP 1.17.15), where Suṣeṇa is said to be the son not of Dharma but of Varuṇa. He explains the apparent contradiction by arguing that 1) in this passage Varuṇa is called by the name Dharma; 2) Śārdūla was so frightened that he misheard the genealogy of Suṣeṇa; or 3) the reference here is to a different Suṣeṇa than the one previously mentioned. (nanu varuṇo janayāmāsa suṣeṇa nāma vānaram iti bālakāṇḍoktam. satyam uktaṃ sa evātra dharmaśabdenocyate. śārdūlo vā bhayākūlo 'nyathā śrutavān. anyo 'yaṃ suṣeṇa ity apy āhuḥ.)

"Dadhimukha" dadhimukhaḥ: This would appear to be Sugrīva's uncle, who is the superintendent of the king's Madhuvana in the Sundarakāṇḍa (sargas 59–62).

23. "Vegadarśin" vegadarśī: Literally, "perceiving speed." Cr appears to understand this not as the name of a third monkey but as an epithet applying either to Durmukha or Durmukha and Sumukha. He explains the compound as meaning "having the nature of recognizing the respective speed [of the various monkeys] (svasvavegadarśanaśīlaḥ)." See 6.116.48 and note.

"created death in the form of these monkeys" mṛtyur vānararūpeṇa . . . sṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "death was created in monkey form." The commentators differ as to whether this means that these previously named monkeys resemble Death itself (mṛtyutulyāḥ—Ct, Cm, Cg, first alternative) or that they are the sons of Mṛtyu, the god of death (yadvā sumukhādayo mṛtyuputrā ity arthaḥ—so Cg, second alternative; Cv, Crā similarly).

24. Several of the commentators note that, because of the distinction between biological fatherhood (bījitva) and legal fatherhood (kṣetritva), we see two fathers mentioned for several of the monkey heroes (evaṃ tatra tatra pitṛdvayanirdeśo bījitvakṣetritvābhyām iti mantavyam—so Cg).

25. "grandson" naptā: Although the term normally refers to the son of one's daughter, both Cr and Cg remark that, in this case, it refers to the son of one's son (atra naptṛśabdo 'rthasāmarthyāt pautre vartate—so Cg).

26. "like Kāla, the ender of all things" kālāntakopamāḥ: This expression and its variant, kālāntakayamopama (like Yama, who brings time [Kāla] itself to an end, see 6.55.93), is a commonplace in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.45.31; 6.48.83; 6.55.93–96; 6.69.8; 6.75.2; 6.83.30; 6.104.31; and notes) as well as in the Mahābhārata (see, for example, 3.23.30; 3.28.23; 3.138.12; 3.154.40; 3.175.15; 6.50.42; 6.51.38; 6.87.7; 7.95.19; 7.134.35; 8.35.18; 8.40.18; 10.13.20; 14.73.27). Professor Sharma has informed us, and we concur, that the compound should be read as a karmadhāraya, i.e., "Time itself is the Ender." See verse 31 below. See, too, R. K. Sharma 1964, p. 26. Cf. 6.80.7 and note.

27. Ñ1 (omits verse 28) and all southern manuscripts (D5–7,9–11,S) read verses 27–28 after verse 33. It is not clear on what basis the critical editors have chosen to follow the northern sequence. Perhaps the northern redactors and the critical editors after them were disturbed by the inclusion of Lakṣmaṇa in the middle of a list of monkeys rather than after it with the description of Rāma.

28. "Sudurdhara" sudurdharaḥ: The critical edition follows the reading of Cg, Cv, Crā, and Cm. D6,7,10,T3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa durdharaḥ, giving Durdhara as the name of the monkey.

"son of the Vasus" vasuputraḥ: The term "Vasu" is generally used to indicate a group of eight vedic divinities, one of the classes of divinities that make up their traditional number of thirty-three. The individual members of this class vary from text to text. Less commonly, the term may be used in the singular to refer to a variety of individual vedic divinities, including Indra, Dyaus, etc. If the term is intended to be singular here, it is unclear which particular divinity is meant. The commentators are silent. See, too, note to 6.45.38.

29. "one hundred million of these . . . heroic monkeys" daśa vānarakoṭyaḥ . . . śūrāṇām: The commentators note the irregular loss of the expected genitive plural ending of the word vānara-, which would put it into agreement with the nouns and adjective with which it is in apposition. Cg cites Pā 7.1.39 (supāṃ suluk), which accounts for such elisions in vedic.

"I am unable to describe the rest." śeṣān nākhyātum utsahe: Literally, "I am unable to describe the remaining ones." We follow the interpretation of Ct, Cr, and Ck, who understand that Śārdūla is unable to enumerate all the remaining monkeys. Cg reads śeṣam, "the rest," for the plural śeṣān and understands the phrase to mean that the rākṣasa is unable to specify further details about the monkeys, such as their places of birth, and so on (śeṣaṃ janmasthānādi).

30. "whose build is that of a lion" siṃhasaṃhananaḥ: Cg, quoting Amarakośa (3.1.12) (varāṅgarūpopeto yaḥ siṃhasaṃhananaḥ), argues that this phrase means "possessing a pleasing arrangement of the limbs (ramaṇīyāvayavasanniveśavān)."

"the one who slew Dūṣaṇa, Khara, and Triśiras" dūṣaṇo nihato yena kharaś ca triśirās tathā: See Araṇyakāṇḍa 24–29.

31. "for he slew Virādha and Kabandha" virādho nihato yena kabandhaś ca: See Araṇyakāṇḍa 2–3, 65–69.

"who was like Yama, the ender of all things" antakopamaḥ: See verse 26 above.

32. "all" tāvantaḥ: Literally, "so many." We follow the reading of Cg, who quotes Amarakośa (3.3.245) to the effect that yāvat and tāvat may be used in the sense of "totality." (ye janasthānagatās te yāvantas te sarve 'pi hatā ity arthaḥ. yāvat tāvac ca sākalya ity amaraḥ.) Ck understands similarly.

"who slew all the rākṣasas in Janasthāna" janasthānagatā yena . . . rāksasā hatāḥ: See Araṇyakāṇḍa 24–25.

33. "resembling a bull elephant" mātaṅgānām ivarṣabhaḥ: Literally, "like a bull of or among elephants." Despite the homology of this trope with the stereotypical metaphor of the bull as a symbol of power, etc., we are inclined to read this construction with Cr and Cg, who understand, "best of elephants (gajaśreṣṭha iva)."

34. "having received the city of Laṅkā" parigṛhya purīṃ laṅkām: We are inclined to agree with Cg and Cr, who supply the word rāghavāt or rāmāt, "from Rāghava or from Rāma," and see the phrase as a reference to Rāma's having transferred sovereignty from Rāvaṇa to Vibhīṣaṇa at 6.13.9. All translators consulted follow this interpretation, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1189), who understands, "hath laid siege to Lañkā." This is a plausible but less persuasive reading of the gerund pratigṛhya (v.l. for the critical edition's parigṛhya), which can also have the sense of "seize, attack."

35. "upon Mount Suvela" suvele . . . śaile: Literally, "on the mountain Suvela." See note to 6.20.21.

"You, sir, must now decide what is to be done next." śeṣakārye bhavān gatiḥ: Literally, "You, sir, are the highest recourse with respect to action that remains to be done."

Several of the commentators call our attention to discrepancies between the accounts of the ancestry of various monkeys as they are given in this sarga and at Bālakāṇḍa 16. Most of them, following Cm, note the discrepancies but deny any contradiction on the grounds that many monkeys may have the same names. (nanv atra sarge dharmasya putraḥ suseṇaḥ. vaivasvataputrau śarabhagandhamādanāv ity ucyete. bālakaṇḍe tu "varuṇo janayāmāsa suṣeṇaṃ nāma vānaram. śarabhaṃ janayāmāsa parjanyas tu mahābalam. dhanadasya sutaḥ śrīmān vānaro gandhamādanaḥ" iti trayāṇām anyata utpattir uktā. satyam. suṣeṇādi saṃjñāvatām anekeṣām api sattvān na virodhaḥ.) Cg, however, regards the entire sarga as suspect for two reasons—first, because of these very discrepancies, and, second, because he finds the chapter unnecessary to the sequence of the epic narrative, which, he claims, would remain intact even without this chapter (atra vānarajanmokte prāyaśo bālakāṇḍoktavirodhād etat sargaṃ vināpi pūrvottarakathā saṃghaṭṭanāc ca sargo 'yaṃ kalpita ity āhuḥ).

Sarga 22

1. "Meanwhile" tatah: Literally, "then." Crā and Cg take note of the apparent repetition here of the account given in the previous sarga. Cg, who had already noted the narrative superfluity of sarga 21 (see note to 6.21.35), claims here that the previous material is repeated in order to maintain the sequence of the narrative (kathāsaṃghaṭanāya pūrvasargoktam anuvadati). Crā also notes the repetition and, alluding to the type of inconsistencies in the tales of the origins of the monkey heroes noted above (at sarga 21), remarks, as Cg remarked earlier (6.21.35), that sarga 21 is unnecessary to the narrative sequence (tatas tam akṣobhyabalam ity anuvādaḥ pūrvasargādau ca kṛtaḥ . . . pūrvasargam antareṇāpi kathā saṃgacchate). Still, he concludes resignedly with the maxim, "one must take into consideration the existing situation (tathāpi sthitasya gatiḥ cintanīyeti nyāyena pūrvasargo vyākhyataḥ)," and therefore comments on the seemingly otiose sarga.

"near Mount Suvela" suvele . . . śaile: See notes to 6.20.21 and 6.21.1.

This verse is a close variant of 6.21.1.

2. "somewhat agitated" jātodvego 'bhavat kiṃcit: Cr is of two minds as to how to construe kiṃcit. He notes that it can be taken, as we do, with jātodvegaḥ, or as modifying idam in pāda d, thus yielding the sense "He said something to his ministers. (sacivān kiṃcid abravīc ca. kiṃcid iti jātodvegānvayi vā.)"

The verse is a close variant of 6.21.2.

3. "Rākṣasas! . . . counselors" mantriṇaḥ . . . rākṣasāḥ: Cg sees some ambiguity in the syntax of this verse and offers three alternative readings. The first is similar to our translation. The second, which he borrows from Cv, sees rākṣasāḥ not as a vocative but as a nominative plural and part of the subject of the following verse. His third alternative is to take mantriṇaḥ and rākṣasāḥ as vocatives in apposition and then to read the third person imperative samāyāntu as a polite second person, thus giving the sense "O rākṣasa counselors, please assemble." Ct and Ck, who follow the first interpretation, supply the phrase "[Let them assemble] on your instructions (yuṣmadvacanāt)."

"focusing their thoughts" susamāhitāḥ: Literally, "well focused or fully intent." Cg glosses, "skilled in the science of politics (nītikuśalāḥ)."

5. "what was appropriate for them to do next" kṣamaṃ yat samanantaram: Ct and Ck supply the words "with respect to winning over Sītā (sītāprāptāv iti śeṣaḥ)." Cg explains, "What was to be done after the approach of Rāma. (rāmasya samīpagamanānantaram. yat kṣamaṃ kartum ucitam.)"

"unassailable Rāvaṇa" durdharṣaḥ: Literally, "unassailable one."

6. "summoning" āhūya: Literally, "having summoned." D7,10–11,T2,3,G2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead ādāya, "having taken [with him]."

"Rāvaṇa, himself a great master of illusion" mahāmāyaḥ: Literally, "having great powers of illusion." Ñ2,B2,D10,11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead mahāmāyam, thus making this a redundant epithet of Vidyujjihva.

"went to where . . . was" prāviśad yatra: Literally, "he entered where."

8. "Rāghava's head along with his great bow and arrows—all fashioned through the power of illusion" śiro māyāmayam . . . rāghavasya . . . mahac ca saśaraṃ dhanuḥ: Literally, "Rāghava's head made through illusion and a great bow with arrows."

9. Following 9ab, Ñ,V2,B1–3,D6,7,9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr insert a passage of one line [456*], evidently out of their concern that the king should reward his servant without the latter actually having done anything: "He then demonstrated the proper use of his powers of illusion to Rāvaṇa."

10. "Sītā seated" upaviṣṭām: Literally, "[her] seated."

Following 10a, D3–7,10,11,S, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [458*], which extends the description of Rāvaṇa: "Eager to see Sītā, the lord of the rākṣasas, sons of chaos."

11. "surrounded by . . . rāksasa women" upāsyamānām . . rākṣasībhiḥ: Literally, "being waited or attended upon by rākṣasīs." Cg takes the participle in its sense of "worship, attend upon" and, understanding Sītā to be its subject rather than object, glosses, "devoted [wife] (anuvratām)."

For elaborate descriptions of Sītā's rākṣasī wardresses, see 5.15.4–17; 5.20.31–36. See, too, Sutherland 1989; and S. Goldman 2001, 2003a, 2003b.

12. "calling out . . . in feigned delight" praharṣan nāma kīrtayan: Literally, "falsely delighting [and] calling." Like Ck, Ct, and Cg, we take the particle nāma here in its sense as a marker of falsehood (aparamārthe). (See Mallinātha's comments on KumāSaṃ 5.32 for a similar usage.) The texts and printed editions of the southern commentators as well as a number of northern and southern manuscripts (Ś,V1–3,D0, 4–6,8–13,T1,2,M3, and Cv, Cm, Cg, and Ct) read the variant praharṣaṃ nāma, which would make praharṣam the object of the participle kīrtayan. Ct and Ck read nāma as we have done and explain that Rāvaṇa is proclaiming his joy, which is a result of his feigned victory over Rāma. (nāma ity aparamārthe. aparamārthabhūtaṃ rāmajayajaṃ praharṣaṃ kīrtayan—so Ct.) Cr reads the accusative praharṣam adverbially and takes nāma nominally in its sense of "name" as the object of the participle kīrtayan. He thus understands the clause to mean "joyfully proclaiming his name (praharṣaṃ yathā syāt tathā nāma svābhidhāṃ kīrtayan san)." Cg understands praharṣam metonymically for "as if proclaiming the joyful news (praharṣavarttāṃ kīrtayann iva)." Cm understands, "joyfully calling out Sītā's name (praharṣaṃ kīrtayan 'he site!' iti sambandhaḥ)."

13. "about whom you are wont to speak so boastfully" yam upāśritya valgase: Literally, "with reference to whom you boast." Cg, the only commentator who both reads and comments upon the verb valgase, glosses, "prattle, talk too much (jalpasi)," and understands, "You spoke harshly or cruelly (niṣṭhuram avada ity arthaḥ)." Our interpretation is based on an attested, if not common, sense of the root √valg [normally, "jump, leap"] as noted in the Śabdakalpadruma (s.v. valganam), which offers bahubhāṣaṇam, "talking too much," as one of the meanings of the term. The idea, no doubt, is that Rāvaṇa is referring to Sītā's harsh rebuke of his attempt to woo her at Sundarakāṇḍa 18–19, where she tells him of Rāma's great power and warns him of the destruction he faces at her husband's hands. D10–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yam āśritya vimanyase, that is, "with reference to whom you spurn [me]."

14. "I have completely undermined your grounds for refusing me" chinnaṃ te sarvato mūlam . . . mayā: Literally, "By me your root is completely cut off." Ck and Ct explain, "The basis for your refusal to marry me is cut off in every way [v.l. sarvathā for sarvataḥ] (te mūlam asmad aparigrahanidānaṃ sarvathā sarvaprakāreṇa chinnam)." Cg glosses, "that which has been [your] basis (ādhārabhūtam)" for mūlam, "root."

"you will have to become" bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "You will be." We agree with Ck in understanding that Rāvaṇa feels that, in feigning the death of Rāma, he has left Sītā no alternative but to marry him of her own accord (gatyantarābhāvāt svayam eveti śeṣaḥ).

Following verse 14, Ñ2,D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [462*]: "Foolish woman, give up this notion![1] Of what use is a dead man to you? My lady, you must become the foremost among all my wives."

[1]"notion" matim: Cr understands Rāvaṇa to be referring to Sītā's intention of following Rāma to the next world. He feels that Rāvaṇa is dissuading her on the grounds that she will not be able to obtain her husband in the afterlife (enāṃ tallokagamanaviṣayāṃ matiṃ viṣṛja tyaja mṛtena lokāntaraṃ gatena patyā tvaṃ kiṃ kariṣyasi tatprāptir na bhaviṣyatīty arthaḥ).

15. "Your merit is exhausted and your purpose has failed" alpapūṇye nivṛttārthe: Literally, "O woman of little merit, O woman whose purpose has been thwarted." Ct explains that Sītā's purpose or goal was nothing other than [the recovery of] Rāma himself (nivṛttārthe nivṛtto rāmarūpo 'rtho yasyāḥ).

Cr has a unique perspective on this whole passage. He reads it as indirect (bhaṅgyantareṇa) praise of Sītā on the part of Rāvaṇa (presumably as a devotee—see note to 5.18.6). Thus, he takes alpapuṇyā to mean that Sītā purifies even the lowliest, who attain purity through the recollection of her name, etc. (alpapuṇye 'lpānāṃ kṣudrāṇām api puṇyaṃ pavitratvaṃ yayā yannāmasmaraṇādinā kṣudrā api pūtā bhavantīty arthaḥ). He understands the vocative nivṛttārthe as the negative anivṛttārthe, which is plausible given the sandhi environment. The sense according to him would then be, "one who has accomplished all of her objectives (na nivṛtto 'rtho yasyāḥ sarvārthasaṃpannety arthaḥ)."

"you foolish woman" mūḍhe: Cr takes the normally highly pejorative term mūḍha, "fool," in an opposite sense, adducing the terminology of the Yogasūtra (1.2) and glossing prāptanirodhe, "O you who have transcended the state of mūḍhatva and attained the cessation of random thoughts (he prāptanirodhe)." We are indebted to Professor R. K. Sharma for this interpretation.

"who think yourself so clever" paṇḍitamānini: Cr sees this normally pejorative term to mean "one whose habit is to honor paṇḍits (paṇḍitān manyate satkaroti tacchīlā)."

"the slaying of Vṛtra" vṛtravadham: This refers to the famous legend of Indra slaying the demon Vṛtra, which can be traced back to the earliest vedic literature. The event has become a common standard of comparison for the slaying of powerful warriors. See, for example, ṚV 1.32; TaiS 6.5.5; ŚatBr 1.6.3; JaimiBr 2.155; MBh 5.9–10; and Rām 1.23.17–19; 5.20.28.

16. "our shores" samudrāntam: Literally, "to the edge of the sea."

"in a futile effort to kill me" māṃ hantuṃ kila: Literally, "to kill me indeed." We interpret the adverbial particle kila here in its sense of indicating contempt or disdain.

17. "reached the southern shore" tīram āsādya dakṣiṇam: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of all southern commentators read instead pīḍya (tīrtvā—D6,T2) tīram athottaram, "having devastated the northern shore." This reading thus places the action Rāvaṇa describes as having taken place before Rāma crosses the ocean rather than, as in the critical reading, on the shore of Laṅkā.

18. "exhausted from its long march" adhvani pariśrāntam . . . sthitam: Literally, "located on the road, exhausted."

19. "on that very spot where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa lay" yatra rāmaḥ salakṣmaṇaḥ: Literally, "where Rāma [was] together with Lakṣmaṇa."

"Rāma's" asya: Literally, "his."

20–21. The list of weapons differs somewhat among the various manuscripts and printed editions. Similarly, the identification of the specific weapons varies among the different translations. See Glossary of Weapons.

"staves heavy with iron" daṇḍān mahāyasān: The term mahāyasa is poorly attested in the literature. It appears to be a compound consisting of the adjectives mahant, "great," and āyasa, "made of iron." We take it more or less in the sense given in PW and MW (s.v.). The term occurs in the Citraśāla Press edition of the Mahābhārata (4.65.7), where Nīlakaṇṭha glosses mahāphalaka, which seems to be a type of broad-headed spear. Cf. Apte s.v. mahāphalam. Cf. also note to 6.3.12.

"streams of arrows" bāṇajālāni: Literally, "masses of arrows."

22. "deft-handed" kṛtahastena: Literally, "of accomplished hand." We follow Ct and Cg, who gloss, "of trained hand (śikṣitahastena)." Cr, however, sees the compound not as a bahuvrīhi modifying prahastena but as a pūrvanipāta tatpuruṣa in the sense of "wielded in his hand (haste kṛtena)." The adjective is undoubtedly used for its echoing effect with the name Prahasta.

23. "Vibhīṣaṇa tried to flee, but, as it happened, he was captured" vibhīṣaṇaḥ samutpatya nigṛhīto yadṛcchayā: Literally, "Leaping up, Vibhīṣaṇa, as it happened, was captured." The syntax is somewhat ambiguous. We follow Ct, Ck, and Cg in reading Vibhīṣaṇa as the subject of the gerund samutpatya, literally, "having jumped up, having rushed forth," which they understand to mean "fled (gataḥ)." The verb sam + ut $\sqrt{pat}$ can also mean "to attack," and so the phrase could also plausibly mean "[Prahasta—so Cr], as it happened, attacked and captured Vibhīṣaṇa."

"and all the leaping monkeys" sarvaiḥ . . . plavagaiḥ saha: Literally, "with all the leaping monkeys." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read sainyaiḥ, "[along] with troops, soldiers," for sarvaiḥ, "with all."

24. "Sugrīva . . . with a broken neck . . . Hanumān . . . his jaw smashed" sugrīvo grīvayā . . . bhagnayā . . . nirastahanukaḥ . . . hanūmān: Here and in the following verses Rāvaṇa's description of the monkeys' injuries plays upon their names, many of which include references to body parts, etc. Thus, Sugrīva means, literally, "having a beautiful neck" and Hanumān, "having a [great] jaw." For the origin of Sugrīva and his name, see Uttarakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 3, line 75; for Hanumān's, see 7.35.47.

"lies there . . . lies there" śete . . . śete: Literally, "he lies . . . he lies." D9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and Lahore read the vocative sīte, "O Sītā," for the first śete, "he lies [there]," in pāda a. D9–11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct also read the vocative sīte, "O Sītā," for the second occurrence of the verb śete in pāda c.

25. "as he leapt up . . . stricken at the knees" jānubhyām utpatan nihataḥ: We follow Cg here, who reads the instrumental dual jānubhyām irregularly as a locative (jānubhyām jānunoḥ) as this seems to be in keeping with the tenor of the previous verse, where the monkeys are wounded on those parts of the body from which their names are derived or with which they resonate alliteratively. Cr and most available translators, except Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1475), understand that the monkey is rising to, or from, his knees or thighs when he is struck down (jānubhyām utpatan).

26. "two bulls among monkeys . . . cut down" nihatau vānararṣabhau: Ñ2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead tau vānaravararṣabhau, "those two bulls among the foremost monkeys." The texts and printed editions of Ct provide no verbal element in the verse to inform us of the fate of Mainda and Dvivida. This defect is remedied in these texts and editions in a variant to pādas 27ab. See note to verse 27 below.

27. "Cut through the middle with a sword . . . destroyer of his enemies" asinābhyāhataś chinno madhye ripuniṣūdanaḥ: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead asinā vyāyatau chinnau madhye hy ariniṣūdanau, "those two powerful destroyers of their enemies [Mainda and Dvivida] were cut through the middle with a sword." As noted above, this syntax completes the vulgate variant of verse 26.

"fell thunderously" abhiṣṭanati: This unusual verb, abhi √stan, known primarily to the vedic corpus, means, literally, "to thunder" (Grassmann 1872 [1964 reprint] s.v.). Manuscripts show many variants. Ct, Cr, and Ck read anusvanati, "he resounds, makes a noise." Cg, Cm, and Cv read anutiṣṭhati, which Cg glosses as "he lies (śete)."

"Panasa . . . like a jackfruit" panasaḥ panaso yathā: Here, again, Rāvaṇa's choice of upamāna is derived from a play on a character's name. We understand with Cr, who glosses, "like a ripe panasa fruit that has split open (vidīrṇapakvapanasaphalam iva)," that the object of comparison here is the fruit of the jackfruit tree rather than the tree itself. The idea, we think, is that given the critical reading abhiṣṭanati, we are to understand Panasa has fallen with a thud like a ripe jackfruit. Dutt (1893, p. 1191), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 88), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 77), Pagani (1999, p. 942), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 75), however, all understand the reference to be to the jackfruit tree (Artocarpus integrifolia) itself, which is technically more correct, given the masculine gender of the word.

28. Darīmukha lies in a pit" śete daryāṃ darīmukhaḥ: Here, again, Rāvaṇa plays on a monkey's name. Darīmukha means "whose mouth is like a pit or cave."

"is moaning" niṣkūjan: Literally, "moaning." So we render the participle. Other translators, such as Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1475), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 77), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 88), similarly understand that the monkey is emitting a sound ("shrieking, hurlant"). Ck and Ct insist that the critical edition's reading is the authentic one (pāñktaḥ). Cm, Cg, and Crā, however, read niṣkūjaḥ sāyakaiḥ kṛtaḥ, which yields the meaning "silenced by arrows." This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1191), Pagani (1999, p. 942), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 75–76).

29. "Aṅgada . . . Adorned with his armlets, he lies" aṅgadaḥ . . . nipatito 'ṅgadaḥ: The repetition of the name Aṅgada here is problematic. In keeping with the tenor of the passage (i.e., the repeated playing upon the names and attributes of the monkeys), we have cautiously accepted the reading of Cr, who explains the second occurrence of the name as "characterized by armlets (aṅgadaviśiṣṭaḥ)." Evidently, he is reading the term as a taddhita derivation of the name formed with the suffixation of the ac pratyaya (Pā 5.2.127). Cg attempts to finesse the problem by reading nipatitāṅgadaḥ for the critical edition's nipatito 'ṅgadaḥ, thus providing an easily intelligible bahuvrīhi with the sense "his armlets fallen."

"felled . . . he lies" pātitaḥ . . . nipatitaḥ: The somewhat awkward repetition of pātitaḥ and nipatitaḥ is avoided by V3,D10–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, which read paritaḥ, "on all sides," for pātitaḥ, "felled." Ś,V1,B2,4,D0–3,5–9,12,13,T2,3, G2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read patitaḥ, "fallen," for pātitaḥ, "felled." Cg's reading avoids redundancy by making the substitution mentioned above, where he substitutes a bahuvrīhi compound. These variants are rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 76).

30. "scattered" mṛditāḥ: Literally, "crushed."

"trampled . . . crushed" mathitāḥ: Literally, "crushed, destroyed." We have used two English verbs to reflect the different agents of the various monkeys' destruction.

"by row upon row of chariots" rathajālaiḥ: Literally, "by networks or masses of chariots."

31. "harried from the rear" hanyamānā jaghanyataḥ: Literally, "being struck from behind." The term jaghanya, normally, "hindquarters, buttocks," is used here in a technical military sense of "rear guard of an army" (Apte s.v. jaghanam). See MBh 3.267.16; 6.46.54; 6.104.9,15; 9.18.34; etc.

32. "Apes and monkeys, all mixed together" ṛkṣāḥ . . . vānarais tu vimiśritāḥ: Literally, "apes intermingled with monkeys." The idea here is that, in their panic, the army has broken ranks so that the different troops and species have become mixed up. For a discussion of the difference between ṛkṣas, "apes" [commonly rendered as "bears"], and vānaras, see 6.4.17 and R. Goldman 1989.

33. "many of the yellow-eyed monkeys have been slaughtered by innumerable evil-eyed rākṣasas" piṅgākṣās te virūpākṣair bahubhir bahavo hatāḥ: Literally, "many tawny- or yellow-eyed ones were killed by many squint-eyed ones." D5,9–11,T1,3,M1,3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read piṅgalāḥ, "tawny or yellow [monkeys]," for piṅgākṣāḥ, "yellow-eyed [monkeys]." The half verse is somewhat ambiguous as it fails to identify clearly the killers and the killed. The texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute rākṣasaiḥ, "by rākṣasas," for bahubhiḥ, "by many," and we believe the intention of the passage is to continue the description of the slaughter of the monkeys by the rākṣasas. Cg and Cm, who read bahubhiḥ with the critical edition, understand that what we see here is monkeys whose vision may be impaired (virūpākṣa) killing other tawny monkeys, perhaps in panic. (piṅgalāḥ vānarāḥ.

virūpākṣair vānaraiḥ.) This is not implausible in light of the preceding verse, where the monkey troops are represented as having lost all sense of order and discipline in their flight.

34. "Here, I have had them bring you his head" idaṃ cāsyāhṛtaṃ śiraḥ: Literally, "This head of his has been brought." The head actually does not appear in the presence of Sītā until verse 37 below.

35. "so that Sītā could hear him" sītāyām upaśṛṇvantyām: Literally, "while Sītā was listening."

38. "the long-tongued rākṣasa, Vidyujjihva" vidyujjihvaṃ mahājihvam: The poet continues to play upon the names and physical attributes of his characters. Vidyujjihva means "lightning-tongued."

39. "wretched woman" kṛpaṇā: A number of manuscripts (V,B2,D0–4,9–11,T1) and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the accusative kṛpaṇām for the critical edition's kṛpaṇā. This reading is reflected in those translations that follow the text of Ct. For them, the adjective kṛpaṇām must modify avasthām, "state, condition," rather than sītām, "Sītā." The meaning would thus be "Let her clearly see the pitiful final state of her husband."

40. "beautiful" priyadarśanam: Despite the sorry condition of the head referred to in verse 34 above, the head, as Ct notes, is just as beautiful as Rāma's own (rāmaśirovat priyadarśanam ity arthaḥ).

"swiftly withdrew" kṣipram antaradhīyata: Literally, "disappeared quickly." Several of the commentators read something into Vidyujjihva's rapid departure. Ct thinks Vidyujjihva withdraws so quickly because he has realized the impropriety of remaining for any length of time in the women's quarters (apāgacchat strīgoṣthyāṃ sthātum ayuktatvadhīyeti bhāvaḥ). Cr attributes a still higher motive to Vidyujjihva, arguing that his rapid withdrawal suggests that his compassion has been aroused by the mere sight of Sītā (sītādarśanamātreṇa tasya dayotpanneti sūcitam).

41. "threw down" cikṣepa: Ct, Cg, and Cm gloss, "he snatched (ācakarṣa)," with Cg supplying the additional phrase, "from Vidyujjihva's hand (vidyujjihvahastād ity arthaḥ)."

"famed throughout the three worlds" triṣu lokeṣu vikhyātam: Cg explains that the bow is renowned because it is, in fact, Viṣṇu's bow (vaiṣṇavatvād iti bhāvaḥ). This is presumably the bow that Rāma took from the hand of Rāma Jāmadagnya in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.75.4).

"and said this to Sītā" sītām idam uvāca ha: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8–13,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead rāmasyaitad iti bruvan, "saying, 'this is Rāma's.' "

42. "your precious Rāma" tava rāmasya: Literally, "Of your Rāma." We have added the ironic adjective to convey the contemptuous tone Rāvaṇa would use.

43. "When he . . . had flung . . . Rāvaṇa" vinikīrya rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇa having flung." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead vini(ca vi—D9) kīryamāṇaḥ, "flinging down."

"and Vidyujjihva" vidyujihvena saha: Literally "with Vidyujihva." Several of the commentators note the irregular loss of the first "j" of the name.

"You must obey me." bhava me vaśānugā: Literally, "you must be submissive to me."

See 6.23.1–3 for a theological explication of this verse by Cr.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 23

1–3. Cm subjects this passage to a close and elaborate theological reading in which he argues that the Sītā who is being fooled by Rāvaṇa's trickery is really fictive and is described here only in keeping with the demands and conventions of the divine narrative. He notes that Rāvaṇa fully recognizes the divinity of the goddess and desires only death at Rāma's hands. Cm further argues, as he has done previously, that Rāvaṇa's solicitation of Sītā's favors here is actually a cryptic appeal for the grace and favor of the goddess. He claims that the allegations that Rāma is dead, etc., are merely a ruse to deceive the other rākṣasas, and he concludes by resorting to the ekākṣarakoṣa, according to which the syllable mā, "mother," refers to the goddess Lakṣmī (i.e., Sītā) and the syllable "a" refers to Viṣṇu (i.e., Rāma). Thus, he argues that Rāvaṇa's apparent demand that Sītā submit herself to his will in verse 6.22.43 is actually an exhortation to Sītā to remain always devoted to her lord, Viṣṇu (in the form of Rāma). Thus, he reads bhava me vaśānugā ("You must obey me") as "O Mā (Lākṣmī), always follow the wishes of 'A' (Viṣṇu)." Here he reads "me vaśānugā" as "me 'vaśānugā." (vāstavārthas tu me vaśānugety atrāvaśānugeti chedaḥ he me lakṣmīḥ! avaśānugā asya viṣṇo rāmasya vaśam anugacchatīty avaśānugā bhavety arthaḥ.) See notes to 5.18.4ff. See, too, 6.22.43; 6.37.9; and 6.48.13 and notes.

"alliance with Sugrīva that had been mentioned by Hanumān" sugrīvapratisaṃsargam ākhyātaṃ ca hanūmatā: See 5.33.47. As Ct notes, Sītā's prior knowledge of the alliance with the monkeys lends credence to Rāvaṇa's report of the devastation of the monkey host in verse 6.22.24 above (hanūmatākhyātaṃ sugrīvapratisaṃsargaṃ sugrīvarāmasaṃbandhaṃ rāvaṇakalpitavānaravadhasyopapādakam). Cg is uncertain as to whether Sītā has heard about the alliance from Rāvaṇa or observed it directly. (rāvaṇamukhāc chrutveti śeṣaḥ. yadvā dṛṣṭvā jñātvety arthaḥ . . . anyatra sākṣātkāraḥ.)

"forehead" keśāntadeśam: Literally, "the place where the hair ends." We follow Cg, Cm, and Ct in reading this as a kenning for "forehead (lalāṭa)."

"crest-jewel" cūḍāmaṇim: At 5.36.52, the term refers to Sītā's hair ornament.

"Shrieking like an osprey" krośantī kurarī yathā: The image is a commonplace in the literature to represent lamenting women. Cf. 6.30.10–12; 6.39.9; 6.98.26; and notes; and also Pratijñāyaugandharāyaṇa iv.24. The male osprey (Pandion haliaetus haliaetus [kurara]) is particularly known for its piercing screams during the bird's elaborate aerial display at the time of courting and early incubation. See Fitzgerald 1998. Hammer (unpublished) in a detailed study argues that the kurarī is not, in fact, an osprey (Pandion haliaetus) but rather a curlew (Numenius arquata orientalis).

"Kaikeyī" kaikeyīm: Cr takes the name as an adjectival derivative (taddhita) referring to Kaikeyī's maidservant, Mantharā (kekayīdāsīṃ mantharām).

4. "I hope you are satisfied now, Kaikeyī" sakāmā bhava kaikeyi: Literally, "May you be one whose wish has been fulfilled, Kaikeyī!" Cr understands that Sītā is speaking with an ironic tone of voice (kāku) and thus means to say to Kaikeyī (by which he understands, as before, Mantharā) that her dreams, too, have come to naught (kākvā tavāpi manoratho bhraṣṭa iti sūcitam).

"You malicious creature!" kalahaśīlayā: Literally, "by you, whose nature is quarrelsome." Cg understands the epithet to mean that Kaikeyī's very purpose was to bring about the destruction of Rāma through the pretext of his temporary exile, and, in so doing, she has inadvertently brought about the destruction of the entire Raghuvaṃśa, whose members are dependent on Rāma. Thus, Kaikeyī has occasioned a perverse fulfillment of her plans. (tvayā sarvaṃ kulaṃ raghuvaṃśa utsāditaṃ bhavati. tathā kulanandano 'yaṃ rāmo hataḥ. pravrājanavyājena rāmahananam eva tvayā saṃkalpitaṃ tad idānīṃ viparītaphalaṃ te jātam. kulatantubhūtarāmahananena tad ekaparāḥ sarve bharatādayo hatā eva kalaha eva te prayojanaṃ phalitam iti bhāvaḥ.) Cf. 5.11.23–36, where Hanumān describes the potential destruction of the lineage in the event of the failure to find Sītā.

5. "Kaikeyī . . . she " kaikeyyāḥ . . . tayā: Literally, "of Kaikeyī . . . by her." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg substitute instead the vocative kaikeyi, "O Kaikeyī," and the pronoun tvayā, "by you" (printed editions only), thus making this verse a continuation of Sītā's direct address to Kaikeyī. Raghunathan, alone among the translators, renders this variant (1982, vol. 3, p. 77).

"from his home" gṛhāt: D5–7,10,11,T,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Crā, Ck, and Cg read instead mayā, which must then be construed, following Ct, as mayā saha, "along with me."

"in the barkcloth garments of an ascetic" cīravasanas tayā: Literally, "wearing cīra . . . by her." The word cīra normally refers to rags or tattered garments but is attested elsewhere in the sense of the barkcloth garments of an ascetic (cf. KumāSaṃ 6.93 and ManuSm 11.101). Our choice of reading is, of course, informed by 3.33.6–13, where Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and Sītā put on barkcloth garments. See, too, Emeneau 1988. D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cm read instead cīravasanaṃ dattvā, "having given [him] barkcloth garments."

6. "young woman" bālā: Literally, "child, girl." Cg understands that the term suggests Sītā's tenderheartedness (mṛdubuddhir ity arthaḥ).

"fell to the ground" jagāma jagatīm: Literally, "went to the earth." The term jagatī is slightly unusual in the sense of the ground under one's feet. As is suggested by Cg, and made clear in the following verse, we are to understand that Sītā has fainted (mūrcchitety arthaḥ).

7. "she heaved a sigh and regained consciousness" samāśvasya pratilabhya ca cetanām: In normal usage, sam + ā √śvas means "to regain consciousness or to take comfort." Thus, for example, Bhavabhūti uses it regularly to indicate that a character has regained consciousness (see, for example, UttaRāC 3.6.7; 3.8.5,6; 3.9.3; etc.). Here, in agreement with Cg, who understands, "having taken a breath (ucchvāsaṃ prāpya)," and, given the context, we are forced to take the gerund in its root meaning, "to sigh or breathe deeply."

"large-eyed woman" āyatekṣaṇā: Cg reads this stereotyped description of a beautiful woman to mean that Sītā, her vision blurred by tears, has had to open her eyes wide in order to see the head (āyatekṣaṇāśrumiśratvena śirovalokanārthaṃ vistṛtalocanety arthaḥ).

"kissed" samupāghrāya: V2,B3,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead samupāsthāya, "having brought near or having approached."

8. "one who followed the code of the warrior" vīravratam anuvratā: Literally, "vowed to one whose vow is that of a hero." Many northern and southern manuscripts (D0,1,3,5,7,9–11,T3,M1–3) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the masculine vocative vīravratam anuvrata, "O you who are devoted to the vow of a hero," which would then refer to Rāma. Ct interprets vīravratam as "the firm vow to keep his father's words (sudṛḍhaṃ pitṛvākyapālanavratam)." Cr interprets the phrase as "O one whose character is to adhere to the heroic way of life (vīrarītipālanaśīla)." Cg glosses, "O one who has made a vow never to turn back without having slain his foe (vīravrataṃ śatrum ahatvā na nivartiṣya iti saṃkalpam anuvrata anuprāpta)."

"I have now been made a widow and so must share this, your final state." imāṃ te paścimāvasthāṃ gatāsmi vidhavā kṛtā: Literally, "Made a widow, I have gone to this final state of yours [i.e., died]." The syntax and the exact sense of this sentence are unclear. Ct proposes supplying the word nāśāt, "because of death or destruction," to be governed by the enclitic pronoun te, yielding the sense "Because of your death, I have come to this final condition, that is, I have been made a widow. (te tava nāśād imāṃ paścimāvasthāṃ gatāsmi. tām avasthām āha vidhavā kṛteti.)" Cr, Cm, and Cg, on the other hand, derive the sense of the participle gatā from the root $\sqrt{gam}$ in its meaning of "to know or perceive." They thus understand Sītā to be saying, "I have seen your final state and thus have been made a widow. (gatāsmi dṛṣṭavaty asmi. gatyārthā jñānārthā iti nyāyāt. ato vidhavā kṛtā—so Cg.)" These commentators may have been influenced by the construction in verse 6.22.39 above, where Rāvaṇa orders Vidyujjihva to make Sītā witness her husband's final state. Our translation is influenced by the northern reading "iyaṃ te paścimāvasthā hatāsmi vidhavā kṛtā (Such is your final state; having been made a widow, I am destroyed)." The sense is that Sītā, witnessing the apparent death of Rāma, cannot continue to live and, as a pativratā, must follow him in death.

9. "because of the wife's lack of virtue: nāryāḥ . . . vaiguṇyam: We follow the interpretation of Cg, Cm, and Ck, who put forward the culturally sanctioned cliché that holds the wife accountable for her own widowhood (prathamaṃ bhartur maraṇaṃ bhāryādoṣanimittakaṃ bhavati). Ct and Cr gloss vaiguṇyam, "lack of virtue," as anarthaḥ, "calamity," understanding that the prior death of a husband is the greatest calamity that can befall a woman (mukhyo 'narthaḥ). Cg suggests that the verse can be read in two ways. The first of these, which we follow, has Sītā questioning the traditional wisdom in that, since she sees herself as having been an exemplary wife, she cannot understand how Rāma could have predeceased her. She thus may be seen as blaming Rāma. (suvṛttas tvaṃ sādhuvṛttāyā mamāgrataḥ saṃvṛtto mṛtaḥ katham idaṃ saṃgacchata iti bhāvaḥ. asmin pakṣe na suvṛttapadasvārasyam.) As an alternate reading, Cg suggests that Sītā is, in essence, accepting blame for her husband's death (yadvā bhavanmaraṇasya maddoṣa eva hetur ity āha).

"departed" saṃvṛttaḥ: Given the clear context, we must agree with the majority of the commentators in understanding this term in the unusual sense of "died." Cr reads saṃvṛtaḥ, "hidden, obscured," which he glosses as tirohitaḥ, "hidden," which here, also somewhat unusually, must mean "dead." This reading is unattested as a variant in the critical apparatus, or in any of the printed editions consulted, except for the 1930 edition of NSP (6.32.9); but compare the 1888 edition of NSP, which reads with the critical edition.

10. "While I . . . am sunk in an ocean of grief" magnāyāḥ śokasāgare: The syntax of the verse, with its unresolved genitive construction in pādas a and b, has puzzled the commentators. Cm and Ct propose adding the phrase mama maraṇam eva varam, that is, "for me [who am sunk] . . . death would be preferable." Cr proposes adding the phrase mama duḥkham avalokya in the sense of "[you, Rāma], having seen the distress of me [who am sunk]." Cg, whom we follow here, reads the first half of the verse as a genitive absolute in keeping with Pā 2.3.37, which he quotes, glossing it with the parallel locative absolute. One can perhaps read this as a kind of anādaraṣaṣṭhī (Pā 2.3.38) in which Sītā could be seen as blaming Rāma for allowing himself to be slain while attempting to rescue her.

"from one sorrow to another" duḥkhād duḥkham: Cg details the sequence of sorrows that Sītā has had to endure, including the exile to the forest, her abduction by Rāvaṇa, and, finally, the death of her husband. A few devanāgarī manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead mahad duḥkham, "great sorrow."

11. "now like a loving cow bereft of her calf" vatseneva yathā dhenur vivatsā vatsalā kṛtā: Literally, "like a loving cow made calf-less by her calf." The pathetic image of a cow bereft of its calf is used frequently to describe Kausalyā when bereft of Rāma, as well as to refer to other women in similar circumstances. See 2.34.4; 2.36.7; 2.38.16–17; 2.68.24–25; and notes. See, too, 6.39.9 and note. Apparently to avoid the awkwardness of vatseneva . . . vivatsā, "like [one] calf-less by a calf," D9,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct replace the phrase vatseneva, "as if by a calf," with the phrase vatsalā te, "so loving toward you."

12. "Your valor was beyond imagination . . . who" yair acintyaparākrama: Literally, "O you of unimaginable valor! . . . by whom."

"who foretold a long life for you" ādiṣṭaṃ dīrgham āyus te yair: Literally, "by whom long life was foretold of you." Cg notes that those brahmans who had predicted a long life for Rāma did so only on the basis of their observation of his valor and not on the basis of their consultation of the śāstras (acintyaparākramety anena te parākramaṃ dṛṣṭvā tair uktaṃ na tu śāstraṃ dṛṣṭveti gamyate). By using the term śāstras, Cg is no doubt referring to the scientific texts on astrology (jyotiḥśāstra) and bodily signs (sāmudrika-śāstra). See 5.33.11–20 and notes.

D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr substitute, for pāda a, dai(de—D11)vajñair api rāghava, "O Rāghava, even by the fortune tellers or astrologers."

"for your life has been cut short" alpāyur asi: Literally, "you are one of little life span."

13. The verse is slightly elliptical and somewhat ambiguous, and the commentators have proposed a variety of interpretations. We believe that the basic meaning is that Sītā, puzzled that so wise and clever a person as Rāma could have fallen into the rākṣasas' trap, thinks that he must have been befuddled by fate or doom. This is in keeping with the popular maxim vināśakāle viparītabuddhiḥ, "at the appointed hour of doom one's mind becomes befuddled." The verse also relies on the popular metaphor of Kāla (Time, Death) "cooking" all creatures, in the sense that Kāla leads all creatures to maturity and finally death. See MBh 1.1.188; 17.1.3; and Maitrāyaṇī Upaniṣad 6.15 (kālaḥ pacatīti bhūtāni).

"Or . . .?" atha vā: We agree with the critical edition and the suggestion of several of the commentators (Ct, Ck, and Cs) that the common indeclinable athavā, "or," should be read as two words, atha and vā. These commentators understand atha as a question marker (athaśabdaḥ praśne) and take vā in the sense of athavā (vā athavā). The notion, as expressed by some of the commentators, is that Sītā, having raised the question of the inaccuracy of the astrologers' predictions in the previous verse, now rejects that notion and introduces the concept of an imponderable fate beyond the ability of wise men to predict.

"did your wisdom fail you, even though you were so wise" naśyati prajñā prājñasyāpi sataḥ: According to Ct and Ck, the idea here is that, owing to some lapse or failure of wits, Rāma fell asleep and so fell into the power of his enemies (prajñādaurbalyāt supto 'rivaśaṃ prāpta iti śeṣaḥ). Cg and Cs suggest that perhaps it is not Rāma who has lost his wits but the astrologers themselves, who, according to Cg, were no match for Rāma's evil destiny (athavā teṣām anṛtavāditvaṃ nāsty eva kiṃ tu tavaiva bhāgyaviparyāsāt teṣām api prajñā naṣṭeti pakṣāntaram avalambate).

"who creates all beings" bhūtānāṃ prabhavaḥ: Literally, "the source of beings." Most of the commentators whom we follow take prabhavaḥ in its common meaning of "source or origin." Thus, Cs explains, "Kāla is both the creator (utpādakaḥ) and destroyer (saṃhārakaḥ) of creatures."

"leads them inevitably to destruction" pacaty enam: Literally, "he cooks or ripens him."

14. "unforeseen death" adṛṣṭaṃ mṛtyum: Literally, "unseen death." Commentators generally take the adjective adṛṣṭaṃ, "unseen," in the sense of "unexpected (ajñātam—Ct, Cr, Ck)." Cg, however, understands it to mean "[unforeseen] because of [Rāma's] having been asleep (sauptikatvāt)."

15. "Having fallen into my clutches" saṃpariṣvajya: Literally, "having embraced."

"I who am . . . Kālarātri, the dark night of universal destruction" kālaratryā mayā: Literally, "by me, Kālarātri." Cg describes Kālarātri as "a certain female divinity (śakti) who carries off all creatures (kālarātrir nāma sarvabhūtāpahāriṇī kācana śaktiḥ)." Through the use of this metaphor (vyastarūpaka, or "uncompounded" metaphor, according to Cg [see Gerow 1971, s.v. asamastarūpaka, p. 245]), Sītā is blaming herself for her husband's death. Notably, in an earlier context, Hanumān has described her in exactly the same way when warning Rāvaṇa of the destruction Sītā will ultimately bring to the city of Laṅkā (see 5.49.33 and note). See Sutherland 1989. A few manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cv appear uncomfortable with the metaphor, substituting the genitive mama for the instrumental mayā. This, as Cg proposes, should be read as the ablative mattaḥ, "from me," yielding the sense "who has been taken away from me by Kālarātri." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 77) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1478) follow Cg's reading. Cg notes the critical reading and its interpretation as a variant.

"you, a lotus-eyed hero" tvam . . . kamalalocanaḥ: Literally, "you, a lotus-eyed one." V3,D0,3,13,T1,2,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cm and Cg read the vocative kamalalocana. Cg remarks on the propriety of the epithet here, noting that Rāma was taken away by Kālarātrī (v.l. Kālarātri), literally, "the night of Kāla," because of his lotus eyes. The allusion is to the well-known fact that lotus blossoms are closed at night. Cg identifies the figure here as a metaphor, rūpaka, supported by the figure parikara, in which each modifier of a noun lends a particular meaning (see Gerow 1971, s.v. parikara, p. 203).

"thus" tathā: Cg suggests that this phrase is used to avoid the inauspiciousness and sense of revulsion that would arise if Sītā had referred directly to the severing of Rāma's head (śiraśchedāder aśīlatvena tathety uktam).

16. "to my misery" mām . . . tapasvinīm: Literally, "miserable, or pitiable, me."

"bull among men" puruṣarṣabha: Cg argues that this term is used here to illuminate the impropriety of the treachery suggested in this verse on the part of so well-bred and noble a hero (anena dakṣiṇasya śaṭhatvam anucitam iti dyotate).

"lie in the embrace of the earth, as if she were a beautiful and beloved woman" upaśeṣe . . . priyām iva śubhāṃ nārīṃ pṛthivīm: Literally, "you lie [on] the earth, which is like a beloved, beautiful woman." The syntax seems elliptical, and we follow the suggestion of Cs, who supplies the gerund āliṅgya, "having embraced." D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read iha śeṣe, "you lie here," for upaśeṣe. Cr understands the indeclinable iha to mean "at this time (asmin samaye)." Cs understands iha to refer to "the land protected by the rākṣasas (rakṣorakṣitakṣitau)."

M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg correct the ellipsis by reading samāśliṣya, "having embraced," for śubhāṃ nārīm, "beautiful woman." This yields the sense "having embraced the earth, as if a beloved, [you lie]." This variant is rendered by the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 77).

D5,9–11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read yathā, "just as," for śubhām, "beautiful." This reading is redundant with the iva of pāda c.

Cg takes priyām, "beloved," as a comparative adjective, glossing, "beloved in comparison with me (mattaḥ priyām)." This idea is represented in a number of translations.

18. "blameless hero" anagha: Literally, "O one without sin." Cs notes that this epithet suggests the propriety of [Rāma's] attainment of a heavenly world accessible [only] through meritorious action (anena puṇyalabhyasvargagatiyogyatāṃ sūcayati).

"and with your other ancestors as well" pūrvaiś ca pitṛbhiḥ: Literally, "and with previous fathers." Cs, referring to a text he identifies as the Aitareyabhāṣya, quotes a passage to the effect that all one's male ancestors may be designated by the term pitṛ (pitāmahādyāś ca pitaro nāma kīrtitāḥ). D5–7,9–11,T1,G3,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read sarvaiḥ, "with all [your forefathers]," for pūrvaiḥ, "with previous [fathers]."

19. The verse exhibits a number of variants across the numerous recensions, each of which presents problems of construction and interpretation. The situation is exacerbated in the critical edition, which collocates variants that appear to be found together in no printed edition or commentator's text. See Sutherland 1992.

"You have become a shining star" nakṣatrabhūtas tvam: The reading appears to be shared by the majority of southern manuscripts, with the exception of the textual tradition associated with Ct, Cr, and Ck, who, with most northern manuscripts (Ś, Ñ,V,B,D0–4,8,10–13), read "nakṣatrabhūtaṃ ca (Ñ,V1,B2–4—tu;V2,3—tvam)." In this latter variant, the distinction of becoming a star or constellation belongs not to Rāma but to his entire lineage (rājarṣivaṃśam in pāda c). Ct and Ck explain that the entire Ikṣvāku lineage is accorded this distinction by virtue of the accomplishment of their legendary ancestor Triśaṅku through the application of the "chatrinyāya (the 'maxim of the man with the umbrella,' where there is the ascription of a quality of a single member to an entire group) (triśaṅkos tathātvāc chatrinyāyena vaṃśasya tathātvam—so Ct)." It will be recalled that the Ikṣvāku dynast Triśaṅku attains the status of a nakṣatra at Bālakāṇḍa 59. It is a commonplace of epic and later Indian literature that individuals who acquire great merit in their lifetimes may become stars in the firmament until their good karma has been exhausted (see, for example, 5.15.20). See 6.4.44 and 6.60.24 and notes. Cr, on the other hand, understands the compound to modify the noun karma, "action," in pāda b. He thus explains, "you who have accomplished a great feat, which itself has become a shining star in heaven. That is, it shines brightly everywhere (yena tvayā divi nakṣatrabhūtaṃ sarvatra prakāśamānam ity artho mahat karma kṛtam)." This interpretation is followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1478). Cs appears to be aware of this reading and, quoting Ct, offers it as an alternative, understanding the phrase to modify rājarṣivaṃśam, "the royal lineage of the Ikṣvākus." This interpretation of the reading -bhūtam is found in Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 221) and among translators of the texts and printed editions of Ct, for example, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 91) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 79). Cg, who reads with the critical edition, glosses "become a shining star in the sky" as "mounted in a celestial flying chariot (vimānasthaḥ san)." Vimānas are the typical vehicles from which the gods and other celestial beings survey events on earth. See notes to 5.6.4 and 5.7.18.

Cs takes this opportunity to offer one of his idiosyncratic alternative readings in which he separates the word nakṣatra, "constellation," into na and kṣatra, that is, "not belonging to the kṣatriya-varṇa, 'warrior class.' " He then argues that, although Rāma was born in a kshatriya lineage, he has transcended the status of a mere kshatriya because there are no kshatriyas to equal him even in heaven. This superiority to ordinary royalty is, Cs suggests, also applicable to Rāma's wider lineage in that its dynasts, such as Daśaratha, etc., regularly consort with Indra and the other divinities. It is this fact, indeed, that entitles the lineage to the qualifier puṇyam, "holy." (yan-mahatkarmakṛtaṃ bhuvi tadvaṃśasthātiriktakṣatrabhūtaṃ kṣatrajātyutpannasaṃbaddhaṃ kṣatrabhūsaṃbaddhaṃ neti kiṃ vaktavyam. divy api tādṛśaṃ tatrāpy etat sadṛśaḥ kṣatriyo nāsti tannakṣatrabhūtaṃ kṣatrabhūyiṣṭaṃ neti vā. daśarathādibhir indrādisāhitīkaraṇād iti bhāvaḥ. etādṛśaṃ puṇyaṃ rājarṣivaṃśam upekṣase.)

"great and pleasing deed that you performed" mahat karma kṛtaṃ priyam: Given the reading of the critical edition and the way in which it separates the words, placing a space between karma and kṛtam, which follows the printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck, we are inclined to follow Cr's reading in regarding the clause as elliptical. Like Cr, we have supplied the words "that you [performed] (yena tvayā)." Cr, however, understands the adjective priyam, which we have translated as "pleasing," to modify not the deed performed by Rāma but rather his royal lineage. He thus gives the terms the sense "dear or beloved." Ct and Ck read the three words as a compound, mahat-karmakṛtam, which would then modify their reading nakṣatrabhūtam, "the state of being celestial bodies," which these commentators, as indicated above, ascribe to Rāma's entire lineage. Their interpretation is, then, "You have acquired the status of a shining star by means of that great feat." They understand the feat in question to be Rāma's famous adherence to his father's word (mahatā pitṛvacaḥpālanarūpeṇa karmaṇā). Cv and Cs understand mahatkarma to be a tatpuruṣa compound either in the sense of "performing the feats of the great (mahatāṃ karmakāriṇam—so Cv)" or "a feat of the great (mahatām karma—so Cs)."

Cg, Cm, and Crā have a different reading, mahatkarmakṛtām, which here is a genitive plural. Cg takes the compound in the sense of "[that merit] that belongs to those who have performed great deeds (mahākarmakṛtām)." Cg notes that the karmadhāraya mahat-karma is an epic irregularity for the Pāṇinian mahākarma (ātvābhāva ārṣaḥ).

Cm and Crā avoid the grammatical problem by reading mahat nominally in the sense of "great persons." Cm reads the compound as a dvandva to mean "of those great men and those who have performed [good] actions (mahantaś ca te karmakṛtaś ca teṣām)" and thus sees this as governing the adjective priyam, which he takes to mean "desirable" and which he sees as referring to the Ikṣvāku lineage.

"you . . . ignore" samupekṣase: Manuscripts and the southern commentators are divided as to whether to read as the critical edition does in the sense of "you neglect, ignore, disdain" (so Cm, Ct) or some variant of samavekṣase in the sense of "you see, survey, look down upon" (so Ś,Ñ,V,B,D0–5,8,12,13,G1,2,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Ck). Among the commentators consulted, Ct, Cr, Cm, and

Cs read with the critical edition, while Cg and Ck read the variant. The issue is whether Sītā is rebuking Rāma for having abandoned his lineage on earth by ascending to the heavens or whether he has ascended to the heavens for the purpose of seeing his departed ancestors there. Thus, Ct glosses, "having abandoned, you depart (tyaktvā gacchasi)." Cr sees an implicit critical question, adding the interrogative "why [do you neglect your own royal lineage]? (kim artham)." Cg glosses, simply, "you see (paśyasi)." Ck is similar. Cm, reading with the critical edition, offers no explanation. Cs, while reading with the critical edition, appears to offer both alternatives plus a third option of his own. Thus, he offers an interpretation similar to that of Ct, whose interpretation he also quotes in full. But he also raises the possibility that Rāma has gone to heaven in order to see his royal lineage, headed by his father, etc. Cs then adds yet another twist to this verse by offering the possibility of taking the term rājarṣivaṃśam as Sītā's reference to her own noble lineage, the Janakavaṃśa, which she accuses Rāma of insulting by his failure to take her along with him to the heavens. (mahatkarmakṛtaṃ puṇyam rājarṣivaṃśaṃ pitrādikaṃ yathā rāma īkṣase paśyasi. tatra gataḥ. tathā puṇyam ātmano mama rājarṣivaṃśaṃ janakavaṃśam. kim upekṣase madanayaneneti vā.)

Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 91) understands Sītā to be saying that Rāma disdains to rejoin his holy lineage of royal seers. In this interpretation, he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 79) and Pagani (1999, p. 944). Pagani, who follows the text of the GPP with its three commentators (Ct, Cr, and Cg), amplifies this interpretation in a note (p. 1657) in which she claims that the commentators understand that Rāma neglects his lineage because he has died without an heir. We are unable to locate any commentary that says anything even remotely like this.

20. "I was but a girl and you yourself a mere boy" bālāṃ bālena: Literally, "a girl by a boy." Cr, alone among the commentators, understands the term bālā to mean "ignorance" and appears to suggest that it was through Sītā's ignorance [perhaps of the fact that she would be widowed so early] that she was acquired by Rāma (bālāṃ saṃprāptāṃ mām bālena mamājñānena hetubhūtena kiṃ na prekṣase). See notes to 2.17.26 and 3.45.10, dealing with the ages of Rāma and Sītā.

D6,T2,3,G2,3,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read bālyena, "by childhood." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 78), the only translator consulted to render this, understands, "whom you wedded as a youth."

21. " 'I will be with you forever.' " cariṣyāmīti: Literally, "I will go or I will wander." We follow Cg and Cm, who supply the phrase "with you (tvayā saha)." Ct, Cr, and Ck do so as well but also add a direct object for the root √car, "to move," namely, "religious activities, etc. (dharmādikam)." They thus read √car in the sense of "to do or perform," having evidently in mind the common kenning for a spouse, dharmasahacārin; -cāriṇī. The ellipsis is easily understood in light of the final word of the preceding verse where Sītā describes herself as Rāma's "sahacāriṇī (lifelong companion)."

"you . . . took my hand in marriage" gṛhatā pāṇim . . . tvayā: Literally, "by you taking the hand." The reference is to the ancient custom in the Hindu wedding ceremony of pāṇigrahaṇa, in which the bride and groom grasp hands and circumambulate the ritual fire (see Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 427).

22. "abandoned me . . . leaving me" mām apahāya . . . tyaktvā mām: Several of the commentators are disturbed by the redundancy and seek either to eliminate or explain it. Cr argues that the verbal root √hā, "to abandon," when preceded by the upasarga apa and having the sense of "motion" need not be interpreted to mean

"leave," its common meaning. Thus, Cr glosses the phrase mām apahāya, "having left me," as vana ānīya, "having brought me through the forest," thereby avoiding the redundancy. Cg reads the gerund tyaktvā to refer to Sītā and supplies as its object tvām, "you," thus yielding the sense "having left me who had left you." Cs offers a similar interpretation but reverses the referents of the two gerunds. He also suggests that the redundancy here reflects the excess of Sītā's grief, quoting a passage to the effect that speech uttered in jest or lamentation is meaningless. ("duḥkhātiśayād vā punaruktiḥ. parihāse pralāpe ca vāg anarthāpi dṛśyate" anarthā nirarthā.)

"resourceful hero" gatimatāṃ vara: Literally, "O best of those endowed with motion or alternatives." The precise sense of the epithet is not entirely clear here, and it is probable that it is used primarily to echo the participle gataḥ, "gone away," which immediately precedes it. Translators have offered a variety of explanations, such as Dutt's simple, but opaque, "best of goers" (1893, p. 1194); Raghunathan's "you who aim at the highest of goals" (1982, vol. 3, p. 78); Gita Press's "O jewel among the resourceful" (1969, vol. 3, p. 1478); and Roussel's "le plus sensé" (1903, vol. 3, p. 94), echoed by Shastri's "the wisest of Sages" (1959, vol. 3, p. 79) and Pagani's "toi le plus avisé des hommes d'ici-bas" (1999, p. 944). These last three reflect the sense found in the northern recension, matimatāṃ vara, "foremost among the wise," which itself is probably a gloss on the southern reading. Cf. Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 222 and our Introduction, pp. 115–16.

23. "Your body" śarīraṃ te: Ck, wishing to be technically correct, notes that this is the headless trunk of Rāma (kabandharūpam ity arthaḥ).

"accustomed to" ucitam: D5–7,9–11,T3,G1,2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead ruciram, "beautiful."

"only the finest things" kalyāṇaiḥ: Commentators differ as to what is being referred to here. Ct and Cm simply gloss, "auspicious things (mañgalaiḥ)." Cr explains, "many auspicious ministrations (anekamāñgalikopacāraiḥ)." Cg offers two alternatives: "excellent sandalpaste, etc., or golden ornaments (śubhaiś candanādibhir vā suvarṇābharaṇair vā)."

"embraced by me alone" pariṣvaktaṃ mayaiva: Cg notes that the phrase demonstrates Rāma's monogamy, adding the words "and by none other (ananyayā)." Even though this is a relatively unusual characteristic among the Indian epic heroes, it is rarely highlighted or mentioned in the commentaries.

"dragged and torn apart" viparikṛṣyate: Literally, "dragged apart and about." We have used the two verbs in an effort to render the sense of the two upasargas, vi and pari.

24. "You performed the vedic rites" yajñair iṣṭavān: Cg, striving to be technically correct, notes that Rāma would only properly perform the vedic rites after ending his period of life as a forest renunciant. He further notes that, in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, Rāma did not offer vedic sacrifices before going into the forest. According to Cg, Sītā is lamenting that Rāma has been cut off in the midst of life and thus has been denied the opportunity to perform his ritual duties as a householder and so be eligible for the last rites of the vedic religion. (atra vanavasāt pūrvam agnyādhānādyabhāvāt tannivṛttyanantaram ādhānāgniṣṭomādikam anuṣṭhāya paścātkramaprāptāyuravasāne yajñīyāgnibhiḥ saṃskāraṃ prāptuṃ yogyas tvaṃ katham evaṃ madhye maraṇaṃ prāpto 'sīti bhāvaḥ.)

"Agniṣṭoma" agniṣṭoma-: This is the name of a soma sacrifice typically performed in the spring as part of the Jyotiṣṭoma sacrifice. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1134–1203; and Renou 1954, p. 4.

"purificatory rite of cremation" saṃskāram: The term here can carry either or both the senses of 1) purification and 2) a vedic rite of passage, in this case specifically the antyeṣṭi, or funerary ritual.

"in the sacred fire" agnihotreṇa: Literally, "by means of the agnihotra." Agnihotra is the name of a particular oblation to the fire god, Agni, but is used frequently to refer to the sacrificial fire itself. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 998–1008; and Renou 1954, pp. 4–5.

25. "sorrowfully longing" śokalālasā: Literally, "[she] longing in grief." Cg glosses, "[she] stupefied with grief (śokamandā)."

"will now have to question" pariprakṣya(D7,11—kṣa)ti: Literally, "she will ask." Ś2,Ñ,V,B1–3,D7,9–11,13,T,G1,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead pariprekṣyati, "she will see."

"who, alone . . . will return" ekam āgatam: Literally, "one [who has] come." Cs notes that Sītā's understanding is correct based on Rāvaṇa's statement at 6.22.23 above, where he tells her that Lakṣmaṇa has fled with the surviving monkeys ("diśaṃ pravrājitaḥ sarvair lakṣmaṇaḥ plavagaiḥ saha" iti lakṣmaṇasya jīvatvokter īyam uktir yuktā).

27. "and that I am living in the rākṣasa's household" māṃ ca rakṣogṛhaṃ gatām: Literally, "and me, gone to the house of a rākṣasa."

"she will die of a broken heart" hṛdayena vidīrṇena na bhaviṣyati: Literally, "with a shattered heart, she will not exist."

Following verse 27, Ś,D1–3,5–13,S (G3 after verse 28) insert a passage of two lines [484*]: "For the sake of a worthless wretch like me,[1] the king's son Rāma, who did not deserve this,[2] has crossed the mighty ocean only to drown in a puddle.[3]"

[1]"For the sake of a worthless wretch like me" mama hetor anāryāyāḥ: Literally, "because of ignoble me."

[2]"who did not deserve this" anarhaḥ: Cg and Crā point out that Sītā means that Rāma did not deserve such a death, that is, in his sleep (etādṛśasauptikavadhānarhaḥ). D5,9–11,T1,G2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead anaghaḥ, "sinless, irreproachable."

[3]"has crossed the mighty ocean only to drown in a puddle" sāgaram uttīrya . . . gospade hataḥ: Literally, "having crossed the ocean was killed in a cow's hoofprint." As several of the commentators point out, this is a proverbial metaphorical expression. The sense is that Rāma, having slain formidable foes such as Khara, has been slain by an insignificant foe, Prahasta (kharatarakharādīn hatvā kṣudreṇa prahastena hata ity arthaḥ).

Following 484*, D1,2,5–7,9–11,S continue with a passage of four lines [485*]: "It was out of delusion that the son of Daśaratha married me, a disgrace to my own family. I was born to be the death of my noble lord, Rāma, in the guise of his wife.[1] Indeed, I think I must have once[2] prevented some great gift,[3] since now that I have become the wife of him for whom all the world is a guest,[4] I am left here to grieve."

[1]"I was born to be the death of . . . Rāma, in the guise of his wife" rāmasya bhāryā mṛtyur ajāyata: Literally, "a wife was born as Rāma's death or death was born as Rāma's wife."

[2]"Indeed, I think I must have once" nūnaṃ manye mayā jātu: D6,7,T2,3,G1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead nūnam anyāṃ mayā jātim. According to this reading, which is followed by all the translators of the southern recension, the sense is "Surely, I must have prevented some great gift in a previous birth." According to the southern commentators, Sītā feels that she has failed to make some significant gift, presumably to the brahmans, in a previous life. The commentators understand the accusative jātim either as a locative (so Ct, Cr, Cg, second alternative) (anyāṃ jātim anyasmiñ janmani—so Cg) or as the object of an implicit gerund, "having obtained (prāpya—so Cg, first alternative)."

[3]"[I must have] . . . prevented some great gift" [mayā] . . . vāritaṃ dānam uttamam: Cg notes that the reference would be to the gift of a girl in marriage (kanyādānam), while Ct adds to this the prized gifts of cattle, land, and gold (kanyādānaṃ gobhūhiraṇyādidānaṃ ca).

[4]"for whom all the world is a guest" sarvātither iha: Literally, "having everyone as a guest here." Commentators vary in their understanding of this obscure epithet. Ct and Ck understand it to mean "affectionate toward all guests" and construe it with the following adverb iha, "here," in the sense of "at the proper time and place (sarvātithipriyasyeha kāle deśe ca)." Cr understands it to mean "for whom everyone is a guest, that is, a supplicant (sarvo 'tithir yācako yasya)." Cg offers two possible interpretations: 1) "he for whom all are guests, that is, the protector of all (sarve 'tithayo yasya tasya sarvātitheḥ sarvarakṣitur ity arthaḥ)," and 2) "he who reverences every guest (sarvātithipūjakasyeti vārthaḥ)." Cv and Cm agree with Cg's second interpretation.

28. "But enough of this!" sādhu: We take the term as an interjection. The idea is that Sītā has now finished the lamentation for her departed lord and turns her thoughts to actually joining him in death. Other translators have tended to take the term either in its other sense as an interjection, "very well" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 92; and Pagani 1999, p. 944), or adverbially in the sense of "done well or properly" (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1479; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 78; and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 222). Some translations, for example, those of Dutt and Shastri, appear to ignore the term completely.

"Please . . . let me throw myself upon" pātaya mām . . . upari: Literally, "[you] make or let me fall upon or over." Virtually the entire northern recension, as well as all devanāgarī manuscripts collated for the critical edition and all printed editions consulted with the exception of some texts associated with Cg (D5–6, VSP, KK), reads instead ghātaya, "[you] have [me] slain." Cr explains the syntax as "Place me on top of Rāma and have me slain." In either case, it is clear from the succeeding verses that Sītā is expressing a wish to accompany her husband in death.

29. "Join my head with his head, and my body with his body" śirasā me śiras cāsya kāyaṃ kāyena yojaya: The separate mention of the head and the body perhaps reflects Sītā's understanding that Rāma has been beheaded. Cr, the only commentator to hint at this, glosses, "the remainder of [his] body (śeṣaśarīram)" for "body (kāyam)."

"I shall follow" anugamiṣyāmi: This appears to be a clear allusion to the practice of anugamana, by which a wife follows her husband shortly after his death. It is a variant of the more infamous practice of sahagamana, or so-called suttee. One also sees here a reference to the vedic funerary rite in which the wife lies down on or near the body of her deceased husband but arises before the actual cremation. Cf. RV 10.18.7.

"I do not wish to live for even another moment, wicked woman that I am." muhūrtam api necchāmi jīvituṃ pāpajīvitā: This line, pādas ef, and the following two verses belong mainly to the northern recension (being omitted in D5,7,9–11,T1,3,G,M1,2,5). The editor of the Kumbakonam edition includes these lines in his numbered running text (KK 6.32.33–34) but encloses them in brackets, noting that these verses are not found in older manuscripts, only in modern ones. (idaṃ ślokadvayaṃ prācīnakośeṣu na dṛśyate. auttarāhapāṭha eva dṛśyate). The editor of VSP relegates the entire passage to a footnote after his verse 32 (VSP 6.32.32*, p. 254), noting that it is added in some manuscripts (ity adhikaḥ pāṭhaḥ keṣucit pustakeṣu dṛśyate). Given this textual history, the inclusion of these five lines in the critical text seems highly suspicious. The lines probably should have been relegated to the apparatus or, at the very least, marked as an uncertain reading. One wonders if the choice to include the lines was made because they express the normative and stereotypical portrayal of Indian wifehood.

30. See note to verse 29 above.

31. See note to verse 29 above.

32. "large-eyed lady" āyatekṣaṇā: See note to verse 7 above.

"daughter of Janaka" janakātmajā: M3 and the printed editions of Cg read instead ca punaḥ punaḥ for janakātmajā. This is rendered by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 79) as "[as she looked] again and again."

"there" tatra: Cg glosses, "in the region before [her] (purodeśe)." Northern manuscripts, some southern manuscripts, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead caiva [or cāpi], "and."

33. "lamenting bitterly" lālapyamānāyām: Cg takes the reference to Sītā's lamentation as a departure point for a brief theological excursus. He anticipates an objection to the effect that, since Sītā [although she is the goddess] weeps and laments at the sight of her husband's severed head, just like some ordinary mortal woman, she ought by rights to die of grief and shock in the same fashion. He explains that this is not the case because the divine couple share a common state of being (parasparasattā), which is keeping Sītā alive, since, in fact, there has been no injury to her husband. He notes that this shared state of existence does not necessarily translate into mutual consciousness. By this we understand him to see Sītā's lamentations as genuine, for she does not really know that her husband is alive. (nanu laukikīṣu kācid iva sītā bhartṛśiraḥsākṣātkāre 'pi ciraṃ ruditvā vilapya kathaṃ jīvitaṃ dhārayati sma. ucyate. atra yayor divyadampatyoḥ parasparasattaiva jīvitadhāraṇe nimittaṃ na tu jñānājñāne. ato bhartṛjīvitavaikalyābhāvāt sā jīvati sma.) See notes to verses 41 and 42 below, where Cm and Ct express a different view as to the nature of Sītā's knowledge of the truth.

"sentry" anīkasthaḥ: Literally, "one situated in the army." The term is often used for a guard or sentry. Cm, Ck, Ct, and Cg gloss, "guardian of the gate (dvārarakṣī)," while Cr glosses, "a type of spy or secret agent (cāraviśeṣaḥ)."

34. "May my lord be victorious" vijayasvāryaputra: Literally, "O son of the noble one, be victorious." Ct, Ck, and Cm note that although the term āryaputra is normally used as a wife's stereotypical mode of address to her husband, we are to understand it here as a generic term of respect [reading ārya in the sense of nobleman, master, etc.] (āryaputraśabdo yady api strībhir bhartari prayujyate prāyeṇa tathāpi pūjāmātre sāmānyataḥ prayogo 'pi bodhyaḥ). Cs breaks the sandhi of the sequence vijayasvāryaputra to read vijayasva + aryaputra and then glosses the latter term as svāmiputra, "son of my master," citing Amarakośa (3.3.106) for this sense of arya. With his typical ingenuity, he also offers a different separation of the compound as ari + aputra, which he then reads as a bahuvrīhi compound in the sense of "one who renders his enemies sonless." He concludes by saying that his reading and alternate explanations avoid the confusion engendered by the reading āryaputra, which, he insists, is invariably used in a marital context. (aryaputra svāmiputra "syād aryaḥ svāmivaiśyayoḥ" ity amaraḥ. arayo 'putrā yeneti vā. tenāryaputreti patiṃ prati bhāryā saṃbodhanasyaiva sarvatra sattvena katham evam iti śaṅkānavakāśaḥ.) See 6.102.35 and notes. Cf. 6.61.19 and note.

35. Following 35ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [490*]: "Desiring an audience, he [Prahasta] has sent us,[1] lord. Surely, your majesty, it must be a matter that demands the attention of the king.[2]"

[1]"has sent us" vayaṃ prasthāpitāḥ: Literally, "we have been sent." Cg suggests that since it is most improbable that a group of messengers would be admitted to the inner apartments, the sentry [erroneously] uses the plural out of fear. (vayam iti. bhayena bahuvacanam. bahūnām antaḥpure samāgamāsambhavāt.) D7,9–11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead ahaṃ prasthāpitaḥ, "I have been sent."

[2]"it must be a matter that demands the attention of the king" rājabhāvāt kṣamānvitam: Literally, "because of the nature of the king, [it] is accompanied by or associated with forbearance." The phrase is awkward and obscure, and our translation follows the somewhat labored explanation of Cv, Cg, and Cm, who share this reading. Cg explains, " 'because of the nature of the king' means 'because of the fact of being king.' 'Associated with forbearance' means 'that because of the urgency of action at that moment, there is an expectation of your command because you are the king.' (rājabhāvād rājatvād dhetoḥ. kṣamānvitaṃ tadānīm eva kartavyatveti tava rājabhāvāt kṣamayā tvadājñāpratīkṣaṇenānvitam.)" Ct, Ck, and Cr read the facilior vocative kṣamānvita, which they and those translators who follow them interpret as part of an interjection, "O you who are forbearing because of your kingly nature (he kṣamānvita rājabhāvād rājadharmād dhetoḥ—so Cr)."

36. "to grant an audience to his counselors" mantriṇāṃ darśanaṃ yayau: Literally, "he went to the sight of his counselors." Ct, Ck, and Cm suggest supplying the gerund uddiśya, "with reference to or for the purpose of," which would then govern the accusative darśanam, "sight or audience." Cr glosses, "[went] in order to see (avalokanārtham)."

37. "counselors" mantribhiḥ: Ct and Ck editorialize by supplying the adjective duṣṭa-, "corrupt, evil."

"knowing full well the martial valor of Rāma" viditvā rāmavikramam: Cr notes that he would have learned this from the mouths of his spies (cāramukhād avagatya).

40. "assembled before him" avidūrasthitān: Literally, "standing not far off."

"eager to act on his behalf" hitaiṣiṇaḥ: Literally, "desiring well-being."

41. "with the loud beating of bherī drums sharply struck with drumsticks" bherīninādena sphuṭakoṇāhatena: See 6.17.31–33; 6.24.19; and notes.

"but do not tell them why" vaktavyaṃ ca na kāraṇam: Literally, "and the reason is not to be stated." Ct explains, "say only that the king has issued a summons, but do not tell its purpose (rājāhvayata ity etāvad eva vaktavyaṃ na tv etad artham itīti bhāvaḥ)." Cv, Cg, and Cm understand Rāvaṇa's thinking here to be that if the commanders proclaim throughout the city that the troops are to go forth to battle, Sītā will inevitably hear this and understand that Rāvaṇa's story about the destruction of Rāma's army was a lie (yuddhārthaṃ niryāteti pure pravadanti ced balādhyakṣās tadānīṃ devyāḥ sannidhau kathitaṃ svakīyaṃ rāmasainyavadhavṛttāntavākyam asatyam iti tasyā viditaṃ syād iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg).

Cm goes on to observe that the real meaning of Sītā's lament in verses 1–32 above is that, even though she is fully aware that Rāma's head and bow are illusory, she engages in this elaborate feigned lamentation in order to deceive the rākṣasas. ("sā sītā tacchiro dṛṣṭvā tac ca kārmukam uttamam" ity ārabhya "iti sā duḥkhasaṃtaptā vilalāpāyatekṣaṇā" ity antānāṃ sītāpralāpavākyānāṃ vāstavārthe 'yam āśayaḥ. sītāpi rāmaśiraādikaṃ māyākalpitaṃ jñātvāpi tat satyam iti matveva mithyāpralāpādinā rākṣasān vañcayituṃ bahuvidhaṃ pralapati.) Note that this idea is at variance with the ideas Cg expresses about divinity and omniscience at verse 33. See, too, Ct's comments to verse 42 below.

42. "the commanders of the troops . . . each his own vast host" balādhipās te mahad ātmano balam: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead tadaiva dūtāḥ sahasā mahad balam, "then [his] emissaries immediately [assembled] a vast host."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Ct concludes his remarks on this sarga by noting that we are to understand that Sītā's lamentations here are simply for the purpose of demonstrating her human nature (atra sītāpralāpaḥ svasya mānuṣadharmaprakaṭanāyeti bodhyam). This, of course, bears on the whole question of the ambiguous nature of the avatāra, especially in the case of Rāma (see Pollock 1991, pp. 15–67; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 29–30, passim). Compare the comments of Cg on verse 33 and Cm on verse 41 above.

Sarga 24

1. "Saramā" saramā: The commentators are in general agreement that this is the wife of Vibhīṣaṇa and a woman deeply devoted to Sītā. (vibhīṣaṇapatnīyaṃ saramā. sā tu sītāyāṃ bhaktimatī—so Ct.) Ct, Cm, and Ck argue that we are to understand that Saramā has been deputed by Rāvaṇa to console Sītā since he fears that her delicate nature might succumb to the intense badgering to which he has subjected her (sā hi rāvaṇena jñātasāttvikābhāvātībhartsanena nāśam āśaṅkya sītāśvāsanārthaṃ saṃdiṣṭeti bodhyam—so Ct).

"dear friend" praṇayinī sakhī: D1,4,6,T1,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Crā read the accusatives praṇayinīṃ sakhīm, which would then refer to Sītā rather than Saramā. This reading is rendered only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 79).

Following verse 1, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [496*]: "Then soft-spoken Saramā consoled Sītā, who had been deluded by the lord of the rākṣasas and therefore was afflicted with the deepest sorrow."

2. All the commentators consulted raise the question of how a rākṣasa woman could possibly offer friendship and consolation to Sītā. They find the rationale for this in the present verse. It should be noted, however, that Saramā is not the only rākṣasa woman to act protectively or to show sympathy toward Sītā during her captivity. Others include Trijaṭā (5.25.4–7ff.), Saramā's own daughter, Analā (5.35.11), and Rāvaṇa's queens (5.20.10–12).

"instructed by Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇādiṣṭā: According to Cr, Rāvaṇa has instructed Saramā to protect Sītā from the vicious (krūra) rākṣasa women. The abuse and threats that these rākṣasa women direct toward Sītā is graphically described in the Sundarakāṇḍa (sargas 21–23) (krūrarākṣasībhyo rakṣaṇāya rāvaṇenājñāpitā). Ck is more specific, arguing that Rāvaṇa has instructed Saramā to protect Sītā at all times and by all means, fearing that she might otherwise die as a result of the abuse of the rākṣasa women (sā hi saramā rāvaṇena rakṣārthaṃ sandiṣṭā sarvathā sarvadā bhartsanādau naśyatīti vicārya rāvaṇenaiva samāśvāsanārtham ādiṣṭā). Cg, Cm, and Cv extend this idea somewhat by claiming that Rāvaṇa has ordered Saramā to look out for Sītā's general well-being (yogakṣema). Crā, however, is skeptical about the whole matter. He notes that, although we are clearly meant to understand from the passage that Rāvaṇa has assigned Saramā the task of protecting Sītā, it would also seem quite inappropriate for the demon king to have given orders to his brother's wife. Crā also sees a contradiction between the idea that, on the one hand, Saramā appears to be acting as an agent of Rāvaṇa, while on the other, she is represented below (verses 4–5) as eavesdropping on Rāvaṇa's conversation with Sītā. There she is said to have concealed herself out of fear of Rāvaṇa and appears to be assisting Sītā of her own volition and against Rāvaṇa's interests. Crā admits to being unable to resolve this contradiction and invites the learned to consider how to do so. (upari sakhīsnehena tadbhīru mayā sarvaṃ pratiśrutam. līnayā gahane śūnye bhayam utsṛjya rāvaṇād iti rāvaṇabhayād gūḍhāvasthānena rāvaṇoktavākyaśravaṇaṃ ca pratīyate. vibhīṣaṇabhāryāyā rāvaṇena niyogo 'nucita iva pratibhāti. rāvaṇaniyuktatve tadbhayād gūḍhāvasthānam anupapannam iti pratīyate. atra parihāro vidvadbhiś ca cintanīyaḥ.) See Ck's comments to verses 4–5 below, where he uses similar wording in the same connection. This would suggest that Ck was, in fact, reading, or familiar with, Crā.

"compassionate" sānukrośā: Cr sees Saramā's compassion for Sītā to be a direct consequence of Rāvaṇa's having instructed her to protect the latter (sītāviṣayakadayāviśiṣṭā sā saramā rakṣamāṇayā sītayā mitraṃ kṛtā).

"firm in her vows" dṛḍhavratā: Ct, Ck, and Cm take the adjective to mean that Saramā has firmly vowed to guard Sītā even with her life (prāṇair api mameyaṃ rakṣaṇīyeti dṛḍhapratijñā). Cg understands it to indicate that her friendship for Sītā was undying (anena sakhyasyāpracyutir nirdarśitā).

3. "her friend" sakhīm: Ś1,V,B1,D4,9–12, and Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead the nominative sakhī, which would then refer to Saramā instead of Sītā.

"covered with dirt" dhvastām: The commentators are divided as to how to understand this polysemic adjective. Ct, Cm, and Ck understand, "oppressed by grief [in the case of Sītā] and by the fatigue of a long journey [in the case of the mare to which Sītā is being compared] (pīḍitām adhvaśrameṇa śokena ca—so Ct)." Cv, Cr, and Cg, however, understand the term in its other sense of "covered with dust or dirt (dhūlyupahatām)." We prefer the latter interpretation because of the specific reference to Sītā's rolling in the dust in pāda d, an image reinforced by the closely similar description of Kausalyā at 2.17.18, where the queen is described as having rolled on the ground like a mare in her grief at learning of Rāma's exile.

"like a mare that had been rolling in the dust" upāvṛtya . . . vaḍavām iva pāṃsuṣu: Vālmīki is fond of equine similes to describe women, particularly when they are overwhelmed by sorrow. As noted above, Kausalyā is similarly described at 2.17.18; Sītā herself is compared to a filly rolling on the ground at 5.24.2. In other contexts, Kausalyā is compared to a mare approaching her colt in delight at 2.17.9, while the women of Rāvaṇa's harem are compared to fillies relieved of their heavy loads at 5.7.43. D6,T2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read pāṃsulām, "dusty," for the critical edition's pāṃsuṣu, "in the dust," despite its redundancy with Cg's interpretation of dhvastām. Ct and Ck understand that the mare would roll in the dust to relieve fatigue (śramaṇanāśārthaṃ luthitvā).

4–5. "Sītā" tām: Literally, "her."

Following 4ab, D5,T1,M3, and GPP, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [498*]: "Take heart, Vaidehī, do not despair!"

"Timorous lady, in my love for you, my friend . . . I overheard everything" sakhī-snehena tad bhīru mayā sarvaṃ pratiśrutam: The texts and printed editions of Ct either omit or bracket this line. This creates an awkward and defective reading. Dutt (1893, p. 1196) glosses over the issue by partially including the line, while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 93), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 81), and Pagani (1999, p. 945) omit the line entirely. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1481) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 80) read and translate the line.

"I overcame my fear of Rāvaṇa" bhayam utsṛjya rāvaṇāt: Literally, "having abandoned my fear of Rāvaṇa." The commentators continue to exhibit concern over the apparent contradiction between Saramā's role, on the one hand, as a friend and confidant of Sītā, and, on the other, as an agent of the latter's tormentor, Rāvaṇa. Ct raises the question of how, after the banishment of Vibhīṣaṇa, his wife, Saramā, could have come close enough to Rāvaṇa to overhear his private conversations with Sītā. His explanation is that Saramā had previously overheard the history of the illusory head and bow (māyākṛtavṛttāntam) and had subsequently hidden herself in order to protect Sītā. Saramā claims that she never had any fear of Rāvaṇa, since he had appointed her to guard Sītā and because she was a member of his own race (tava rakṣaṇe niyuktatvāt tajjātitvāc ca). Because of the seeming contradictions here, Ct and Cg note that some authorities think there is a second Saramā (tato anyaivaiṣā saramety anye). Ck certainly offers such a solution, and Ct's reference may well be to him. Cr raises another contradiction. If, he asks, Saramā had to conceal herself to overhear Rāvaṇa's words, how then could she claim to have overcome her fear of him? Cr proposes that what Saramā means to say is that, since she had no fear of Rāvaṇa when it came to aiding Sītā, she was able to discover the reason for Rāvaṇa's hasty departure. (nanu līna-śravaṇe 'pi rāvaṇāt kuto na bhītir ity ata āha. tava hetoḥ tvatprayojanasiddhyarthaṃ rāvaṇān me bhayaṃ nāsti. ata eva yatkṛte yad arthaṃ sasaṃbhrānto rāvaṇo niṣkrāntas tat sarvam abhiniṣkramya bahir gatvā me mama viditam.) See note to verse 6 below.

Ck's interpretation is similar to Ct's. However, he amplifies it somewhat by suggesting that what is meant is that someone other than Saramā was appointed to guard Sītā. Acknowledging the seeming insolubility of the conundrum, he suggests that it should be left to the learned to figure out the solution (atra parihāro vidvadbhiś cintyaḥ). See Crā's similar comment above on verse 2. Note that Ck is perhaps ridiculing Crā in that he actually offers a response to the rhetorical question. Ck offers his own idiosyncratic solution according to which someone other than Saramā, hidden in a thicket out of fear of Rāvaṇa, has blurted out the words quoted by Saramā (saramāntaroktatve bhayān nilayajalpastutasya). The authentic sense, according to Ck, is that the speaker had merely conquered the power of Rāvaṇa's illusion, not his or her fear of the demon king (mohamātram utsṛjya rāvaṇād iti pāṅktatvāt).

Cg raises a different question, asking how Saramā, if not present at the time of [Sītā's] encounter with Rāvaṇa, could have overheard their conversation. He suggests that she was concealed in the hollow of a tree [preferring the v.l. gagane, "in the sky," for the critical reading gahane, "in a thicket"]. He then raises the question of why, just because she was in a deserted spot, she would have lost her fear of Rāvaṇa. He explains, as does Cr, that she places Sītā's welfare above her own life. (tadānīm asannihitayā tvayā kathaṃ śrutam ity atrāha līnayeti. līnāya cchannāya gagane kutra cit tarurandhre gahana iti pāṭha āvṛtta ity arthaḥ. śūnye nirjane kathaṃ ghorād rāvaṇād bhayaṃ tyaktaṃ tatrāha taveti. tava hetos tvannimittaṃ me jīvitam api na priyam.) Cg now raises the same contradiction raised by Crā at verse 2 above, viz., that it would have been inappropriate for Rāvaṇa to employ his brother's wife, but that if she had been so employed, she could have hardly had to hide from him while discharging her duties. Cg's explanation relies on the change in circumstances between the time of Saramā's employment while her husband, Vibhīṣaṇa, was still in good standing in Rāvaṇa's court, and now, when he had been banished. Cg argues that, although Saramā was originally appointed to become an intimate friend of Sītā's to look after her well-being, now, after her husband's exile, she would have cause to fear her brother-in-law. Alluding to the issue of social propriety, Cg further notes that Saramā's appointment would have been conveyed to her through the mouth of a servant woman, and that Rāvaṇa, regarding her as his younger sister-in-law [snuṣā, literally, daughter-in-law], would not have spoken to her directly. Cg concludes by noting that some authorities understand that the reference is to another Saramā. (nanu vibhīṣaṇabhāryā kathaṃ sītārakṣaṇe rāvaṇena niyogārhā niyoge vā kathaṃ tasyā rāvaṇabhayād gūḍhāvasthānam. ucyate. vibhīṣaṇāvasthānakāle sītāyogakṣemaparāmarṣāyāntarañgabhūtā saramā niyuktā. tannirgamanād idānīm antarañgavartāśravaṇe bhītāsīd iti na virodhaḥ. niyogaś ca dāsīmukhenādarśanaṃ ca snuṣātvād iti ca bodhyam. anyeyaṃ saramety eke.)

Cs raises the question of how the wife of Vibhīṣaṇa, who could not remain in Rāvaṇa's confidence, could have been in a position to overhear his private conversation. He explains that she would have had no fear of Rāvaṇa despite the fact that he was cruel and an enemy of her husband, since she would have thought, "What could he do to a woman?" Her concealment, however, Cs proposes, would not so much result from her fear, which she had overcome, but from her shame or modesty [which she felt toward her brother-in-law]. (nanu vibhīṣaṇabhāryātvena tvaṃ tattvatas tena na viśvasanīyeti kathaṃ saṃkathanaṃ śrutaṃ bhavaty ety [sic] ata āha. līnayeti. śūnye janaiḥ. gahana itarāparijñātasthāne. rāvaṇabhayam utsṛjya krūro 'pi rāvaṇo ramaṇaripur api yoṣitaḥ kiṃ karotīti bhītiṃ tyaktvā nīlāyanaṃ tu bhāvatvād rāvaṇasya lajjayeti bhāvaḥ.)

"For, wide-eyed lady, I would gladly die for your sake." tava hetor viśālākṣi na hi me jīvitaṃ priyam: Literally, "on your account, O you of wide eyes, life is not dear to me." Cg sees the epithet as highly meaningful here, explaining that the inner meaning of the passage is "Having seen the beauty of your eyes, how could I bear your suffering? (tatra hetur viśālākṣīti tava nayanasaundaryaṃ paśyantyā me kathaṃ tvatpīḍā soḍhavyeti bhāvaḥ)."

6. "Then, when the overlord of the rākṣasas had departed, Maithilī, I followed after him and learned the whole reason for his agitation." sa saṃbhrāntaś ca niṣkrānto yatkṛte rākṣasādhipaḥ / tac ca me viditaṃ sarvam abhiniṣkramya maithili: Literally, "Going out, Maithilī, I learned the whole reason why the overlord of the rākṣasas had left in a state of agitation." Rāvaṇa departed at 6.23.36. See Cr's comments on verses 4–5 above.

7. Several of the commentators are evidently disturbed by the way in which this verse seems to break the narrative sequence of Saramā's report. The point is that where one expects Saramā to tell Sītā the reason for Rāvaṇa's sudden departure, she now appears to go back and reveal to her the nature of the deception he had attempted to perpetrate. Thus, Ck and Ct note the narrative disjuncture (tasya paścād api kathane bādhakābhāvenādau rāmamohaṃ nivartayati). Cs, reading Saramā's thoughts, renders them as: "Since it [the reason for Rāvaṇa's departure] is not really urgent, I will tell you about it later (atyanāvaśyakatvād anantaraṃ vadiṣyāmi)."

"It would be impossible to slay . . . in his sleep" na śakyaṃ sauptikaṃ kartum: The phrase is elliptical, and we have followed the commentators, who take the term sauptika either in its adjectival meaning, "pertaining to sleep," adding a noun such as "battle, slaying, etc." to complete the sense (sauptikaṃ suptau maraṇam—so Cg, Cv) or in its nominal meaning in the sense of "night raid or an attack on sleeping men (suptikālayuddham—so Ct)," the way in which it is used in the tenth parvan of the Mahābhārata (Ct, Ck, Cm, Cr). The reference here is to Rāvaṇa's false claim (6.22.22) that Prahasta had beheaded Rāma in his sleep.

"ever-vigilant" viditātmanaḥ: Ct and Ck explain, "having vanquished such mental defects as sleepiness, laziness, etc. (jitanidrālasyādidoṣacittasyety arthaḥ)"; Cr explains, "knowing the nature of the rākṣasas (jñātarākṣasasvabhāvasya)." Cs, who gives the critical reading as a variant, glosses, "whose effort will prove successful (viditātmana iti pāṭhe vidito 'yaṃ phalisyatīti jñāta ātmā yatno yena sa tathety arthaḥ)." See notes to 6.92.25 and 6.31.58.

"no one can kill" vadhaś ca . . . naivopapadyate: Literally, "and slaying is not possible." Ct, Cg, and Ck, whom we have followed, take the statement to be a general one in the sense that Rāma is invincible because of his superiority to all others in valor (sarvātiśāyiśauryavati—so Ct). Cm and Cs distinguish between the term sauptika, "[killing someone] asleep," and vadhaḥ, "slaying," which they take to mean killing someone who is awake. (sauptikaṃ karma suptamaraṇam. vadho jāgradavasthāyāṃ hananam—so Cm.) They thus understand Saramā to be saying that Rāma cannot be killed either while sleeping or while awake.

8. Saramā is referring to Rāvaṇa's false description of the slaughter of the monkey hosts at 6.22.19–34 above.

"Nor would it be possible to kill" na . . . hantuṃ śakyāḥ: Cr and Cs attribute the invulnerability of the vānaras solely to Rāma's protection (rāmeṇa surakṣitāḥ), while Cg sees it as a consequence both of Rāma's power and their own (svabalād rāmabalāc ca).

"who use trees as weapons" pādapayodhinaḥ: Literally, "tree warriors."

"by Indra, bull among the gods" devarṣabheṇa: Literally, "by the bull among the gods." According to the normal epic topos, one would take this as a reference to Indra, the king and chief warrior of the vedic gods. The only commentators who remark on the epithet (Cr, Cs) understand this, however, to be a reference to Viṣṇu.

9–11. For descriptions of Rāma's qualities and virtues, see translations and notes to 1.1.8–19; 2.1.15–26; and 5.33.12–20.

"muscular" -vṛtta-: Literally, "rounded, stout."

"fierce in valor" pratāpavān: Literally, "possessed of heat, splendor, or heroism."

"powerfully built" saṃhananopetaḥ: Literally, "endowed with [bodily] firmness."

12. "whose every thought and deed is reprehensible" ayuktabuddhikṛtyena: Literally, "by him of improper thought and deed." We follow the commentators in analyzing the compound as a bahuvrīhi whose final member is a dvandva.

13. "Put all your grieving behind you." śokas te vigataḥ sarvaḥ: Literally, "All your sorrow has departed." D5,6,11,M1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read sarva-[kalyāṇām] for sarvaḥ, thus making the adjective "all" apply not to Sītā's grief but to her impending happiness.

"Lakṣmī herself is smiling upon you." tvāṃ bhajate lakṣmīḥ: Literally, "Lakṣmī favors or chooses you."

"which will delight you" prītikaraṃ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead te bhavati, "of you . . . my lady."

15. "I myself have seen" dṛṣṭo me: Ck proposes fleshing out the verse with a phrase explaining that Saramā has been able to observe Rāma by exploiting her power to fly through the air (khacaritvād bahir nirgatyeti śeṣaḥ). Ct accepts this as a possible explanation but suggests as an alternative that Saramā might have climbed to a turret on her housetop to observe Rāma (svagṛhavartyūrdhvagṛham āruhya iti śeṣaḥ).

"who has practically accomplished his mission" paripūrṇārthaḥ: Literally, "who has fulfilled his purpose." It is unclear what Saramā is referring to specifically. She may be alluding only to Rāma's success in crossing the formidable ocean with his forces or, as we have translated, to her certainty of Rāma's impending defeat of Rāvaṇa and rescue of Sītā. Only Cs among the commentators consulted addresses this term. He explains Rāma's success as inhering in his "having treated the lord of rākṣasas as insignificant (alakṣyīkṛtarakṣodhyakṣatvāt)."

"guarded" rakṣitaḥ: We follow Cr in understanding balaiḥ, "by the forces," as subjects of the root √rakṣ. Ct and Ck take a different view, understanding that Rāma is protected "by his own immense power (svamahimnā)," understanding balaiḥ as an instrumental of accompaniment.

"by his massed forces" sahitaiḥ . . . balaiḥ: We read the adjective sahitaiḥ with Ct, who glosses saṃgataiḥ, "gathered together." Cs accepts this, glossing militaiḥ, "assembled," but also proposes the alternative sa-hitaiḥ, in the sense of "well-wisher, benefactor."

16. "Rāvaṇa" anena: Literally, "by him."

"Rāghava has crossed the ocean" rāghavas tīrṇaḥ: Literally, "Rāghava has crossed."

17. "took counsel" mantrayate: According Ct, Ck, and Cm, one should supply a phrase such as "having gone out from here (ito nirgatya)."

18. "while the rākṣasa woman Saramā was speaking in this fashion, she and Sītā heard" iti bruvāṇā saramā rākṣasī sītayā saha / . . . śuśrāva: Literally, "As the rākṣasī Saramā was speaking thus, she, together with Sītā, heard." We follow Cg, who suggests that we are to read the phrase "with Sītā (sītayā saha)" from pāda b with the finite verb śuśrāva, "she heard," rather than with the more proximate present participle bruvāṇā, "was speaking" (as Cr suggests). Although this reading is metrically somewhat dislocated, it has some things to recommend it. For example, the formulaic use of the present participle bruvāṇā, which is common in Vālmīki, rarely governs this type of prepositional phrase. Moreover, the use of this phrase with bruvāṇā suggests a conversation or dialogue, whereas, up to this point, we have seen only a monologue on Saramā's part.

"dreadful sound" śabdam . . . bhairavam: Given the description of the beating of drums, the harnessing of battle animals, and the preparations of the armies in the following verses, we are inclined to understand the sound in question to be the clatter and commotion of a large body of soldiers arming for war. Ct and Cm, however, understand the sound to refer specifically to the leonine bellowing (siṃhanādam) of the troops. This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1197), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 82), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 94). Cf. 6.57.47; 6.62.38; and notes.

"fully preparing themselves for war" sarvodyogena: Literally, "by every effort."

19. "bherī drums" bheryāḥ: See 6.17.31–33; 6.23.41; and notes.

20. "timid woman . . . terrifying . . . sound of the bherī drum . . . its" bhairavā bhīru bherikā / bherī-: Literally, "terrifying, O timid [woman], bherī drum, of the bherī drum." The poet seems to attempt to echo the sound of the drumbeats with his extended alliteration (anuprāsa) of the consonant bh through pādas b and c. See note on verse19 above.

"call to arms" saṃnāhajananī: Literally, "bringing about preparations for battle."

21. "are being made ready" kalpyante: Cr explains that the elephants are being fitted with their various equipment so that they can proceed into battle (gamanārthaṃ racanāviśeṣair yujyanta ity arthaḥ). Cg understands ākalpyante, which he glosses in the sense of "being ornamented or being caparisoned (alaṃkriyante)."

"Everywhere" tatra tatra: Literally, "there [and] there." Cr explains, "in their assigned place (niyojitapratiṣṭhāne)."

"foot soldiers" padātayaḥ: D6,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sahasraśaḥ, "by the thousands." This substitution eliminates an explicit substantive so it is not clear to what the adverb sahasraśaḥ refers. Cr, the only commentator to address this issue, refers it back to the rutting elephants in pāda a, while most translations that follow the text of Ct see it as a reference to warriors.

"forming their ranks" saṃpatanti: Literally, "rushing together, gathering."

Following 21ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [509*] in which the fourth division of the traditional fourfold army, the cavalry, is mentioned: "Thousands of swift horsemen, lances in hand,[1] are in a state of excitement.[2]"

[1]"horsemen, lances in hand" turagārūḍhāḥ prāsahastāḥ: Literally, "[men] mounted on horses, having prāsas in hand." We have translated prāsa elsewhere as "dart" (see, for example, 5.41.11; and 6.41.24–25 and note), but that does not seem to fit the context here.

[2]"in a state of excitement" hṛṣyante: Literally, "they are excited, rejoice." The texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead dṛśyante, "they are seen."

22. "rushing, roaring . . . rushing, roaring" vegavadbhir nadadbhiś ca: The participles clearly refer to both the soldiers and the torrents of water, and we have therefore repeated them.

23–24. "from the rākṣasas' . . . and ornaments" bhūṣitānāṃ ca rakṣasām: B1,D9,10, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasendrānuyāyināṃ, "of the followers of the lord of the rākṣasas."

"shining" prasannānām: Literally, "bright." The idea here, according to Ct, is that the weapons are bright from having been sharpened on whetstones (śāṇollekhananirmalānām) and, according to Cr, polished (saṃskṛtatvena nirmalānām).

"Just look at the . . . radiance . . . as they glitter" prabhāṃ visṛjatāṃ paśya: The syntax is a bit awkward. We have followed the suggestion of Cg, Cm, Ck, and Ct in understanding prabhām, "radiance," to be the object of both the participle and the finite verb. Cg alternatively offers a way to avoid the awkward syntax by proposing to break the participle visṛjatām, "releasing, emitting," into the imperative visṛja, "release," and the demonstrative pronoun tām, and then to supply the word śokam, "grief," as the direct object of the imperative. This reading would yield something like "behold the radiance . . . and abandon your grief."

"It looks like a blazing forest fire in the hot season." vanaṃ nirdahato gharme yathā rūpaṃ vibhāvasoḥ: Literally, "like the appearance of a fire burning a forest in the hot season."

Following verse 23, D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of one line [511*]: "It is the uproar of the swift and frenzied rākṣasas."

Published editions of Ct either omit (NSP) or bracket without numbering (GPP) verses 24cd–26ab. Gita Press, however, includes the passage (6.33.26cd–28ab). Ck notes that these two ślokas are interpolated into some manuscripts (atra madhye kvacic chlokadvayaṃ prakṣiptam). Ct agrees with this textual judgment and quotes Ck.

25. "of the bells" ghaṇṭānām: Cg thinks that these are the bells worn by war-elephants (gajaghaṇṭānām).

"the rumbling of the chariots" rathānām . . . nisvanam: Literally, "the sound of the chariots." Cg understands the reference to be to the sound made by the friction of the wheel rims (nemisaṃghaṭṭanajam).

"the neighing of the war-horses" hayānāṃ heṣamāṇānām: Literally, "of the neighing horses." The phrase is elliptical, omitting any clear direct object of the finite verb śṛṇu, "listen." Commentators resolve the ellipsis in one of two ways. Cr proposes reading nirghoṣam, "clanging, sound," from pāda a to refer to the noise of both the bells and the horses. In a similar vein, Cg proposes to employ anuvṛtti, "repetition," to read nisvanam, "sound," of pāda b with hayānāṃ heṣamāṇānām. Alternatively, Cg, somewhat more ingeniously, proposes breaking the participle into heṣam, "the neighing," and āṇānām, "making noise, sounding," which would yield "the neighing of the neighing [horses]."

"like the blaring of trumpets" tūryadhvaniṃ yathā: Literally, "like the sound of tūryas." Apte, PW, and Monier-Williams (s.v., respectively) all understand the term to refer only to a type of musical instrument. Dutt (1893, p. 1198) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 81) both take the term to mean a type of drum, while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1482) understands the term, as we do, to refer to trumpets, which seems more appropriate given the simile. See, too, 6.90.27–28. Cf. 6.116.24.

26. "the frenzied preparations" saṃbhramaḥ: Cr glosses, "agitation, excitement, or alarm (udvegaḥ)." Cg glosses, "preparations (saṃnāhaḥ)."

27. "But fear of Rāma has come upon the rākṣasas, lotus-petal-eyed woman . . . as fear of Vāsava overcame the daityas" rakṣasāṃ bhayam āgatam / rāmāt kamalapatrākṣi . . . daityānām iva vāsavāt: D5–7,10,11,T,G1,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read pādas ab separately and take *pāda*s cd with 28ab, substituting the nominatives rāmaḥ and vāsavaḥ for the ablatives rāmāt and vāsavāt. In addition, D10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the nominative masculine kamalapatrākṣaḥ for the critical edition's feminine vocative kamalapatrākṣi. The sense thus derived is "Fear has come upon the rākṣasas.

Once lotus-petal-eyed Rāma has defeated (avajitya of 28ab) [Rāvaṇa], as Vāsava did the daityas, [he will surely take you back]." The commentators offer a variety of interpretations in an effort to flesh out the passage. Ct, Ck, and Cm appear to understand an unexpressed simile to the effect that Rāma, having defeated and slain Rāvaṇa, will recover Sītā, just as Vāsava recovered Lakṣmī when she was in the possession of the daityas. Among the commentators consulted, only Cr, who reads tam avajitya with the critical edition, understands the gerund avajitya to refer to Rāma's defeat of Rāvaṇa. Cg and Cm, who read tvām avajitya, understand "having won you back from his enemy's house (vinijitya śatrugṛhād apanīya tvām abhigamiṣyatīti yojanā)." Ct, whose reading is the same as Cr's, nevertheless understands tvām avajitya as Cg and Cm do.

The genitive plural daityānām presents syntactical difficulties in the vulgate reading. Cr and Cg propose reading the genitive as an accusative. As an alternative, Cg suggests reading adaityānām, which then permits the interpretation "like Vāsava [foremost] among the gods [i.e., the non-daityas]."

28. See note to verse 27 above.

30. "Soon Rāma will come, and I shall see you seated upon his lap" āgatasya hi rāmasya kṣipram añkagatāṃ satīm / ahaṃ drakṣyāmi . . . tvām: Literally, "I shall soon see you, being one who has gone to the lap of Rāma, who has come." One could also interpret the participle satīm in its nominal sense of "chaste woman, devoted wife," as several of the translators do. For example, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1483) translates, "a virtuous lady"; Dutt (1893, p. 1198), "devoted to thy lord"; and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 81), "the chaste wife." The context of Saramā's speech, with its suggestion that Rāma will surely take Sītā back (verses 27 and 28 above), makes this interpretation equally plausible, despite the fact that the syntax would tend to support the participial reading. The commentators are silent. See S. Goldman 1992 and 1996.

31. "Lovely lady" śobhane: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the vocative, jānaki, "O Jānakī."

"broad-chested hero" mahorasaḥ: Literally, "of the broad-chested one."

32. "Sītā, my lady" site devi: Like Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 81), we understand the vocative devi in its common sense of "O my lady or queen." Several of the translations consulted, however, understand it in its sense of "O goddess, O divinity," which, in the present context, seems inappropriate.

"the braid—falling to your waist" jaghanaṃ gatām . . . veṇīm: Literally, "the braid reaching to your buttocks." See 5.13.24 and note.

"many months" bahūn māsān: The time elapsed since Sītā was taken captive has to have been at least ten months. At 3.54.22, Rāvaṇa sets a time period of twelve months for Sītā either to come to his bed or be eaten. At 5.31.27, Sītā tells Hanumān that she has only two more months remaining before Rāvaṇa plans to kill and eat her. See, too, 5.20.6–9 and notes; and note to 6.112.1.

33. "you will abandon . . . sheds" mokṣyase: Literally, "you will release."

34. "Rāma . . . he, who deserves happiness" sukhārhaḥ: Literally, "one worthy of happiness."

"complete" samagram: Many manuscripts (Ñ1,B1,3,D6,9–11,T3,G2,3,M1–3) and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read the nominative samagraḥ instead, which the commentators treat variously. Ct and Ck gloss, "together with (sahitaḥ)." Cg and Cm gloss, "his every wish fulfilled (saṃpūrṇamanorathaḥ)." According to GPP (6.33.36), Cr appears to read instead samagnaḥ, which he explains as tvayā saha magnaḥ, "absorbed with you."

35. "reunited" samāgatā: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read sabhājitā, which Ct glosses as "honored, respected (satkṛtā)." Translators who follow Ct translate in this vein. Thus Dutt (1893, p. 1198) renders, "loved," and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 95), "au milieu des caresses." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 83), following Roussel, renders, "embraced."

"with Rāma" rāmeṇa: M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg substitute vīryeṇa, "with valor or strength."

"just as the earth does with its ample crops when watered with copious rains" suvarṣeṇa samāyuktā yathā sasyena medinī: The syntax allows for a certain amount of ambiguity. One could, for example, like Dutt (1893, p. 1198), take suvarṣeṇa as a bahuvrīhi modifying sasyena, thus yielding the sense "as does the earth with well-watered crops." We believe, however, that the basis for the simile is the notion of the parched and heated (= sorrowful) earth in the hot season being cooled, refreshed, and revivified by the onset of the monsoon. This interpretation clearly underlies the northern variant of 516*, "as does the earth previously parched by lack of rain with its new crops."

"earth" medinī: According to footnote 3 on page 2218 of GPP, Cg reads the variant maithilī, "Maithilī," for medinī. This reading, however, is unattested in printed editions of Cg (KK, VSP) and the critical apparatus.

36. "Sūrya, bringer of day" divasakaram: Literally, "the maker of day." Ct and Ck remind us that the sun is Sītā's [i.e., the Sūryavaṃśa's] clan divinity (kuladaivatam).

"sustainer of all creatures" prabhavaḥ . . . prajānām: Ct, Ck, and Cr see the reference as elliptical. They take prabhavaḥ in its sense of "source" and supply the phrase "[the source] of the happiness and [the source] of the destruction of unhappiness (sukhaduḥkhahānyor iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr understands, "the cause of people's happiness and unhappiness (prajānāṃ sukhaduḥkhayor iti śeṣaḥ prabhavaḥ kāraṇam)." Cg, whom we have followed, understands that the sun is actually the means of production and sustenance of all living creatures according to the well-known vedic belief that the sun receives the sacrificial offering and returns it in the form of rain, which produces the food that sustains all creatures. Cg further argues that this characterization of the sun does not duplicate that of the true source of all beings, i.e., the ātman. He argues that this is suggested by the use of the horse simile in pāda b and substantiates this identification by quoting Taittirīya Upaniṣad 2.8 (cf. Kaṭha Upaniṣad 6.3), where it is stated that the sun rises out of fear of the ātman. (ayaṃ divasakaraḥ prajānāṃ devatiryaṅmanuṣyasthāvarāṇāṃ prabhavaḥ kāraṇam. hiḥ prasiddhau varṣādidvārā jagadāpyāyaka ity arthaḥ. agnau prāstāhutiḥ samyag ādityam upatiṣṭhate. ādityāj jāyate vṛṣṭir vṛṣṭer annaṃ tataḥ prājā ity ukteḥ. na punar atra jagatkāraṇatvoktiḥ. aśvopamānena svātiriktapuruṣaprerayatvābhidhānāt. bhīṣāsmād vātaḥ pavate bhīṣodeti sūrya iti śruteḥ.) Ck identifies the divinity with whom Sītā must seek refuge as the indwelling deity Brahmā, who is her only hope (antargataṃ bhagavantaṃ brahmāṇaṃ śaraṇaṃ vrajeḥ).

"foremost of mountains" girivaram: The reference, as all commentators agree, is to the axial mountain Meru, around which the sun was believed to revolve.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 25

1. "with her words" tena vākyena: The commentators and the translators who follow them differ in their opinions as to whose words are intended here and with what to construe them. Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cg (alternate interpretation) believe the words to be those of Rāvaṇa at 6.22.13–34. These commentators understand that these words are the source of Sītā's distress. Cr, who, along with Cg (pace GPP 6.34.1) and the critical edition, reads mohitām for Ct's and Ck's moditām, explains, "deluded by those words that had been uttered by Rāvaṇa, Sītā was therefore suffering (tena rāvaṇoktena vākyena mohitām ata eva jātasaṃtāpāṃ sītām)." All translators who follow the text of Ct (Dutt 1893, p. 1199; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 83; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 96; Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1484; and Pagani 1999, p. 947) accept that the words referred to are Rāvaṇa's. We think that this interpretation is improbable, however, as it is unusual, to say the least, for Vālmīki to refer in this way to a speech that is separated from the moment he is describing by an intervening speech. We therefore find Cg's construction of the verse, in which the phrase refers to Saramā's immediately preceding speech as the source of Sītā's comfort, more persuasive. It should be noted, however, that Cg also admits the possibility that the words may be Rāvaṇa's. (atheti prathamaślokena pūrvasargoktānuvādaḥ tena vākyena hrādayāmāsety anvayaḥ. yadvā tena vākyena rāvaṇavākyena.) This interpretation is also followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 82) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 227).

"confused" mohitām: As indicated in the previous note, Cr understands the term to refer to Sītā's having been deluded by Rāvaṇa's speech [concerning his alleged slaying of Rāma]. D7,10,G1,3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead moditām, "cheered, made happy."

"as do the heavens to the earth" pṛthivīṃ dyaur iva: D10,11,G3,M1,2,5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead mahīṃ dagdhām iva, "as to the parched earth." This reading, which all translators rendering the text of Ct follow, appears to be defective in that it omits a feminine upamāna corresponding to Saramā (the upameya). Ct and Ck attempt to remedy this deficiency by supplying the phrase "like a bank of clouds (meghapaṅktir iva)."

3. "unseen" praticchannā: Literally, "concealed."

"a message from you informing him that you are safe" tvadvākyam . . . nivedya kuśalam: Literally, "having informed him of your well-being through your words." The phrase is somewhat awkward and ambiguous, and has produced a variety of interpretations among the commentators and translators. Our translation basically follows the interpretation of Ct, who glosses the adjective kuśalam as "informing [him] of your well-being (kuśalāvedakam)." Given the context, this seems to be the most probable content of a potential message from Sītā. Cg glosses kuśalam as "inspiring or producing well-being [in Rāma] (kuśalapratipādakam)." Cm offers yet a third alternative, glossing, "[your words] in the form of an inquiry about [Rāma's] well-being (kuśalapraśnarūpam)." Cr, along with a few, mainly devanāgarī, manuscripts, reads tadvākyam for tvadvākyam. Thus, he understands the phrase to mean "his, that is Rāvaṇa's, words directed toward you and your well-being (tad rāvaṇoktaṃ vākyaṃ tvāṃ prati vacanaṃ kuśalaṃ tava maṅgalaṃ ca)."

5. "tinged with her recent sorrow" pūrvaśokābhipannayā: We follow the interpretation of Ct, Cr, and Cm, who understand that Sītā's speech still bears a trace of the grief

she was experiencing prior to being consoled by Saramā (pūrvaśokābhipannayā śvāsanāt pūrvaṃ jātena śokeneṣadyuktayā—so Ct). Cg, however, breaks the adjective pūrva- out of the compound, giving it the sense of "which had previously been tinged by sorrow but which was now cheerful (pūrvaṃ śokābhipannayā saṃprati hṛṣṭayety arthaḥ)." This interpretation is followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 82).

6. Ct, Ck, and Cg offer here, in advance, an explanation of why Sītā declines Saramā's offer to serve as a messenger to Rāma and instead instructs her in the following verses to spy on Rāvaṇa. These commentators agree that Sītā is concerned about the impropriety of dispatching a rākṣasa woman to her husband, Rāma. Ct and Ck even liken such a meeting to that between Śūrpaṇakhā and Rāma. Ct and Ck claim that by praising Saramā's abilities, as she does in this verse, Sītā is able gracefully to divert her to the more appropriate mission that she has in mind (atha sītā śūrpaṇakhāyā ivāsyā api rāmasamīpagamanam anucitam iti vicārya tat sāmārthyaślāghāpūrvaṃ tām ucitakṛtye niyojayati—so Ct). Cg further remarks that Sītā does not wish to ruin her friendship with the rākṣasa woman by simply refusing her offer, but skillfully uses a pretext to divert her (saṃdeśam āhariṣyāmīti vadantīṃ saramāṃ prati na gantavyam ity ukte sakhyahāniḥ . . . ato vyājena nipuṇaṃ pariharati).

"for my sake" madantare: Like most of the commentators, we take antara in its sense of "with reference to or for the sake of." Cs, with his usual eccentricity, takes the term in its sense of "innermost soul or essence," and thus reads the expression as a vocative addressed to Saramā, in the sense of "my heart of hearts, dearest friend," and so forth. (he madantare! mayi antaram antarātmā manaḥ prāṇo vāyasyāḥ sā tat saṃbuddhiḥ.)

"I know that . . . you could accomplish even the impossible" avagacchāmy akartavyaṃ kartavyaṃ te: Literally, "I understand that which is not to be done is to be done by you." Ñ1,B3,D10,11,13,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead avagacchādya kartavyaṃ kartavyaṃ te, "now learn the task that is to be done by you." Ck claims that this is the authentic reading (iti pāṅktaḥ).

7. "you should go to Rāvaṇa as I wish to know what he is doing now." jñātum icchāmi taṃ gatvā kiṃ karotīti rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "having gone to him, I wish to know, 'What is Rāvaṇa doing?'" The syntax of this line is extremely awkward, and the commentators struggle to make it yield its sense. The major difficulty here is the construction of the gerund gatvā, "having gone," of which Sītā would appear to be the grammatical subject, but Saramā is obviously the logical one. Cr, Cg, and Cm, with whom we agree, understand, despite the syntax, that Sītā is asking Saramā to go and spy on her master, Rāvaṇa. Ct, however, understands Rāvaṇa to be the subject of gatvā and interprets the line to mean "I wish to know about him, i.e., what Rāvaṇa has been doing since leaving this place (ito gatvā rāvaṇaḥ kiṃ karotīti rāvaṇaṃ jñātum icchāmi)." Of the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1199) follows this interpretation. Our interpretation is perhaps supported by the seemingly glossing readings of the north (see Pollock 1984a, p. 85). Thus, Ś,V,D0–4,8,12,13 (=Lahore 6.10.8cd) read tvatto 'ham jñātum icchāmi (or close variants), "I wish to find out from you," for pāda c (jñātum icchāmi taṃ gatvā); Ñ and B1–3 (=Gorresio 6.10.8cd) read jñātum arhasi gatvā tvam, "having gone, you must find out."

8. "Rāvaṇa, who makes his enemies cry out" rāvaṇaḥ śatrurāvaṇaḥ: This is yet another example of the etymological epithets of which the poet is very fond. See note to 6.8.12.

"master of illusion" māyābalaḥ: Literally, "whose power is illusion."

9. "He has . . . menace and threaten me" tarjāpayati . . . bhartsāpayati: Several of the commentators note the irregular causative formations and distinguish the two terms as referring to nonverbal and verbal forms of intimidation, respectively (avācikī bhīṣikā tarjanaṃ vācikī tu sā bhartsanam—so Ct).

"who . . . stand guard over me" yā māṃ rakṣanti: Ś,Ñ1,V1,2,B1–3,D0–4,7–13,T3,G1,3, M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yo māṃ rakṣati, "[he] who stands guard over me," thus placing Rāvaṇa, not the rākṣasa women, in the role of Sītā's warder.

10. "I am fearful . . . I tremble in fear of him" udvignā . . . asmi . . . tadbhayāc cāham udvignā: Literally, "I am fearful . . . I am fearful from fear of him." The term udvigna, "frightened, trembling," is repeated in pādas a and c. Although none of the commentators takes explicit objection to this example of punarukti, "repetition, redundancy," Cr and Cs make efforts to mitigate it. Cr takes advantage of the hiatus between pādas c and d to read udvignā as the sandhi form of the feminine plural udvignāḥ. He thus understands Sītā to be saying to Saramā, "And you [the rākṣasa women] are frightened of him as well (udvignā yūyam apīti śeṣaḥ)." Cs proposes, in his first interpretation, that we read the negative particle na with pāda a rather than b. This enables him to interpret the verse as follows: "Formerly, I was neither fearful nor apprehensive of anything whatsoever and my mind was at peace. But now, through fear of him, I, who am in the aśoka grove, have become frightened. (yāhaṃ prāñ nodvignā na śaṅkitā ca kasmāccid api. mama manaḥ svastham. tādṛśy apy ahaṃ tadbhayād rāvaṇakartṛkabhītihetoḥ. aśokavanikāṃ gatā prāptā. ataś codvignety anvayaḥ.)"

"here in the aśoka grove" aśokavanikāṃ gatā: Literally, "gone to or situated in the aśoka grove." Cr supplies the particle api after gatā, suggesting the sense "even though I am in the aśoka grove," apparently thinking that Sītā is commenting that she is fearful of Rāvaṇa, even though she is not in his presence. We do not find this interpretation persuasive, although it is followed in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1484) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 82).

11. "that he may have discussed or decided" kathā tasya niścitaṃ vāpi yad bhavet: Literally, "what his conversations or decisions might be." Ct, Cr, and Ck understand that Rāvaṇa's deliberations concern whether he should release Sītā (kathā madvimokṣaviṣayakathā). Cs thinks that they refer either to Rāvaṇa's preparations for battle or to the further imprisonment of or clemency toward Sītā. (kathā yuddhasaṃnāhakathā. madviṣayanigrahānugrahakathā vā.) Cg and Cv do not specify the subject, taking the reference to be to the news of what Rāvaṇa is doing (vartā).

"that would be the greatest favor you could do for me" paro me syād anugrahaḥ: Literally, "[that] would be the highest grace or favor for me."

12. "caressing her, replied in words choked with tears" uvāca vacanaṃ tasyāḥ spṛśantī bāṣpaviklavam: Most of the commentators (Cv, Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cg) read, or appear to read, vadanam, "face," for vacanam, "words." This reading for them thus becomes the object of the participle spṛśantī, "touching," as well as the modificand of the adjective bāṣpaviklavam, "tearful." Their reading thus would mean: "Saramā replied, wiping her [Sītā's] tear-stained face." Printed texts of VSP and KK read vadanam, but NSP and GPP read vacanam, even though the commentaries they reproduce read vadanam. Crā notes that vadanam is a [variant] reading, while Cv does the same for vacanam. All translators of the vulgate translate "face." The textual evidence for vadanam is weak, however, confined only to a few southern manuscripts (D6,T1,M3, and Cg and Ct).

13. "you shall see me when I return" upāvṛttāṃ ca paśya mām: Literally, "see me returned." V1,3,D1,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead upāvartāmi maithili, "I shall return, Maithilī."

14. "she . . . eavesdropped on his deliberations with his counselors" śuśrāva kathitaṃ tasya . . . samantriṇaḥ: Literally, "she heard the conversation of him who was with his counselors."

15. "then" tadā: Ś,Ñ,V,B1–3,D0–4,7–13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead śubhām, "lovely," which modifies aśokavanikām, "the aśoka grove."

16. "the grove" tatra: Literally, "there."

"robbed of her lotus" bhraṣṭapadmām iva: Literally, "whose lotus was lost or fallen." As Pagani (1999, p. 1658) comments in her note to this sarga, Śrī, the goddess of fortune and consort of Viṣṇu, is commonly represented in iconography as seated on an expanded lotus. Thus, Cg glosses, "deprived of her lotus seat (padmāsanahīnām ity arthaḥ)." Cs offers another explanation that calls to mind the common representation of Śrī as holding a lotus. According to him, the idea here is that, while playing, Lakṣmī has dropped from her hand the lotus she was using as a ball (kamalaṃ kandukīkṛtya khelanasamaye hastavicyutalatādilīnanālīkām).

17. "and offered her a seat" dadau ca svayam āsanam: Literally, "and she gave a seat of her own accord." The gesture indicates that Sītā regards Saramā as more or less her social equal.

19. "the tremulous Sītā" sītayā vepamānayā: Cg notes that Sītā trembles in anticipation of what dreadful news Saramā may bring (kiṃ vā bhayaṃ vakṣyatīti kampamānayā).

"Rāvaṇa's deliberations with his counselors" kathitam . . . rāvaṇasya samantriṇaḥ: Literally, "the conversation of Rāvaṇa, who was with his counselors."

20. "given earnest advice" bṛhadvacaḥ . . . bodhitaḥ: Literally, "advised or made aware [of] a great speech."

"his own mother" jananyā: As Cm and Cg remind us, Rāvaṇa's mother's name is Kaikasī (see 7.9.15–25).

"by . . . his elder counselor" mantrivṛddhena: Literally, "by the eldest among the counselors." The epithet is used largely for its echoing effect with the name aviddhena.

"Aviddha" aviddhena: The name Aviddha (v.l. Avidhya, Āviddha) is almost certainly one of the variations of the name of the character called Avindhya (v.l. Suvindhya, Avandhya) at 5.35.12–13 (D5,T1,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg omit these two verses), a rākṣasa adviser to Rāvaṇa who is consistently supportive of Rāma and Sītā, and who advises Rāvaṇa to return Sītā to Rāma. A rākṣasa by the name of Avindhya (v.l. Avindya, Avandhya, Avidhya, etc.) is mentioned several times in the Rāmopākhyāna (MBh 2.273.28,32; 3.264.55; 3.266.64–65; and 3.275–276.39). D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead atisnigdhena, "most affectionate or devoted," in place of the counselor's name. Ck, who insists that this reading is authentic, identifies the unnamed counselor as Mālyavān. Cf. 6.80.50–51 and note.

"who said": The words have been added to provide a transition to the following speech.

21. "His amazing deeds in Janasthāna" janasthāne yad adbhutam: Literally, "the wonder in Janasthāna." As most of the commentators point out, the reference is to Rāma's slaying of Khara and the other rākṣasas at 3.24–29.

"sufficient evidence for you" nidarśanaṃ te paryāptam: Literally, "the illustration is enough for you." As the commentators indicate, the reference is to Rāma's valor (tat parākramasyety arthaḥ).

22. "his finding Sītā" darśanam: Literally, "finding or seeing." We agree with the commentators that the reference is to Hanumān's discovery of Sītā.

"What mere human . . . could have brought all this about?" kaḥ kuryān mānuṣaḥ: The verse is slightly confusing in that it speaks initially of Hanumān's exploits, and then refers to someone who is, at least apparently, a human, i.e., Rāma. Cg, Cm, and Ct understand that Rāma's power is such that even his mere servant, Hanumān, is capable of defeating all the rākṣasas. (tiṣṭhatu raghunāthaḥ. tad anucaro hanumān eva sarvān rākṣasān jetuṃ samartha ity āśayena tat parākramaṃ varṇayati—so Cm.) Several commentators note that the thrust of the rhetorical question here is to show that Rāma is indeed an incarnation of God (svadūtamukhenānekakāryakārī rāmo deva eveti bhāvaḥ—so Cg). Ct and Ck extend this idea by stating that Hanumān and Rāma, respectively, are not merely a monkey and a man but that they are incarnations of god. (hanūmān rāmo vānaro manuṣyo vā na. api tu devāvatāra iti bhāvaḥ.) Cr describes Rāma simply as "an extraordinary human being (vilakṣaṇo mānuṣaḥ)."

"on earth" bhuvi: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead yudhi, "in battle," which is completely redundant with yuddhe, "in battle," in pāda c.

23. "aged counselors" mantrivṛddhaiḥ: Cg and Cs note the shift from the singular in verse 20 above to the plural here. The former ascribes it merely to the use of the respectful plural (pūjāyāṃ bahuvacanam). Cs offers three other explanations. According to the first, there were always multiple counselors, but, in verse 20, the reference in the singular to Aviddha (v.l. Avindhya) is to be taken as synecdoche (upalakṣaṇa) of the part for the whole (pūrvamantrivṛddhenety ekavacanam upalakṣakam aparamantrivṛddhānām iti jñāpayitum atra mantrivṛddhair iti bahuvacanam). According to his second interpretation, through the use of the singular we must understand that there is only one Avindhya. However, we must also understand that there is a collectivity (itiḥ) because of the different kinds of arguments [employed]. Cs's third interpretation again understands the use of the singular to represent the group. The idea here is that the word avindhya is derived from the employment of the Pāṇinian taddhita suffix "ya" as enjoined at Pā 4.2.49, which allows the singular to indicate a group, as in the case of the secondary derivate pāśyā, "a collection of nooses," from the noun pāśaḥ, "noose" (tatraikavacanenaika evāvindhya upapādanaprakārabhedād itiḥ pāśānityādivad bahuvacanam iti vā). Cs also notes the inversion of the order in which Rāvaṇa's mother and counselors are mentioned in the two verses (20 and 23). He argues, curiously enough, that, although she is mentioned first in verse 20 out of respect, she is put second here because she is merely reflecting [while presumably the counselors make their arguments]. (tatra mānyatvān mātuḥ puraskaraṇam. tasyā ālocanakāryāniyuktatvenātra vṛddhamantripuraskaraṇam iti vivekaḥ.)

24. "such" iti: The odd and ambiguous placement of this particle between the words tvām, "you," and maithili, "O Maithilī," in pāda b has caused consternation and debate among many of the commentators. Our interpretation follows that proposed by Cr, Cv, Crā, and Cm. This interpretation is also ascribed by Cg to "some commentators." The idea is that the iti marks the statement of Rāvaṇa's resolution as a kind of quotation marker, despite the syntactic dislocation (iti niścaya ity anvaya ity eke). Cg's principal interpretation is that the particle should be read as indicating causality, i.e., "for (iti hetau)." He offers yet another interpretation, also ascribed to other commentators, in which we are to supply the word manye, "I think (iti manya ity apare)." Thus, he uses it to mark the end of Saramā's statement of Rāvaṇa's intentions. Finally, Cg notes that some manuscripts (in the critical apparatus V3,G,M5) read iha, "here," for iti, thus avoiding the problem entirely (iha maithilīti keṣucit pāṭhaḥ).

25. "That, indeed" tad eṣā: Literally, "this then." Printed editions of Ct (GPP, NSP, and KK—noted in a footnote—6.34.25) read instead eṣām, "of them, theirs." The variant is unnoted in the critical apparatus.

"unwavering" susthirā: Literally "firmly established." M1–3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead niścitā, "resolved."

"befuddled as he is by his impending doom" mṛtyulobhāt: Literally, "because of the confusion of death." We follow Ct, Ck, and Cr in taking lobha, normally, "greed, lust, desire," in its less common sense of "confusion, delusion." The idea here is almost certainly the common notion that those who are about to die lose their rational faculties. Cg does not expand upon the term, and it is probably for this reason that Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 83), who generally follows him, translates, "he is courting death." Cs understands lobha in its more common sense of gārdhya, "desire," but explains the compound obscurely as "out of the desire among them [the rākṣasas?] for the goddess of death (mṛtyudevyā eṣu vidyamānād gārdhyāt)."

"He will have to be completely crushed in battle" anirastas tu saṃyuge: Literally, "not [i.e. unless he is] turned back in battle."

"Intimidation alone cannot force him to release you." bhayān na śaktas tvāṃ moktum: Literally, "he cannot release you out of fear."

27. "bherī drums" bherī-: See 6.17.31–33 and notes.

"the entire army" sarvasainyānām: Literally, "of all the troops, armies." As Cg notes, we are to understand that the reference here is also to the monkey hosts, whose employment of bherī drums, etc., is also mentioned in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (atra bheryādiśabdo bheryādiśabdaparo vānarasainyānām api bheryādikam astīti kiṣkindhākāṇḍe darśitam) (4.37.13). This is confirmed in the next verse as well as in the first verse of sarga 26.

28. "their spirits failed them" naṣṭaujasaḥ: Literally, "their vitality destroyed."

"Their energies were sapped by despair" dainyaparītaceṣṭāḥ: Literally, "their exertions overcome by despondency."

The meter is indravajrā.

Sarga 26

1. "to the . . . sound of . . . bherī drums" bherīśabdena: See 6.17.31–33 and notes.

"Rāghava" rāghavaḥ: D9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr substitute the adjective nādinā, "resounding" (modifying -śabdena, "sound"). Cs notes this as a variant reading, explaining it first as "echoing, resounding" but then, in his typically eccentric fashion, as a bahuvrīhi modifying -śabdena, "sound," with the sense "whereby the rākṣasas were not eaters (na vidyanta ādino rākṣasā yena tādṛśena)." He bases this interpretation on an unattested passage that he claims is from the tenth skandha of the Bhāgavatapurāṇa, "rākṣasas are said to be those who eat (ādino rākṣasāḥ proktā iti bhāgavatadaśamaskandhatātparyāt)." The idea seems to be that the daunting sound of Rāma's approaching army has made the rākṣasas lose their appetite. Cs is perhaps trying to extend the thrust of 6.25.28 above, where the sound similarly makes the rākṣasas lose their will to live.

"the conqueror of enemy citadels" parapurañjayaḥ: Cs proposes, as an alternate reading, breaking the compound into parapuram and jayaḥ. This reading, with a little rhetorical supplementation, yields for him the meaning "Rāma . . . approached the enemy citadel as victory approached him. (parapuraṃ vairinagaram. mahābāhū rāma upayāti. jayaś ca tam upayāti.)"

"did . . . draw near" upayāti: Several commentators, including Ct, Ck, and Cr, supply the word "Laṅkā."

3. Following verse 3, D5–7,9–11,T,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert a passage of one line [534*]: "[Rāvaṇa] . . . that cruel lord of the rākṣasas, who brought so much suffering to the world, [spoke] without reproach.[1]"

[1]"without reproach" agarhayan: D5–7,9,T,G,M3,5, and Cv, Crā, and Cg read instead garhayan, "reproaching." Those translators who accept this latter reading differ as to the object of Rāvaṇa's reproach. Some, e.g., Dutt (1893, p. 1201) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 85), understand that Rāvaṇa is belittling Rāma's exploits listed in verse 4 below. Others, including Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 84), Pagani (1999, p. 949), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 98), see him as reproaching his ministers (presumably for their timidity). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1484) reads with Ct and the critical edition.

4. "the size of his army" balasaṃcayam: Literally, "accumulation or mass of his forces." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead balapauruṣam, which those translators who follow this text read as a samāhāradvandva in the sense of "strength and valor."

Following verse 4, Ñ,V2,B1–4,D2,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [539*]: "When the night-roaming rākṣasas heard those words of Rāvaṇa,[1] they looked at one another in silence, realizing Rāma's valor.[1][2]"

[1]"they looked at one another in silence, realizing Rāma's valor" tūṣṇīm anyonyam aikṣanta viditvā rāmavikramam: D5–7,9–11,S omit line 1 and substitute the accusative plural participle īkṣataḥ, "looking at," for the critical text's third person plural imperfect aikṣanta, "they looked at." This line is then an extension of the syntax of verse 4 with the sense "But I know that you, sirs, who, realizing Rāma's valor, are looking at one another in silence, are also truly valorous in battle."

5. "the paternal uncle of . . . mother" mātuḥ paitāmahaḥ: There is some disagreement among the commentators as to Mālyavān's precise relationship to Rāvaṇa. This disagreement is heightened by a variant in the reading that appears to be known to most of the commentators. The critical reading is shared by Cg, Cv, Crā, and Cm. They agree that the phrase works out to mean "the son of the grandfather of the mother," i.e., Kaikasī's father or paternal uncle. Cg relies on the Uttarakāṇḍa's genealogy of the rākṣasas to demonstrate, correctly in our opinion, that Mālyavān is Kaikasī's uncle and, thus, Rāvaṇa's maternal granduncle. The Uttarakāṇḍa (7.5.5) tells of the birth of the three sons of Sukeśa: Mālyavān, Sumāli, and Māli. At 7.5.34–36, the offspring of Sumāli, including Rāvaṇa's mother, Kaikasī, are mentioned. Despite this, as Cg notes, some commentators (Cv, Crā, Cm) understand Mālyavān to be Kaikasī's father. Ct, Ck, and Cr, along with a variety of northern and southern manuscripts, read vṛddho mātāmahaḥ, "aged maternal grandfather," for mātuḥ paitāmahaḥ. This inferior reading is rendered in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1201), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 98), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 85), Pagani (1999, p. 949), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1487).

6. "in the traditional branches of learning" vidyāsu: The commentators differ on the identification of the branches of learning referred to here. Ct and Ck claim that there are fourteen branches (see Yajñavalkyasmṛti 1.3) but neither enumerate them nor cite a source for such a list. Cg and Cm understand the reference to be to the four branches of learning, which they enumerate as metaphysics or logic (ānvīkṣikī), vedic studies (trayī), economics (vārtā), and political science (daṇḍanīti). Cg supports this identification with a quotation from Kāmandaka 2.1, where a monarch is advised to consider these four areas in consultation with those who are knowledgeable and practiced in them (ānvīkṣikīṃ trayīṃ vārtāṃ daṇḍanītiṃ ca pārthivaḥ / tadvidbhis tatkriyopetaiś cintayed vinayānvitaḥ //). Arthaśāstra 1.2–4 identifies the same four vidyās. These are vedic studies (trayī), economics (vārtā), political science (daṇḍanīti), and metaphysics (ānvīkṣikī) (1.2.1). Arthaśāstra 1.2.8 explicitly states that Kauṭilya understands that there are four vidyās (catasra eva vidyā iti kauṭilyaḥ //).

7. "peace or war" saṃdadhānaḥ . . . vigṛhṇan: Literally, "making peace [and] fomenting strife." The participles are derived from the verbal roots that are the source of the nouns sandhi, "peace," and vigraha, "war," that refer to two of the six guṇas, or modes of policy, as enumerated at Arthaśāstra 7.1.2, Manusmṛti 7.162, Yajñavalkyasmṛti 13.347, and Śiśupālavadha 2.26.

"at the appropriate times" kālena: Literally, "according to time." Cg and Cm are more specific, noting that one makes peace when one's own forces are weak and makes war when they are strong. (kālena saṃdadhānaḥ svabalakṣayakālena saṃdhānaṃ kurvan. kālena vigṛhṇan svabalavṛddhikālena vigrahaṃ kurvan—so Cm.)

8. "weaker than his rival" hīyamānena: Literally, "by one being diminished or a lesser one."

"he must never underestimate his enemy" na śatrum avamanyeta: Cv and Cm read sa[ḥ] for na, yielding the sense "he should despise his enemy." Cm notes our reading as a variant. Cg is apparently aware of the reading sa[ḥ], simply correcting it to na. No attestation of this variant appears either in the critical apparatus of the critical edition or that of KK.

9. "I would recommend making peace" mahyaṃ rocate saṃdhiḥ: Literally, "I choose or prefer peace."

"so heavily besieged" abhiyuktāḥ sma: The particle sma here must be read as emphatic. B4,D7,10,11, and Ct, Cr, and Ck read instead abhiyukto 'si, "you are besieged or obsessed." This reading exploits the ambiguity of the verb abhi $\sqrt{}$yuj, which can mean, among other things, "to attack, besiege, invade," as well as "to be attached to, devoted to, obsessed with." Cr takes the word in the latter sense, while Ct offers the two as alternatives. All translations consulted take abhiyukta, either in the singular or plural, in some variation of the former sense, with the exception of Raghunathan. Although he normally follows Cg (who glosses here viruddhāḥ, "blockaded, besieged"), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 84) translates, "Sita, who has been an obsession with you."

10. "the gods, seers" devarṣayaḥ: We agree with Cg, who understands the compound as a dvandva. Other commentators ignore the issue of how to read the compound. However, some translators, including Dutt (1893, p. 1202), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1487), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 84), read the compound as a karmadhāraya, either leaving the word untranslated or rendering, "celestial sages."

"Rāma's" tasya: Literally, "his."

11. "two races" pakṣau: Normally, the term means "side or faction," as in verse 7 above. Here, however, although the term surely has a connotation of opposition, the context better supports the usage of pakṣa as "race, family, lineage" (s.v. Apte and cf. MBh 13.57.40 [rūpānvitāṃ pakṣavatīṃ manojñāṃ bhāryām ayatnopagatāṃ labhet saḥ]), where the term pakṣavatīṃ would appear to refer to a woman of good family.

"who had recourse to righteousness and unrighteousness, respectively" dharmādharmau tadāśrayau: Literally, "righteousness and unrighteousness were their recourses."

"respectively": Following several commentators, we add the term (kramāt—so Ct) for clarity.

12. "the way . . . the way" pakṣaḥ . . . pakṣaḥ: The poet continues to use this polysemic term in a variety of its meanings. Compare notes to verses 7 and 11 above. Here the term carries something of its sense of "side" or "faction."

"of the great" mahātmanām: Cg insists that this normally bland epithet must be read pregnantly here so as to emphasize the great difference in quality between the exalted gods and the lesser asuras. (mahātmanām iti hetugarbhaviśeṣaṇam. mahāsvabhāvānām ity arthaḥ. samīcīnaprakṛtīnām iti yāvat.)

"Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇa: D6,9–11,T2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rākṣasa, "O rākṣasa!"

"asuras and the rākṣasas" rakṣasām . . . asurāṇām: Ct notes, with reference to the guṇa theory of Sāṃkhya, that the rākṣasas are to be distinguished from the asuras in that the former are "rājasic," or passionate in nature, wheras the latter are "tāmasic," or turgid in nature (rajastamaḥprakṛtitvāt).

13. "when . . . when" tataḥ . . . tataḥ: Literally, "then . . . then." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read instead yadā, "when," for the first tatah, while D10, GPP, and NSP read tadā, "then," (Gita Press reads yadā . . . yadā) for the second occurrence of tataḥ.

"eclipses" grasate: Literally, "it swallows, consumes." The verb is also used in the science of astronomy to describe the action of an eclipse, and the sense of "to overshadow or to dominate" seems to make that metaphor appropriate here.

"ushers in . . . brings on" abhūt . . . pravartate: Literally, "it was . . . it goes forward or occurs." The commentators differ among themselves as to the chain of causation intended here. Some, including Cv, Cg, Cr, and Cm, see, as we do, that it is the relative strength of dharma and adharma that lends to each cosmic age its particular character (dharmo 'dharmaṃ yadā grasate 'bhibhavati tadā kṛtaṃ yugam abhūt . . . adharmo yadā dharmaṃ grasate tadā tisyaḥ kaliḥ pravartate—so Cg). Others, such as Crā, Ct, and Ck, seem to take a more mechanistic view, in which it is the immutable progression of the cosmic ages that determines the relationship between the two, dharma and adharma. (yadā kṛtaṃ yugam abhūt tadā tasmād eva kālād dhetoḥ pravṛddho dharmo 'dharmaṃ grasate 'bhibhavati vai prasiddham. yadā tiṣyaḥ kaliḥ pravartate tadā tata eva hetor adharmo dharmaṃ grasate kalau pādena dharmasthiteḥ—so Ct.) The translators reflect the two views. Dutt (1893, p. 1202) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1487) follow the position of Crā, Ct, and Ck; while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 99), Pagani (1999, p. 950), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 84), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 86) translate with Cv, Cg, Cr and Cm. Ct and Ck take the verse as a jumping-off point for similar and moderately lengthy discussions of the nature of dharma and types of adharma relative to the observed behavior of rākṣasas and asuras. Both note that the gods are exclusively devoted to dharma. The demons, on the other hand, although they may perform actions that are in keeping with dharma and thus may enjoy their fruits, are tāmasic and rājasic by nature, and must, in the end, at the exhaustion of the fruits of their righteous conduct, experience the fruits of their unrighteousness. (devāḥ kevaladharmaparāḥ. rakṣosurāḥ kāmyarājasatāmasadharmamātraparāḥ. tādṛśadharmam anutiṣṭhato 'pi tān uktatriprakārādharmo na muñcaty eva. rajastamaḥprakṛtitvāt. ato dharmakaraṇena sukhino 'pi te kāmyatvena sāntatayā dharmaphalānte 'dharmaphalabhogabhāja iti na doṣaḥ—so Ct.)

"in the golden age, known as the Kṛta" kṛtam . . . yugam: Literally. "The Kṛta Yuga."

"the degenerate Tiṣya Age" tiṣyaḥ: Literally, "Tiṣya." This is an alternate name for the last and most degenerate of the four yugas, or cosmic ages. It is more commonly known as the Kali Age. Cg quotes Amarakośa 3.3.148 to this effect (tiṣyaḥ kalau ca puṣye ca).

14. "In rampaging through the worlds" caratā lokān: Literally, "by [you] ranging or wandering the worlds." The commentators take the reference to be to Rāvaṇa's digvijaya, or "career of conquest of the worlds," described in the Uttarakāṇḍa (7.13–34).

"trampled . . . embraced" vinihataḥ . . . pragṛhītaś ca: Literally, "struck down . . . adopted." As various commentators point out, the references here are to Rāvaṇa's numerous acts of oppression of the brahmans, gods, divine sages, etc. (anekadvijadevarṣyādipīḍaneneti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Note the typographical error in the critical edition, which reads pragṛhatiś ca. This is not noted in the errata.

15. "your reckless actions" pramādāt . . . te: Literally, "because of your heedlessness, recklessness."

"righteousness, which the deities revere" surabhāvanaḥ: Literally, "that which has the reverence of the gods." Following the suggestion of Ct, Cr, and Ck, we have added the word "righteousness (dharma)" to maintain the binary opposition between dharma and adharma that forms the backbone of Mālyavān's argument. We also accept these commentators' gloss on bhāvanam, "feeling of devotion or faith," as "constant worship or practice (bhāvanaṃ nityānuṣṭhānam—Ck, Ct)." Cr glosses, "it is revered (bhāvyate)." Cg and Cm, on the other hand, understand adharma to be the subject of both clauses. In keeping with this interpretation, they understand surabhāvanam to mean "favoring the gods (surānukulaḥ—Cg)" or "strengthening the gods (surān bhāvayati vardhayati—Cm)." This, however, seems redundant in the context.

16. "Doing whatever you pleased" yat kiṃcit kāriṇā tvayā: Literally, "by you doing whatever." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 99) mistakenly translates, "tout ce que tu fais." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 86) and Pagani (1999, p. 950).

"suffering" udvegaḥ: We agree with Cg, who glosses, "mental anguish (manastāpaḥ)," in taking this term in its usual sense of "pain, affliction, suffering." Ct and Cm understand the term somewhat unusually to mean "wrath, anger (krodhaḥ—Ct)." This interpretation has been followed by the majority of translators consulted, with the exception of Pagani ("une profonde détresse"; 1999, p. 950) and Gita Press ("great molestation"; 1969, vol. 3, p. 1488). Gorresio's text reads saṃtrāsaḥ, "fear." Cg and Cm understand that the seers' agitation is caused by such acts as the abduction of their daughters and wives [by Rāvaṇa] (kanyāpatnīharaṇādikam).

17. "all the different principal sacrificial rites" mukhyair yajñaiḥ . . . tais taiḥ: Literally, "those [and] those principal sacrifices."

18. "Reciting the vedas aloud . . . they chant the vedic mantras" vedāṃś coccair adhīyate . . . brahmaghoṣān udairayan: Here again, Cg attempts to eliminate the apparent redundancy, arguing that the second phrase is a kind of gloss or explanation (vivaraṇam) of the first.

"They pour oblations" juhvati: Cg tries to distinguish between the action described here and the seemingly identical action of sacrifice mentioned in the preceding verse. He argues that sacrifice (yāga) is the renunciation of some substance on behalf of a divinity, whereas oblation (homa) is the physical offering in the sacrificial fire of that which is renounced. (devatoddeśena dravyatyāgo yāgaḥ. tyaktasyāgnau prakṣepo homa ity anayor bhedaḥ.)

"Thwarting" abhibhūya: The most common sense of abhi$\sqrt{}$bhū is "to defeat, overcome, humiliate." All translations consulted interpret the gerund in this sense. Among the commentators, only Cg provides a gloss, agaṇayitvā, "paying no heed to." On the basis of their silence, we presume that the other commentators accept the more common meaning. Cg's interpretation seems to reflect the normal relationship between the vedic ṛṣis and the rākṣasas as it has been described earlier in the poem, where the brahmans required Rāma's services to protect them and their rituals from the depredations of the demons.

"all the rākṣasas scatter in all directions" diśo vipradrutāḥ sarve: Literally, "all run in [all] directions." We follow the commentators in adding the word rākṣasas to provide the subject. A variety of mainly northern manuscripts, but including the text of Cg and the printed editions of VSP, KK, Gorresio, Gita Press, and Lahore, read sarvāḥ instead of sarve, which yields the sense "they scatter in all directions." This reading is followed by all translations consulted regardless of the text on which they are based.

"thunderclouds in the hot season" stanayitnur ivoṣṇage: Literally, "like thunder in the hot season." We follow Cv, Cm, Cg, and Cr, who interpret uṣṇage in its common meaning of grīṣme, "hot season." Ck, Ct, and Cs interpret uṣṇage as a compound in which the prior member refers to the hot season, while the compound refers elliptically to the sun at that time of year. They thus read the phrase as a kind of locative absolute in the sense of "when the sun is in the hot season" (uṣṇo grīṣmas tadgate ravāv iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

19. "the Agnihotra rites" agnihotra-: See note to 6.23.24.

"saps" ādatte: Literally, "it takes away." The texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the gerund āvṛtya, "enveloping, occluding." Because in this reading the gerund replaces the finite verb, Ct and Cr must provide a replacement. Ct offers uttiṣṭhati, "it rises up," while Cr suggests atiṣṭhat, "it stood."

20. Following verse 20, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of three lines [547*] in which Mālyavān continues his speech, stating, "You obtained a boon[1] against gods, dānavas, and *yakṣa*s. But it is powerful and mighty men, monkeys, apes, and langurs, firm in their valor, who have come here and are roaring."

[1]"boon" varaḥ: The critical edition makes no mention of the boon of Rāvaṇa at this point. Cg and Cm specifically mention that the boon is that of "invulnerability (avadhyatva)." They understand Mālyavān's comment to be in anticipation of Rāvaṇa's possible objection based on his boon of invulnerability to the gods, etc. (balino 'pi devā brahmadattavaramahimnā na prahartuṃ śaknuyur iti cet tatrāha devadānavetyādinā). For Rāvaṇa's boon of invulnerability, see note to 6.28.28–29.

21. For similar passages listing inauspicious omens, see 6.31.3–12; 6.41.30–34; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.41–45; 6.65.17–19; 6.83.32–24; 6.94.14–27; and notes. Compare the similar evil omens that presage the destruction of Dvārakā at Mahābhārata 16.3. Cf. AgniP 529–33.

"And . . . many different" vividhān . . . bahuvidhāṃs tathā: Literally, "and . . . various . . . of many kinds." D0–3,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read bahūn, "many," for tathā. The commentators are eager to avoid any redundancy. They distinguish the adjectives in slightly different ways. Cg and Cm, who follow the critical text, understand vividhān to mean "divided into different types: celestial, atmospheric, and terrestrial (divyāntarikṣabhaumabhedabhinnān)." Cg takes bahuvidhān to refer to differences within the types just mentioned (bhaumādiṣu pratyekaṃ vividhān). Cm and Cv understand similarly. Ct understands bahuvidhān in the same sense in which Cg understands vividhān, that is, "divided into different types: celestial, atmospheric, and terrestrial (divyāntarikṣabhaumabhedabhinnān)." He does not comment on vividhān. Cr takes vividhān to mean "producing many forbidden consequences (anekaniṣiddhaphalavidhāyakān)." Cr then explains bahuvidhān as "of many types (anekaprakārān)."

22. "thundering deafeningly" kharābhistanitāḥ: Literally, "harshly thundering." See 6.31.5; 6.41.33; 6.45.926*–36; and 6.53.41; and notes.

"with hot blood" śoṇitena . . . uṣṇena: For blood raining down, see 6.31.5; 6.41.33; 6.45.926*–36; 6.83.33; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf. note to 6.76.2, inserted passage 1674*, lines 5–7. For a discussion on evil omens, see 5.25.35–37 and note; see also 5.27.4 and note.

23. "weeping mounts" rudatāṃ vāhanānām: The crying or weeping of mounts is a commonly mentioned ill omen. See 6.65.18; 6.83.33; and 6.94.26 and notes.

"battle flags" dhvajāḥ: Ś,V2,3,D4,7–9,11–13,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute rajo-, yielding the adjective rajodhvastāḥ, "covered with dust." This reading provides no explicit modificand for the adjective, leaving the commentators who share it to supply one. Ct and Cr supply diśaḥ, "quarters, directions," which is in accordance with the conventional evil omen of dust-occluded horizons. This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1203), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1489), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 86), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 99). Ct also notes that "some [commentators]" propose supplying instead the word vāhanāni, "mounts" (despite the gender disagreement that this would cause). Of the translators consulted, only Pagani (1999, p. 950) follows this suggestion.

24. "Beasts of prey" vyālāḥ: The term has a number of meanings, several of which are possible in this context. We agree, however, with Ct and Ck, who gloss, "carnivorous beasts (māṃsādāḥ paśavaḥ)." Cg takes the term in its adjectival sense of "malicious, vicious (duṣṭāḥ)" and sees it as modifying the jackals and vultures. All translators consulted, with the exception Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 99) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 87), agree with Ct and Ck. Roussel, however, followed as usual by Shastri, understands vyāla in another of its senses, viz., "serpent." Cf. 6.31.5 and note.

The howling or shrieking of beasts of prey, especially jackals, is a common evil portent. See 6.31.7; 6.45.32,34; 6.53.42; 6.83.33; 6.94.21; and notes. Cf. 6.41.32 and note.

"keep pouring into" praviśya . . . aniśam: Literally, "constantly entering." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute the locative ārāme, "in the garden," for the adverb aniśam, "constantly." This inferior reading is reflected in all translations consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 85), who follows Cg, and Gorresio, whose text reads sahasā, "all at once," in place of aniśam.

25. "Dark women" kālikāḥ . . . striyaḥ: Commentators differ as to the identity of these women. Ct and Ck understand them to be Mahākālīs, which are horrific forms of the goddess. Cs defines them similarly as "village divinities, such as Mahākālī, Bhadrakālī, and so forth (grāmasthāḥ mahākālībhadrakālītyādayaḥ)." Cm and Crā in a similar vein describe them as "śaktis," meaning supernatural females, such as Pūtanā, etc. (pūtanāpramukhaśaktayaḥ—Cm). Cg, whom we have followed, describes them as women of blue-black complexion, such as Pūtanā (nīlavarṇāḥ striyaḥ pūtanāpramukhā iti yāvat), while noting that some commentators (e.g., Cm, Crā) have called them "śaktis" (śaktaya ity eke)." Cr glosses karālāḥ, "deformed, hideous, or having protuberant teeth." Crā and Cm gloss striyaḥ with the accusative plural strīḥ and understand that the kālikās are speaking menacingly to the women [of Laṅkā]. For a discussion of the nature and history of malignant supernatural females in early India, see White (2003, pp. 27–66). See 6.34.15 and note. Cf. 5.22.41 and note; and 6.60.18; 6.69.23; 6.71.13; and notes.

"deathly white teeth" pāṇḍurair dantaiḥ: Literally, "with white teeth." Most commentators simply note that the women are characterized (upalakṣitāḥ) by white teeth but attribute no specific meaning to this feature. Our translation is influenced by the interpretation of Cs, who feels that the mention of the color of the teeth, along with the activities attributed to the women, indicates that death is inevitable after a short interval. (dantānāṃ pāṇḍuratvoktyoktyā ca viruddhabhāṣaṇamoṣaṇahasanādīnāṃ niścitaṃ maraṇam. kiṃcid vyavadhānena bhaviṣyatīti sūcayati.)

"laughing wildly" prahasanti: Literally, "they laugh." We have added the adverb in keeping with the tenor of the verse.

"speaking menacingly" pratibhāṣya: Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm all understand the upasarga prati as pratikūlam, "adversely, threateningly, menacingly." Ck additionally notes, "speaking improperly (asabhyabhāṣaṇaṃ kṛtvā [lit., 'having made improper speech'])." Cs understands, "contrary speech (viruddhabhāṣaṇa-)," while Cv glosses, "shouting back (pratikruśya)." Cr simply glosses, "addressing (saṃbodhya)."

"looting houses" muṣṇantyo gṛhāṇi: Ct, Ck, Cr, Cg, and Cm all feel that the word gṛhāṇi here is a kind of metonymy for the contents of the houses (gṛhāṇi tadvartidravyajātam—so Ct, Ck). This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1893, p. 1203) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 85), who translate "furniture" and "household goods," respectively.

26. "the bali offerings in house after house" gṛhāṇāṃ balikarmāṇi: Literally, "the bali rites of houses." The term bali refers to a commonly practiced household ritual of offering or scattering various foods for spirits, divinities, birds, and so on. As Cg points out, the term is used here by metonymy for the offerings or oblations that are needed to perform the rite (balikarmasādhanāni havīṃṣi). Crā understands similarly.

"Cows are giving birth to donkeys" kharā goṣu prajāyante: Literally, "donkeys are being born to cows."

"while rats are mating with mongooses" mūṣikā nakulaiḥ saha: Literally, "rats with mongooses." To make sense of this reading, one has to supply a verb. Cg, who shares the reading, suggests the bland vartante, "they are." Given the context of what follows, we prefer to borrow the verb sameyuḥ, "they mate, have sex with," from verse 27 below. Most northern manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read the locative nakaleṣu [v.l. nakulīṣu] ca for the critical reading. This then creates a parallel construction to that in pāda c, reading "mongooses are giving birth to rats."

27. "with tigers" dvīpibhiḥ: We follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "with tigers (śārdūlaiḥ)." The word can also mean leopard, and some translators render accordingly.

"and even with humans" mānuṣaiḥ saha: Note the apparent contradiction here, since, with the exception of Sītā, there are no humans in Laṅkā. Cg explains that the humans must have been produced supernaturally as a result of the omens of which Mālyavān is speaking (mānuṣāś cātrotpātajanitā eva). Crā claims that pādas cd are found only in a few manuscripts and that they contain a clear contradiction because there are no humans in Laṅkā. (kiṃnarā rākṣasaiś cāpi samīyur mānuṣaiḥ sahety ardhaṃ keṣucit kośeṣu na dṛśyate. tasmin virodho 'sti laṅkāyāṃ mānuṣābhāvāt.)

28. "White doves with red feet" pāṇḍurā raktapādāś ca . . . kapotāḥ: The red color here signals inauspiciousness. Cf. 6.67.5 and note. Cf. AgniP 232.4–5.

"flutter through the sky" vihagāḥ . . . vicaranti: Literally, "sky-goers move about." The term vihaga is most commonly used as a kenning for "bird or other flying creature." Given the presence of the noun "dove or pigeon (kapota)," it must be taken as an adjective or even as a participle. Ct and Ck understand that the omen consists not so much in the fact that the birds are flying about but that they do so inside people's houses. They therefore suggest adding the phrase "inside the houses (gṛheṣu madhya iti śeṣaḥ)." For other references to birds as ill omens, see 6.31.8; 6.41.30; 6.43.8; 6.45.18,33,36; 6.53.43; 6.83.32; and notes. See, too, 6.94.25 and note.

29. "śārikas" śārikāḥ: Probably the common mynah (also called sārika), Acridotheres tristis. See Dave 1985, pp. 81–82, 85–86; Ali and Ripley 1968–1974, vol. 5, pp. 177–180; and Brockington 1984, p. 95. Monier-Williams (s.v.) offers "Turdus salica." See 6.94.25 and note.

"screeching, "cīcīkūcī" " cīcīkūcīti vāśyantyaḥ: Cg, reading the variant vīcīkūcī, remarks that these birds, nurtured in houses for their sweet singing, have now abandoned their dulcet tones and are screeching fiercely (veśmasu madhurasaṃlāpārthaṃ poṣitāḥ śārikā madhurabhāṣaṇāni vihāya vīcīkūcīti krūraṃ vāśyantīty arthaḥ). Cr, on the other hand, understands that the birds are mimicking the cries of various species, cries such as cīcī and kūcī (cīcīti kūcīti ca tattajjātīyaśabdānukaraṇaṃ vāśyantaḥ santaḥ).

"tethered . . . once tamed, they have become aggressive" grathitāś cāpi nirjitāḥ kalahaiṣiṇaḥ: Literally, "even though tied and subdued, quarrelsome." It appears to us that the situation being described is that the pet birds have suddenly abandoned their docile demeanor and have become wild and savage. In this, our understanding is informed somewhat by that of Cg, who groups the mynahs together with the birds and beasts mentioned in the southern interpolated passage 558* (see below), arguing that the creatures are quarrelsome, even though they have been previously tamed and bound together in bunches (pūrvaṃ nirjitā api punaḥ kalahaiṣiṇaḥ santo grathitāḥ puñjībhūtāḥ patanti dhāvanti). Ct, Ck, and Cr, however, understand the situation to be that the birds have been worsted by other birds in fights and are tied to one another as they flutter about (paksyantarair nirjitā grathitāḥ patanti parasparam ābadhya patanti).

Following verse 29, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [558*]: "All the birds and beasts are screeching at the sun."

30. "at all hours" kāle kāle: Literally, "in time, in time." Cr, Ct, and Ck understand, "at each of the saṃdhya times, that is, dawn and twilight (saṃdhyākāleṣu)." Cg similarly explains, "morning and evening (sāyaṃ prātāś ca)." Cf. 5.12.48.

31. This verse and the one that follows it are interesting from a textual point of view, and their inclusion in the critical edition bears upon the debate as to whether the oldest stratum of the text recognizes the divinity of Rāma and his identity with Viṣṇu. Both verses are omitted in D5,6,T, while D11 omits only verse 31. The verses are poorly attested in the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators, with only Cr and Cs accepting and commenting upon them. Ck mentions the verses and notes that the older, i.e., more authentic, textual authorities regard them as interpolated and, therefore, decline to comment upon them (viṣṇuṃ manyāmahe rāmam ityādi saṃdhiṃ rāmeṇa rāvaṇa ity antaṃ ślokadvayaṃ prakṣiptam iti prācīnair na vyākhyātam). Ct quotes his remarks approvingly. Cr explains verse 31, saying that Mālyavān, etc., think that Rāma must be Viṣṇu in human form because of his extraordinary valor. They reason, therefore, that he must be something other than an ordinary human and that he is indeed the Supreme Being (parapuruṣa) (mānuṣaṃ rūpam āsthitaṃ rāmaṃ viṣṇuṃ svapratāpadvārā sarvatra pūrṇaṃ manyāmahe 'to 'yaṃ rāghavo mānuṣamātro 'smajjñānaviṣayībhūtamanuṣyaśarīravān na prākṛtavilakṣaṇaḥ parapuruṣa ity arthaḥ).

The two verses are treated variously in the different printed editions of the southern texts. GPP brackets and places them between 6.35.34cd [=critical edition 30ef] and 6.35.34ef [=critical edition 565*]. The editors of KK bracket them but number them as verses 6.35.38–39, noting that the verses are absent from five of their manuscripts. VSP omits them from its running text, placing them in a footnote marked between its verses 6.35.36 and 6.35.37. It quotes Ck and Cs in that same note. Gita Press includes these verses as 6.36.35,36a–d. Because of the spotty representation of this passage in the printed editions of the south, it is rendered in only a few of the translations consulted. Thus only Dutt (1893, p. 1203), Shastri (1959, vol. 9, p. 87), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1489) translate the verses, while Pagani, Roussel, and Raghunathan omit them. A variant of the passage appears in Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 232) and corresponds to his edition's 6.11.32cd–34ab [=Lahore edition 6.11.28–29]. That this passage has such strong textual support in what is generally acknowledged to be one of the "core books" of the epic speaks in favor of the position that the oldest strata of the text are fully aware of Rāma's divinity and of his identification as a Vaiṣṇava avatāra (see Pollock 1984b and 1991, pp. 15–67; pace Brockington 1984, chap. 7 and Gonzales-Reimann 2006). Cf. Hopkins 1902, p. 139. Compare 6.47.104 and note.

"We truly believe" manyāmahe: Literally, "we think."

32. Following verse 32, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [565*]: "You should consider these events[1] and then do what will be beneficial for our future."

[1]"events" karmāṇi: Literally, "actions, deeds." Cr understands these actions to be the heroic deeds of Rāma. Ct agrees but adds the omens reported by Mālyavān. Ck refers only to the omens. VSP, KK, and GPP record Cg's reading as kāryāṇi (which is the reading of Cm), while the critical edition reports his reading as karmāṇi. In his commentary Cg appears to read karmāṇi. Both he and Cm gloss, "kartavyāni," which, Cg further explains, are the actions incumbent on Rāvaṇa, such as returning Sītā, etc.

33. "among those foremost counselors" anuttameṣu: Literally, "among the foremost." Following Cg, we have supplied the noun "counselors" for clarity. Commentators are divided as to how to read the adjective. We agree with Cg in taking it as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "having no superior," as this seems to fit the context in which the virtues of Rāvaṇa's counselors have been described (6.9.1–5). Cr and Cm understand the term in the sense of "non-excellent" and take it as a reference to the lowly and vile rākṣasas who form Rāvaṇa's entourage. Cs offers both alternatives, glossing, "either incomparable or vile (anuttameṣv asadṛśeṣu rākṣaseṣu yadvānuttameṣu nīceṣu)." None of the translators consulted takes the term as pejorative, with the exception of Dutt (1893, p. 1202), who seems to take the plural term as a reference to Rāvaṇa himself, translating, "having said this unto that vile one."

"had judged the intentions" parīkṣya . . . manaḥ: Literally, "having examined the mind." Ct and Ck explain, "having realized that 'my words do not please him' (tasmai rāvaṇāyety artho manaḥ parīkṣya maduktam asmai na rocata iti jñātvety arthaḥ—so Ct)." Cg, Cs, and Cm explain, "realizing that his mind was not to be changed (manaḥ parīkṣyānivartyaṃ jñātvā—so Cg)."

"watching Rāvaṇa closely" samavekṣya rāvaṇam: Cg explains, "having observed Rāvaṇa's appearance closely, that is, principally observing his gestures, etc. (rāvaṇākāraṃ samavekṣyeṅgitādidarśanapuraḥsaraṃ dṛṣṭvā)." He thus explicitly distinguishes this action from the action of examining Rāvaṇa's feelings expressed in the gerund parīkṣya above. Pagani (1999, p. 951) understands, "devant la moue de Rāvaṇa."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 27

1. "could not abide" na marṣayati: Literally, "he does not tolerate."

"the words . . . uttered for his own good" vākyaṃ hitam uktam: Literally, "speech spoken beneficially or beneficial speech spoken." All translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 86) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 7, p. 232), understand the word hitam as an adjective meaning "beneficial," modifying vākyam, "speech." We, however, tend to agree with Cg, who reads the term hitam adverbially with the participle uktam, "spoken" (uktaṃ hitaṃ yathā bhavati tathā).

2. "rolling his eyes in rage" amarṣāt parivṛttākṣaḥ: On rolling one's eyes as a sign of rage, see 5.20.23; 6.46.14; 6.84.30; and notes. Cf. 6.47.55 and 6.50.9.

3. "I shall not listen to these" naitac chrotragataṃ mama: Literally, "this has not entered or gone to my ears."

"thinking them to be beneficial" hitabuddhyā: Literally, "with an idea of [being] beneficial."

"you are in effect siding with my enemies" parapakṣaṃ praviśyaiva: Literally, "having actually entered the enemies' camp or side." We interpret with the majority of the commentators. Ct and Ck, however, gloss, "having accepted their [the enemies'] superiority (tatprābalyaṃ parigṛhyaiva)." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1204) follows this interpretation.

4. Cg and Cm subject this verse to two interesting but very different close readings. Cg explains each of the terms in Rāvaṇa's description. Thus, mānuṣam, "human," means that Rāma is weak by reason of his very species (jātyā hīnabalam); kṛpaṇam, "wretched," means that he is deficient by nature (prakṛtyā hīnam); ekam, "alone," indicates that he has no (significant) allies (asahāyam); śākhāmṛgāśrayam, "has to rely on tree-dwelling monkeys," means that he has only inferior allies (kṣudrasahāyam); tyaktaṃ pitrā, "abandoned by his own father," means that he is impoverished (nirdhanam); and vanālayam, "lives in the forest," indicates that he is without a kingdom (rājyahīnam). Cm, in one of his intermittent bursts of devotional energy (see note to 5.20.3; cf. notes to 6.47.6; 6.53.38; 6.56.13; 6.57.7; 6.59.53; 6.60.6; 6.65.10; 6.68.26; 6.75.19–22; 6.80.15; and 6.81.4), reinterprets each of these terms to make Rāvaṇa deliver a virtual stotra in praise of the Rāmāvatara. He claims that in reality (vastutas tu) the inner meaning of the verse is as follows:

> Vanālayam means "he whose resting place (ālaya) is the water (vanam), i.e., the ocean (udadhiḥ)," in other words, "who sleeps on a banyan leaf (vaṭapatraśayinam) [in the ocean], or Nārāyaṇa." This divinity is abandoned by his father (pitrā tyaktaṃ) in the sense that he has no beginning, etc., for the Lord, lacking any birth, and so forth, has therefore no father. Thus, he is alone (ekam). That is, he is without a second. (ata eva pitrā tyaktaṃ janmādirahitam ity arthaḥ. īśvarasya janmādyabhāvād eva pitrādyabhāvaḥ. ata evaikam advitīyam.) He is śākhāmṛgāśrayam in the sense that he must be sought (mṛgyate) through the śākhās, or branches of the vedic corpus, that is, he is to be known through the vedas (ata eva śākhāmṛgāśrayaṃ śākhābhir vedaśākhābhir mṛgyata iti śākhāmṛgo vedavedyaḥ). Also, since he is the universal Lord (sarveśvaraḥ), he is thus the āśrayaḥ, or Universal recourse (sarveśvaraḥ sa cāsāv āśrayaś ceti tam). He is human (mānuṣam) in that he has incarnated himself in the form of a man and kṛpaṇa in the sense of compassionate (kṛpālu). Moreover, in regarding Rāma in these terms, Rāvaṇa is saying that Mālyavān is quite correct in seeing him as capable (tathāpi kenāpi hetunā mānuṣaṃ manuṣyarūpeṇāvatīrṇam ata eva kṛpaṇaṃ kṛpāluṃ rāmaṃ samarthaṃ manyase kila tad yuktam eva).

5. Cm continues his devotional interpretation in this verse, inverting the order of the adjectives ahīnam, "in no way lacking," and hīnam, "weak, deficient," to yield the sense "What makes you (Mālyavān) think that I, the lord of the rākṣasas, who am lacking in all valor, am so strong (ahīnam)? (kena hetunā rakṣasām īśvaraṃ sarvaparākramair hīnaṃ mām ahīnaṃ manyasa ity arthaḥ)." See verse 4 above.

6. "out of resentment of my prowess" vīradveṣeṇa: Literally, "through hatred of a hero." Cg explains, "through animus toward a hero of your own race (svajātīyavīradveṣeṇa)."

"the prompting of my foes" paraprotsāhanena: A few, mostly devanāgarī, manuscripts and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read mama, "my," for para-, "foe." This reading gives the phrase the sense of "[or] in order to provoke me." Ct and Ck explain that Mālyavān hopes to provoke Rāvaṇa to fight by praising his enemy (śatrupraśaṃsāyāṃ krodhād yuddhāya pravartiṣyata iti). This reading, both textually and contextually inferior, is reflected in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1204), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 88), Pagani (1999, p. 951), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 101).

7. "unless he were prompted by an enemy" vinā protsāhanād ripoḥ: Some devanāgarī manuscripts (D7,9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead vinā protsāhanena vā, "unless through incitement." They interpret the phrase as they did in the previous verse and are followed by the same translators who are mentioned in the previous note.

8. "who, but for the lotus, resembles the goddess Śrī" padmahīnām iva śriyam: Literally, "like Śrī devoid of a lotus." Commentators are somewhat divided as to how to interpret the phrase. Ct takes it similarly to the parallel expression, bhraṣṭapadmām iva śriyam at 6.25.16, arguing that it suggests Sītā's loss of splendor and her vulnerability to abduction (lakṣmītvābhāvabodhanam atyupādeyatvabodhanaṃ ca). The context here, however, would seem to call for a reference to Sītā's beauty and desirability rather than her loss of radiance as at 6.25.16. We therefore follow Cs and Ck, who understand that it is only the lotus that distinguishes Sītā from the splendid Goddess of Fortune (kevalaṃ padmenaivaitasyās tasyāś ca bheda iti bhāvaḥ).

"for fear of Rāghava" rāghavasya bhayāt: We read the phrase with Cg, who glosses rāghavāt for rāghavasya. Cm and Cr agree. Some of the translators take the genitive rāghavasya (sādharaṇaṣaṣṭhī) as the indirect object of the verb pratidāsyāmi, "to give back." They thus understand, "why would I give . . . back to Rāghava?" Cm provides a devotional explanation, interpreting as follows: "Since I took Sītā from the forest only out of a desire to be slain at Rāma's hands, why then would I return her out of fear of him? (rāmahastād vadhecchayaiva vanāt sītām ānīya rāghavasya bhayāt kim arthaṃ pratidāsyāmīty arthaḥ)." See note to verse 4 above.

9. "In a few short days" kaiścid ahobhiḥ: Literally, "with or by some days."

"you will see me slay Rāghava" paśya . . . rāghavaṃ nihataṃ mayā: Literally, "Behold Rāghava slain by me." Cm, continuing his devotional reading of the passage, proposes taking the root $\sqrt{han}$, "slay," in the sense of "come ($ā\sqrt{gam}$)." He thus understands, "[behold Rāma] coming here on my account." (mayā hetunā nihatam āgatam ity arthaḥ. "hanahiṃsāgatyoḥ" [Naighaṇṭuka ii, 14] iti dhātor evam arthaḥ.) See note to verse 4 above. See, too, notes to 6.37.9; 6.80.29; 6.81.4; and 6.91.19. Cf. 6.67.17 and note.

"and their tens of millions of monkeys" vṛtaṃ vānarakoṭībhiḥ: Literally, "surrounded by tens of millions of monkeys."

11. Cg believes that Rāvaṇa utters this verse out of regret for having spoken so harshly to his venerable granduncle (see note to 6.25.5), who only wants what is good for him (atyantahitaparaṃ vṛddhaṃ mātāmahaṃ katham evaṃ paruṣam uktavān asmīty anutāpenāha).

"I might be cut in two" dvidhā bhajyeyam: Literally, "I might divide into two." Ct says that Rāvaṇa might break like bamboo but will not bend like a reed (dvidhā bhajyeyam itaraveṇuvan na nameyaṃ vetasavat). We prefer the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "I might have my head cut off (śiraśchedaṃ prāpnuyām)." Cm supplies the word śatruṇā, "by an enemy."

"This is an innate fault of mine" eṣa me sahajo doṣaḥ: Cg, with whom Cm agrees, notes that Rāvaṇa makes this self-deprecatory comment in the knowledge that his position violates the maxim of political science that holds that an inferior party sues for peace (tarhi hīyamānena sandhiḥ kārya iti nītiśāstravirodhaḥ syāt tatrāha eṣa me sahajo doṣa iti). See 6.26.8 and ArthŚā 7.1.13 (parasmād dhīyamānaḥ saṃdadhīta).

12. "somehow or other . . . actually" tāvat . . . yadṛcchayā: Literally, "really . . . by chance." Ct and Ck understand Rāvaṇa to be attributing the feat of bridging the ocean to a lucky accident rather than to any great power on Rāma's part. They cite in this connection the maxim of the writing of the bark beetle (ghuṇākṣaranyāya) in which the burrowed tracks of the insect in wood or paper may chance to resemble letters of the alphabet. (rāmeṇa samudre setur baddha iti vismayo yadi ko 'tra vismayaḥ. yataḥ sa yadṛcchayā daivagatyā ghuṇākṣaranyāyena na tu svasāmarthyenety arthaḥ.) Cg, similarly, invokes the maxim of the crow and the palmyra fruit (kākatālīyanyāya) in which the alighting of the bird on the palmyra tree and the fall of its fruit are falsely thought to be causally connected (atha setubandhena vismayase cet tad api kākatālīyam ato mā bhūt te bhayam ity āha). The two maxims seem somewhat inapposite here, as it is difficult to see how anyone could accidentally build a bridge over the ocean. Cg attempts perhaps to minimize the incongruity by taking the polysemic indeclinable tāvat in its sense of "just a little" to indicate that it was only a small ocean that Rāma bridged (tāvat samudre svalpasamudra ity arthaḥ).

"what is so miraculous about this" vismayaḥ ko 'tra: Literally, "what miracle is there in this?" Cr says that Rāvaṇa means to say, "I am (lit., we are) capable of accomplishing many [such miracles] (vayam evam anekaśaḥ kartuṃ samarthā ity arthaḥ)."

13. "not" na: Continuing his devotional reading, Cm proposes taking the negative particle out of the syntax of the primary sentence and reading it separately, in the sense of "no doubt (na sandehaḥ)." He thus reads, "having crossed . . . Rāma will return alive, without a doubt, I promise you (sa tv ity asya vāstavārthas rāmo vānarasenayā sahārṇavaṃ tīrtvā jīvan pratiyāsyatīti te satyaṃ pratijānāmi na sandehaḥ)." See note to verse 4 above.

14. "with such agitation . . . angry" saṃrabdhaṃ ruṣṭam: We read the former term adverbially with the participle bruvāṇam, "speaking," and the second adjectivally with rāvaṇam, "Rāvaṇa." Ct, Cr, and Cg read the former adjectivally and thus are obligated to distinguish the near synonyms. Ct understands saṃrabdham to mean "worked up for battle (saṃrabdhaṃ yuddhe saṃrambhavantam)," while Cr glosses, "prepared for battle (yuddhodyogavantam)." Cg explains, "filled with egotism (ahaṃkārayuktam)." Ct glosses ruṣṭam as "angry (kupitam)." See note to 6.2.14.

"humiliated" vrīḍitaḥ: Cg suggests that Mālyavān is humiliated because of the futility of his advice (svopadeśavaiphalyād iti bhāvaḥ).

16. "he went on taking counsel and deliberating" mantrayitvā vimṛśya ca: Cg attempts to differentiate the near synonyms by arguing that the former refers to deliberating the course of action and the latter to the taking of decisions. (mantrayitvā kartavyaṃ vicārya. vimṛśya niścitya.)

"ordering" kārayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused to make."

"unparalleled defense of Laṅkā" laṅkāyām atulāṃ guptim: Literally, "an unequaled protection in Laṅkā." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead laṅkāyās tu tadā guptim, "then . . . the defense of Laṅkā."

19. "after assigning Śuka and Sāraṇa" vyādiśya śukasāraṇau: Ct, apparently referring to the tense exchanges between Rāvaṇa and these two rākṣasa spies at 6.20.1–13 above, notes that Rāvaṇa contemptuously relieves them of duty [at the northern gate] after hearing their reports [of their botched intelligence missions] (tanmukhato vṛttānta-śravaṇottaraṃ tau tiraskṛtyety arthaḥ). The idea is that Rāvaṇa intends to take that position himself. Ct's understanding is perhaps supported by the fact that, at 6.28.13 below, Rāvaṇa alone is said to be stationed at the northern gate, while no mention of Śuka and Sāraṇa is made. See 6.34.19 and notes.

"I shall be there" atra bhaviṣyāmi: As is made clear by 6.28.13, the sense is that Rāvaṇa plans to take up his position at the northern gate as well. B4,D5,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead gamiṣyāmi, "I shall go." Cr believes that Rāvaṇa is indicating a planned inspection of all the four positions to which he has ordered his ministers (atrādiṣṭarākṣasasthitadikṣv ahaṃ gamiṣyāmi yathā-kālaṃ sarvaṃ draksyāmīty arthaḥ).

20. "the central encampment" madhyame . . . gulme: Cg defines gulma here as "a shrine or domed structure in the center of the city (nagaramadhyacaityasthānam)." This contrasts somewhat with his explanation of the same term at 5.3.27, where he defines it as "a military assembly point in the center of the city (nagaramadhyasthitasainyasamājaḥ)." Ct and Ck gloss, "an army encampment in the center of the city (puramadhyavartini senā-sanniveśe)," while earlier Ct understands, "central courtyard (madhyamakakṣyāpradeśaḥ)." See 5.3.27 (= GPP 5.4.15) and note. Cf. 6.3.27; 6.28.31; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

"Virūpākṣa" virūpākṣam: This rākṣasa's name was used by Jacobi (1893) as part of his argument for the interpolated nature of much of the text of the Sundarakāṇḍa. See Goldman and Goldman 1996, p. 23. See, too, 6.28.31 and note.

21. "Thus did . . . complete . . . Then . . . he considered" evam . . . kṛtvā . . . mene: Literally, "Having made [arrangements] thus, he thought."

"Then, being under the power of fate, he considered himself to have accomplished his objective." mene kṛtārtham ātmānaṃ kṛtāntavaśam āgataḥ: D5–7,9–11,T,M, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead the paraphrase kṛtakṛtyam ivātmānaṃ manyate kālacoditaḥ, "impelled by Kāla (i.e., his own impending doom), he thought himself to have, as it were, accomplished his purpose." Cf. 6.38.19 and note.

22. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 28

1–3. "Rāma the king of men, Sugrīva the king of the monkeys, the monkey Hanumān, son of Vāyu" naravānararājau tau sa ca vāyusutaḥ kapiḥ: Literally, "the two kings of men and monkeys [respectively] and the monkey, the son of Vāyu."

"apes" ṛkṣa-: On the identity of ṛkṣas, see note to 6.4.17. See, too, 1.16.10 and note and R. Goldman 1989.

"Suṣeṇa and his sons" suṣeṇaḥ sahadāyādaḥ: The term can refer specifically to a son, to any male heir, or, generically, to any male relative. Here, both Ct and Cg select the more generic meaning, "kinsmen," citing Amarakośa (3.3.89) (dāyādau sutabāndhavāv ity amara). However, at 6.35.2–3, the same term is used in connection with Suṣeṇa in a context in which the sense of "son[s]" is clearly preferable, and, for the sake of consistency, we have translated similarly here. Elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa the term generally is used in the sense of "heir" (1.59.5,6; 2.102.29; and 3.66.10).

"took counsel together, saying" samavetāḥ samarthayan: Literally, "assembled, they deliberated." Note the irregular absence of the preterit augment in the imperfect.

4. "It is not to be conquered even by the immortal gods" amarair api durjayā: B1,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sarvair api sudurjayā, "extremely difficult to conquer even by all." It is evident to the commentators and translators who share this reading that a word for "gods" must be understood or supplied.

5. "It is time to take counsel and formulate a plan" mantrayadhvaṃ vinirṇaye: Literally, "you [pl.] must take counsel in reference to a fixed plan."

"For this is the principal stronghold of Rāvaṇa" nityaṃ saṃnihito hy atra rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "for Rāvaṇa is constantly present here."

6. "rich in meaning" puṣkalārtham: Ct explains, "having few words, but abundant meaning (bahvarthālpaśabdam)."

"free from all vulgarity" agrāmyapadavat: Literally, "having no vulgar words." Ct explains, "having no vulgar meanings or words and free from incorrect usages (agrāmyārthapadavad apaśabdahīnaṃ ca)." Cr and Ck understand only, "free from incorrect usages (apaśabdahīnam)," while Cm explains only, "having no vulgar meanings or words (agrāmyārthapadavat)." Cg understands the expression to refer explicitly to a dual linguistic code, including Sanskrit and a regional Lañkān, or rākṣasa, language or dialect. He glosses the term as "possessing Sanskrit words" and explains that Vibhīṣaṇa speaks without the use of his regional language in order that all his listeners may understand him clearly. (agrāmyapadavat saṃskṛtapadavat. sarveṣāṃ sphuṭapratipattaye svadeśabhāṣāpadarahitam uktavān ity arthaḥ.) See note to 4.3.25 (App. I, No. 3) concerning Hanumān's proficiency in Sanskrit. See, too, 5.28.19 and note.

7. "Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa": See note to 6.11.3, where Cg identifies the four by the same names. See, too, 6.10.12, where the four are first mentioned. Cf. 6.13.2; 6.28.7; and 6.71.2. See verses 32–34 and notes below. See also 7.5.39, where the four are said to be Anala, Anila, Hara, and Saṃpāti.

8. "Turning themselves into birds" bhūtvā śakunayaḥ sarve: Compare note to 6.13.23 (App. I, No. 10), where Śuka similarly turns himself into a bird for the purpose of espionage.

"the defensive preparations" vidhānam: Literally, "arrangements." We follow Ct, Ck, Cm, and Cr, and also the logic of the narrative in adding the word "defensive" (pururakṣārtham iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

11–12. "spears, swords, and bows, and wielding lances and war hammers" paṭṭasāsidhanuṣmadbhiḥ śūlamudgarapāṇibhiḥ: See Emeneau 1953, and cf. Brockington 2006. See Glossary of Weapons.

"is stationed": The two verses referring to Indrajit have no finite verb or nominal equivalent. We agree with Cg in borrowing the verbal phrase "is stationed (āsādya tiṣṭhati)" from verse 10 (indrajit paścimadvāram āsādya tiṣṭhatīty anukṛṣyate).

13. "supremely confident" param asaṃvignaḥ: Literally, "supremely unperturbed." We have followed the reading and interpretation of Cg and Cs, who read the sequence as two words, param plus asaṃvignaḥ, and then take param adverbially. Ct and Ck read the sequence as a karmadhāraya compound parama-saṃvignaḥ, which yields the meaning "extremely agitated." They explain that, despite Rāvaṇa's outward demeanor, his heart is gripped by fear because of the report he has had from his spies, Śuka and Sāraṇa, concerning the enormous size of the forces opposing him (see sargas 17–19 above) (śukasāraṇāveditamahābalasmaraṇād antaḥkaraṇe 'tibhītaḥ—so Ct). This interpretation, which is followed by all translators who follow the text of Ct, is plausible in light of the reference at 6.22.2, where Rāvaṇa is shown as somewhat shaken by his spies' report. On the other hand, fear does not appear to be in keeping with Rāvaṇa's character, and this interpretation seems to accord poorly with the adjective yukta, "focused," that precedes it. Cs quotes the interpretation of Ck and Ct but claims that it is not in keeping with the tenor of praise of Rāvaṇa. He notes that, if the author had intended to express fear, he would have done so in the context of Rāvaṇa's witnessing the heroic deeds of Hanumān (see 5.44.1 and 5.46.1), since witnessing something directly is more powerful than merely hearing about it. (śukasāraṇāveditamahābalasmaraṇād antaḥkaraṇe bhīta iti vyākhyā stutiprastāvānanuguṇā. yadi vaktavyā bhītis tarhi hanumataikalena kṛtasya karmaṇo dṛṣṭatvena vaktavyā. śravaṇāpekṣayā svasākṣiṇaḥ prābalyāt.)

14. "Virūpākṣa" virūpākṣaḥ: See 6.27.20 and note; and note to verse 31 below.

"still more rākṣasas" rākṣasaiḥ: Literally, "with rākṣasas." Here, as in verse 12 above, there seems to be a distinction between notable rākṣasa warriors and the company of foot soldiers. In this case, Cg adds the word "principal or leading (mukhyaiḥ)" as a modifier of rākṣasaiḥ.

"swords" -khaḍga-: Although the reading is unattested in the critical apparatus, printed versions of the text of Ct and Cr read instead mudga- "war hammer or mace." This variant is reflected in the translations of Dutt (1893, p. 1206), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 89), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 104).

15. "as quickly as possible" śīghram: Literally, "quickly."

16. "In the city" pure: A variety of manuscripts (Ś,V,B4,D0–4,7–13,G2,3,M5) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read tathā, "and," in place of pure.

"one thousand . . . and" ca sahasraṃ ca: A few manuscripts (D10,11,M1,2) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr substitute daśasāhasram, "ten thousand." The larger number thus appears in translations that follow these commentators.

"elephants . . . chariots . . . horses . . . rākṣasas" gajānām . . . rathānām . . . hayānām . . . rakṣasām: If, as we suggested above in note 14, the term rākṣasa here refers specifically to foot soldiers, then the verse alludes to the classic four divisions of the ancient Indian army (see notes to 6.3.24). Several of the commentators, including Ct, Cm, and Cg (first alternative), clearly understand this to be the case. (gajānāṃ gajayodhinām. rathānāṃ hayānām ity atrāpy evaṃ draṣṭavyam—so Cg.) Thus, several translations refer to the warriors rather than the mounts. Cg's second interpretation, referring specifically to the elephants, etc., is the one we have followed (yadvā gajānām ityādiśabdā gajādiparāḥ). Cm proposes adding the phrase "ready for battle (sannaddha)" to each of these war vehicles as well as to the rākṣasas mentioned in the verse.

"more than ten million" sāgrakoṭī: The term is ambiguous, as sāgra- can mean either "full, entire" or "with a surplus, more than." Ct and Cr understand, "ten million increased by some hundreds of thousands (kiṃciṃllakṣyasaṃkhyādhikā koṭir ity arthaḥ—so Ct)." Ck, who reads the plural koṭīḥ, understands, "tens of millions increased by some thousands (sāgrakoṭīḥ koṭibhyo 'dhikakiṃcitsahasrasaṃkhyā ity arthaḥ)." Cg understands, "a full ten million (pūrṇā koṭiḥ)."

17. "the handpicked guard" iṣṭāḥ: Literally, "cherished or favored ones." We agree with the interpretation of Cg, who glosses, "belonging to the innermost circle (antaraṅgāḥ)" and explains, "his personal attendants (svasevinaḥ)."

19. "he made these concluding comments" idam uttaram abravīt: Normally, this would mean "he uttered this reply." Since, however, Vibhīṣaṇa is not responding to any prior speech on Rāma's part, we take uttaram adjectivally in the sense of "last, final, concluding," understanding an implicit word for speech. Cg suggests the equally plausible "the following speech (anantaravaktavyam)." Northern texts avoid the awkwardness by reading the more conventional "he spoke these further [words] (idaṃ punar uvāca ha).

Following 19ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [576*]: "Having spoken in this fashion, that great-armed [Vibhīṣaṇa] introduced those rākṣasas and had those ministers report to Rāma all that was going on[1] in Laṅkā."

[1]"all that was going on" sarvam: Literally, "all."

Following verse 19, D7,9–11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators insert an additional line [577*]: "Rāvaṇa's majestic younger brother, in his desire to aid Rāma."

20–21. "Kubera" kuberam: This incident from Rāvaṇa's past is related in the Uttarakāṇḍa (sargas 14–15). See 6.7.3–5 and notes.

"six million" ṣaṣṭiḥ śatasahasrāṇi: Literally, "sixty hundred thousand." According to Cg, Vibhīṣaṇa's point here is that, as he has shown in the previous verses, the rākṣasa army Rāma is about to confront is many times larger than even the one that assisted Rāvaṇa in conquering the worlds in a previous era (digvijayakālikabalād ādhunikabalam adhikam iti kathayituṃ pūrvabalaṃ parigaṇayati).

"valor, strength, energy, power, dignity, and pride" parākrameṇa vīryeṇa tejasā sattvagauravāt . . . darpeṇa: Cg attempts to distinguish these semantically overlapping terms as follows: parākrama means "the power to conquer one's enemies (parābhibhavasāmarthyena)"; vīrya, "the quality of keeping oneself steadfast in battle (svayam avikṛtatvena)"; and tejasā, "courage, splendor (pratāpena)." Like Cm, he understands sattvagauravāt as a compound with the sense of "extreme steadfastness (dhairyātiśayena)." See note to 6.2.14.

22. According to Cg, Vibhīṣaṇa, anticipating [the objection] that it is improper to describe an enemy's army in the presence of one's lord, refutes [the objection] (svāmisannidhau śatrubalavarṇanam ayuktam ity āśaṅkya pariharati).

"Please do not be angry with me over this." atra manyur na kartavyaḥ: Literally, "Let there be no anger or despondency in this." Ct and Ck, who take manyuḥ in both its senses of anger and despair, here see Vibhīṣaṇa as urging Rāma not to give way like Rāvaṇa to these emotions upon hearing of his enemy's strength (atra rāvaṇabalavarṇanaviṣaye manyuḥ svāntaḥkaraṇe dainyam api roṣaś ca na kāryo rāvaṇavat—so Ct). See 6.17.5 and 6.20.1–12.

"I am trying to rouse your fury for battle" roṣaye: Literally, "I would make you angry." We have followed the interpretation of Ct, Cg, and Cm. The latter two understand that Rāma's ability to defeat even the gods, described in the second half of the verse, is a result of his being roused to fury in battle (roṣaye śatrunirasanāya roṣaṃ utpādaye na bhīṣaye śatrubalavarṇanena na bhītim utpādaye). Cr understands the phrase somewhat differently. He applies the negative particle na to kopaye (his v.l. for roṣaye) as well as to bhīṣaye in pāda b. He thus explains, "Since you are capable of defeating even the gods, you should not get too angry in the current battle. For you will gain the victory even without excessive anger. Therefore, I will try to rouse neither your anger nor your fear (yataḥ surāṇām api nigrahe tvaṃ samartho 'sy ato 'tra yuddhe manyur atikopo na kartavyo 'tikopanam antaraiva te vijayo bhaviṣyatīti tātparyam ata eva tvāṃ na kopaye nāpi bhīṣaye)." Ck's understanding is similar to that of Cr.

23. "you, sir . . . will . . . destroy" bhavān . . . nirmathiṣyasi: Cr and Cg note the irregular use of the second person with the formal third person pronoun bhavān. Cg attributes this to an irregular epic usage (madhyamapuruṣatvam ārṣam), while Cr attributes it to carelessness (vyatyayena madhyamaḥ puruṣaḥ). Manuscript evidence supports the critical edition's reading.

"with its four divisions" caturāṅgeṇa: This term conventionally describes the classical Indian army with its four kinds of fighting forces: infantry, cavalry, chariots, and elephants. See note to 6.3.24. This description is entirely inapposite for the monkey forces marshaled by Sugrīva, as they use neither mounts nor vehicles. The problem does not arise for Ct nor for the translators who follow him, for his text [and that of Crā] reads vṛtam for vṛtaḥ, "surrounded," in which case the description is of Rāvaṇa's army and is perfectly appropriate. Cg, Cm, and Ck, however, who share the reading of the critical text, need to justify the usage. Cg explains, "the monkey army is divided into four sections on the analogy of Rāvaṇa's army (rāvaṇasenāvac caturāvayavena vyūhya vibhajya)." Presumably he understands that one segment of the monkey troops confronts a corresponding aṅga of the rākṣasa host. Cm, whose position Cg mentions and ascribes to others (anye), thinks that the monkey host is said to have four divisions because it is the instrument of accomplishing the mission that [normally] is to be effected by an army of four divisions (caturāṅganirvāhyakāryakaraṇasadbhāvād vānarabalasya caturāṅgatvoktiḥ). Ck believes that the reference is to the spatial division of the army of which one division is stationed at each of the four gateways of the city wall of Laṅkā in order to blockade it (yasmāt tena caturdvāreṣu sarvāpi senā vibhajya pratiṣṭhāpitā tat tasmād bhavān apīdaṃ vānarānīkaṃ caturāṅgena caturdvāropa[ro]dhārthaṃ caturavayavavibhāgena vyūhya tathā).

24. "When Vibhīṣaṇa, the younger brother of Rāvaṇa, had spoken in this fashion" rāvaṇāvaraje vākyam evaṃ bruvati: Literally, "when Rāvaṇa's younger brother had thus spoken this speech."

27. "of boundless vitality" aprameyātmā: The precise sense of the term is hard to determine, principally because of the broad semantic range of the noun ātman in compounds of this type. The term can and does mean anything from "self, soul, mind, and spirit" to "body" in the epic literature. Given the context, we have chosen the sense of "vital spirit or energy." The epithet is used elsewhere of Śiva, usually in the sense "[he] of inscrutable spirit" (Apte s.v.). Cg understands the epithet to suggest that Hanumān is a worthy [foe] of that master of illusion Indrajit [whom Rāvaṇa has posted at the western gate (see verses 11 and 12 above)] (aprameyātmeti māyāvina indrajito 'yam evārha iti bhāvaḥ).

"let . . . force and breach" nipīḍya . . . praviśatu: Literally, "having pressed upon, let him enter."

28–29. "gift of a boon" varadāna-: For Rāvaṇa's qualified boon of invulnerability, see 1.14.12–15 and notes. Cf. 7.10.17–20. On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see Pollock 1991, pp. 15–54. See, too, 6.47.53,104; 6.49.12; 6.59.82; 6.63.40; 6.82.26,29 and notes; and notes to 6.7.15; 6.12.10; 6.13.15; 6.26.20; 6.31.51–52; 6.40.56 (835*); 6.47.104; 6.49.56; 6.54.54; 6.59.82; and 6.99.9. Cf. 6.57.4; 6.59.31; and 6.67.27 and notes. See, too, 5.49.23–26 and 5.58.14 and notes.

31. "the . . . king of the monkeys, Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, king of the apes, and Vibhīṣaṇa, the younger brother of the rākṣasa lord" vānarendraś ca . . . ṛkṣarājaś ca jāmbavān / rākṣasendrānujaś caiva: Literally, "the king of the monkeys, Jāmbavān, king of the apes, and the younger brother of the rākṣasa lord." V2,3,D3,5,7,9–11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read vīryavān, "heroic," for jāmbavān, "Jāmbavān," See note to 6.4.17.

"Let . . . take up their positions at the central encampment" gulme bhavatu madhyame: Literally, "Let him be at the central encampment." The singular is used by attraction for the three warriors mentioned in the verse. The reference here is undoubtedly to the defensive position manned by Virūpākṣa, as mentioned above at verse 14. (On the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa, see 5.44.2–3,27; 6.27.20; 6.33.10; 6.83.5,28; 6.84.13–15,22,30,33; 6.82.5; 6.87.1,2; and notes.) A few manuscripts and the texts of Cg and Cm, as well as the printed editions of KK and VSP, read instead gulmo bhavatu madhyamaḥ, "Let them constitute a central force." Cg, the only commentator to note this reading, understands that the warriors mentioned in the verse should constitute an intermediate force posted between the northern and western [gates] occupied by powerful Rāvaṇa and Indrajit [respectively]. (gulmo bhavatu madhyamo madhyamasenā bhavatv ity arthaḥ. balavadbhyāṃ rāvaṇendrajidbhyām adhiṣṭhitayor uttarapaścimayor madhyamagulmo bhavatv ity arthaḥ.) Cf. 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.31.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

32. "take on human form" mānuṣaṃ rūpaṃ kāryam: As the various commentators suggest, the idea here is that if the monkeys were to take on human [or rākṣasa] form, exploiting their power of "shape-shifting (kāmarūpatā)," they could not be distinguished from the enemy (atha vānarāṇām api kāmarūpatayā rūpāntarakaraṇe yuddhe svīyaparakīyavivekāsaṃbhavād āha—so Ct). Cg notes that if the monkeys were to fight by using their power to change their appearance, then, because of [their] similarity with the rākṣasas, it would be impossible to distinguish one's allies from one's enemies. Moreover, he understands that the rākṣasas would be unlikely to take on the form of monkeys since they would deem such a form inferior. (yadi vānarā api kāmarūpadharaṇena yudhyeyū rākṣasānām api tādṛśatvād ātmaparaviveko na syāt. vānaratvaṃ tu jaghanyatayā na te bhajiṣyantīti bhāvaḥ.) As will emerge in the following verses, only seven of the warriors on Rāma's side bear human forms in the conflict. As specified in verses 33–34 below and noted by Ct, those warriors would be Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa [who lack the power of changing their form at will], Vibhīṣaṇa, and his four rākṣasa companions, Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa. Ct notes that, with the exception of those seven, anyone bearing a human form is to be killed without hesitation (evaṃ cāsmān sapta hitvā manuṣyākāro niḥśaṅkaṃ vadhyaḥ). See note to verse 7 above.

33–34. "The monkey form itself" vānarā eva: Literally, "monkeys alone." As the various commentators note, the reference here must be to the physical appearance of monkeys.

"our" naḥ: D10,11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead vaḥ, "your."

"with his four companions" ātmanā pañcamaḥ: Literally, "with himself as the fifth." The reference is to Vibhīṣaṇa's four rākṣasa companions, Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa. See note to verse 7 above.

35. "in order to secure the success of their mission" kāryasiddhyartham: Cm, alone among the commentators, reads the adverb as a bahuvrīhi compound modifying Vibhīṣaṇa, with the sense "whose purpose was the success of the mission." (kṛtya-siddhyarthaṃ kṛtyaṃ kartavyam eva siddhiḥ prayojanaṃ yasya tam. vibhīṣaṇaviśeṣaṇam idam.)

"resolute Rāma . . . resolved purposefully" Rāmaḥ . . . buddhiṃ cakāra matimān matim: The texts of the commentators and the corresponding printed editions show a certain amount of variation in their readings of the two nearly synonymous terms buddhi and mati-. In addition, the various commentators, most of whom are aware of the variants, offer multiple interpretations of the different readings. The central problem, the presence of the two terms in the accusative as apparent objects of the finite verb cakāra, is most difficult in the critical reading. The text of Ct, Ck, and Cr avoids the seeming redundancy by reading prabhuḥ, "lord [Rāma]," for matim. This permits the interpretation "resolute lord Rāma made up his mind [buddhim]." Ct notes the variant matim, reading it quasi-adjectivally with buddhim, in the sense of "discerning, selective (arthanirdhāraṇātmikām)." He cites Cm, who quotes "knowledgeable sources (tajjñāḥ)" for the sense of "discernment (arthanirdhāraṇam)," explaining that Rāma was taking a decision that was "appropriate to the moment (tātkālikarūpāṃ matim)." This is, however, Cm's alternate explanation of what is, for him, an alternate reading. Cm's first alternative is to take matim in the sense of "thoughtful (mananātmikām)," which he also takes as an adjective modifying buddhim. Cg also acknowledges buddhim as a variant reading but reads it as the final member of a compound, suvelārohaṇabuddhim, which would stand in apposition with matim, yielding the sense "he formed a notion—the exclusive intention to climb Mount Suvela and no other (suvelārohaṇabuddhim eva matiṃ cakāra nānyam ity arthaḥ)." Cg's and Cm's principal reading of the verse has, however, the nominative buddhiḥ for the critical edition's buddhim. This reading is also difficult to construe, and the two commentators, it seems to us, struggle to make sense of it. Cg's idea is to read buddhiḥ in the sense of the possessive adjective buddhimān "intelligent, wise," which has irregularly lost its possessive suffix (matublopa ārṣaḥ). He then glosses matim as icchām, "desire." Thus, his interpretation of the verse would be "wise and intelligent Rāma desired to climb." He makes no effort to address or clarify the resulting redundancy between buddhiḥ and matimān. Cm proposes yet another epic irregularity as an interpretive strategy, reading suvelārohaṇe buddhiḥ as an irregular aluksamāsa to be read as a bahuvrīhi modifying Rāma (suvelārohaṇebuddhiḥ). The sense of the compound would then be "[Rāma] whose thoughts were directed toward climbing Mount Suvela." Cm then explains matimān as "discerning with respect to future events (āgāmigocarabuddhimān)" and, like Cg, glosses matim as "the desire to climb Mount Suvela (suvelārohaṇecchām)." See note to 6.2.14.

"Mount Suvela": See note to 5.1.189. Only Cg among the commentators pays any attention to the purpose of Rāma's sudden jaunt into the mountains, which seems to have no relevance to his military objective. Taking his cue from 584*, translated below, he notes, "[Rāma's] climb was merely for the purpose of viewing the beauty [of the landscape] and not for getting to Laṅkā. Therefore," Cg continues, "the following verse [verse 36] describes the descent from the mountain in order to besiege Laṅkā. (ārohaṇecchāhetum āha ramaṇīyataram iti. saundaryāvalokanam eva tadārohaṇahetur na tu laṅkāprāptiḥ. ata eva laṅkoparodhāyāvarohaṇaṃ vakṣyati tatas tv iti.)" See 6.21.21 and 6.29.1 and notes.

Following verse 35, D5,7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [584*]: "Seeing the supremely charming slopes of Mount Suvela . . . [Rāma]."

36. Ck, quoted in part and with some variation by Ct, argues, somewhat heatedly, that this verse has been pointlessly interpolated here in order to artificially and inappropriately break the text into two sargas. He regards this as reckless tampering with the text of the seer [Vālmīki] and argues that there should not be a sarga boundary here. (tatas tu rāma ityādi vakṣyamāṇasaṃgrahaślokaś ca na. nāpi coktir anuvādaḥ. nāpīha pūrvāparaprakaraṇavicchedaḥ. ata imaṃ ślokaṃ vṛthā prakṣipyātra sargaṃ vicchindanti. evam evaṃ kusṛṣṭita ṛṣyuktasargasaṃkhyābhyadhikadarśanaṃ jāyate. ato nātra sargavicchedaḥ.) His position finds little support in the critical apparatus.

"wise and great" mahātmā . . . mahātmā: Cg and Cr are disturbed by the repetition and differentiate the meanings of the term in its two occurrences. Cr takes the first occurrence to mean "whose inherent form is worthy of worship (pūjyasvarūpaḥ)" and the second to mean "very active, energetic, or persevering (atiprayatnavān)." Cg takes the first to mean "highly intelligent (mahābuddhiḥ)" and the second to mean "of great fortitude (mahādhṛtiḥ)."

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 29

1–2. "Mount Suvela" suvelasya: Cg notes that, as the sarga will bear out, the purpose of the ascent of Suvela is to permit surveillance of the citadel of Laṅkā (laṅkādarśanārthaṃ suvelārohaṇam). In this connection, he identifies Suvela as a mountain of similar elevation to Laṅkā itself (suvelo nāma laṅkāsamatuṅgatāko girivišeṣaḥ). See note to 6.28.35, where reference is made to Cg's position that the first reason for the climb is to enjoy the scenery and only later on (i.e., in verse 36) does its military purpose come into play. See 6.20.21; 6.21.21; and notes. See, too, 6.22.1. Cf. 6.31.42.

"devoted and righteous . . . skillful both in counsel and in action" dharmajñam anuraktam . . . mantrajñaṃ ca vidhijñaṃ ca: Although the placement of all these adjectives appears to make them apply exclusively to Vibhīṣaṇa, Cg, for some reason, understands that they are also meant to apply to Sugrīva (dharmajñetyādi sugrīvasyāpi viśeṣaṇam). Ct, Cg, and Cm, whom we follow, gloss vidhijñam, "knowing custom, precept, proper usage," with kāryajñam, "knowing duty, what is to be done."

3. Cg, alone among the commentators, is concerned about the seemingly nonlinear quality of the narrative, which appears here to be taking us back to the point in sarga 20 [verse 21] where Rāma is described as encamped on Mount Suvela. Cg's explanation is that the current passage is merely a more detailed account of the events of the day on which Rāma crossed the ocean. According to him, these events, until now, have been described in a more summary fashion. (ayaṃ ca samudrataraṇadivasavṛttāntaḥ. pūrvaṃ saṃgraheṇokto 'dya saviśeṣam ucyate.) See note to 6.15.33 (App. I, No. 16, lines 33–125), where Rāma's initial observation of Laṅkā is first described in the vulgate. See 6.20.21; 6.21.21; 6.22.1; 6.28.35; and note. See, too, notes to verses 1–2 above.

"straightaway" sādhu: Literally, "properly, correctly."

4–5. "proper conduct" vṛttam: Cs, as we and Cg have done, understands the term as "conduct of the virtuous (vṛttaṃ sadācāraḥ)." However, he proposes as an alternative taking the term in its other meaning of "news, report," and explains, "or, the report that 'we are more powerful than he (asmadbaliṣṭhatāvārtā vā).' "

"his own high lineage" kulam: Literally, "family, good family, high breeding." We agree with Cg in understanding the reference to be to the rules of conduct for one of noble lineage enjoined in the dharmaśāstra (dharmaśāstravihitasvakulācāraḥ). Cm construes the second half of verse 5 somewhat differently, taking the adjective garhitam, "contemptible," as a modifier of kulam rather than kṛtam, "action." He thus reads, "Rāvaṇa, who knows nothing of righteousness, has brought his own lineage into contempt (yena rāvaṇena dharmādikaṃ na jñātaṃ tena tatkulaṃ garhitam iti saṃbandhaḥ)."

"in his vile rākṣasa nature" rākṣasyā nīcayā buddhyā: Literally, "because of [his] low or vile rākṣasa nature." The term buddhi normally means "mind, thought, intellect." Here, however, the context demands the term's less common meaning of "nature." Cs, anticipating that this comment might injure Vibhīṣaṇa's feelings, explains as follows: "Because it belongs to a rākṣasa, [that is,] only because it is related to a rākṣasa, is it also low. Rāma says this in order not to offend Vibhīṣaṇa. (rākṣasyā rākṣasasaṃbandhinyā. tatrāpi nīcayā. vibhīṣaṇaṃ sumukhīkartum iyam uktiḥ.)" This is an early case of political correctness.

"this contemptible thing" tad garhitaṃ kṛtam: We agree with Cg that the reference is retrospective to the abduction of Sītā (3.47–52). Cr, however, interprets it as a generic allusion to all of Rāvaṇa's misdeeds, such as the harassment of the seers, etc. (yena garhitaṃ ninditaṃ karmarṣipīḍanādi kṛtam).

6. This and the following verse are omitted from D10,11, and the text of Ct. They are inserted in brackets, without verse numbers, between verses 5 and 6 in the GPP. Gita Press includes the verses as do KK and VSP. These verses are absent from NSP.

"at the mere mention of that vilest of rākṣasas" yasmin . . . kīrtite rākṣasādhame: We read the phrase as a sati saptamī (locative absolute), in the sense of "when that vilest of rākṣasas is mentioned." It is also possible to read kīrtite as a simple adjective in the sense of "infamous, notorious." But this seems less plausible here.

"my anger blazes up" me vardhate roṣaḥ: Literally, "my anger swells or grows." D1,2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read vartate, "it occurs, exists," for vardhate, "it grows."

7. See note to verse 6 above.

8. "Speaking" saṃmantrayan: Literally, "taking counsel or advising." We follow Cg, who glosses, simply, "speaking (vadan)." Ct and Ck suggest, "reflecting (saṃcintayan)."

"to make camp there" vāsāya: Literally, "for dwelling." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the gerund āsādya, "having approached."

10–11. The three lines from 10cd–11cd ("as well as Hanumān, Aṅgada, Nīla, Mainda, Dvivida, Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Śarabha, Gandhamādana, Panasa, Kumuda, Hara, and the troop leader Rambha [hanūmān aṅgado nīlo maindo dvivida eva ca / gajo gavākṣo gavayaḥ śarabho gandhamādanaḥ / panasaḥ kumudaś caiva haro rambhaś ca yūthapaḥ])" are not found in the texts of Ct, Ck, and Cr and are placed in brackets without verse numbers in GPP after 6.38.8ab; NSP omits them entirely. Gita Press, VSP, and KK all include the verses.

"Hanumān" hanūmān: Cg notes that the separate mention of Hanumān suggests that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are proceeding on foot here [as opposed to riding on the shoulders of Hanumān and Aṅgada, respectively, as they did during the earlier march] (hanumān iti pṛthaguktyā rāmalakṣmaṇau padbhyām evārūḍhāv iti gamyate). See note to 15.27 (314*).

Following verse 11, Ñ,V,B1,2,3,D5–7,9,S, GPP in brackets, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm insert a passage of two lines that extends the list of names [587*]: "Jāmbavān, Suṣeṇa, wise Praghasa, immensely powerful Durmukha, and the monkey Śatabali."

12. "These . . . swarmed up" ete . . . adhyārohanta: Literally, "these ascended or climbed up."

"leaping with the speed of the wind" vāyuvegapravaṇāḥ: Literally, "endowed with the speed of the wind."

13. "perched as they were on its summit" śikhare tasya: Literally, "on its summit." The commentators are divided as to whether to read the locative śikhare as referring to the placement of Rāma and the monkeys or to that of the city of Laṅkā itself. The former position, which we feel is somewhat more justified by the context, is held by Ct, Ck, and Cr, all of whom suggest supplying a form of the root √sthā (sthityā or sthitvā) to refer to the placement of the monkeys. Cg and Cm, however, take the genitive pronoun tasya to refer not to Mount Suvela, the monkeys' observation post, but instead to Mount Trikūṭa, upon whose peaks the fortress city of Laṅkā was built (see 5.2.1 and note) (tasya prasiddhasya trikūṭasya khe viṣaktām ākāśe lambamānām iva sthitāṃ purīṃ laṅkām).

"suspended in the sky" viṣaktām iva khe: Literally, "as if attached in the sky." Ct glosses the participle as "built (racitām)"; Cg, "suspended (lambamānām)"; and Cm, "as if floating (carantīm iva sthitām)." Cs offers the most charming metaphor, "that is to say, kissing the sky (ambaracumbinīm iti yāvat)."

15. "saw what appeared to be a second rampart" dadṛśuḥ . . . prākāram aparam: Literally, "they saw another rampart." We follow Cr, Ct, Cm, and Ck, who indicate in various ways that the host of huge rākṣasas was like a wall or was perceived as such by the monkeys (aparaṃ prākāraṃ prākāratayā pratīyamānaṃ rākṣasasamūham ity arthaḥ—so Cr).

"stationed at the base of the city wall" prākāracayasaṃsthaiḥ: Only the texts and printed editions of Cg and Cm read -caya- with the critical edition. Both of these commentators gloss, "earthen wall (vapram)," and thus appear, as we have done, to understand the reference to be to the earthen base or foundation of the defensive rampart of the city. Our visualization of the scene is that the city wall is surrounded by a dense formation of rākṣasa troops that gives rise to the perception that the city has two concentric walls. It is also possible to take caya, and even vapra, in the sense of "top or summit," in which case the image would be of a second wall of rākṣasas rising vertically from the top of the rampart. This idea may gain some support from the northern variant 590*, line 6, which reads prākāravaḍabhīsaṃsthaiḥ, "stationed at the turrets of the city wall." D10,11,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read -vara-, "best," for -caya-, yielding the sense "stationed on or at that splendid rampart."

16. "so eager for battle" yuddhakāṅkṣiṇaḥ: The modificand of this adjective is somewhat ambiguous. Since the form can be read either as a nominative or an accusative, the adjective could describe either the rākṣasas or the monkeys. We, along with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1496) and Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 239), take it with the former largely because of its placement in the verse. Cr, the only commentator to take note of the phrase, reads the adjective with the monkeys. In so doing, he is influenced by the reading of Ct's and Ck's texts, which have tam, "that," for the critical reading te, "they." Cr glosses the accusative pronoun with rākṣasagaṇam, "the host of rākṣasas," which thus becomes the direct object of dṛṣṭvā, "having seen." This reading, however, leaves hanging the accusative plural rākṣasān of pāda d. Translators other than the two mentioned above, however, appear to follow this reading and indicate that it is the monkeys who are eager for battle.

"loudly" vipulān: B2,3,D5–7,9–11,T1,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead vividhān, "various," yielding the meaning "[they all bellowed] variously."

17. "illumined by the full moon" pūrṇacandrapradīpā: Literally, "having the full moon for its lamp." Several of the commentators, including Cv, Cg, and Cm, note that the adjective tells us that the ascent of Mount Suvela took place on the full-moon night (paurṇamāsyām) and that the battle therefore commences on the next day, which is the first day of the succeeding dark half of the month (tena pratipadi yuddhārambhaḥ—so Cm). Ct, alone among the commentators, specifies that the month is Pauṣa and that the ascent takes place either on the fourteenth day of the bright half or on the full-moon night itself (anena pauṣaśuklacaturdaśyāṃ pūrṇimāyāṃ vā suvelārohaṇam iti bodhyam). Cg, however, perhaps uncomfortable with the chronology here, proposes an alternative explanation whereby the night is illuminated with lamps as bright as the full moon, which were placed in the monkeys' encampment to provide light (yadvā pūrṇacandratulyapradīpavatīti vārthaḥ saṃbhavanti hi vānarasenāyām api prakāśārtham āropitā dīpāḥ). Ct also suggests that the reference to the fullness of the moon is made [to indicate] the fulfillment of [Rāma's] resolve (pūrṇacandratvoktiḥ pūrṇakalpatvād iti). On the chronology of epic events, see note to 6.4.4.

18. The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 30

1–2. "those bulls among the tawny monkeys" haripuṅgavāḥ: Ś,V,B3,D,T3,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead hariyūthapāḥ, "troop leaders of the tawny monkeys."

"parks and woodlands" vanāny upavanāni ca: Literally, "forests and cultivated groves." As Cg explains, vanāni refers to natural woodlands, while upavanāni refers to landscaped ones (vanāny akṛtrimāṇy upavanāni kṛtrimāṇi).

"level" sama-: Cg and Cr note that this means "free from elevations and depressions (nimnonnatatvarahitāni)." Cm glosses, "equal in length and breadth (dairghyaviśālaiḥ samāni)," an idea Ct echoes in different terms.

"hospitable" -saumyāni: Literally, "charming, gentle." We agree here with Ct, Cr, Cm, and Ck, who explain, "free from dangers, such as wild animals, etc. (duṣṭamṛgādy-upadravarāhityena—so Ct)." Cg glosses, "friendly, smooth (snigdhāni)."

"the monkeys were" te . . . babhūvuḥ: Literally, "they were."

8. "charming in every season" sarvartukaṃ ramyam: We read the two adjectives together in keeping with our understanding that the former refers to the fact that the groves are in full fruit and flower at all seasons. Cf. 5.2.9–13 and note. See, too, 6.108.12; 6.115.20; and notes. Cg, Ck, Ct, and Cm understand, "in which all seasons [are simultaneously present] (sarva ṛtavo yasmiṃs tat)."

9. "natyūhas" natyūha-: According to Monier-Williams (s.v.), this is probably a variant of dātyūha, which he identifies as Cuculus melanoleucus. The word dātyūha is itself a variant term for cātaka, also identified by Monier-Williams as Cuculus melanoleucus. According to Dave (1985, pp. 131–33), both terms commonly refer to the hawk-cuckoo. Ali and Ripley (1968–1974, vol. 3, pp. 200–202) identify the hawk-cuckoo as the Cuculus varius varius, the common hawk-cuckoo, or brainfever bird. This bird is famous for the sound of its call and is referred to commonly in Indian love poetry. Brockington (1984, p. 95) identifies this bird as the Indian moorhen (Gallinula chloropus indica Blyth). (On the Indian moorhen, see Ali and Ripley 1968–1974, vol. 2, pp. 174–76.) Dave (1985, pp. 293–94) identifies the natyūha of the Rāmāyaṇa as the white-breasted water-hen (Amaurornis phoenicurus insularis). See Ali and Ripley 1968–1974, vol. 2, pp. 171–72.

"koyaṣṭibhakas" -koyaṣṭibhakaiḥ: This is probably the night heron (Nycticorax nycticorax). See 5.1.42 and note. Cf. 2.48.36 and 3.71.11, where Pollock identifies the bird as a type of plover known as a lapwing. See Dave 1985, pp. 357–60.

"The sweet notes of the cuckoo" rutaṃ parabhṛtānām: Literally, "the cry of the parabhṛtas." The cry of the parabhṛta (literally, "raised by another [i.e., the crow]"), or kokila, that is, the Indian cuckoo (Cuculus saturatus), is considered one of the most romantic and charming sounds of nature and is referred to constantly in the poetic literature. See Dave 1985, pp. 127ff.

"rushing woodland streams" vananirjhare: Literally, "in or over a forest cascade."

10–12. "heroic" vīrāḥ: Cg suggests that this term is used because the monkeys have no fear, even when entering their enemies' woods (śatruvanapraveśe 'pi nirbhayāḥ).

"who could take on any form at will" kāmarūpiṇaḥ: Cg suggests that this stock epithet of the monkeys indicates that they possessed both small and large bodies suitable for entering small and large places (sūkṣmavipulapradeśānuguṇasthūlasūkṣmaśarīravantaḥ). Cf. Hanumān's many changes of size in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.1.8; 5.1.186–87; 5.35.31–41; and notes).

"drongos" bhṛṅgarāja-: According to Apte (s.v.) and Monier-Williams (s.v.), the term refers both to a type of bird and to a variety of large bee. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 91) appears to understand, "beetle." The bird in question is usually identified as the greater racket-tailed drongo (Dicrurus paradiseus), also called the fork-tailed shrike (Dave 1985, pp. 64–67).

"were swarming with bees" bhramaraiḥ sevitāni: Literally, "frequented by bees." A variety of southern and northern manuscripts substitute one or another of a number of variants in which a form of the word kurara/kurarī, "osprey/female osprey" (Dave 1985, p. 185) is found. Among these, D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read kururasvanitāni ca, "resounding with the cries of ospreys." See 6.23.1–3; 6.98.26; 6.39.9; and notes. See Fitzgerald 1998.

"koṇālakas" koṇālaka-: The name is not cited in PW, Monier-Williams, or Apte. Brockington (1984, p. 95) notes it as unidentified. Cv and Cg understand it to be a kind of wagtail (khañjanaḥ [Motacilla indica Gmelin]).

"They echoed with the song of koṇālakas and resounded with the cries of sārasa cranes." koṇālakavighuṣṭāni sārasābhirutāni ca: This half śloka, 11cd of the critical edition, is omitted by Ś1,B3,D3,9–11,G2,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck. The half verse is bracketed between 6.39.11ab and cd in GPP. It is found in KK, Gita Press, and VSP (6.39.11cd).

13. "fragrant" ghrāṇasukhaḥ: Literally, "pleasant to the sense of smell." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead prāṇasamaḥ, "equal to the breath of life." Ct explains the simile by saying that the breeze is compared to a breath because of its gentleness (mandatā).

"began to blow" vavau: Literally, "it blew."

14–15. "notable for their deafening roars" nadatāṃ varāḥ: Literally, "foremost among those who roar." Recall that in the Bālakāṇḍa (1.16.16) the vānaras are said to be able to knock birds out of the sky with their roaring. Cf. also 4.14.20.

"many-bannered" patākinīm: Literally, "possessing banners."

16. "crushed the earth" kurvantaḥ . . . mahīṃ caraṇapīḍitām: Literally, "making the earth foot-crushed." This half verse lacks a finite verb and is, in fact, yet another participial clause of verses 14–15 above. As Cg points out, pādas cd need to be construed as a separate sentence (rajaś cety ardham ekaṃ vākyam).

17. "bears" ṛkṣāḥ: Although this term normally refers to a species of primate in the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa (see Goldman 1989 and 1.16.10 and note), in the present context in which the poet refers to the natural fauna of the region, he may well have bears in mind. This is even more likely, since the list of animals mentioned emphasizes the fiercer forms of wildlife. Compare 6.101.34 and note, where again it appears that the term is probably used in the sense of "bear." See also 6.12.12 and note.

18–20. "reaching into the sky" divispṛśam: Literally, "touching the sky." The commentators remark on the various irregularities of the formation. Thus, for example, Cm glosses, "divaṃ spṛśatīti divispṛśam."

"There . . . stood one of the lofty summits" śikharam . . . prāṃśu caikam: Literally, "and one lofty peak or summit." These verses lack an explicit finite verb. The term ekam, "one," is slightly problematic in this context because, as its name implies, Trikūṭa is a mountain with three peaks. Indeed, Cg notes that Mount Suvela, which has been described in the preceding sarga (6.29.1,3ff.), is the name of the first peak of Trikūṭa, and that the peak now under discussion is the well-known middlemost of the three. It is, he comments, lofty in comparison with the peaks on either side of it. He thus glosses the word ekam as "an incomparable middle peak." (evaṃ trikūṭasya prathamaśikharaṃ suvelākhyam uktvā madhyamaśikharaṃ varṇayati . . . tat prasiddham. prāṃśu pārśvavartiśikharadvayāpekṣayonnatam. ekam advitīyaṃ madhyamam ity arthaḥ.) Ck and Ct gloss, "unbroken, single (akhaṇḍam)." Cf. GPP 7.5.23cd–24ab, where the relationship between the two peaks is further clarified. See, too, note to 6.2.10.

"Mount Trikūṭa" trikūṭasya: Literally, "of Trikūṭa." See note to 6.2.10.

"it seemed to be made of gold" mahārajatasaṃnibham: Literally, "appearing to be gold." The word mahārajata-, literally, "great silver," we believe is explained correctly by Cr, Ct, Cm, and Cg (second interpretation) as "gold (suvarṇasya—so Cr)." Cg, however, offers, as his first explanation, "resembling abundant silver (pṛthurajatasannibham)."

"beautiful" ślakṣṇam: This term can mean "smooth" or "charming/beautiful." We have chosen the latter, although the former is also plausible in the context. Certainly, this is the reading of Ck and Ct, who gloss, "like a paved or inlaid floor (kuṭṭimabhūmivat)."

"even in their imagination, let alone in reality" manasāpi . . . kiṃ punaḥ karmaṇā: Literally, "even by thought, much less by action."

Following verse 20, D5–7,9–11,S, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr insert a passage of one line [606*] describing the measurements of the city of Laṅkā: "It is ten leagues wide and twenty long (daśayojanavistīrṇā viṃśadyojanam āyatā)." The texts and printed editions of Cg, Crā and Cv, however, have a somewhat grander conception of the city's dimensions, reading instead, "It is a hundred leagues long and thirty wide (śatayojanavistīrṇā triṃśadyojanam āyatā)." The discrepancy between these two measurements has caught the attention of Ct, who attempts to reconcile his measurement with the latter as it is found in the vulgate text (GPP 7.5.25 [= CE 7.5.22a–83*, line1]). He claims that the smaller measurement refers to the inner citadel, which is Rāvaṇa's residence, whereas the greater one refers to the larger dimensions of the city as a whole. (idaṃ ca laṅkārūpamahādurgāntarvartirāvaṇavāsasthānabhūtāntardurgaparam. śatayojanavistīrṇā triṃśadyojanam āyatety atraivānyatra sthala ukteḥ.) See, too, Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1498, note.

22. "the heavens, Viṣṇu's middle step" madhyamaṃ vaiṣṇavaṃ padam: Literally, "the middle step of Viṣṇu." The reference is, of course, to the well-known story of Viṣṇu's vāmanāvatāra in which he traverses the universe in three strides. The midmost of these strides is, as the commentators point out, the sky. See 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.49.1–2; 6.53.26; 6.59.7; and notes. See, too, 1.28.2 and note.

"at summer's end" ātapāpāye: Literally, "at the passing of the hot season." The reference, as noted by Cm and Cg, is to the beginning of the monsoon (varṣārambhasamaye—so Cg). The simile thus compares the lofty buildings of the city to the towering clouds of the rainy season.

24. "the domed palace" caityaḥ: See 6.6.3 and note.

"a full complement" samagreṇa: Literally, "complete." Commentators differ somewhat on how to take this adjective, which modifies śatena, "a hundred." Ct and Ck gloss, "with full military equipment (samagrasaṃnāhavatā)." Cr glosses, "assembled, massed (militena)." Cg does not find the term problematic since his text reads balena, "force, army," for śatena, yielding the meaning "a whole army." This reading is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 92), who renders, "a large . . . force."

Following verse 24, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of four lines [608*], summarizing the description of Laṅkā: "[Rāma saw that city], which was charming, wooded, adorned with mountains, abounding in parks and woodlands, variegated with all kinds of minerals, resounding with the songs of various birds, frequented by all kinds of animals, covered with all types of flowers, and frequented by all manner of rākṣasas."

25. "Lakṣmaṇa's fortunate elder brother" lakṣmīvāṃl lakṣmaṇāgrajaḥ: This is an example of the sort of alliterative epithet of which the poet is so fond.

"whose objective had been thus far achieved . . . opulent" samṛddhāṃ samṛddhārthaḥ: This is yet another example of alliteration. The more common meaning of the term samṛddhārthaḥ, "whose wealth was ample," would fit the context poorly here, as Rāma, during the years of his exile, is described as a penniless wanderer (see, for example, Rāvaṇa's description of Rāma at 5.20.29). We understand the term artha here to mean

"goal or purpose" and understand the reference of the adjective to be to Rāma's having fulfilled the first, critical part of his quest, viz., to arrive with his forces at the gates of Laṅkā. A number of manuscripts, including Ś,V1,2,B2,D5,6,8,10–12,T1,M3, as well as the printed editions of all southern commentators read instead samṛddhārthām. This reading makes the adjective modify Laṅkā rather than Rāma and yields the sense "opulent, prosperous." The difficulty of this reading, which is followed by all translations based on the southern recension, is that it creates a redundancy with samṛddhām, which also means "opulent, prosperous." The commentators try to differentiate the two terms. Cr glosses, "grown to a great size (atipravṛddhām)" for samṛddhām, while Cg glosses, "lofty (unnatām)" to avoid the redundancy. Variations on the themes of size and opulence appear in the various translations of the southern text. The Lahore edition (6.15.25) reads with the critical text, while Gorresio (6.15.28) drops samṛddhārtha completely, using only the adjective samṛddha, "prosperous," to refer to Rāma.

Following verse 25, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [609*]: "As he gazed upon that city, crowded with great mansions, Lakṣmaṇa's godlike and powerful elder brother was wonderstruck."

26. "and his vast army" mahatā balena: Literally, "with a large army." Cr understands the vast army to be yet another of Laṅkā's attributes (mahatā balenopalakṣitāṃ purīṃ laṅkām).

"glittering with gems" ratnapūrṇām: Literally, "full of jewels." Cg proposes taking ratna-, "jewel," in its generic sense of "[any] excellent thing (śreṣṭhavastūni)."

"abounding with defensive works" bahusaṃvidhānām: Literally, "with many arrangements." On the basis of a similar usage at 6.3.10, we agree with Cg, who glosses, "defense, protection (rakṣaṇam)" for saṃvidhānam. Cr glosses, "types of constructions/arrangements (racanāviśeṣāḥ)," which is somewhat more ambiguous but probably means the same thing.

"Its mighty gates were studded with great defensive engines" mahāyantrakavāṭamuhkyām: Literally, "having principal gates with great engines." Although some translators (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 109; Dutt 1893, p. 1211; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 93) interpret the underlying compound as a dvandva and thus understand the reference to be to great engines and gateways, we follow the suggestion of Cr, who glosses, "Laṅkā in which the principal gates were fitted with engines (mahāyantrayuktāḥ kavāṭamukhyā yasyāṃ tām [laṅkām])." Like the commentators on 6.3.15–16 above, modern translators differ in their opinion as to whether the yantras mentioned are military engines or mechanical devices connected with the operation of the gates. Thus, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 93) translates, "huge gates operated by machines." Pagani (1999, p. 957) renders, "ses portes aux puissantes serrures." We share the view of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1499), "fitted with huge engines of war." See 6.3.3–4,11 and notes. Cf. 6.15.18; 6.49.11; and 6.80.19 and notes.

The meter is upajāti.

Following sarga 30, D5–7,9–11,S insert an additional sarga of eighty lines [App. I, No. 18]: "Then Rāma, along with Sugrīva and the troop leaders of the tawny monkeys, climbed Mount Suvela, which was two leagues in breadth.[1–2] Standing there for a while and looking around in all ten directions, he spied the perfectly situated city of Laṅkā, ornamented with beautiful woodlands and built by Viśvakarman on the lovely summit of Mount Trikūṭa.[3–5] [And there he saw,] standing on the top of a tower, the unassailable lord of the rākṣasas. He was surrounded by white yak-tail fly whisks and adorned with the parasol of victory. He was smeared with red sandalwood paste and adorned with jeweled[1] ornaments.[6–8] He looked like a black storm cloud and was clad in golden garments. His chest was scarred by the tips of the tusks of Indra's war elephant, Airāvata. He was clad in garments as red as hare's blood, and he resembled a mass of storm clouds in the sky, suffused with the light of the setting sun.[9–12] The moment Sugrīva saw the rākṣasa lord, he leapt up, right before the eyes of Rāghava and the monkey lords.[13–14] Inflamed by an access of rage, he sprang up with strength and courage from the mountain peak to the gateway tower. He stood there for a moment watching, his mind utterly free from fear.[15–17] Regarding the rākṣasa as lightly as a piece of straw, he spoke these harsh words to him: 'I am the servant and ally of Rāma, lord of the world, rākṣasa. Through the blazing energy of that lord of kings, you shall not escape me this day.'[18–20] Having spoken in this fashion, he suddenly jumped up and leapt over him. Tearing off his splendid crown and casting it down, he landed on the ground.[21–22] Watching him as he swiftly advanced, the night-roaming rākṣasa said to him, 'Before you came into my sight, you were Sugrīva, "of the beautiful neck [su-grīva]," but now, you shall be Hīnagrīva, "the one with no neck at all [hīna-grīvaḥ]."'[23–24] Having spoken in this fashion, he swiftly sprang up and with both arms hurled him to the ground. But the tawny monkey, bouncing up like a ball, then threw him down with both arms.[25–26] Their limbs bathed in sweat, their bodies red with blood, they remained motionless, locked in each other's embrace, like a śālmalī and a kiṃśuka tree.[2] [27–30] The two of them, the immensely powerful rākṣasa and the monkey lord, engaged in a nearly unendurable battle with blows of their fists, palms, elbows, and fingertips.[31–34] The two of them, endowed with fearsome power, engaged in a terrific struggle for a long time on the terrace of the gateway tower. Throwing each other up and down, bending their bodies, they held their ground on the gateway tower with their footwork.[35–38] Grappling with each other, their bodies clinging fast, they both then fell into the moat of the rampart. But without touching the ground, they both flew up again and stood still for a moment, breathing hard.[39–42] Grasping each other repeatedly in the bonds of their arms, they engaged once more in battle. Thus did they then perform the various techniques of battle, engaging each other with anger, skill, and strength.[43–46] Like a lion and tiger filled with pride, like two young elephant bulls engaged in combat, striking and pressing each other with their chests, they both fell to the ground at once.[47–50] Dragging each other up and hurling each other down, they performed many techniques of battle. Endowed with strength and training in the martial arts, neither of those warriors soon tired.[51–54] Like two splendid bull-elephants, the two of them warded each other off with their mighty arms that were like elephant trunks. They fought each other fiercely for a long time, circling each other swiftly in the wheeling movements of combat.[3] [55–58] Confronting each other, bent on killing each other, they paused again and again, like two tomcats intent on food.[59–60] They wheeled in different circular movements and took up various postures. They advanced and retreated variously, like the flow of cow's urine. They moved sideways and crookedly. They parried blows, evaded, and ran about. They ran swiftly toward each other, crouching and posing, and grasping each other. They faced each other, turned their backs on each other, raced about and leapt. Both skilled in the techniques of battle, they approached each other and drew back.[4] [61–67] Thus did Rāvaṇa and the lord of the monkeys engage each other.[68] At that juncture, the rākṣasa attempted to employ his power of magic illusion. But the overlord of the monkeys, aware of this, then leapt into the sky with a victorious air, having conquered his fatigue.[69–71] And so Rāvaṇa stood there, cheated by the king of the tawny monkeys.[72] Then the lord of the best of the tawny monkeys, the son of the sun god, having gained fame in battle and having exhausted the lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas in battle, leapt up into the vast sky and went to Rāma's side in the midst of the army of the host of the tawny monkeys.[73–76] Thus, the lord of the tawny monkeys, son of Savitṛ, having accomplished this feat, flying like the wind, reentered the army in great excitement, honored by the foremost of the tree-dwelling monkeys and increasing the ardor for battle of the son of the king of the splendid Raghus.[5][77–80]"

[1]"jeweled" ratna-: D5–7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead rakta-, "red."

[2]"like a śālmalī and a kiṃśuka tree" śālmalikiṃśukāv iva: See 6.76.28 and note. See, too, 6.35.9 and note.

[3]"circling each other swiftly in the wheeling movements of combat" saṃceratur maṇḍalamārgam: Literally, "they carried out the technique of the circle." The commentators discuss at great length the various type of military movements referred to here. See 6.87.23,25,30 and notes. Translators offer a variety of definitions based primarily on the commentators. Dutt (1893, pp. 1213–14) lists all the terms in Sanskrit and attempts to define them in a series of footnotes.

The meter of lines 27–58 is upajāti.

[4]Lines 61–67 provide a detailed technical account of the battle between Rāvaṇa and Sugrīva, alluding to a variety of technical terms for the different movements of hand-to-hand combat. Commentators and translators offer a variety of interpretations of these sometimes obscure terms. Our translation is basically informed by the analysis of Cg, who gives the most detailed discussion of this passage.

[5]The meter of lines 73–80 is mālinī.

Sarga 31

1. "at this juncture . . . various portents" atha tasmin nimittāni: Literally, "now, at or on that . . . portents." The phrase is elliptical but, in the context of the critical edition, is probably best read as we and Cr ("at this time [tasmin samaye]") have done. An alternative would be to understand "on that [mountain, i.e., Suvela]." The other southern commentators operate in the context of the southern recension in which the immediately preceding sarga (App. I, No. 18, translated at note to 6.30.26) describes Sugrīva's unauthorized struggle with Rāvaṇa. They understand tasmin here to refer to Sugrīva's body upon which Rāma sees signs (nimittāni). They interpret these as the signs of combat, such as blood, etc. (tasmin sugrīve. nimittāni kṣatajādirūpāṇi yuddhacihnāni—so Ct).

"Lakṣmaṇa's elder brother . . . fortunate Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇapūrvajaḥ / . . . lakṣmaṇaṃ lakṣmisampannam: This is another example of the poet's fondness for alliteration, especially involving his characters' names. According to Cg, however, the word lakṣmī (here, lakṣmi-), normally, "good fortune, the goddess of good fortune," refers to [Lakṣmaṇa's] gratification upon seeing favorable portents (lakṣmīr atra nimittadarśanajaḥ santoṣaḥ). Cf. 6.14.3 and note.

Following 1ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eighteen lines [610*] in which Rāma addresses not Lakṣmaṇa but Sugrīva, rebuking him for his impulsive and unauthorized attack on Rāvaṇa: "Embracing Sugrīva, he [Rāma] then spoke these words, 'You did this rash act without consulting me. Lords of the people do not engage in such rash undertakings. Fond of reckless deeds, hero, you did this rash thing mischievously, placing me and the army along with Vibhīṣaṇa in peril.[1–5] From now on, hero, you must not engage in such thoughtless actions. If you had been killed somehow or other, what use would I have for Sītā, Bharata, my younger brother Lakṣmaṇa, Śatrughna, or even my own body, great-armed slayer of your foes?[6–9] Even though I knew your strength, you who are the equal of great Indra or Varuṇa, before you returned, I had made up my mind that, once I had destroyed Rāvaṇa in battle, together with his sons, troops, and mounts, and had consecrated Vibhīṣaṇa as king of Laṅkā, I would transfer my kingship to Bharata and abandon my body, mighty one.'[10–14] Sugrīva then replied to Rāma, who was speaking in this fashion, saying, 'How, heroic Rāghava, could I, knowing my own strength, have simply stood by once I saw Rāvaṇa, the abductor of your wife?' Rāghava, commending that hero, who had spoken in this fashion. . . . [15–18]"

2. "these cool lakes" udakaṃ śītam: Literally, "cool water." We follow Ct, who glosses, "bodies of water filled with that [water] (tadvato jalāśāyān)."

"dividing this massive army into companies and marshaling it in formation" balaughaṃ saṃvibhajyemaṃ vyūhya: Literally, "having divided and marshaled this flood of troops." We follow Cg in understanding two separate military actions here. The first, according to Cg, is the breaking up of the mass of troops into units under the command of their various troop leaders; the second is the marshaling of these forces into the defensive and offensive formations (vyūhas), such as the eagle formation, etc. (saṃvibhajya tattadyūthapādhīnaṃ kṛtvā vyūhya garuḍādirūpeṇa sthāpayitvā).

Verses 2–12 recur with minor variations at App. I, No. 16, lines 3–26 [= GPP 6.23.2–13]. See note to 6.15.33. Ct declines to comment on the passage here, noting that he has done so earlier (vyākhātaprāyā ime ślokāḥ).

3. For similar passages listing inauspicious omens, see 6.26.21–30; 6.41.30–34; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.41–45; 6.65.17–19; 6.83.32–34; 6.94.14–27; and notes.

"I see signs of a horrendous universal catastrophe" lokakṣayakaraṃ bhīmaṃ bhayaṃ paśyāmi: Literally, "I see a fearful danger, destructive of the world." We agree with Cg in understanding bhayam, "fear, danger," to refer here to "portents of danger (bhayanimittam), which indicate the impending universal destruction (lokakṣayasūcakam)."

"presaging the annihilation" nibarhaṇam: Literally, "destruction." We follow Cg, who glosses, "indicating destruction (vināśasūcakam)."

4. "the mountains crumble" patanti dharaṇīdharāḥ: Literally, "the upholders of the earth fall." Ś,Ñ2,V1–3,B2,3,D2–4,6,8,10–12,T2,3,G1,2,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read nadanti, "they roar, bellow," for patanti, "they fall." Based on this reading, Cr believes that the noun dharaṇīdharāḥ refers not to the mountains but to the elephants of the four quarters, who in Hindu cosmology are represented as supporting the earth on their foreheads. See 6.4.6 and 6.58.45–46 and notes. See, too, 1.39.12,16,17 and notes. Cr thinks that these elephants are trumpeting (diggajā nadanti). Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1504), following Cr here, understands that the elephants are trumpeting. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 113), Dutt (1893, p. 1213), and Pagani (1999, p. 960) understand that the mountains are emitting sounds. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 96) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 97), following the variant dharaṇīruhāḥ, "[things that] grow on mountains, (i.e., trees)," found in a number of southern manuscripts (D5,T1,G3,M3; KK 6.41.13; VSP 6.41.13), understand that trees are falling.

5. "resembling beasts of prey" kravyādasaṃkāśāḥ: Most commentators list the kinds of beasts intended, including hawks, jackals, vultures, wolves, and so on, and understand the clouds' likeness to these creatures to consist in their dark color, or, as Cg puts it at his comments to the identical verse at GPP 6.23.5 (= CE App. I, No. 16, lines 9–10), "wolf colored (vṛkavarṇāḥ)." Cg offers an alternative, i.e., that the clouds may have the shape of birds of prey, such as hawks, etc. (śyenādisaṃsthānā iti vā). The latter is the only explanation he offers at the current verse (śyenādisadṛśyasaṃsthānāḥ). See 6.26.24 and note.

"mingled with drops of blood" miśraṃ śoṇitabindubhiḥ: At GPP 6.23.5, Cg quotes Varāhamihira, who gives a list of evil omens, including showers of blood (divy ulkapatanaṃ caiva divānakṣatradarśanaṃ / divā śanis tathā kāṣṭhatṛṇaraktapravarṣaṇam /). Varāhamihira's quote does not appear to come from either his Bṛhatsaṃhitā or Bṛhajjātaka. Varāhamihira, however, does mention showers of blood as portents of wars between kings (46.40,43). For blood raining down from the heavens as a portent, see 6.26.22; 6.41.33; 6.45.926*–36; 6.83.33; 6.94.15; and notes. Cf. note to 6.76.2, inserted passage 1674*, lines 5–7.

6. "The evening sky, the color of red sandalpaste" raktacandanasaṃkāśā saṃdhyā: Literally, "twilight, the color of red sandalwood." At GPP 6.23.6, Cg explains, "filled with clouds like red sandalpaste (raktacandanatulyameghavatīty arthaḥ)." For red sandalwood, Cg glosses, "saffron (kuṅkumam)."

7. The howling or shrieking of beasts of prey, especially jackals, is a common portent of destruction. See 6.26.24; 6.45.32,34; 6.53.42; 6.83.33; 6.94.21; and notes. Cf. 6.41.32 and note.

"beasts and birds of ill omen" apraśastā mṛgadvijāḥ: Literally, "inauspicious beasts and birds." These, according to Cg and Cr, are forbidden (Cg, "lowly [hīnāḥ]") scavenger animals, such as jackals, vultures, etc. (niṣiddhāḥ . . . śṛgālagṛdhraprabhṛtayaḥ—so Cr). See notes to 6.4.6 and 6.26.28.

8. "glows dully" aprakāśaś ca saṃtāpayati: Literally, "and, devoid of light, [it] emits heat or burns." As Cg notes at GPP 6.23.8, the heating of something naturally cool [such as the moon] is an evil omen (śītasya saṃtāpakaraṇaṃ hy utpāta iti bhāvaḥ).

"emitting a dark and reddish glare" kṛṣṇaraktāṃśuparyantaḥ: Literally, "surrounded by black and red rays." Cg, in his comments on GPP 6.23.8, explains it exactly in this way. Here, however, Cg reads the variant kṛṣṇaraktāntaparyantaḥ, "having a dark interior and red borders" (D6,T3,G1,3,M5, VSP 6.41.17, and Cg—not noted in KK or GPP), which, he understands, is an adjective modifying not the moon but the halo around the sun in the following verse (see note above). This yields the sense "dark in its central orb but red at its circumference." This reading is reflected only in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 96), who, however, unaccountably reverses Cg's interpretation, rendering, "black at the outer edge and red inside," and understanding it as a reference to the halo of the moon.

9. "faint" hrasvaḥ: Literally, "short, diminutive, diminished." Cg takes the term here to refer to a measure of one vyāma (vyāmamātraḥ), the distance between the tips of the fingers of the outstretched arms (about a fathom, or six feet). See Apte s.v.

"menacing" rūkṣaḥ: Literally, "harsh, rough." We follow Cg, who glosses, bhayaṃkaraḥ, "frightening," although at GPP 6.23.9, he glosses the more lexically supportable krūraḥ, "cruel."

"corona" pariveṣaḥ: Cg, who reads 8cd together with 9ab as describing the solar corona, thus understands that the corona is tricolored, namely, black (kṛṣṇa), red (rakta), and crimson (sulohita). Cg, in his comments to GPP 6.23.9, claims that the appearance of such a solar corona is an omen presaging the death of a king. He supports this claim by quoting Kāśyapa: "A double corona [presages] the destruction of an army, a triple corona that of a king (dvimaṇḍalaś camūpaghno nṛpaghno yas trimaṇḍalaḥ)." He also quotes a text, possibly Kāśyapa, to the effect that a solar corona presages different things at different times of the day. Thus, "[its appearance] in the first watch (yāma) of the day indicates affliction (pīḍā); in the second watch, it presages an intense battle (?) (vṛṣṭiyuddha); in the third watch of the day, such a corona foretells prosperity (kṣema), they say; and, in the fourth, universal destruction (sarvanāśa) (dinakarapariveṣaḥ pūrvayāme tu pīḍā, dinakarapariveṣo vṛṣṭiyuddhaṃ dvitīye / dinakarapariveṣaṃ kṣemam āhus tṛtīye dinakarapariveṣaḥ sarvanāśaś caturthe //)." According to this reckoning, Rāma's sighting of the corona in the evening, which should correspond to the fourth yāma of the day, would suggest the universal destruction of which he speaks in verses 8 and 10.

"inauspicious" apraśastaḥ: As at verse 7 above, we follow Cr and Cg, who gloss, aśubhakaraḥ. At GPP 6.23.9, Cg, on the other hand, glosses, "unfamiliar (aprasiddhaḥ)," which he explains as "unprecedented (itaḥ purvam adṛṣṭa ity arthaḥ)."

"dark spot . . . Lakṣmaṇa" nīlaṃ lakṣma lakṣmaṇa: Literally, "dark blue mark, Lakṣmaṇa." Cg describes this mark or sunspot as being like one of the dark spots on the moon (candrakalaṅka iva). He then cites a passage from the Chāndogya Upaniṣad (6.4.2) in which the dark manifestations of the sun are represented as food, one of the three constituents (fire, water, and food—tejobanna) of the material universe according to the Chāndogya cosmology. At GPP 6.23.9, however, Cg gives this explanation and citation only as his second alternative. For the first, he says that the mark is of the nature of a fissure (chidrarūpam) and quotes Varāhamihira to the effect that the appearance of such a fissure on the sun or the moon and the eclipse of these luminaries on a non-parvan day each presage the destruction of a kingdom (aparvaṇi tathā rāhugrahaṇaṃ candrasūryayoś candrārkamaṇḍalacchidraṃ dṛṣṭvā janapadakṣaye).

Note the alliteration in the sequence lakṣma and lakṣmaṇa.

10. "look strange" dṛśyante na yathāvat: Literally, "they do not look as they should." Cg suggests that they are obscured (malināni).

"All of this that appears to us seems to presage" abhivartate . . . iva . . . śaṃsati: Literally, "it approaches . . . it seems to indicate." We agree with Cg and Cm, who understand the implicit subject of the predicate abhivartate to be the sum total of the previously described evil portents (uktaṃ nimittajālam). Ct, who reads the singular dṛśyate for the critical edition's plural dṛśyante, proposes an implied subject, which is "the Milky Way[?], etc. (prakāśagatyādikam)." This enables Ct to read the plural nakṣatrāṇi, "constellations," as an accusative. Thus, he understands the phrase to mean "the Milky Way, etc., which leads to the constellations, does not appear as it should."

Cr takes abhivartate as the dative of the irregular parasmaipada participle of the verb abhi √vṛt in the sense of "to advance, attack." He thus understands, "the appearance of the nakṣatras presages destruction for a person who is about to launch an attack in the world (lokasya loke 'bhivartate 'bhivartamānāya janāya yugāntam iva śaṃsati bodhayati)." Cf. note to verse 42 below.

11. "kites" śyenāḥ: Normally the term śyena refers to a hawk, eagle, or other type of bird of prey. In the present context, however, where the discussion is of flocking, downward-spiraling carrion birds, it is probable, we believe, that the poet was thinking of the common kite, despite the lack of lexical support. See notes to 6.75.20; cf. notes to 6.87.39–40. Cf. Dave 1985, pp. 242–43.

"spiraling downward" nīcaiḥ paripatanti: Literally, "they fall or swoop down." Several translators understand the reference to be to the diving or swooping of the birds, but we see it more as the slow descending spirals of birds that feed on carrion. Cg, on the other hand, understands that the birds are coming down to alight on low altars or platforms (nīcair hrasvaṃ vedikāsthānaṃ paripatanti prāpnuvanti). Cm reads nīcaiḥ adjectivally rather than adverbially, taking it to mean "together with [other] lowly creatures (kṣudrajantubhiḥ saha)."

"jackals" śivāḥ: Cg notes that, although a blanket mention has been made (verse 7 above) of the mournful and frightful cries of all the inauspicious birds and beasts, the repetition of the specific species here is owing to the extreme inauspiciousness of the animals mentioned (apraśastamṛgajātyuktāv api punaruktir aśubhādhikyāt).

Following verse 11, D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr insert a passage of two lines [615*]: "Soon the earth, covered with a mire of flesh and blood, will be littered with stones, spears, and swords loosed by the monkeys and rākṣasas."

12. "this very day, swiftly and without delay" kṣipram adya . . . javenaiva: Literally, "quickly, right now, with great speed."

14. "he inspected" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw, viewed." Cg observes that Rāma's reviewing his troops at the foot of the mountain indicates that the entire army did not climb Mount Suvela (anena sarvaṃ balaṃ na suvelam āruhad iti gamyate).

15. "master of timing" kālajñaḥ: Literally, "knowing the [proper] time."

"prepared" saṃnahya: Normally, the verb sam √nah is used reflexively in the sense of " to prepare, equip, or arm oneself for battle." Here, however, it is used in a transitive sense. Thus, we read with Cg, "having incited or stimulated (protsāhya)."

"army of the monkey king" kapirājabalam: Cg understands kapirāja in the sense of "foremost monkeys," thus giving the meaning "the army of outstanding monkeys (kapiśreṣṭhānāṃ balam)."

"at the proper moment" kāle: Literally, "in time." We follow Cr, Cg, and Cm in understanding the reference to be to an appropriate time for battle (saṃgrāmasamaye—so Cr). Ct, however, sees an implicit reference to an auspicious moment as specified in the science of astrology (jyotiḥśāstroktakāle).

16. "when the time was right" kāle: Literally, "in time." This term, which is repeated from the previous verse, is treated somewhat differently here by the various commentators, perhaps in an attempt to absolve the poet of the flaw of redundancy. Thus, Ct, who in the earlier passage referred to the moment selected by astrology, here sees the time as chosen by the prognosticative science of [nasal] sounds (svaraśāstra) (Apte s.v.). Ct indicates that these would be used to select the proper moment to initiate the battle (yuddhayogye kāle). Cg, who earlier had interpreted, "the [proper time] for battle (kāle yuddhakāle saṃyugāya yuddhāya)," here understands, "in the morning (prātaḥkāle)."

17. "the king of the apes" ṛkṣarājaḥ: This epithet is normally applied to Jāmbavān. The disjunction of the epithet here from the name "Jāmbavān" makes the identification difficult. Translators vary in their interpretations. Some, in keeping with tradition, assign the epithet to Jāmbavān, despite the disjunction (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1505 and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 97). Some take it as a reference to the monkey Nīla, whose name immediately follows it (Dutt 1893, p. 1216). Some read it as referring to Nala, whose name immediately precedes it (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 97 and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 243). Still others (Pagani 1999, p. 961 and Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 114) understand, as do we, that the epithet stands alone and is not in apposition to any of the names in the verse. The commentators are largely silent on this, with the exception of Cs, who reads as we do, identifying the king of the ṛkṣas as Dhūmra. On the issue of the identification of ṛkṣas, see Goldman 1989 and 1.16.10 and notes. See, too, 6.4.17 and note.

18. "forest-dwelling monkeys" -vanaukasām: Literally, "forest dwellers."

21. The verse consists entirely of accusative feminine adjectives modifying Laṅkā. Technically, it should be construed with either the previous or the following verse. We have read it as if it were a separate descriptive sentence in order to avoid an excessively long construction.

"it seemed impregnable" suduṣprāpām: Literally, "exceedingly inaccessible or unattainable."

22. "following orders" yathānideśam: Literally, "according to instructions." Ś,Ñ, V1,B1,2,4,D1–4,6,8,12,T3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead yathāniveśam, "according to encampment," which, according to Cg, gives the sense that the monkeys each took up their assigned position. (yathāsthānam. rāmavaco 'nyūnaṃ svaṃ svaṃ sthānam anatikramyety arthaḥ.) Cm, however, interprets the critical reading in the sense in which we do, glossing, "not deviating from Rāma's instructions (yathāniveśaṃ rāmanideśam anatikramya)." In fact, the word nideśa- itself can also mean "place or station," and various translators have interpreted accordingly (e.g., Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 97).

"closely besieged" saṃpīḍya nyaviśanta: Literally, "having pressed closely together, they encamped." Compare note to verse 32 below.

23. "guarded and blockaded" jugopa ca rurodha ca: That Rāma is represented as simultaneously blockading and protecting the gate is troubling to many of the commentators, who see the sequence as contradictory. Ct, Ck, Cg, Cm, and Cs suggest supplying a separate object, "his army (ātmīyabalam)," for the verb jugopa, "he protected." Their idea is that Rāma is engaged in two separate activities, one offensive and the other defensive. Cs, however, suggests an additional explanation of a theological nature. He proposes that Rāma protects through his indwelling form that is internal to Rāvaṇa, etc. [i.e., all other beings], while at the same time he besieges [the city] in his exterior [human] form as Rāma. This, Cs continues, suggests that in the absence of an impulse from Rāma, Rāvaṇa is incapable of doing anything. (jugopa anta[ḥ]sthitarāvaṇādyantaḥsthitena rūpeṇa jugopa. bahī rāmarūpeṇa rurodha ceti vā. antareṇa rāmapreraṇāṃ rāvaṇaḥ kim api kartuṃ na kṣama ity anena sūcyate.) Cg argues that the use of the verb rurodha, "he blockaded," here enables us to infer from the context (arthasiddham) that [Rāma's forces] had also ascended to the peak of Mount Trikūṭa,

[where Laṅkā is located], which was described at 6.30.18. Cg quotes this verse (rurodhety anena śikharaṃ trikūṭasya prāṃśu caikaṃ divispṛśam ity uktatrikūṭaśikharārohaṇam arthasiddham).

24–25. "capable of guarding" samarthaḥ parirakṣitum: Cs explains that only Rāma is able to guard the gate in such a way that Rāvaṇa and his allies will be unable to force their way out (rāvaṇādayo yathā na bahir āgaccheyus tathā rakṣitum ity arthaḥ). Cm, evidently unhappy with the use of the verb pari √rakṣ, "to protect," in regard to something one is attempting to assault, suggests that the phrase tad dvāram, "that gate," is a compound referring to the army [of Rāma] assigned to the blockade of that gate (taddvāraṃ taddvārarodhikāṃ senām).

26. "the ocean guarded by Varuṇa" varuṇeneva sāgaram: Literally, "as the ocean by Varuṇa." The word "guarded" has been borrowed here from the following syntactic unit for the sake of clarity.

"It struck terror into the hearts of the weak." laghūnāṃ trāsajananam: Literally, "generating fear in the weak." We follow Cg, Cm, Ck, and Cr, all of whom provide different glosses with the sense of "weak, cowardly, unsteady, etc." for laghu, "light, insignificant."

"just as is the underworld known as Pātāla" pātālam iva: Literally, "just as Pātāla."

27. "Rāma saw" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw."

"stores" -jālāni: Literally, "masses."

28. "Mainda and Dvivida" maindena dvividena ca: Although it is stated at 6.28.25 above that Nīla was assigned to the eastern gate with many other monkeys, Mainda and Dvivida are not specifically named there. Cg notes, however, that we should understand that Rāma had previously assigned them to this position (maindena dvividena cetyādinā pratidvāram adhikayūthapatigamanasyātroktatvāt pūrvaṃ rāmeṇa te niyuktā iti jñeyam).

29. See 6.28.26, where Rāma assigns Aṅgada to the southern gate.

30. "Pramāthin, Praghasa" pramāthipraghasābhyāṃ ca: D7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the names Prajaṅgha and Tarasa. Compare 6.28.27.

31. "central encampment" madhyame . . . gulme: The idea here, according to Ct, Ck, Cg, and Cm, is that in order to be able to swiftly lend support to Rāma or Hanumān, who are stationed, respectively, at the northern and western gates, where, again respectively, the most invincible of the rākṣasas, Rāvaṇa and Indrajit, are stationed, Sugrīva encamps with the main monkey force midway between those two gates. This would place Sugrīva, according to the commentators, in the direction guarded by the divinity Vāyu, i.e., the northwestern quarter. According to Cg, Ck, and Cm, that Sugrīva so positions himself is an illustration of the kākākṣinyāya, or maxim of the crow's eye, according to which a single element, e.g., a word in a sentence, can do double duty in different places. Ct, however, cites the madhyamaṇinyāya, or maxim of the central gemstone, which presumably refers to the stone's ability to illuminate articles on either side. (atidurjayarāvaṇendrajidadhiṣṭhitayor uttarapaścimadvārayor madhye vāyudiśi. tadubhayadvāranirodhakānāṃ madhyamaṇinyāyena sāhāyyaṃ kartuṃ sugrīvaḥ samatiṣṭhatety arthaḥ—so Ct.) Cf. 5.3.27; 6.3.27; 6.27.20; 6.28.31; 6.45.2; 6.62.5; 6.71.1; 6.72.5; 6.84.6; and notes.

"swift as Suparṇa or the wind" suparṇaśvasanopamaiḥ: Literally, "comparable to Suparṇa or the wind." Since both Suparṇa [Garuḍa] and the wind are stereotyped upamānas for the quality of speed, we have fleshed out the elliptical simile accordingly. The idea here, presumably, is to emphasize the swiftness with which Sugrīva's troops could respond to the aid of either Rāma or Hanumān as needed. V3,D5,10,11,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read suvarṇa-, "gold," for suparṇa-, while V3,D7,9–11,G1,2 read -pavana-, "wind (lit., the purifier)," for śvasana-, "wind." Although the text of GPP (6.41.42; but not NSP [6.41.42]) reads the all-but-untranslatable suvarṇa-, no commentator mentions the variant, and no translator renders it.

32. "illustrious leaders of the monkey troops" vānarāṇām . . . prakhyātayūthapāḥ: Literally, "the illustrious troop leaders of the monkeys." Ct and Cm, evidently disturbed by the relatively small number of monkeys mentioned here [compared to the astronomical numbers given at 6.15.25 and 6.19.4] as constituting Sugrīva's main force, emphasize the word prakhyāta-, "illustrious," to indicate that the less prominent monkeys, not mentioned here, are simply innumerable. Ct notes further that when the text mentions [in verse 31] that these are "all the foremost monkeys," we are to understand that this leaves out the monkeys already stationed at the four gates. (sarvair hariśreṣṭhair dvāranirodhaniyuktebhyo 'vaśiṣṭaiḥ prakhyātayūthapāḥ ṣaṭtriṃśatkoṭyaḥ. aprakhyātayūthapānāṃ tatsenānāṃ ca gaṇanābhāva iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.)

"were encamped, pressing their siege" nipīḍyopaniviṣṭāḥ: Literally, "having pressed, were encamped." Cr fleshes out the phrase, explaining, "having pressed the rākṣasas who were stationed there, they were encamped (tatstharākṣasān pīḍayitvopaniviṣṭā abhavann iti śeṣaḥ)." Compare note to verse 23 above.

34. "Sugrīva" sugrīvaḥ: D5,7,10,11,T1,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead suṣeṇaḥ, "Suṣeṇa."

"a little to the west of Rāma's post" paścimena tu rāmasya . . . adūrāt: Literally, "not far off to the west of Rāma." Ct, Cr, and Cm explain that Sugrīva (or Suṣeṇa in Ct's and Cr's variant) is providing close support as a rear guard to Rāma (āsannapṛṣṭhabhāgāvaṣṭambhena—Ct, Cm).

36. "erect . . . flexing . . . contorted" vikṛta- . . . vikṛta- . . . vikṛta-: Like other translators, we have had to render this adjective, which normally means "transformed, distorted, hideous," in different ways in order to accommodate the contexts in which it is used. In the case of the monkeys' tails, we have followed Cg, who glosses, "extending their tails upward (ūrdhvaṃ prasāritapucchāḥ)." This is, as we understand it, an aggressive posture on the part of the monkeys. Ct and Cr understand the action to be a product of the monkeys' rage but do not describe it precisely (atikrodhāveśavaśāt—so Cr). In the case of the monkeys' limbs, we understand them to be extended or flexed menacingly. Cg explains the compound vikṛtacitrāṅgāḥ, "flexing their variegated limbs," as follows: "The transformation (vikṛtatvam) of the limbs refers to the fact that the monkeys' faces and eyes are red with rage and therefore their limbs are of variegated colors [i.e., blotchy]. (vikṛtatvaṃ koparaktamukhanetratvam. ata eva citraṃ citravarṇam aṅgaṃ yeṣāṃ te tathoktā iti vigrahaḥ.)" As for the monkeys' faces, the contortion is also probably a product of their anger, as Cr suggests. Cg believes that they are twisting their features in imitative mockery of the rākṣasas (rākṣasaviḍambanāya kūṭilitamukhāḥ). See Maestripieri 1999a–f and Flack et al. 2000a–d.

38. "as powerful as an ogha of elephants" oghabalāḥ: Literally, "having the strength of an ogha." We provide the word "elephant" to retain the standard of measure established in the preceding verse. The term ogha here is somewhat problematic. Normally, it has the sense of "a flood, a host, a vast number." However, because the verse specifically refers to a multiple of one hundred [oghas], it seems likely to us that the term is intended here in the spirit of the earlier passages where the monkeys are enumerated (see 6.19.32 and notes). Thus, it appears that the poet is referring to a specific astronomical number. One problem with this interpretation is that the term ogha appears to be citable in this meaning only in one passage in a few Rāmāyaṇa manuscripts, where it is said to equal one hundred thousand samudras (following 6.19.32 at 412[E]* in D5,T1,M1–3, and in the published editions of Cg; also found in KK 6.28.39 and VSP 6.28.38 and as a bracketed and unnumbered line between GPP 6.28.37 and 38, where it is stated to be an additional half verse belonging to the text of Cg [śataṃ samudrasāhasram ogha ity abhidhīyate]). On the other hand, the term mahaugha, or "great ogha," occurs at 412*, line 3 ([following 6.19.32] = GPP 6.28.37). See note to 6.19.32, where we are given the definition of a mahaugha as one hundred thousand samudras [ten sexdecillion = 10^{52}]. By this calculation, the terms ogha and mahaugha would be synonymous. If, however, one were to take the modifier mahā- in these numerical compounds in its usual sense of "one hundred thousand," then an ogha would be one one-hundred-thousandth of a mahaugha and thus equal to a samudra. For a discussion of this system of numeration used in connection with the numbering of the monkey troops, see notes to 6.19.32.

Ct, Cr, Cg, and Cm all understand the reference to be to a specific number, "having the strength of one count or number of oghas of elephants (nāga) (oghasaṃkhyānāga-balāḥ)."

Many northern manuscripts, as well as the edition of Gorresio (6.16.42), avoid the confusion regarding the exact number the term ogha represents by substituting vāyubalopamāḥ, "as powerful as the wind," for śataguṇottarāḥ, "a hundred times [as powerful as that]," of pāda b. This makes it possible to interpret ogha in the sense of a force of nature (the flood or ocean) similar to the massed monkey troops. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 245) translates accordingly, "Alcuni han l'impeto de' flutti." This reading gains some credence, perhaps, from the fact that the term ogha is clearly used in its sense of "an ocean, flood, or mass" in verse 45 below to describe the massed armies whose sound is compared to that of the ocean. Other northern and devanāgarī manuscripts, as well as the Lahore edition (6.16.39), avoid the problem by reading megha-, "clouds," for ogha-, yielding the somewhat awkward sense of "as powerful as clouds." The monkeys themselves will be compared to clouds at verse 44 below.

39. "variegated" vicitraḥ: The idea, according to Cg, is that the army is of various colors, etc., because of its being made up of monkeys, langurs, and bears (vicitraḥ vānaragopucchabhallūkajuṣṭatayā nānāvarṇaḥ). Cs takes two minor lexical meanings of the word citra here as the basis for alternate explanations of the term. According to the first, in which citra is a synonym for māyā, it means that "the monkey host is devoid of magical or deceitful means [māyika], unlike the rākṣasas, etc. (na ca rākṣasādīnām iva māyika ity āha. vicitra iti vigatamāya ity arthaḥ)." According to the second, in which citra means "sky," the monkey host is "not going through the sky [that is entirely situated on the ground] (vicitro 'gaganaga ity arthaḥ)."

"swarm of locusts" śalabhānām ivodgamaḥ: Ct, Ck, and Cg (second alternative) understand the reference to be to the sudden calamitous swarming of these insects (utpātakāle iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Cg, however, for his first alternative, understands śalabha- to refer to the terrifying, mythical, eight-legged beast called śarabha, which is said to be stronger than a lion (Apte s.v.). He thus sees the point of the simile not to be so much the vast number of troops but their fearsomeness (śalabhānāṃ śarabhāṇām aṣṭapādamṛgāṇām udyamaḥ samāgama āsīt tathā bhayaṅkaro 'bhūd ity arthaḥ). For a description of the mythical creature called śarabha, see Ṛtusaṃhāra 1.23.

40. "seemed to be . . . filled . . . as if covered" paripūrṇam iva . . . saṃchanneva: We follow Ct, Cr, and Cg in reading the participles distributively. Cr and Cg are disturbed by the poet's repetition of the comparative particle iva in the verse. Cr argues that we should take one iva in the sense of api, "as well" (eka ivaśabdo 'pyarthe). Cg, on the other hand, writes the repetition off as the figure of speech vākyālaṃkāra (atraivaśabdadvayam api vākyālaṃkāre).

"converging on the city" saṃpatadbhiḥ: Literally, "[by those] flying or leaping together."

41. "A hundred divisions each of one hundred thousand" śataṃ śatasahasrāṇāṃ pṛthak: V3,D10,11,T3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read pṛtanā, "an army or a division of an army [consisting of 243 elephants, 243 chariots, 729 cavalry, and 1,215 foot soldiers]," for pṛthak, yielding the sense of "armies of ten millions [of apes . . .]." Ct takes the term sahasra, "thousand," in the sense of koṭi, "ten million." He thus sees the monkeys here as numbering ten billion (śatakoṭi). Ct, Cg, Cm, and Ck inform us that the monkeys mentioned here are to be understood as over and above those who have been previously stationed at and around the gates of the city (ete pūrvaniyuktādhikā iti bodhyam—so Ct). See note to 6.3.24.

"stationed themselves at . . . swarmed in" upājagmuḥ: Literally, "they approached." The same verb does double duty for the two groups of monkeys, and we have translated it in two ways to reflect the warriors' different situations.

42. "mountain" giriḥ: According to Ct, Ck, Cv, Cg, and Cm, the mountain in question is Trikūṭa (see 5.2.1 and note). Cr specifies that the mountain includes [all three of its peaks] Suvela, etc. (suvelaprabhṛtiḥ). See 6.29.1–2 and notes.

"marched upon" abhyavartata: We understand the verb here in its sense of "to attack or approach with hostile intent." Ct, Cr, and Ck suggest that this additional force of monkeys is moving around the citadel in order to gather information as to what is happening with the troops stationed at the four gates (sarvadvāravartisvasenāsarvavṛttāntagrahaṇārthaṃ saṃcaratām iti śeṣaḥ). Cf. note to verse 10 above.

43. "tree-wielding" drumapāṇibhiḥ: Literally, "with trees in hand."

"so that not even the wind could enter" duṣpraveśāpi vāyunā: Literally, "hard to enter, even by the wind." We understand, with Cr and Cg, that it is the mass of monkeys surrounding the city that makes it impenetrable (vānaraiḥ saṃvṛtā laṅkā vāyunāpi duṣpraveśā babhūva—so Cr). It is also possible, as some translators have done, to understand the adjective to refer to the preexisting impenetrability of the city. (See, for example, Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 98.)

45. "like the sound that might arise from the waters if the ocean itself were to be shattered" sāgarasyeva bhinnasya yathā syāt salilasvanaḥ: Literally, "such as might be the sound of the water of the ocean being split." Ct, Ck, and Cr understand the figure to be an imaginary one (abhūtopameyam) in which the sound arises from the ocean's being divided by the causeway (see 6.15.15–24). (bhinnasya sāgarasya kṛtasetuvibhedanasya. abhūtopameyam—so Ct.) We agree that the simile is an imaginative one, but we are not persuaded that there is any reference here to the setubandha. Cg understands the adjective bhinna, "split, shattered," to refer to the ocean having broken its boundaries, and then understands the sound of the monkey hosts to be like that of the ocean in that it was like the sound of water. Cg tells us that, with this reading, the problem of the apparent redundancy of the adverb yathā in pāda d and the particle iva in pāda c is eliminated. (bhinnamaryādasya. sāgarasyevābhivartato 'bhivartamānasya balaughasya. salilasvano yathā syāt tathā mahāñ chabdo babhūveti yojanā. ato na yathāśabdavaiyyarthyam.) Cm and Cv read similarly although their glosses are less detailed.

46. "parks, and woodlands" -vanakānanā: Literally, "woods and forests." We follow Cg, who avoids the redundancy by glossing vana with udyāna, "park." See 6.32.3.

48–49. "for the destruction of the rākṣasas" rakṣasāṃ vadhe: Literally, "with respect to the destruction of the rākṣasas." Cs reads this phrase as an indication that, despite Rāma's going through the motions of royal diplomacy, the slaying of the obdurate rākṣasa king has already been decided. (etena lokānukṛtyā eva rājanītyanusaraṇam. na śṛṇoti rāvaṇo 'to māraṇam eva niścitam iti sūcayati.)

"once again" punaḥ punaḥ: Literally, "again and again."

"Fully conversant with the sequential application of the various stratagems and of their consequences" kramayogārthatattvavit: Literally, "knowing the essence of the stratagems of sequential application." This ambiguous term is, evidently, a reference to the six stratagems (see 6.9.8 and notes) that a king may employ in regard to his enemies. The term kramayoga, "gradual or sequential application," does not appear to be used in the Arthaśāstra in a technical sense, although it is citable from the Pañcatantra (Hertel 1908, p. 122:9) and Manusmṛti 1.42 in the general sense of "gradually, successively." Our translation follows the interpretation of Cg, who explains the compound as follows: "kramayoga refers to the sequentially employed stratagems of statecraft, conciliation, and so forth. The artha of these stratagems is their consequences. One who understands (vit) the essence (tattva) of these consequences is a kramayogārthatattvavit (kramayuktā yogāḥ sāmādyupāyāḥ teṣām arthaḥ phalaṃ tasya tattvaṃ yāthārthyaṃ vettīti tathoktaḥ)." Cm has a similar interpretation, except that he glosses krama as nīti, "statecraft," itself. Ct and Ck also interpret similarly, taking artha to mean sādhya, "goal," rather than phalam, "consequence." Ct further understands tattva, "essence," in the sense of the application of the stratagems (tattvaṃ tatprayojanam).

"Abiding by the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa" vibhīṣaṇasyānumate: Literally, "in the agreement or permission of Vibhīṣaṇa." The commentators are divided as to how to interpret this elliptical phrase. Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cm (second alternative) supply the participle sthitaḥ (sthitvā—Cm) to indicate that Rāma is abiding by the advice of, or is in agreement with, Vibhīṣaṇa. Ct and Cm explain that Vibhīṣaṇa's advice to Rāma is that, were Rāvaṇa to seek refuge with him, Rāma should return the sovereignty of Laṅkā [which he had earlier conferred upon Vibhīṣaṇa (see 6.19.26–27 and notes; see, too, 6.13.9 and notes)] to him (yadi rāvaṇo bhavantaṃ śaraṇam upeyāt tadā laṅkārājyaṃ tasyaiva deyam iti vibhīṣaṇamate sthita ity arthaḥ). Cs offers a different perspective, noting that, since Rāma had already consecrated Vibhīṣaṇa as king, it would be impossible, in the event of reconciliation [with Rāvaṇa], to abrogate that prior arrangement. Under these conditions, it is only appropriate for Rāma to consult with Vibhīṣaṇa before taking any action. Cs goes on to state that the inner meaning of this expression is a reflection of Rāma's omniscience and not any duplicity on the part of Vibhīṣaṇa. (vibhīṣaṇasya rājyābhiṣeko jāta iti sandhau ca na tadabhisandhisiddhir iti tatsaṃmatīkaraṇam ucitam iti bhāvaḥ. sarvajñatvaṃ rāmasya virājata iti na duścittatā vibhīṣaṇasyeti paramārthaḥ.)

"the protocol of kings" rājadharmam: Ct and Ck understand the reference to be to the dharma, or righteous behavior, of kings, according to which the stratagem of force, daṇḍa, ought not to be employed in the first instance, as it is injurious to the people (sāmāditryupāyasādhye 'rthe daṇḍo na moktavyaḥ prajānāśahetur ity evaṃrūpaṃ rājadharmam anucintayan). Ck sees this as a reference to Rāma's supremely compassionate nature. Cg and Cm, however, whom we follow, understand the reference to be to the proper protocol of a king who is about to attack an enemy city. According to this protocol, the king must first employ a messenger through whom he issues a challenge to his rival to come out and fight (yuyutsayā śatrupuraṃ pratyāgatā rājāno yuddhārthaṃ dūtamukhena prathamam āhvayantīty evaṃrūpaṃ rājadharmam anusmaran). This interpretation, we believe, provides a better explanation for Rāma's appointment of Aṅgada as his emissary. On the stratagem of force, see 6.9.8; 6.51.11–13; 6.59.28; 6.71.12; and notes.

50. "free from anxiety" gatavyathaḥ: Literally, "whose anxiety has gone." Cg and Cm, perhaps in an effort to avoid a perceived redundancy with the phrase "abandoning fear (bhayaṃ tyaktvā)," gloss, "having cast off fatigue (gataśramaḥ san)." Ct and Ck, in keeping with their rather different reading of this passage, understand the adjective to refer not to Aṅgada but to Rāma, and gloss "without incident, safely (nirupadravaḥ)." They take the adjective as a reference to Rāma's crossing of the ocean. See below.

"monkey" kape: Cg notes that the use of this particular term here is to illuminate Aṅgada's power to leap (kape ity anena laṅghanasāmarthyaṃ dyotayati).

"you must leap into the city of Laṅkā" laṅghayitvā purīṃ laṅkām: Normally, this phrase would mean "having leapt over the city of Laṅkā," just as it is used so commonly in the text to describe Hanumān's leap over the ocean (see Sundarakāṇḍa 1). In recognition of the slightly odd usage, Cr and Cg add some more immediate object of the gerund, the former glossing, "having leapt over, that is, having disregarded, the city of Laṅkā, that is, the rākṣasas stationed there (laṅkāṃ purīṃ tatstharākṣasān laṅghayitvā anādṛtya)." Cg glosses purīm, "city," as "its ramparts (laṅkāṃ purīṃ tatprākāraṃ laṅghayitvā)." Ct and Ck, as well as the translators who follow their texts, understand that pādas cd are not part of Rāma's instructions to Aṅgada but rather the beginning of Rāma's message to Rāvaṇa. They thus see Rāma himself as the subject of the gerunds laṅghayitvā and tyaktvā and understand the passage to be an elliptical reference to Rāma's having leapt, i.e., having crossed over, the ocean. In order to make this reading intelligible, Ct and Ck must supply not only the word "ocean" but an entire complex sentence, viz., "one must supply the words, 'having abandoned fear and having regarded your army as a mere straw, I have laid siege to Laṅkā.' " (laṅghayitvā samudram . . . bhayaṃ tyaktvā tvadbalam tṛṇīkṛtya laṅkām upāruṇadham iti śeṣaḥ.)

"ten-necked Rāvaṇa" daśagrīvam: Literally, "the ten-necked one."

"you are to address him in my words as follows" brūhi madvacanāt: Literally, "speak according to my speech."

51–53. "You have lost your royal majesty, your lordship is at an end. You have lost your wits and doomed yourself." bhraṣṭaśrīka gataiśvarya mumūrṣo naṣṭacetana: Literally, "O you whose majesty has lapsed, O you whose lordship has gone, O you who desire to die, O you whose wits are destroyed." A variety of manuscripts, including the texts of Ct and Ck, read these terms instead as singular accusatives, with the last two forming the compound mumūrṣānaṣṭacetanam, "whose wits are destroyed by the desire for death." Ct reads these accusatives as objects of the imperative brūhi, "[you, Aṅgada] speak or address," in 50b. Translators who follow the text of Ct therefore take 51ab as part of Rāma's instructions to Aṅgada, since the epithets become, in Ct's reading, adjectives modifying daśagrīvam in 50a. The notion that one's wits desert one at the point of impending death is a common one and is enshrined in such maxims as "vināśakāle viparītā buddhiḥ (at the time of destruction, one's wits become addled)."

"will . . . be humbled" gataḥ: Literally, "gone."

"born of the boon of self-existent Brahmā" svayaṃbhūvaradānajaḥ: Literally, "born of the gift of a boon of the self-existent one." The reference is, of course, to Rāvaṇa's boon of invulnerability to superhuman beings. See note to 6.28.28–29.

Following verse 52, D7,G2, and the text of Cr (found in GPP in brackets between 63bc and 64ab) insert a passage of one line [642*]: "Today the unbearable fruit of that evil act [will be] obtained [by you]."

54. "Once I have killed you" mayā hataḥ: D10,11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read yudhi sthiraḥ (v.l. yudhi sthitaḥ—Ś,Ñ,V,B,D0–4,6–9,12,13,T2,G2,3,M5), "firm or steadfast in battle." Northern manuscripts generally read the first person, gamiṣyāmi, and thus the phrase yudhi sthitaḥ would refer to Rāma.

"realm" padavīm: This term can have a variety of meanings, chiefly, "way, path" and "state, condition." Ct and Ck take as their first meaning the idea that Rāvaṇa will follow the path of the seers, etc., in the sense that he will, like them, die. However, they note, since Rāvaṇa is, according to their reading, steadfast in battle and, moreover, a worshiper of self-existent Brahmā, he will, upon his death, attain a blessed world through the grace of that divinity. In support of this contention, Ct cites a verse from the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.18.30, which is also found at Manusmṛti 8.3.18) to the effect that "men who commit crimes are, when punished by kings, purified and thus attain heaven, just as do the virtuous." (tadvat tavāpi maraṇaṃ bhaviṣyatīti bhāvaḥ. kiṃca yudhi sthiratve svayaṃbhūpāsakasya te tadanugrahān matto maraṇe puṇyalokaprāptis taveti bhāvaḥ. "rājabhir dhṛtadaṇḍās tu kṛtvā pāpāni mānavaḥ / nirmalāḥ svargam āyānti santaḥ sukṛtino yathā //" ity ukteḥ.) Cr notes that, since Rāvaṇa is steadfast in battle, he will attain the highest station, that is, the next world. (yudhi sthiras tvaṃ devaprabhṛtīnāṃ padavīṃ caramagatiṃ paralokam ity arthaḥ. gamiṣyasi prāpsyasi.) Cg offers two alternate interpretations. In his first he takes padavī in its sense of "state or condition," which he sees as the condition of defeat (paribhava) to which Rāvaṇa had subjected the gods, etc., and sees Rāma as telling Rāvaṇa that he will suffer the same fate (padavīṃ teṣu kṛtaṃ paribhavaṃ kamapi gamiṣyasīty arthaḥ). Cg's second alternative is much the same as that of Ct and Ck. Even though Cg does not share the reading yudhi sthiraḥ of Ct and Ck, he notes that, since Rāvaṇa is steadfast in battle, he will go to the world of the gods, etc., because a person who is firm in battle is purified of all his sins (yuddhe sthitvā sarvapāpaviśuddhaḥ san gatiṃ gamiṣyasi). Cm similarly understands the reference to be to the blessed realms reserved for those who are steadfast in battle. He quotes the same verse as Ct, adding to it an additional half verse (a variant of ManuSm 8.3.16), to the effect that "a king who fails to punish a criminal shares that criminal's guilt (rājā tv aśāsan pāpasya tad avāpnoti kilbiṣam)." This latter is evidently cited as part of a justification of Rāma's killing Rāvaṇa.

55. "wretched rākṣasa" rākṣasādhama: Literally, "worst or lowest of rākṣasas." The epithet is no doubt intended to stand in pointed contrast with the descriptive phrase rakṣasāṃ śreṣṭhaḥ, "best or foremost of rākṣasas," applied to Vibhīṣaṇa in verse 57 below.

"with an illusion" māyayā: As Cg notes, the illusion referred to here is probably that employed by the rākṣasa Mārīca, who assumed the form of a magic deer to lure Rāma away (see 3.40.12ff.). Perhaps one could also understand the term more generally in the sense of "deceptively, deceitfully," as a reference to Rāvaṇa's own māyā in assuming the appearance of a wandering mendicant to gain Sītā's confidence (see 3.44.2–3).

56. "Unless you . . . come to me for refuge" na cec charaṇam abhyeṣi: Cg, no doubt keeping in mind the Śrīvaiṣṇava concept of śaraṇāgati, "seeking refuge with the Lord," remarks that, if Rāvaṇa were to take refuge with him, Rāma would forgive everything he had done. However, Cg continues, Rāvaṇa would not be allowed to seek refuge unless he first returns Sītā any more than a thief could obtain forgiveness without returning the gold he had stolen. Cg also argues that, if Rāvaṇa were actually to seek refuge with Rāma, the latter would then confer the kingship of Kosala upon Vibhīṣaṇa. (śaraṇāgatau tu sarvaṃ kṣamiṣya iti bhāvaḥ. maithilīm upādāyety anena svarṇasteye svarṇapratyarpaṇam antareṇa prayaścittānadhikāravat sītāpratyarpaṇābhāve śaraṇāgatau tu nādhikāra ity uktam. rāvaṇena śaraṇāgatau kṛtāyāṃ vibhīṣaṇāya kosalarājyaṃ dāsyāmīty abhiprayaḥ.) The idea here, no doubt, is that, if Rāma were to forgive Rāvaṇa and let him keep his throne, he would still have to honor his promise of a kingdom to Vibhīṣaṇa. This idea is in sharp contrast to a well-attested northern insertion [644*] in which Rāma enjoins Rāvaṇa to save his life by returning Sītā while forfeiting his throne.

57. Expanding on his comments to verse 56, Cg notes that in this verse Rāma outlines what he is going to do should Rāvaṇa not seek refuge with him. Even should Rāvaṇa take refuge, Rāma would spare only his life but would not permit him to retain his kingdom (śaraṇāgatyakaraṇe svakartavyam āha . . . [dharmātmeti] . . . yadvā śaraṇāgatau prāṇatrāṇaṃ kariṣyāmi na tu rājyaṃ dāsyāmīty abhiprāyeṇāha).

"The foremost of rākṣasas, righteous-minded . . . Endowed with majesty" dharmātmā rakṣasāṃ śreṣṭhaḥ . . . śrīmān: Ct and Ck argue that these generic modifiers have particular reference here to the propriety of Vibhīṣaṇa's succession. Thus, Ct argues that righteous-mindedness, or the quality of holding righteousness as foremost, is a prime prerequisite for kingship. Ct goes on to suggest that by the phrase rakṣasāṃ śreṣṭhaḥ, "foremost among the rākṣasas," it is suggested that the succession of the throne [to Vibhīṣaṇa] after you [Rāvaṇa] is legitimate. Ct finally suggests that śrīmān, "endowed with majesty," indicates that Vibhīṣaṇa possesses all the auspicious marks that indicate accession to kingship. (dharmātmā dharmapradhāno nityaṃ dharmacittaś ca. idam aiśvaryasya sākṣān nidānam. rākṣasaśreṣṭha ity anena tvadanantaraṃ nyāyaprāptaṃ tasya rājyam iti darśitam. śrīmān ity anena tadaiśvaryaprāpakāśeṣalakṣaṇavattvam.) Cg understands these terms similarly.

"come over to me" saṃprāptaḥ: Literally, "[he] has come." Following Ct, Cg, Ck, Cv, and Cm, we have supplied the pronoun mām, "to me." We thus read the adjective, as do Cm, Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 247), Dutt (1893, p. 1219), Pagani (1999, p. 963), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 99), as a reference to Vibhīṣaṇa's defection to Rāma. Ct, Cg, Ck, and Cv interpret the adjective more strongly as a reference to Vibhīṣaṇa's having taken refuge (śaraṇāgataḥ/prapannaḥ) with Rāma. A few translators take the participle to refer simply to Vibhīṣaṇa's having arrived at the gates of Laṅkā. Thus, Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1509) renders, "has arrived here (with me)"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 116), "que voici"; and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 100), "who is here." See note to verse 56 above.

"secure" dhruvam: We understand the term here as an adjective modifying aiśvaryam, "lordship." It can also be understood, as other translators have done (Gita Press 1969, vol. 3, p. 1509; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 99; Dutt 1893, p. 1219; Pagani 1999, p. 963; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 116; and Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 100), as an adverb modifying prāpnoti, "he shall obtain," and having the sense "surely or certainly." Ct and Cm understand the word adverbially as well.

"unchallenged" akaṇṭakam: Literally, "without thorns," i.e., "without obstacles or hindrances." Here we agree with Ct and Ck, who gloss, "devoid of an obstacle in the form of you [Rāvaṇa] (tvadrūpakaṇṭakarahitam).

58. "unrestrained" avijitātmanā: Literally, "[by you] not having conquered your mind." D5,7,9–11,T1–3,M3–5, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead aviditātmanā. Cg, the only commentator to remark on this term, interprets it as if it were the critical reading, glossing, "[by one] whose mind is not under his own control (asvādhīnamanaskena)." The opposite of this term, viditātman, is often used of Rāma and normally means either "well-known, celebrated" or "knowing one's self." See 6.24.7 and note, where we have translated the term as "ever-vigilant." Translators who follow the texts of Ct and Cg tend to render the compound as "not knowing one's self." Pagani (1999, p. 963), understanding as Cg does, renders, "qui ne se maîtrise pas," as if reading avijitātmanā. In her note on the term, however, she translates, "qui ne se connaît pas lui-même." She points out that this epithet corresponds to the one used of Rāma, "he who knows the self (viditātman)." If, Pagani continues, Rāma is the good king par excellence, then Rāvaṇa is his complete opposite (p. 1660). See notes to 6.24.7 and 6.92.25.

"surround yourself with fools" mūrkhasahāyena: Literally, "[by you] having fools for companions." Cr explains, "by you, who are characterized by undiscriminating companions (avivekisahāyaviśiṣṭena tvayā)," while Cs says, "by this term is suggested that 'the counselors [literally, speakers] in your presence are not great' (mahānto na santi vaktāras tava samīpa iti sūcyate)."

59. "So" vā: Literally, "or." The critical reading is shared by Cg, Cr, and Cm, who appear to understand the term as suggesting that, for Rāvaṇa, battle is an alternative to seeking refuge with Rāma. For example, Cg introduces his gloss by saying, "If you bring Sītā, seek refuge [with me], and hand the kingdom over to Vibhīṣaṇa, then I will spare your life; otherwise, you must fight (sītām ādāya śaraṇam āgato 'si ced vibhīṣaṇāya rājyaṃ dattvā tvatprāṇān rakṣāmy anyathā yudhyasva)." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead the pronoun mā, "[fight] me." These two commentators insist that this poorly attested reading is the authentic one (pāṅktaḥ pāṭhaḥ).

"slain" śāntaḥ: Literally, "calmed, pacified." We follow the commentators who interpret the term as "finished off (samāptaḥ—so Ct, Ck)"; "dead (mṛtaḥ—so Cg, Cr)"; or "slain (hataḥ—so Cm)."

"purified" pūtaḥ: Cg, who shares the critical reading, understands the reference in the context of the ancient Indian code of the warrior, according to which death faced bravely in battle cleanses one of all sins (yuddha aparavṛttyā mṛteḥ sarvapāpaprāyaścittatvād iti bhāvaḥ). Cf. BhagGī 2.37 (hato vā prāpsyasi svargaṃ jitvā vā bhoksyase mahīm / tasmād uttiṣṭha kaunteya yuddhāya kṛtaniścayaḥ). D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read a second śāntaḥ for pūtaḥ. They are, however, forced to read the second occurrence of the adjective in the sense of pūtaḥ, "purified of sins." Unlike Cg, however, Ct and Ck understand Rāvaṇa's purification to be the result not so much of his heroic death as his having been slain at the hands of the Vaiṣṇava avatāra. Ct, for example, glosses the second śāntaḥ as "[you will be] purified of the sins committed since birth (ājanmakṛtāt pāpāt pūto [bhavisyasi])" and notes that we are to understand that the true purpose of the avatāra is purification of sin through the means of direct vision and the recollection of his name (darśananāmasmaraṇaiḥ pāpaśodhanaphalaka evāyam avatāras tattvena jñāyate). Ct further notes that, even should Rāvaṇa lack this understanding of the [saving power of the] avatāra, he would still, if killed by Rāma, be reborn after some interval in a noble kshatriya family (tathā jñānābhāve 'pi matto maraṇe kiṃcit kālottaram uttamakṣatriyakule janmaprāptir iti bhāvaḥ). Evidently, this is a reference to the Vaiṣṇava tradition that Rāvaṇa would one day be reborn as Śiśupāla. See note to 5.16.5. Cr similarly interprets the second śāntaḥ in the sense of "free from crime and sins (aparādhapāparahitaḥ)" but does not indicate why he believes that this purification will take place, noting merely that the statement is a hint to Rāvaṇa not to attempt to flee (etena palāyanaṃ na kartavyam iti sūcitam).

60. The image is not as fanciful as it may seem. For the situation described is identical to the one narrated at 5.36.16–32, where Rāma's divinely charged weapon pursues a mischievous crow throughout the three worlds.

"swift as thought" manojavaḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead niśācara, "O night-roaming [rākṣasa]!"

61. "prepare yourself for the next world" kriyatām aurdhvadehikam: The most literal interpretation of this phrase would be, "perform your funeral rites," and, indeed, this is the way most translators have rendered it. Of the commentators consulted, however, only Cg is content to take aurdhvadehikam in its usual sense of "funerary rites." Like us, however, he is concerned, perhaps, at the peculiarity of the notion of someone performing one's own funeral. He explains as follows: "Since, by my making the [world] free from rākṣasas (see verse 56 above), there will be no one to perform your commemorative rites (śrāddha), you had better perform 'a memorial for the living' yourself (arākṣasakaraṇena śrāddhakartrabhāvāt svayam eva jīvacchrāddhaṃ kuru ity arthaḥ)." The other commentators, however, understand the term here not so much as a technical term for a funeral but rather, on the basis of the literal meaning of ūrdhvadeha as "that which comes after the body," as a reference to the afterlife. They then interpret aurdhvadehika, the derivative of this term, as "that which prepares one for the afterlife, e.g., charity, etc." (dehād ūrdhvaṃ prāpta ūrdhvadehaḥ. paralokas tatra hitaṃ dānādikam aurdhvadehikam—so Ct.)

"a good long look" sudṛṣṭā kriyatām: Literally, "make [Laṅkā] well looked upon." We share the view of the majority of the commentators that the idea here is that Rāvaṇa had best take a last look at his capital as he is about to die and hence will see it no more (itaḥ paraṃ darśanābhāvāt—so Ct). Cg interprets the phrase more specifically as a reference to the fact that, in their restlessness, people at the point of death gaze upon the faces of their sons, wives, etc. (mriyamāṇā hi cāpalena putrakalatrādimukhadarśanaṃ kurvanti tadvad iti bhāvah)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 117) idiosyncratically renders, "laisse Lankā retrouver sa splendeur." In this he is followed word for word by Pagani (1999, p. 963). Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 100) similarly renders, "Let Lanka regain her splendour."

"Your life is in my hands." jīvitaṃ te mayi sthitam: Literally, "Your life rests on me."

62. "Tārā's son, Aṅgada" tāreyaḥ: Literally, "the son of Tārā."

"sped on his way" jagāma: Literally, "he went."

"incarnate" mūrtimān: Literally, "possessing bodily form." Ct and Ck understand, "in the guise of a monkey (vānaraveṣaḥ)." Cg explains, "possessing an arrangement of hands, feet, etc. (karacaraṇādisaṃsthānavān)."

63. "Reaching" atipatya: Literally, "having leapt or flown over." We follow Cr and Cg, who gloss, "having gone to (gatvā)" and "having reached (prāpya)," respectively. Ct, Ck, and Cm, also concerned about the unusual usage, supply, as an object of the gerund, mārgam, "way, path," thus giving the sense "traversing the way [to Rāvaṇa's palace.]"

"the majestic monkey" saḥ . . . śrīmān: Literally, "he, the majestic one." Cg argues that the use of the word "majestic (śrīmān)" here indicates that the monkey was very excited (anena harṣavattvam ucyate).

64. Aṅgada, with his golden armlets" aṅgadaḥ kanakāṅgadaḥ: Here the poet plays with the repetition of the word "aṅgada" as the monkey's name and as the term for an armlet.

65. "in his own words" ātmanā: Literally, "by himself."

"repeated" śrāvayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused [him] to hear."

"speech . . . neither adding nor omitting anything" –vacanam . . . anyūnādhikam: Literally, "speech that was neither reduced nor expanded."

"to Rāvaṇa and his ministers" sāmātyam: Literally, "[to him] along with his ministers."

66. "perhaps you have heard of me" yadi te śrotram āgataḥ: Literally, "if [I] have come to your hearing." Ct, Cm, and Ck are perhaps correct in taking this formulaic expression somewhat ironically to mean, in effect, "no doubt you must have heard of me." These commentators understand the conditional particle yadi, "if," to be an expression of doubt used in a situation that admits of no doubt as, for example, in the expression "if the vedas be authoritative." They thus explain that Aṅgada has no need of describing to Rāvaṇa his own powers and that of his allies, since these must already be known to the rākṣasas. (yadīty asaṃdigdhe saṃdigdhavacanaṃ vedāḥ pramāṇaṃ ced itivat. śrotram āgata eva. etena svasya svīyānāṃ ca balādi tubhyaṃ na vācyam eva tvayā jñātatvād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.) Cr and Cg, however, take the expression more literally. The former glosses, "Perhaps (kadācit) you have heard of me. The sense is 'You have heard.' (yadi kadācit te śrotram āgataḥ. śruta ity arthaḥ.)" The latter reads the expression as an interrogative, "Have you heard of me (māṃ śrutavān asi kim)?" This expression is seen elsewhere in Vālmīki in situations where strangers introduce themselves. Cf. 3.21.24 and GPP 3.17.21.

67. "lowest of men" puruṣādhama: This seems an odd epithet to use of a rākṣasa. V,B1,2,D0,1,3,4,6,7,10,11,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead puruṣo bhava, "be a man," which, according to some commentators, is used in much the same way as the English expression "Go ahead, be a hero." ("You will become a eunuch [klībatvaṃ prāpsyasi—so Cr]"; "Be a hero [śūro bhava—Ct, Cg].") Cg, the only commentator to acknowledge the critical reading as a variant, explains it as follows: "Since you do not come forth even when your city is besieged, surely you are the lowest of men (puroparodhe 'py anirgamane nūnaṃ puruṣādhama evāsīti bhāvaḥ)."

68. "all your kinsmen" -jñātibāndhavam: Either term, jñāti or bāndhava, may refer to kinsmen in general (cf. 5.1.43 and 6.10.3). When used together, as here, the former refers to paternal male kin and the latter to maternal male kin.

69. "thorn that you are in the side of" tvām . . . kaṇṭakam: Literally, "you, a thorn."

"of the gods, dānavas, yakṣas, gandharvas, great serpents, and rākṣasas." devadānava-yakṣāṇāṃ gandharvoragarakṣasām: This conventionalized list of supernatural beings has been used apparently without concern for the fact that Rāvaṇa would not normally be regarded as an enemy to his own kind.

70. "If you do not give back Vaidehī, after first begging her forgiveness and falling at my feet" na cet satkṛtya vaidehīṃ praṇipatya pradāsyasi: Literally, "if you do not give Vaidehī, after honoring and prostrating." Ct and Ck gloss the word satkṛtya, normally "having honored," as kṣamāpanaṃ kṛtvā, "having begged forgiveness." The syntax of this first line is ambiguous, as it does not specify the object or objects of the two gerunds. Commentators and translators, therefore, tend to differ somewhat in their reading of the line. Cm (similarly Dutt 1893, p. 1220 and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 248) understands the object of both gerunds to be "me (mām)," i.e., Rāma. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 100) renders, "If you do not pray for my forgiveness and restore Vaidehī to me." Ct and Ck construe satkṛtya with the accusative vaidehīm and praṇipatya with a supplied mām, "me," i.e., Rāma. They are followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1520), Pagani (1999, p. 964), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 117), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 100).

71. "transported with rage" amarṣavaśam āpannaḥ: Literally, "went to the influence of anger."

72. "His eyes red with rage" roṣatāmrākṣaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead roṣam āpannaḥ, "enraged." See 6.19.22–23; 6.35.11; 6.42.26; and 6.50.9. Cf. 6.27.2; 6.46.14; 6.50.11; and notes.

"fool" durmedhāḥ: Cg understands the epithet to refer not to Aṅgada but to Rāvaṇa in the sense of "ignorant of the śāstraic ordinance that a messenger must not be slain. (durmedhā durbuddhiḥ. na dūto vadhya iti śāstrānabhijña ity arthaḥ.)" Cg does allow for the alternative reading, as in our translation (yadvā durmedhā ity aṅgadam evāha). (Cf. 5.50.1–11 and notes, where Rāvaṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa debate over the propriety of killing Hanumān, who is Rāma's messenger.)

73. "four" catvāraḥ: Cs claims that the four were able to act simultaneously by each seizing, respectively, one of Aṅgada's arms or shoulders. (rākṣasāḥ vacaḥ śrutveva jagṛhuḥ. caturṣv aṅgeṣu skandhabhujeṣu pārśvadvayavartiṣv iti saṃbhavaty aikakaṇṭhyam.) Cs quotes the parallel passage from the Rāmopākhyāna (MBh 3.268.18), where, acting on Rāvaṇa's gestures alone, four rākṣasas seize Aṅgada, as birds might seize a tiger. We see in verse 75 below that the rākṣasas have seized Aṅgada's arms.

"Aṅgada" tam: Literally, "him."

74. "freely" svayam . . . ātmanā: Literally, "on his own . . . by himself." This somewhat redundant expression is avoided in a number of manuscripts (B2,4,D5–7,9–11,T1,2,G1,M1–3) and in the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, Cg, and Crā, which replace ātmanā with the adjective ātmavān, "self-possessed, self-controlled." The critical apparatus, apparently in error, attributes the critical reading to Cg, despite the fact that his commentary and the printed editions of his text all read with the vulgate. According to the editorial principles laid out in the Bālakāṇḍa for the critical edition, this pāda should most likely be marked as uncertain. (See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv.)

"yātudhānas" yātudhāna-: A type of rākṣasa. See 6.3.27 and note.

75. "leapt to the top of the palace" prāsādam . . . utpapāta: Literally, "he leapt up to the palace."

"those rākṣasas" tān: Literally, "them."

"locusts" patagān: The word normally refers principally to birds, and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 100), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1510), and Gorresio (1865, vol. 9, p. 248) have translated accordingly. We believe, however, that here the word can be used synonymously with pataṃga, "flying insect, moth, locust, bird, flying animal," which we think fits the context much better. This idea also seems to have occurred to Dutt (1893, p. 1221), who, alone among the translators, renders, "like insects." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 117), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 101) and Pagani (1999, p. 964), inexplicably translates, "serpents." Perhaps he has mistakenly read pannagān, unattested in the critical apparatus and the texts and printed editions consulted. The commentators are silent on this point, and the manuscripts consulted are remarkably free from variants, except for D4, which reads nāgān patagarāḍ iva, "like [Garuḍa] the king of birds [carrying] serpents."

76. "Shaken loose by his speed, all four rākṣasas fell from the sky" te 'ntarikṣād vinirdhūtās tasya vegena rākṣasāḥ / . . . sarve: Literally, "shaken off by [his] speed, all the rākṣasas [fell] from the sky." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read tasyotpatanavegena nirdhūtās tatra rākṣasāḥ . . . [nipatitāḥ] "shaken off by the speed of his flight there . . . the rākṣasas [fell]" for pādas ab.

77. "as he landed on the pinnacle of the palace . . . it crumbled" prāsādaśikharam . . . tat paphāla tadākrāntam: Literally, "trodden by him, the pinnacle of that palace burst." A variety of northern and southern manuscripts (Ñ1,V1,3, D0,2,4,5,7,9,13,T2,3,G3,M3) as well as the printed editions of Cg (VSP and KK) read instead padākrāntam, "trodden or struck by his foot." Among the translators consulted, this reading is followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 100), who renders, "dislodged with a kick."

Following 77ab, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [652*]: "The valorous son of Vālin saw[1] [the pinnacle of the palace] of the rākṣasa lord."

[1]"saw" dadarśa: Among the commentators who mention this passage, only Cg and Cm read with the critical edition. Ck, Ct, and Cr substitute cakrāma, "he trod upon." Cm mentions this as an alternative reading.

Following verse 77, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [653*]: "Just as long ago the peak of the Himalayas was shattered by the thunderbolt (vajra)."

78. Following verse 78, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of two lines [663*]: "Distressing all the rākṣasas and delighting the monkeys, he returned to Rāma's side in the midst of the monkeys."

79. "foreseeing his own destruction" vināśam . . . ātmanaḥ paśyan: Cm, Ck, and Ct express Rāvaṇa's gloomy thought as follows: " 'This creature has single-handedly humiliated my entire army and escaped with impunity. With so many of his kind bent on my destruction, how can I possibly survive?' Thus did he reflect. (paśyann eko 'pi samagraṃ mama balaṃ parābhūya nirbhayaṃ gacchati. evaṃvidheṣv anekeṣu mannāśodyateṣu kathaṃ jīvanam iti paryālocayann ity arthaḥ—so Ct and Cm.)" Ck reads a slight variant of the above.

81–82. "the tawny monkey" hariḥ . . . kapiḥ: Literally, "the tawny [monkey] . . . monkey." The two verses naturally form a single syntactic unit. Two of the commentators, however, Cr and Cg, wish to take the two verses as independent sentences, supplying the copula "he was (abhavat—Cr; babhūva—Cg)." This would yield the sense "Suṣeṇa . . . was surrounded." Cg makes his reason for this awkward breaking of the verses explicit by noting, "if one construes the two verses as a single sentence, there is redundancy of the terms hariḥ and kapiḥ (uttaraślokenaikavākyatve harikapiśabdayoḥ paunaruktyaṃ syāt)." Because we believe that the syntax is more compelling than the issue of redundancy, we have resolved the problem by taking the term hari in its adjectival sense of "tawny."

"made a tour . . . passes" paryākramata: Literally, "he circumambulated." We have rendered this as two separate verbs, in keeping with the force of the simile. Ct and Ck note that Suṣeṇa makes his tour in order to see to the protection of the entire army, as well as to gather intelligence from all the gates of the citadel (sarvabalarakṣārthaṃ sarvadvāravṛttāntagrahaṇārthaṃ ca).

"of all four city gates" caturdvārāṇi sarvāṇi: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sa tu dvārāṇi saṃyamya, "but he, having controlled or blockaded the gates." Translators who share this reading render the gerund variously. Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1511) renders most literally, "having controlled," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 118), followed by Pagani (1999, p. 964), renders, "surveillait." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 101) translates, "patrolled."

83–84. "hundreds of battalions" akṣauhiṇiśatam: Literally, "one hundred akṣauhiṇīs." The word akṣauhiṇī is a technical term from ancient Indian military texts, where it refers to a vast fourfold military force consisting of 21,870 chariots, an equal number of elephants, 65,610 cavalry, and 109,350 infantry. Clearly this term cannot be applied in its technical sense to an undifferentiated mass of weaponless monkey warriors. Ct and Cm explain that here the term merely indicates a number, i.e., the total number of warriors in an akṣauhiṇī (218,700). Since even a hundred such divisions would not nearly approximate the vast number of monkeys mentioned earlier in the kāṇḍa (6.15.25; 6.19.4; and notes), these same commentators explain the number śatam, "one hundred," here as expressing an endless number (yāvanto 'kṣauhiṇyāṃ gajāśvarathipadātayas tat saṃkhyā vānarā ity arthaḥ śataśabdo 'nantavācī—so Ct). We have compromised somewhat by translating śatam in the plural. See notes to 6.4.24.

"filled with excitement" harṣam evopapedire: Literally, "they went to excitement." Cr explains that some of the rākṣasas, remembering their joy in other battles, are once again filled with the thrill of combat (anyasamaraharṣasmaraṇād dharṣam evopapedire). Cg understands that these are the "steadfast or courageous (dhīrāḥ), while the others are less brave (adhīrāḥ)."

85. "gazed upon what appeared to be a wall of monkeys" dadṛśuḥ . . . prākāraṃ vānarīkṛtam: Literally, "they saw a rampart that had been turned into monkeys." The commentators are divided as to how to interpret this colorful expression. Ct, Cr, and Ck seem to feel that [because of the large numbers of monkeys swarming over the city walls, the rampart] itself appears to be made of monkeys (vānararūpanirmitarūpam—so Ct). Ck clarifies this with an example of a mountain of rocks, etc. (śilādigirir iva vānaranirmitarūpam ivety arthaḥ). Several translators have followed this interpretation. Thus Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 101) translates, "the ramparts one mass of monkeys," and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1511), "the defensive wall converted (as it were) into monkeys (themselves)." Dutt (1893, p. 1222) translates, "the wall thronging with monkeys," and notes, "A translator cannot help a feeling of disappointment at the difference—to the disadvantage of English—between Sanskrit and English. The original for 'thronging with monkeys' is a verbal attributive—vānarikrita—lit. monkeyed." Cg, whom we have followed, understands that the huge mass of monkeys in the space beyond the city walls gives rise to the impression on the part of the rākṣasas that there is, in fact, a second wall consisting of monkeys (vānarapracuratayā kṛtam aparam iva prākāraṃ dadṛśur ity arthaḥ). This interpretation is represented in the translation of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 118), who has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 101) and Pagani (1999, p. 965).

Following verse 85, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [673*]: "Addled with fear,[1] the rākṣasas cried out, 'Alas! Alas.'" This line has been inserted by the southern redactors perhaps to provide a smoother transition to the following verse, which alludes to an uproar that is mentioned nowhere in either the critical or the northern text.

[1]"Addled with fear" bhayamohitāḥ: Literally, "bewildered by fear." D6,7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bhayam āgatāḥ, "became frightened."

86. "the fierce winds at the end of a cosmic age" yugāntavātāḥ: The mythical winds and fires that bring about universal destruction at the end of a cosmic age (yuga) are a favorite object of comparison for the poet (cf. 6.14.14).

"in the rākṣasa capital" rākṣasarājadhānyām: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead rākṣasarājayodhāḥ, "the soldiers of the rākṣasa king."

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 32

Cg tells us that this sarga marks the beginning of the battle (yuddhārambhaḥ). See note to 6.4.4.

2. "doubling his defensive arrangements" vidhānaṃ dviguṇaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made the arrangements double." The commentators agree that the reference is to the defensive preparations of the city. Ct and Ck specify that the reference is to the defenses of the city gates (dvārāṇāṃ rakṣāvidhānam ity arthaḥ—so Ct). V1,3,B1,D8, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr (NSP, GPP; unnoted by the critical edition) read, in pāda c, a second śrutvā, "having heard," for kṛtvā, "having made." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1893, p. 1222) appears to render this reading, translating, "hearing that double arrangements had been made (by Rāma) in guarding the gateways." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 119), followed as is often the case by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 102) and Pagani (1999, p. 965), translates, "réitéra ses ordres précédents."

"he climbed up to the terrace of the palace" prāsādaṃ so 'dhyarohata: Literally, "he climbed or ascended the palace." See 6.62.6 and notes.

3. "together with its hills, parks, and woodlands" saśailavanakānanām: See 6.31.46.

4. "entire" sarvām: Ś,Ñ2,V1,D7–12,T2,G1, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sarvaiḥ, yielding the sense "[swallowed up] . . . by all [the tawny monkeys]."

"swallowed up" kavalīkṛtām: Literally, "made into a mouthful." Cg, the only commentator to address this reading, glosses, "covered (ācchāditām—KK)." A number of southern manuscripts (D7,9–11, G1,M1,2) and the texts and printed editions of Cm,

Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead kapilīkṛtām, "made tawny." These commentators and Cg, who notes this as a variant, gloss, "turned tawny by the color of the monkeys (vānaravarṇena kapilīkṛtām—so Cg)." The critical editors have marked the syllable -va- of kavalī- as uncertain, despite the fact that the entire north, and all but four southern manuscripts and two devanāgarī manuscripts, read kapilī-. We feel that, given the textual evidence, the critical edition's reading should perhaps be emended to read kapilī-. Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 101), a staunch follower of Cg, renders the critical reading, translating, "gobbled up."

5. "wide-eyed" āyatalocanaḥ: This epithet is most frequently used to indicate the beauty of someone's eyes. Here, however, we are inclined to agree with Cg, who sees it as expressing Rāvaṇa's great astonishment (anena vismayātiśaya ucyate).

Following verse 5, D5–7,9–11,T1,3,G,M1,3,5 insert, while M2 inserts after 5ab, a passage of fourteen lines [676*]: "In great delight Rāma and his army advanced rapidly.[1] He gazed upon Laṅkā, which was surrounded by rākṣasas and defended on every side.[1–2] As Rāma Dāśarathi gazed upon Laṅkā with its various banners and flags, he turned his thoughts to Sītā with a grieving heart [3–4]: 'Here is where the fawn-eyed daughter of Janaka is tormented on my account, burning with sorrow, emaciated and lying on the bare ground.'[5–6] Brooding about Vaidehī in her torment, that righteous man quickly ordered the monkeys to slaughter his enemies.[7–8] As soon as Rāma, tireless in action, had issued his orders, the leaping monkeys roared out lionlike roars in great delight.[2] [9–10] All the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys resolved, 'We must smash Laṅkā with mountain peaks or even with our fists!'[11–12] Hefting mountain peaks and huge boulders, and ripping up various trees, the leaders of the troops of tawny monkeys took up their positions.[13–14]"

[1]"advanced rapidly" pupluve: Literally, "he jumped, he bounded." The commentators are disturbed at the notion of Rāma leaping along and explain that this is a figurative usage, expressive of the fact that he is being carried by the leaping monkeys (rāmādhirūḍhavānaraplavanaṃ rāme upacaryate—so Ct).

[2]"the leaping monkeys roared out lionlike roars in great delight" saṃharṣamāṇāḥ plavagāḥ siṃhanādair anādayan: D6,7,9–11,M3 read saṃgharṣamāṇāḥ, "competing with or rivaling [one another]," for samharṣamāṇāḥ, "in great delight," while D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read apūrayan, "they filled," for anādayan, "they roared." This reading requires supplementation with a direct object, such as "the air, the atmosphere, Laṅkā, etc."

6. "As the rākṣasa lord stood watching" prekṣato rākṣasendrasya: Literally, "as the rākṣasa lord looked on." We agree with Ct, Ck, and Cg, who understand this to be a genitive of disrespect (anādare ṣaṣṭhī), glossing, "paying no heed to him who was watching (prekṣamāṇam anādṛtya—so Cg)."

"division after division" bhāgaśaḥ: Literally, "in sections or section by section." Cg explains, "each at its own assigned spot (svasvaniyuktapradeśe)."

"began to scale the walls of Laṅkā" laṅkām āruruhuḥ: Literally, "they climbed Laṅkā." As the commentators point out, the reference is to the ramparts of Laṅkā (laṅkāṃ laṅkāprākāram—so Cg).

7. "Willing to lay down their lives" tyaktajīvitāḥ: Literally, "who had given up their lives." Several of the commentators indicate in various ways that the past participle tyakta- is to be read with a sense of futurity (āśaṃsāyāṃ bhūtavac ceti ktaḥ). See Pā 3.3.132.

"armed with sāla and palmyra trees as well as boulders" sālatālaśilāyudhāḥ: Literally, "having sāla trees, palmyra trees, and stones for weapons." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead sālabhūdharayodhinaḥ, "those fighters with sāla trees and mountains."

8. "the lofty tops of palaces and" prāsādāgrāṇi coccāni: There is considerable variation in the manuscript evidence here, which has led the critical editors to mark the -sāda- of the word prāsāda- and the cocc[ā]- of coccāni as uncertain. B1,D7–11, Gorresio, and the texts and printed editions of Ck, Ct, and Cr read instead prākārāgrāṇy asaṃkhyāni. This would then best be construed with pāda d and translated as, "the tops of ramparts and countless [gateway arches]." M3 and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead prākārāgrāṇy araṇyāni, which would mean "the tops of the ramparts and the forest groves."

10. "troop leaders" yūthapāḥ: A number of manuscripts, both northern and southern, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead vānarāḥ, "monkeys." This has led the critical editors to mark the word as uncertain.

11–12. "the leaping monkeys" plavaṅgamāḥ . . . plavaṅgamāḥ: The noun occurs in both verses. However, as Cg also notes, because the two verses form a single syntactic unit (kāñcanānītyādiślokadvayam), we have translated accordingly, dropping one occurrence to avoid redundancy.

"jumping back and forth" āplavantaḥ plavantaś ca: We agree with Cg in taking the upasarga "ā" in its normal sense with a verb of motion as reversing the direction of that motion. Cg glosses, "going and coming (gamanāgamane kurvantaḥ)." The idea is perhaps that the monkeys rush forward with stones, etc., to attack the battlements and then rush back for more ammunition. Ct and Cm understand āplavantaḥ to mean "jumping about (samantāt plavantaḥ)" and plavantaḥ as "jumping toward the ramparts (prākārābhimukhaṃ plavantaḥ)." Cr's interpretation is similar, except that he glosses, "running all around (āplavantaḥ sarvataḥ paridhāvantaḥ)." Ck gives a slightly more expansive version, explaining that, after jumping all about, the monkeys gather at a single point and then leap toward the city walls (āplavantaḥ āsamantāt plavantaḥ, ekatrasthitvā prākārābhimukhaṃ plavantaḥ).

"resembled the peaks of Mount Kailāsa" kailāsaśikharābhāni: D7,10,11,13, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead kailāsaśikharāgrāṇi, "the tops of the peaks of Mount Kailāsa," forcing those commentators who have this reading to make explicit the now implicit, and somewhat different, simile, glossing, "towers as uneven in height as the peaks of Mount Kailāsa (kailāsaśikharāgrāṇi tadvad uccāvacāni gopurāṇi—so Ct)."

15. "forest-ranging" vanagocaraḥ: The word -gocaraḥ, "range," is marked as doubtful by the critical editors. A number of manuscripts (Ś1,Ñ2,V1,2,D2,8,12,13,G1) read instead the plural -gocarāḥ, which would extend the kenning to all three of the monkeys. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the name of a fourth monkey, Panasa (panasas tathā). It is doubtful whether the entire word -gocaraḥ should be marked as uncertain. Given the lack of substantial variation, at most one would expect that only the final syllable, "-aḥ," would be so marked.

"made a breach in the rampart" nipīḍya . . . prākāram: Literally, "having injured or oppressed the rampart." We follow Ct and Ck, who gloss, "after breaching the outer rampart so that their army could enter, they stationed themselves there (senā-praveśārthaṃ bahiḥ prākāraṃ bhaṅktvā sthitāḥ)."

16. "At that juncture" etasminn antare: We agree with the commentators in interpreting this as a reference to the interval of time during or after which the wall has been breached (bahiḥ prākāraṃ bhaṅktvā senā praveśasamaye—so Ct, Ck). It could also conceivably refer spatially to the breach itself, in the sense of "in or near the breach."

"a bridgehead" skandhāvāraniveśanam: We agree with the majority of the commentators in understanding this term to refer to an encampment at which troops are put into battle formations (skandhāvārasya senāniveśasya niveśanaṃ vyūhabhāvena sthāpanam—so Ct). Cg offers this as his second interpretation, suggesting first that a skandhāvāra is instead a camp established for the rest and relaxation of troops during lulls or intervals of battle (yuddhe 'ntarāntarā viśramārthaṃ vāsasthānaṃ skandhāvāraḥ).

17. "all with a victorious air" jitakāśibhiḥ: Literally, "having the appearance or air of victors." Vālmīki is fond of this phrase; see 6.42.9–10; 6.44.36; 6.49.36; 6.78.38; and notes.

"the eastern gate" pūrvadvāram: The commentators are concerned by Kumuda's assignment here, since it was earlier stated (at 6.28.25 and 6.31.28) that the monkey general Nīla was the officer in charge at the eastern gate. They explain that we are to understand the directions in this passage to refer not directly to the cardinal compass points, which have already been assigned, but to the intermediate points, where the monkeys will reinforce and support the detachments mentioned at sarga 28 (atra pūrvādiśabdā agnyādikoṇaparāḥ pūrvādiṣu nīlādīnāṃ sthāpanasya prāg uktatvāt—so Cr). In the case of Kumuda, Cg states that, having been stationed at the northeast quarter (aiśāna), he advances toward the eastern gate and stations himself there (īśānakoṇe sthitvā pūrvadvāram ākramya sthitavān ity arthaḥ).

Following verse 17, D6,7,9–11,T,G1,2,M insert a passage of two lines [683*]: "In order to assist him, the tawny monkey Praghasa [D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr read Prasabha] was posted there, as was great-armed Panasa surrounded by many monkeys."

18. "the southern gate" dakṣiṇadvāram: According to Cg, we are to understand that Śatabali, having been stationed in the southeast quarter, now proceeds toward the southern gate and stops (āgneyakoṇe sthitvā dakṣiṇadvāram ākramya sthitavān ity arthaḥ). This is similar to Cg's explanation of Kumuda's position in verse 17 above. Recall that, at 6.28.26 and 6.31.29, Aṅgada was assigned to the southern gate.

"two hundred million troops" viṃśatyā koṭibhiḥ: Literally, "with twenty koṭis."

19. According to Cg, Suṣeṇa had been in the nairṛti, or southwest quarter, and then proceeded to the west (paścimadvāraṃ gata āvṛtya tasthau nairṛtakoṇe sthitvā paścimadvāram ākramya sthitavān ity arthaḥ). Note that Hanumān had been assigned to the western gate at 6.28.27 and 6.31.30, while at 6.31.81–82 Suṣeṇa was said to have made a tour of all four city gates.

"the . . . tawny monkey" hariḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead balī, "powerful," which is redundant in light of the synonymous balavān, "powerful," in pāda c.

"six hundred million troops" ṣaṣṭikoṭibhiḥ: Literally, "with sixty koṭis." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead koṭikoṭibhiḥ, "with a koṭi of koṭis." This minor variant yields the astronomical figure of 10^{14}, or one hundred trillion.

20. Ct and Cg understand that Sugrīva was assigned to the vāyavya, or northwest quarter, on the basis of 6.31.34, where it states that Sugrīva, along with others, was encamped a little to the west of where Rāma was stationed, i.e., in the north. Cg quotes 6.31.34 in full, commenting that, as in the case of Kumuda and the rest, Sugrīva's being posted in an intermediate position explains the reference to his blockading the gate stationed in the principal direction, here the north (vāyavyakoṇe sthitasya sugrīvasya uttaradvāranirodhakatvābhidhānād etadanusāreṇa kumudādīnāṃ tattatkoṇāvasthitatvena tattaddvāranirodhakatvam iti vyākhyātam—Cg).

21. "dreadful to look upon" bhīmadarśanaḥ: Literally, "of a fearful appearance." V3,G1,2,M1,2,5 read instead bhīmavikramaḥ, "of fearsome valor." On the basis of this evidence, the critical editors have marked -darśanaḥ, "appearance," as uncertain. However, it seems that, on the basis of the manuscript evidence, this was an inappropriate choice.

"by ten million troops" koṭyā: Literally, "with a koṭi."

22. "Dhūmra" dhrūmraḥ [sic]: The critical edition, no doubt as the result of a typographical error, not noted in the errata, prints dhrūmraḥ for dhūmraḥ. No printed edition attests such a form, and the critical apparatus makes no mention of such a variant.

"of terrifying speed" bhīmavegānām: V1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead bhīmakopānām, "of terrifying anger."

24. At 6.31.29, Gaja, Gavaya, and Gavākṣa are said to be assigned to guard the southern gate with Aṅgada. At 6.32.21, we see a langur named Gavākṣa standing at Rāma's side. Ct, Cg, and Cm are at pains to assure us that the Gavākṣa mentioned in this verse is different from the one named in verse 21 above (rāmapārśvasthād gavākṣād anyo jñeyaḥ—so Cg).

"patrolled swiftly" paridhāvantaḥ: Literally, "[they] running about."

25. "immediate" drutam: Literally, "swift." We read the term adjectivally with niryāṇam, "sortie." It can also be read, as some translators have done, adverbially with ājñāpayat, "he ordered."

Following verse 25, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [690*]: "The instant they heard those words issue from Rāvaṇa's mouth, the night-roaming rākṣasas uttered dreadful shouts.[1–2] Then at his command[1] the dreadful bherī drums of the rākṣasas—their drum heads white as the moon—were beaten with golden drumsticks on all sides.[3–4] Deafening conches, filled with the breath of those terrible rākṣasas, sounded by the hundreds and thousands.[5–6] With their conches and their dark blue limbs, the color of parrots,[2] the night-roaming rākṣasas resembled storm clouds girt with streaks of lightning and crossed by lines of cranes.[7–8]"

[1]"at his command" pracoditāḥ: Literally, "urged on." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prabodhitāḥ, "awakened."

[2]"With . . . their dark blue limbs, the color of parrots" śukanīlāṅgāḥ: D6,T2,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Gita Press (6.42.36) read instead śubhanīlāṅgāḥ, "[having or with their] splendid, dark blue bodies."

26. "the waves" vegāḥ: Normally, in the context of water, vegaḥ means "stream or current." Ct, whom we have followed, glosses, "waves (taraṅgāḥ)." Cg glosses, "stream or flood in general, or the rising of a body of water (pūrāḥ)."

"at the appointed time" samaye: Literally, "at the time." All the commentators who gloss this elliptical term take it as a reference to the pralaya, or time of universal destruction. Cg alone also offers, as an alternative, "the time of moonrise (candrodaye vā)."

"filled to overflowing" pūryamāṇasya: Literally, "being filled." Ct suggests that we supply the words, "by great storm clouds (mahāmeghaiḥ)." Ck is a bit more explicit, offering, "by the seven great clouds (saptamahāmeghaiḥ)." The idea, of course, is that it is the torrential rains from these clouds that are causing the ocean to spill over its shore.

Following verse 26, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of six lines [692*]: "Then the monkey army let loose a roar on all sides, filling the Malaya mountain together with its slopes, peaks, and caves.[1–2] The sound of conches and war drums, as well as the leonine roars of the swift [monkeys], caused the earth, sky, and ocean to resound.[3–4] [These sounds were] accompanied by the trumpeting of elephants, the neighing of battle-steeds, the rumbling of chariot wheels, and the tramping of the rākṣasas' feet.[5–6]"

27. "between the gods and the asuras" devāsure: Literally, "in that pertaining to the devas and asuras." The expression is somewhat elliptical. Ct, Cm, Cr, and Cg (first alternative) understand this as a reference to the battle or conflict between the gods and the demons (devāsurayuddhe—Cr). Cg, attempting to establish grammatical parallelism, amplifies this by saying that the meaning is "just as in the case of the gods and the asuras at the time of the conflict between the gods and asuras (yathā devāsuravirodhe devānām asurāṇām iva ity arthaḥ)." Cg alternatively explains the expression as involving "the irregular substitution of the locative singular ending 'e' for the genitive plural, referring to Pā 7.1.39 (yadvā ṣaṣṭhībahuvacanasya supāṃ suluk [pūrvasavarṇāc] ityādinā śe-ādeśaḥ)." The critical apparatus quotes Crā as advancing the same argument. (devāsure devāsurāṇām iva. supāṃ suluk pūrvasavarṇāc cheyāsāsyā [ḍāḍyā?]yājāla ityāmaḥ śebhāvaḥ.)

28. "the dreadful rākṣasas" ghorāḥ: Literally, "the dreadful ones." D7,9–11,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the accusative plural sarvān, "all," which would then refer to the monkeys.

29. D5,T1,G (after verse 28); D7,10,11,M1,2,5 (after verse 29); D6,T2,3,M3 (after 649*; see below); and the texts of the southern commentators and all printed editions insert a passage of two lines [693*]: "A great shout of 'Victory to King Sugrīva!' arose. Then, after shouting, 'Be victorious, O king, be victorious!'[1] each recited [literally, 'having recited'] his own name."

[1]" 'Be victorious, O king, be victorious!' " rājañ jaya jaya: Ct, Ck, and Cs, followed by many translators, are of the opinion that the cries of "Be victorious, O king, be victorious" are addressed by the rākṣasa warriors to Rāvaṇa (rājan rāvaṇa jaya jayeti rakṣasām uktiḥ—so Ct). Dutt (1893, p. 1225) believes that, rather than each soldier shouting his own name, the two sides cry out the names of their respective kings.

693*, line 1 [first half] = 6.32.13c.

Following 693*, a few southern manuscripts (D6,T2,3,M3) and VSP (unnumbered, in brackets, between verses 6.42.42 and 43) insert a passage of two lines [694*]: "The immensely powerful monkeys slaughtered the rākṣasas in battle [crying], 'Victory to supremely powerful Rāma and mighty Lakṣmaṇa!' " Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 104) renders this verse.

694*, line 2 = 6.32.13ab.

30. According to Ck, pādas ab are prakṣipta, "interpolated," i.e., spurious. Ct notes Ck's objection and appears to document it by noting that, according to the Mahābhārata version of the battle, several verses of which he quotes (MBh 3.268.40ab–3.269.1ab,3), Rāma orders a withdrawal of the monkey army after it has successfully breached the ramparts. Then a group of invisible rākṣasas harries the monkeys in their camp, until Vibhīṣaṇa destroys their invisibility. Cm and Cs similarly mention Ck's view and likewise quote from the same passage of the Rāmopākhyāna. They note that, even though the withdrawal is not mentioned in the present passage, we must infer it on the basis of the parallel passage from the Mahābhārata. See note to 6.33.2–3.

"short javelins" bhiṇḍipālaiḥ: According to Monier-Williams (s.v.) a bhiṇḍipāla [v.l. bhindipāla, bhiṇḍimāla] is either a short javelin or an arrow thrown from the hand or shot through a tube. Some think, however, that it is more like a slingshot, "a stone fastened to a string, a kind of sling for throwing stones" (Monier-Williams [s.v.]). Cg understands, "a type of mace (gadābheda)." On bhiṇḍipālas, see 6.42.19; 6.53.32; 6.73.20–23; 6.83.25; and notes. Oppert (1880, p. 13) identifies the weapon as "a crooked club" and includes it among the "mukta," or released weapons. Dikshitar (1944, pp. 106, 122) understands the bhiṇḍipāla to be "a heavy club which had a broad and bent tail end, measuring one cubit in length." According to him, it was used on the left foot of a warrior "for cutting, hitting, striking, and breaking." See, too, AgniP 251.15.

31. "leaping monkeys" vānarāḥ . . . plavaṅgamāḥ: Literally, "monkeys . . . going by leaps." Cg and Cm note that, in order to avoid redundancy, we are to read the standard synonym for monkey, plavaṅgamāḥ, with its full force as a descriptive adjective, i.e., "moving by leaps." (plavanaṃ plutagatiṃ gacchantīti plavaṅgamāḥ. asaṃjñāyām api khaśārṣaḥ. anena plutagatimatvam uktam. ato na vānaraśabdena punaruktiḥ—so Cg.)

32. "in which the ground grew thick with flesh and blood" māṃsaśoṇitakardamaḥ: Literally, "having flesh and blood for mud."

"was something unimaginable" adbhutopamaḥ: Literally, "was comparable to a miracle."

Sarga 33

1. "As those . . . monkeys continued to fight" yudhyatāṃ tu tatas teṣāṃ vānarāṇām: We follow the suggestion of Cr, Cg, and Cm, who read the first half of the verse as a genitive absolute construction (vānarāṇāṃ yudhyatāṃ satāṃ—so Cr). According to this reading, it is the monkeys alone who are fighting, while the rākṣasas' fury for battle increases. On the basis of Ck's and Ct's interpretation of balaroṣaḥ (Ct's v.l. for balakopaḥ) as, "the rage produced by the sight of each other's armies (parasparabaladarśanajo roṣaḥ)," it appears that Ck and Ct read the genitive plurals of pādas ab in parallel with the genitive plural, rakṣasām, of pāda c. This interpretation yields the following translation: "A terrible rage at each other's armies then arose among the rākṣasas and the great monkeys as they continued to fight." All translators consulted follow this reading of the verse.

"rage against their army" balakopaḥ: The compound is somewhat ambiguous in its meaning. Ct and Ck, who read the synonymous variant balaroṣaḥ, as noted above, interpret it as "the rage produced by the sight of each other's armies (parasparabaladarśanajo roṣaḥ)." Cr glosses, explicitly, "rage against the monkey army [on the part of the rākṣasas] (vānarasenākopaḥ)." Cg and Cm seem to agree with Cr and gloss, "anger of the army (senāyāḥ kopaḥ)." Cg further notes that the word bala here lacks any specification of the case ending (balety avibhaktikanirdeśaḥ). In other words, as Professor R. K. Sharma points out, the compound exhibits the grammatical defect of asamarthadoṣa, in that the word rakṣasām, "of the rākṣasas," construes with the prior member of the compound, bala-.

2–3. "Those tigers among rākṣasas . . . They were rākṣasas" rākṣasavyāghrāḥ . . . rākṣasāḥ: Cg, the only commentator to read rākṣasavyāghrāḥ, is concerned about the apparent redundancy. He explains that "tigers among rākṣasas" refers to an elite type of rākṣasa but that they still belong to the generic type, and so are referred to by the generic term rākṣasa as well. (rākṣasavyāghrā rākṣasaśreṣṭhāḥ. rākṣasaśreṣṭhatve 'pi jātyantaratvaṃ saṃbhavatīti rākṣasā ity uktam.) D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cr, and Ck make the redundancy still worse, reading rākṣasā vīrāḥ, "rākṣasa heroes," for rākṣasavyāghrāḥ. Cr attempts to deal with the problem by reading the first occurrence of the term rākṣasa as a kind of adjective with the sense "characterized or accompanied by many rākṣasas (bahurākṣasaviśiṣṭāḥ)."

"sallied forth" niryayuḥ: Ct thinks that, by using this verb, Vālmīki is suggesting that there has been a withdrawal of the combatants in the intervening period (anena vālmīkināpi pratyavahāro dhvanitaḥ). See note to 6.32.30, where the commentators infer a pause in the battle at this point. See, too, notes to 6.41.8; 6.49.33; and 6.62.2.

"golden-plumed" kāñcanāpīḍaiḥ: See 6.90.6 and note.

"banners" dhvajaiḥ: A few manuscripts (D9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read gajaiḥ, "elephants," for dhvajaiḥ. Ct, no doubt aware of the awkwardness of the simile comparing elephants to the tongues of a flame, explains that the elephants are as unapproachable as flames (agniśikhopamais tadvad durdharśaiḥ). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 104), who normally follows Cg, seems to have ignored the term entirely, ascribing the adjective agniśikhopamaiḥ to the golden plumes of the horses.

4. "who also desired victory" jayam icchatām: Cr sees this as a reference to the rākṣasas (jayam icchatāṃ rakṣasām).

"who could take on any form at will" kāmarūpiṇām: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Cr, Ck, and Ct read instead ghorakarmaṇām, "of dreadful deeds."

5. "as they hurled themselves at one another" anyonyam abhidhāvatām: Literally, "of them running toward one another." Cm, Ct, and Ck understand that the combatants approach one another for the specific purpose of single combat (dvandvayuddhārtham—so Ct).

"engaged in single combat" dvandvayuddham avartata: Literally, "a paired battle took place."

6. "just as long ago the . . . asura Andhaka fought with three-eyed Śiva" tryambakeṇa yathāndhakaḥ: Literally, "like Andhaka with Tryambaka." Andhaka is one of the great asura enemies of Śiva known from the epics, purāṇas, etc. Tryambaka, literally, "three-eyed one," is a common epithet of Śiva. Cf. 6.81.34.

7. "Saṃpāti . . . fought with Prajañgha" prajañghena ca saṃpātiḥ: Literally, "and Saṃpāti with Prajañgha." The half verse is elliptical, and the verb must be supplied. We carry the verb ayudhyata, "he fought," down from verse 6 above. The identity of these individuals is somewhat unclear. Saṃpāti is the name of one of Vibhīṣaṇa's four companions (6.28.7; cf. 6.11.3; and note to 6.10.12) and this could well be the same individual, as Cg asserts (saṃpātir vibhīṣaṇasacivaḥ). On the other hand, at verse 20 below, Saṃpāti uses an aśvakarṇa tree as a weapon. The use of trees and stones as weapons is characteristic of the monkeys, not the rākṣasa warriors.

Ct, Cr, Ck, and Cg are in agreement that Prajañgha is the name of a rākṣasa. Ct and Ck seek to confirm this by quoting verse 20ab below, where Prajañgha uses a bow and arrow, which would presumably distinguish him from the monkeys. But it should be noted that Prajañgha is elsewhere a name of a monkey officer (see 6.4.33; and note to 6.31.30).

"engaged" ārabdhaḥ: Literally, "began." Ct, Cg, and Cr all add some wording to complete the ellipsis, such as "to fight or strike (yoddhum iti śeṣaḥ—Cr; yuddham ārabdhavān—Ct; and hantum iti śeṣaḥ—Cg)."

8. "Mitraghna" mitraghnena: Literally, "slayer of friends," a peculiar name by any standard. A few devanāgarī manuscripts (D9–11) and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead the more normative name Śatrughna (śatrughena), "slayer of enemies." Ct, however, notes the reading of the critical edition as a variant. See notes to verses 11 and 26 below.

10. "Virūpākṣa" virūpākṣeṇa: See note to verse 25 below; and Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 24–26. See 6.28.31 and note.

11. pādas abc = 26abc.

"Suptaghna" suptaghnaḥ: Literally, "killer of sleepers." A number of southern manuscripts (D9–11,T2,3,G3,M1,2) and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the unusual name seen above at verse 8, mitraghnaḥ, "slayer of friends." See, too, verse 26 below and note.

14. "The son of Dharma" dharmasya putraḥ: According to the southern recension of the Bālakāṇḍa (491*, line 11—after 1.16.8), the monkey hero Suṣeṇa's father is Varuṇa, not Dharma. However, because of the variations and duplications of the monkeys' names in the text, it is difficult to determine whether this is indeed a contradiction. See note to 1.16.8.

15. "engaged in single combat" dvandvaṃ samīyuḥ . . . yuddhāya: Literally, "they came together in pairs for battle." Ñ2,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead yuddhvā ca, "and having fought" for yuddhāya.

"many other . . . many other" bahubhiḥ: As Cg notes, although the adjective is applied here only to the rākṣasas, we must supply it for the monkeys as well (bahubhir iti rākṣasaviśeṣaṇād vānarāś cety atrāpi bahava iti viśeṣaṇaṃ vijñeyam).

"in various ways" bahudhā: Cg specifies that this would include fighting with weapons, missiles, arms, feet, and so forth (yuddhāya śastrāstrabāhucaraṇaprabhṛtibhir yuddhāya). D7,9–11,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead sahasā, "violently, suddenly."

17. "with hair in place of weeds" keśaśāḍvalāḥ: The word śāḍvala frequently means "grass" or "herbage," and some translators take the reference to be to the grass or moss on the banks of a river (Dutt 1893, p. 1226; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 105; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 123; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 105; and Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 254). We, however, see the reference to be to vegetation floating in a stream or water weeds, a view shared by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1517) and Pagani (1999, p. 968).

"logjams" -saṃghāṭa-: Literally, "heaps, bunches, clusters." We follow the interpretation of all the commentators, who gloss, "a pile or clump of logs (kāṣṭhasaṃcayaḥ—so Cg)." Cf. 6.81.9 and note.

19. "in that combat . . . smashed" jaghāna samare: Literally, "he struck in battle." D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read gadayā, "with a mace," for samare, "in battle." This minor variant raises the question of why a monkey would be using a formal weapon. Ct, aware of the difficulty, proposes that Aṅgada is using Indrajit's mace, having snatched it from him (tasyaiva gadayā svāpahṛtayā jaghāna).

"Indrajit's" tasya: Literally, "his." The context supports Ct's and Cr's note that this must be Indrajit's chariot (tasyendrajitaḥ).

"gilded" kāñcanacitrāṅgam: Literally, "its body beautified or variegated with gold."

20. See note 7 above, where a number of the commentators cite this verse in support of their contention that Saṃpāti is a monkey and Prajaṅgha, a rākṣasa.

"he . . . struck" nijaghāna: The verb could also mean "he killed," and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1518) and (Dutt 1893, p. 1227) translate accordingly. The problem, as with many of the combatants' names, is that it is not always clear when a figure who appears to have been killed subsequently seems to reappear in the narrative, whether, as has been argued, Vālmīki has nodded (Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 24–26) or whether another figure with the same name is intended. In this case, a rākṣasa named Prajaṅgha appears again in the battle in the southern recension and is finally killed off at GPP 6.76.27 (= critical edition Yuddhakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 43, lines 47–48), where he is beheaded by a blow of Aṅgada's fist.

"in the vanguard of battle" raṇamūrdhani: Literally, "at the head of the battle." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 123) has apparently misread the expression, translating, "[lui asséna un coup] . . . sur la tête." He has been followed in this lapse by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 105), who renders, "[struck him] over the head."

21. "mounted his chariot" rathasthaḥ: Literally, "standing in a chariot."

"javelin he kept there" rathaśaktyā: Literally, "with a chariot-javelin." This seemingly simple compound is actually rather ambiguous in its meaning, which has led translators to render it variously. Ct, Cr, Cm, and Ck understand the term to be a reference to a javelin (śakti) that is located in, or mounted on, a chariot. Cg amplifies somewhat, explaining, "a javelin that is always to be found in a chariot (ratha eva sadā vartamānayā śaktyā)." The term also occurs in the Mahābhārata (Citraśāla Press edition, 10.6.13) and Harivaṃśa (Citraśāla Press edition, Viṣṇuparva 106.5). In the former, the term describes a blazing missile, which Aśvatthāman hurls at Kṛṣṇa. At that occurrence, the commentator Nīlakaṇṭha glosses, simply, cakram, "discus." In the latter, it appears to refer to a structural element of the chariot, against which the wounded demon Śambara leans for support. Here Nīlakaṇṭha defines it as "a flagpole whose purpose is to stabilize or strengthen a chariot (rathasyotsāhahetuṃ dhvajam)." This latter definition is the one given by Apte, MW, and PW. Apte (s.v.) cites the Mahābhārata verse, which seems to support this definition poorly at best. Translators have treated this object variously. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 105) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1518) take it as we and the commentators do. Pagani (1999, p. 969) evidently following the dictionaries, translates, "la hampe de son étendard." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 123) avoids the issue by simply repeating the Sanskrit term. Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 254) does not confront the issue since his text reads instead tathā śaktyā, "and with his javelin." Dutt (1893, p. 1227) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 105) apparently understand śakti in its other sense of "force, power, energy." The former renders, "with all the access of force derived from his car," and the latter, "with the force of his driving." Cf. verse 34 below. See notes to 6.59.13; 6.78.10; and 6.95.9.

"in the middle of the chest" stanāntare: Literally, "between the breasts."

22. "Jambumālin's" tasya: Literally, "his."

"together with that rākṣasa" saha tenaiva rakṣasā: We agree with the majority of commentators in seeing this as a reference to Jambumālin himself. Ct, in fact, feels that we are to understand by this reference that Jambumālin has been killed (tena jambumālī mṛta iti gamyate). Ck, however, understands the reference to be to another rākṣasa, an emissary of Jambumālin (jambumālidūta iti gamyate).

Following verse 22, D5 (after 30)–7,9–11,T (T1after 31),G,M1,2 (after 31),3,5 insert a passage of two lines [706*]: "Roaring, the terrible Pratapana pursued Nala, but Nala swiftly knocked out his eyes."

23. "his body pierced" bhinnagātraḥ: The texts and printed editions of the southern commentators as well as virtually all southern manuscripts read 23ab with 706* [translated above]. Thus, in these texts, Nala's body is pierced by Pratapana's arrows whereas, in the critical edition, Gaja is shot by Tapana.

"Then Gaja . . . smashed him [Tapana] with a mountain peak held in his fist." prajaghānādriśṛṅgeṇa tapanaṃ muṣṭinā gajaḥ: Literally, "Gaja struck Tapana with a fist, with a mountain peak." This half verse is omitted from D5–7,9–11,T,G3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators and therefore does not appear in any translation of the southern recension. Moreover, no northern manuscript appears to juxtapose a monkey, Gaja, with a rākṣasa, Tapana. The northern parallel to this passage in the critical apparatus, as well as in printed versions of the north, represents Tapana as being slain by Nala (Lahore 6.18.55 and Gorresio 6.18.31). It appears that only M4,5 read Gaja, while all other manuscripts either omit the half verse or give the name of the monkey as Nala. The inclusion of this half verse is doubtful at best and should be so indicated, while the name Nala would have been the stronger choice based on textual evidence.

The expression adriśṛṅgeṇa . . . muṣṭinā seems somewhat elliptical unless, as we have done, one reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi, yielding the sense "a fist in which there was the peak of a mountain." One could alternately and, to our mind, less plausibly supply either the conjunction "ca," yielding "with a mountain peak and his fist," or the comparative particle "iva," yielding "with a fist that was like a mountain peak." The northern variants avoid this collocation, while the southern commentators, as noted, do not share the reading.

24. "killed . . . smashing him to pieces" nirbibheda jaghāna ca: Literally, "he smashed and killed." A few devanāgarī manuscripts (D7,9,10) and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead nijaghāna javena ca, "and he swiftly killed."

25. "Virūpākṣa" virūpākṣam: See note to verse 10 above.

26. pādas abc = 11abc.

"Suptaghna" suptaghnaḥ: D5,10,11,T,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead mitraghnaḥ, "Mitraghna." See notes to verses 8 and 11 above.

"all pierced" nirbibhiduḥ: Literally, "they pierced." D10,11,G3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead ādīpayat, "he enflamed, scorched." Cr, who reads with the critical edition, glosses, "undertook activity favorable to piercing (bhedanānukūlavyāpāraṃ cakruḥ)." Evidently he is unwilling to accept the idea that Rāma could actually be wounded, especially by such relatively minor rākṣasas. See notes to 6.33.26; 6.35.9; 6.75.17; 6.76.25,32; and 6.79.1.

27. "with four" caturbhiḥ: Ct calls our attention to Rāma's marksmanship by noting that he needed no more than four arrows to behead the four rākṣasas (nādhikair ity arthaḥ).

28. "Vajramuṣṭi with his fist" vajramuṣṭiḥ . . . muṣṭinā: The name Vajramuṣṭi means "adamantine fisted," and here the poet exploits the name playfully for an ironic effect.

"the lofty tower of a citadel" purāṭṭaḥ: D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead surāṭṭaḥ, or "an aṭṭa of the gods." Ck glosses the term aṭṭaḥ in the sense of kṣaumam, "a room at the top of a house or a fortified structure in front of a building." Ct quotes Ck and notes that other unspecified commentators understand the term to refer to a vimāna, "a flying chariot or a seven-storied mansion." This latter sense is given by Cr, who glosses, "an aerial chariot or mansion of the gods" (devavimānam)," and by Cs, who explains, "an aerial chariot or mansion of the demons given by the gods (devadatto daiteyavimānaḥ)." Cr's interpretation appears to be followed by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1518) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 106), both of whom understand the reference to be to an aerial chariot. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 123) and Pagani (1999, p. 969), respectively, understand aṭṭaḥ in the sense of "un pavillon de Suras" and "le donjon des dieux." Cg, with whom we agree, and the only commentator to deal with the critical reading, glosses, "turret or topmost part of the city or citadel (puravalabhiḥ)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 106), evidently following Cg, translates, "the attic of the citadel." See RaghuVa 6.67. See also notes to 6.62.6 and 6.86.23 [1961*].

Following verse 28, Ñ,B1,4,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read verses 32–34.

29. "whose blows were like that of Indra's vajra or thunderbolt" vajrāśanisamasparśaḥ: Literally, "contact with which is equal to that of the vajra and thunderbolt." Ct explains the compound as meaning "a savage blow of the fist equal to that (tathā krūramuṣṭiprahāra ity arthaḥ)." The use of the word sparśa, "contact," to refer to the devastating impact of a weapon or person is attested elsewhere, as at Mahābhārata 6.114.55, where it refers to arrows loosed in battle. As in verse 28, the poet plays with the name of the rākṣasa and the person or weapon that strikes him. In this case, the play is on aśani, "lightning bolt." The name Aśaniprabha means "having the radiance of lightning." See note to 6.55.43.

30. "that resembled thunderbolts, Aśaniprabha" aśanisaṃkāśaiḥ . . . aśaniprabhaḥ: As above, the poet plays with the name of the demon and the weapon employed.

32. Verses 32 and 34 occur after verse 28 in the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators.

"Nīla, whose dark luster was like that of a mass of collyrium" nīlaṃ nīlāñjanacayaprabham: Again the poet plays on the name of one of the combatants, repeating the monkey's name, Nīla ("Dark" or "Blue-Black"), in the descriptive adjective. Pagani (1999, p. 1661) in her note argues that, since recipes for collyrium are given in medical and alchemical literature as part of the paraphernalia of a magician, the comparison of a warrior to a heap of this substance is a bad omen for his opponent. Here, as elsewhere, she may be extracting more levels of signification from the text than its author may have intended (see notes to verses 34 and 45 below).

34. "the heads of Nikumbha and his charioteer" śiraḥ . . . nikumbhasya ca sārathēḥ: Literally, "the head of Nikumbha and of the charioteer." Of all the commentators and translators consulted, Cs and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 106), perhaps concerned at the singular śiraḥ, "head," understand the syntax to mean that Nīla cuts off the head only of Nikumbha's charioteer (nikumbhasya sārathēḥ śiraś cicchedety anvayaḥ). This is certainly a reasonable reading on syntactic grounds. However, given that no further mention is made of Nikumbha in this passage, we agree with the majority of commentators and translators in understanding that both he and his charioteer have been killed in this fashion (nikumbhasya sārathēś ca śiraḥ).

"with a discus taken from their chariot" rathacakreṇa: Literally, "with a chariot wheel or discus" All the commentators and translators consulted understand the reference to be to a wheel of Nikumbha's chariot. However, given the force of the simile involving Viṣṇu, whose principal weapon is a cakra, or "discus," and in light of what we see as a parallel usage in the case of rathaśakti (verse 21 above), we feel that the context better supports the sharp discus rather than a chariot wheel, which would not serve so well as a cutting tool. Pagani (1999, pp. 969, 1661), who translates, "la roue de char," claims, somewhat imaginatively, that a chariot wheel always refers to Viṣṇu's discus with its sharp edge, which is then, in turn, linked to the wheel of Time.

36. "smashed" nyapātayat: Literally, "he knocked down."

40. "upon Vidyunmālin's chest" tasyorasi: Literally, "on his chest."

43–44. "swords" khaḍgaiḥ: V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead cānyaiḥ, "and with others."

"spears" -paṭṭasaiḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,7–12,T3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead -sāyakaiḥ, "with arrows."

"broken chariots, butchered war-horses" apaviddhaiś ca bhinnaiś ca rathaiḥ sāṃgrāmikair hayaiḥ: Literally, "with broken and split chariots and war-horses." We have followed the suggestion of Cg and Cr in construing the first adjective with the first noun, and the second with the second. D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read cāpi, "as well as or and," for bhinnaiḥ, "broken."

"place of horror" ghoram: Literally, "horrible, dreadful."

45. "headless corpses" kabandhāni: Dutt (1893, p. 1229) envisages these in a note as ghostly apparitions, "Spectres having bodies without heads." Pagani (1999, p. 1661), who is fond of reading larger symbolism into the text, notes here, again somewhat imaginatively, that the headless trunks littering the battlefield symbolize sacrificial posts, thus lending the battlefield itself an air of sacrifice.

Pādas cd are repeated in brackets in printed versions of Cg (= KK and VSP 6.44.12ef).

46. "being torn to pieces" vidāryamāṇāḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead nihanyamānāḥ, "being killed or slaughtered."

"their limbs smeared with blood" śoṇitadigdhagātrāḥ: B1,D9–11,G2,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead śoṇitagandhamūrcchitāḥ, "stupefied with the smell of blood." Although this interpretation is reflected in those translations that follow the texts and printed editions of Ct, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 107) uniquely translates both variants, "maddened by the smell of blood . . . their limbs covered with blood."

"anxious now for the sun, maker of day, to set" divākarasyāstamayābhikāṅkṣiṇaḥ: The rākṣasas' eagerness for nightfall can be interpreted in either of two ways. On the one hand, it may be that, as they have been badly beaten in this first day of battle, they are eager simply for the respite that nightfall generally brings so that they can regroup. On the other hand, as several of the commentators and translators note, it is widely known that the power of the nocturnal rākṣasas increases after sundown, a fact alluded to throughout the literature (rātrau rākṣasānāṃ balādhikyād iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg). See note to 1.25.13; Bālakāṇḍa, App. I, No. 5, lines 14–16 = GPP 1.17.22–23.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila.

Sarga 34

1. "deadly" prāṇahāriṇī: Literally, "carrying off life breaths." Cr believes that the night is perilous for all beings other than rākṣasas (niśācarātiriktānāṃ bhayāvahety arthaḥ). Cg believes we should supply the phrase "to the monkeys (vānarāṇām iti śeṣaḥ)." Cf. note to 6.33.46.

2. "a clash by night" niśāyuddham: Ct and Cs feel that they can more or less precisely date the onset of this night battle by referring to the events described previously. Ct reasons as follows: The ascent of Mount Suvela took place on the full-moon day of the month of Pauṣa [December–January]. Following this, the division of the monkey troops occupied the entire dark half of that month. The battle described in the preceding sarga commenced, then, on the first day of the month of Māgha [January–February] and continued for many days. This battle is generally described as "chaotic (saṃkulam)." It is on the last day of this protracted engagement that the night battle described here begins. (pauṣapaurṇamāsyāṃ suvelarohaṇasya spaṣṭapratīteḥ. tenāvibhāgādinā pauṣakṛṣṇe 'hīte māghaśuklapratipadi yuddhārambhe bahudinaparyantaṃ saṃkulaṃ yuddhaṃ sāmānyenoktam. taduttaradine cedaṃ niśāyuddhaṃ pravṛttam.) Ct substantiates his argument by quoting a verse, apparently from the Padmapurāṇa, in which it is stated that a great and "chaotic (saṃkulaṃ)" battle between the monkeys and rākṣasas began at noon on the first day of the month (tato jajñe mahāyuddhaṃ saṃkulaṃ kapirakṣasām / madhyāhne prathamaṃ yuddhaṃ prārabdhaṃ pratipady abhūd iti pādmoktaḥ). Cs, commenting on verse 1, quotes Ct by name more or less as he is represented in GPP (6.44.2–3). However, he disagrees with Ct's analysis, on the grounds that he cannot find the quoted verse in the Padmapurāṇa. Instead, he quotes another verse, which offers a different view, according to which the great battle took place on the fourteenth day of the bright half of the month of Caitra [March–April] and Rāvaṇa was killed on the forty-eighth day of the war. Cs thus argues that we should reckon the date of the battle here as forty-seven days prior to the fourteenth day of the bright half of Caitra (counting the fourteenth itself as one of the forty-eight days). Cf. note to 6.50.12. Cs concludes by mentioning yet a third position, which he ascribes to unnamed others: that the night battle took place in the dark half of the month of Phālguna [February–March]. (padmapurāṇe pañcaṣeṣu pustakeṣv etat padyādarśanena "atra yuddhaṃ mahad vṛttaṃ caitraśuklacaturdaśīm / aṣṭacatvāriṃśaddinaṃ yatrāsau rāvaṇo hataḥ //" ity anyathādarśanena ca tac cintyam. caitraśuklacaturdaśītaḥ prāk saptacatvāriṃśaddinī grāhyā. caturdaśyā sahāṣṭacatvāriṃśaddinī bhavati. bhavati phālguṇakṛṣṇe rātriyuddham ity anye.) See Introduction, p. 17, note 1; and note to 6.4.4.

3. "tawny monkeys . . . monkey" harayo hariḥ: Literally, "tawny monkeys . . . tawny monkey." Although it is our convention to render the term hari in its etymological sense of "tawny, tawny monkey," we believe that the context of the verse argues for the use of the second term in its most generic sense. Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–4,8–13,T3,G2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read vānaraḥ, "monkey," for hariś cā[sīti], "and . . . a tawny monkey." See note to verse 6 below.

" 'Are you . . .?' 'Are you . . .?' " asīti . . . asīti: Literally, "You are . . . You are." Since there is no interrogative particle in the verse, it is impossible to say for certain whether the utterances are declarative or interrogative. However, given the context in which the combatants are unable to see one another and are groping and striking blindly, we are inclined to share the view of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 125), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 107), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1520) in understanding the phrases to be questions. Other translators render these as exclamations. Cg argues that, because of the terrible darkness, even the rākṣasas (who are typically at home in the darkness, see note to 6.33.46) are themselves confused (dāruṇatamaskatvena rakṣasām api moho 'bhūd iti bhāvaḥ). Raghunathan extrapolates from this, it seems, the idea that both the rākṣasas and monkeys are attacking their own kind (1982, vol. 3, p. 107).

4. "in that darkness" tamasi: The editors of the critical edition have marked this reading as doubtful. V3,D5,7,9–11,T2,3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead sainye tu, "among the troops."

5. "with thickets of luminescent herbs" dīptauṣadhivanāḥ: We agree with Dutt (1893, p. 1229), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 107), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 107), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1521) in understanding the reference to be to the luminescent or phosphorescent herbs that are a commonplace in Sanskrit poetry (cf. 6.61.55 and KumāSaṃ 1.2, etc.). European translators (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 125; Gorresio 1856, vol. 9, p. 257; and Pagani 1999, p. 970), however, have tended to read the compound oṣadhivana as a dvandva in the sense of "herbs and forests," which then leads them to understand the adjective dīpta-, "glowing," in the sense of "flaming or burning." Pagani (1999, p. 1661) has a rather forced interpretation, according to which the mountains in question are the Himalayas. In her view, because these mountains are by definition snow white, comparing them to the rākṣasas must be done on the basis of their great size and not their color. She further argues that the unusual representation of the Himalayas as being on fire, which is contrary to their nature, refers to the demonic and adharmic aspect of the rākṣasas, who disturb the order of the world.

6. "impenetrable" duṣpāre: Literally, "impossible to cross."

"monkeys" plavaṅgamān: Literally, "going by bounds." We normally translate the kenning as "leaping monkeys." In the context, however, this would appear restrictive. See note to verse 3 above.

7. "the monkeys" te: Literally, "they."

"the rākṣasas' golden-plumed horses and their banners that resembled flames of fire" hayān kāñcanāpīḍān dhvajāṃś cāgniśikhopamān: Literally, "the golden-plumed horses and the banners that were like flames of fire." Cf. 6.33.2ab, where horses and banners are described identically. D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ck and Ct read [cā]śīviṣopamān, "[and] like venomous serpents" for [cā]gniśikhopamān, "[and] that resembled flames of fire." Cr appears to have a reading that is unattested in the critical apparatus. He reads [hayān] śikharopamān [dhvajāṃś ca], "horses like mountain peaks and banners." The adjective śikharopamān is attested (but with gajān for hayān) in G2 and M5.

Following verse 7, D5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [718*]: "Those mighty monkeys rocked the rākṣasa army."

8. "they dragged about" cakarṣuḥ: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 125) prefers the less common sense of the root √kṛṣ, "to scratch" (Apte s.v.). In this he is followed, as is so often the case, by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 108), who translates, "clawed."

"bedecked with flags and banners" patākādhvajinaḥ: Ct and Ck understand, "equipped with flagpoles complete with flying flags (patākopetadhvajavantaḥ)."

"slashing" dadaṃśuś ca: Literally, "and they bit [them]."

9. "whom they could make out but dimly in the darkness" dṛśyādṛśyāni: Literally, "both visible and invisible." Translators, with the exception of Raghunathan, who follows Cg, have understood the compound to refer distributively to those rākṣasas who were visible to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa and those who were not. This interpretation is plausible in light of the ability of Indian epic archers to strike unseen targets by sound alone (śabdavedha). Compare, for example, the stories at 2.57.14ff. and 2.58.12–15, where this ability proves to be the undoing of King Daśaratha. The mastery of blind archery is also ascribed to Arjuna in the Mahābhārata. See MBh 1.123.1–6, where, through practice, Arjuna is said to learn to shoot at night. See, however, 6.35.13 and note, where Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa regard this practice as adharmic, "unrighteous." On the other hand, we agree with Cg, who understands the term to mean "barely visible (īṣaddṛśyāni)" in the sense of both visible and invisible at the same time. We have added the words "in the darkness" for the sake of clarity. See, too, Cg's comments at note to 6.35.13.

10. "The thick dust" dharaṇīrajaḥ: Literally, "the dust of the earth."

"of the warriors" yudhyatām: Literally, "of those who were fighting."

11. "swift" mahāvegāḥ: B3,D5–7,9–11,T,G3,M3, and the texts and printed editions of the southern commentators read instead mahāghorāḥ, "very terrible."

"with blood for water" rudhirodāḥ: B2,D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G1,3,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead rudhiraughāḥ, "with torrents of blood." Cg, who reads with the critical edition, notes the irregularity of the substitution of the word uda for the word udaka, "water," in this compound (asaṃjñāyām apy udaka-śabdasyodādeśa ārṣaḥ).

12. "of battle drums—bherīs, mṛdaṅgas, and paṇavas" bherīmṛdaṅgānāṃ paṇavānāṃ ca: For bherīs, see 6.17.31–33 and note; for mṛdaṅgas, see 5.8.38 and Vyas 1967, p. 229; and for paṇavas, see 5.8.39. Vyas (1967, p. 229) identifies the paṇava as a type of drum. But compare Apte (s.v.), who understands the term to refer either to a type of musical instrument or a small drum. Cf. 5.46.27.

"flute" -veṇu-: Ñ2,D10,11,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Cr and Ct read instead -nemi-, "chariot wheel."

Following verse 12, printed versions of Cg (= KK and VSP 6.44.12ef) repeat 6.33.45cd in brackets. The apparatus of KK indicates that these pādas are found in this location in five of the manuscripts on which the edition is based. The critical apparatus makes no mention of the inclusion of this passage here or at 6.33.45. The passage would be translated as follows: "And in that tumultuous conflict, which was comparable to the battle of the gods and the asuras."

13. "the clash of arms" śastrāṇām: Literally, "of weapons." D5,7,T1,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Cg, Cm, and Ck read instead śastānām, "cut down, wounded," which can be taken to refer to the monkeys, the rākṣasas, or both. The reading is perhaps an emendation to enhance the parallelism of the verse. With this reading, one could understand that the rākṣasas are stricken, i.e., with the fists, feet, knees, boulders, etc., of the monkeys, while the monkeys, in turn, are cut and pierced by the sharp arrows and cutting weapons of the rākṣasas. The collocation of the adjectives hatānām and śastānām, as noted below, belongs mainly to the manuscript tradition of Cg, Cm, Crā, and Cv. This is followed in the translations of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1521) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 107).

"screaming" stanamānānām: We construe this participle as well as the following one, (hatānām) kākākṣigolikavat, with both monkeys and rākṣasas.

"as they were struck down" hatānām: V,D1–3,6,10,11,T2,3, the texts and printed editions of Ct, and at least several of Cg's manuscripts (D6 and three manuscripts cited in the apparatus of KK) read instead hayānām "of horses." This variant is then to be construed with the adjective stanamānānām, in the sense of "neighing [horses]." This reading is represented in all translations consulted with the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1521) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 107).

Following verse 13 (or in a few cases, verse 14), virtually all manuscripts except Ś and D1–4,8,10 include a passage of two lines [724*], which construes grammatically with verse 14 below: "[Covered as it was] with the slaughtered monkey leaders, javelins, lances, and battle-axes, and the butchered rākṣasas, huge as mountains, who could take on any form at will, [the battlefield]..."

14. "Strewn with weapons, as if with floral offerings" śastrapuṣpopahārā: Literally, "with weapons for floral offerings."

"thick with mud that oozed blood" śoṇitāsravakardamā: Literally, "its mud [characterized by] flows of blood."

"transformed beyond all recognition" durjñeyā: Literally, "difficult to recognize."

15. "Kālarātrī, the dark night of universal destruction" kālarātrī: Literally, "Kālarātrī." As at 6.23.15 above, we understand, with Ct and Ck, that the reference is to the night of universal or cosmic dissolution or destruction (saṃhārarātrī). Cg, however, believes that the reference is to Bhīmarathi, the inauspicious and dangerous seventh night of the seventh month of a person's seventy-seventh year. This night is believed to be especially fraught with peril for the individual. (kālarātrir bhīmarathirātriḥ. rātrir bhīmarathir nāma sarvaprāṇibhayāvahety ukteḥ.) (See Apte s.v.) As an alternative, Cg proposes that the term could refer to the more horrific form of the goddess Śakti, the fearsome leader of the gaṇas, the demonic hosts of the Śaiva tradition. (śaktir vā. satī ca kālarātriś ca bhairavī gaṇanāyikety ukteḥ.) See, too, 6.58.31 and note. Cf. 6.26.25 and note.

16. "frenzied" saṃhṛṣṭāḥ: Literally, "excited, delighted." Ct and Cr share this reading with the critical edition. The translators who follow their texts tend to understand the adjective in its common sense of "happy, joyous," which seems ill suited to the context. T3,M1–3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Ck read instead saṃsṛṣṭāḥ, which Cg glosses as saṃmilitāḥ in the sense of "grouped together." Ck understands, saṃyuktāḥ, "united." This reading is reflected in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 108), who renders, "made a united attack."

17. "roaring in fury" kruddhānām abhigarjatām: Literally, "of them who were angry [and] roaring."

"of the upheaval of the seven seas" saptānāṃ samudrāṇām: Literally, "of the seven seas." The reference here is to the purāṇic cosmology, according to which the earth consists of seven continents, or dvīpas, separated by seven concentric oceans. In place of saptānām, "seven," D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct substitute sattvānām, "of living beings," which must then be construed with udvarte in the somewhat redundant sense of "the universal destruction of [all] creatures." See note to 6.40.29.

"universal destruction" udvarte: We follow Ct, Cr, and Cg (second alternative) in understanding this term, whose normal sense is "remainder, surplus, excess," to refer here to the pralaya, or "the universal destruction (pralayakāle—so Ct, Cr)." Cg, however, relying evidently on the more normal usage of the term, gives, as his first alternative explanation, "increase, augmentation (abhivṛddhau)," by which he no doubt refers to the rising or flooding of the oceans' waters. Cv glosses, "destruction, dissolution (saṃvartaḥ)."

18–19. "sharp arrows" śaraiḥ . . . śitaiḥ: V3,D4,7,10,11,13,T1,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read the redundant śaraiḥ, "arrows," for śitaiḥ, "sharp," in pāda 18d. Translations that follow Ct tend to eliminate the redundancy by ignoring the term here. Cv and Crā note that, in their opinion, śitaiḥ is the [proper] reading (iti pāṭhaḥ).

"six . . . night-roaming rākṣasas" ṣaṭ . . . niśācarān: Literally, "six night-roaming ones." Ct and Ck indicate that we should understand that these are six prominent rākṣasas (pradhānā iti śeṣaḥ).

"Yajñaśatru" "yajñaśatruḥ": D3,6,T2,3,G,M, and the texts and printed editions of Cg and Ck read instead yamaśatruḥ, "enemy of Yama." Accordingly, the name Yamaśatru appears in the translation of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 108).

"Mahāpārśva, Mahodara" mahāpārśvamahodarau: Two rākṣasa warriors of these names were mentioned previously among those guarding Laṅkā's southern gate (6.27.17). The ones mentioned previously, however, are probably the rākṣasas killed in sargas 85 and 86 by Sugrīva and Aṅgada, respectively, while the two mentioned here are apparently different rākṣasas of the same name.

"giant" mahākāyaḥ: Literally, "having a large body." We follow Ct, Cg, and Ck in taking this term as an adjective modifying Vajradaṃṣṭra (atra mahākāya iti vajradaṃṣṭraviśeṣaṇam).

"both Śuka and Sāraṇa" śukasāraṇau: These are the names of Rāvaṇa's hapless spies whose misadventures were recounted in sargas 16–20 above. Ct notes that there is some disagreement among scholars, however, as to whether the warriors mentioned here are the same as the spies mentioned earlier. He notes that many authorities believe that these two are different from the two figures mentioned earlier, whereas others understand that they are the same two, who, having first been sent out as spies, were later rebuked by the king and so left the royal presence and died in battle. (imau śukasāraṇau cāratvena preṣitābhyām anyāv evety bahavaḥ. tāv iti padasvārasyāc cāratvena preṣitāv evemau rājñā dhikkṛtāv api rājasaṃnidhiṃ parityajya yuddhe mṛtāv ity anye.) See 6.27.19 and notes. But compare 6.28.13 and notes.

Cg notes that Śuka and Sāraṇa were mentioned earlier as having been posted to guard the northern gate (6.27.19) (tāv uttaradvārarakṣakatvena pūrvoktāv ubhau śuka-sāraṇau).

20. "crawled away" apasṛtāḥ: Literally, "departed, withdrew." Cr glosses, "desisted [from battle] (nivṛttāḥ)," whereas Cg offers, "fled (palāyitāḥ)."

"barely clinging to life" sāvaśeṣāyuṣaḥ: Literally, "whose lives had but a remainder." We follow the interpretations of Cr and Cg, who understand the compound to indicate that the wounded rākṣasas have, in fact, only a short time to live (kiṃcin mātrāvaśiṣṭāyurbalā āsannamaraṇā ity arthaḥ—so Cr). This is consistent, we believe, with the information in the verse that they have been pierced to the vitals. All translations consulted that follow this reading, however, have interpreted the compound more or less in the sense of "having barely escaped with their lives." Thus, for example, Dutt (1893, p. 1230) renders, "having only their lives left to them"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 126), "n'ayant plus du souffle"; Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 108), "barely escaping with their lives"; Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 108), "managed to escape with their bare lives"; Pagani (1999, p. 971), "ne leur laissant qu'un souffle de vie"; and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1522), "and their life was saved." All these translations, in our opinion, misinterpret the passage in suggesting that the wounded rākṣasas actually survive their encounter with Rāma. Cf. verse 22 below.

21. "mighty Rāma" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "one of great strength." Ñ1,D1,3,4,7,9–11,13,T1,3,G1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead mahārathaḥ, "great chariot-warrior."

"all directions" diśaḥ . . . pradiśaś ca: Literally, "the cardinal directions and the intermediate directions."

"Then . . . with their shafts adorned with gold" tataḥ kāñcanacitrāṅgaiḥ: Literally, "Then . . . with gold-adorned bodies." D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, Cr read instead nimeṣāntaramātreṇa (= 18c) "in the blink of an eye."

"arrows" śaraiḥ: D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead the adjective ghoraiḥ, "terrible," leaving the audience to supply the term "arrows."

22. "remaining" anye: Literally, "other."

"entering" samāsādya: Literally, "having approached."

23. "thousands" sahasraśaḥ: Literally, "by the thousand." Ñ,B,D7,9–11,T3,G3, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead samantataḥ, "in all directions, on all sides."

"fletched with gold" suvarṇapuṅkhaiḥ: Literally, "with golden feathers."

"sparkling with fireflies" khadyotaiḥ: Literally, "with fireflies."

24. "of the tawny monkeys" harīṇāṃ: D9–11,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cr read instead bherīṇāṃ, "of the bherīs [drums]."

25. "deafening" mahatā: Literally, "great."

"Mount Trikūṭa" trikūṭaḥ: Literally, Trikūṭa." See 6.2.10; 6.30.18–20; 6.34.25; 6.61.66; and notes. See, too, notes to 6.29.13 and 6.78.41. See also 5.1.183,189; 5.2.1,8,18; 5.3.1; 5.37.49; and 5.54.9 and notes. Cf. note to 6.3.19.

"with its many echoing caverns" kandarākīrṇaḥ: Literally, "scattered with caves." We have added the word "echoing" to bring out more fully the sense of the common poetic trope of sounds reverberating in mountain caves. The printed text of GPP (6.44.26) reads the awkward kandaraḥ kīrṇaḥ, for which the critical apparatus finds attestation only in its manuscript D7. It is not clear to us whether this is, in fact, a typographical error in GPP, as GPP's apparatus notes no variants, while NSP's text (6.44.26) of Ct reads with the critical edition. We are not certain as to how one would interpret this reading, although Pagani seems to read it in such a way that the caves (reading plural for singular) of Mount Trikūṭa become the subject of the verb pravyāharat, "he/it spoke." Thus, she translates, "les innombrables caverns du mont Trikūṭa poussaient des cris . . ." (Pagani 1999, p. 971).

"seemed almost to shout in reply" pravyāharad iva: We agree with Cg in interpreting the verb pra + vi + ā √hṛ in the sense of "to respond, reply (prativyāharat)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 126), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 109) and Pagani (1999, p. 971) take the verb in its sense of "to utter confused or inarticulate sounds."

26. "langurs" golāṅgūlāḥ: Literally, "cow-tailed [monkeys]." Elsewhere these monkeys are called gopuccha-, which has the same meaning. See the note on the identification of these primates at 1.16.10 and Goldman 1989. This is the Presbytis entellus, i.e., the Hanuman, or common gray langur, known for its black face and long tail.

"crushed" saṃpariṣvajya: Literally, "having embraced." The idea, as suggested by Cr, is that the monkeys crushed the rākṣasas to death by hugging them tightly (pariṣvaṅgena nihatya).

"rending them with their fangs" bhakṣayan: The most common meaning of the root √bhakṣ is "to eat." All translations of the southern recension consulted, with the exception of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1522), understand the verb in this sense, that is, that the monkeys are actually eating the bodies of the rākṣasas they have killed. We find this to be an unlikely scenario in the context of the Rāmāyaṇa, where the monkeys, however violent, are always shown as subsisting on fruits, roots, and other plant foods (for example, at 6.15.31), whereas the rākṣasas are reviled for their bloodthirsty, carnivorous behavior (for example, at 6.48.25; 6.97.11; etc.). We believe that the context requires us to understand the root √bhakṣ in its less common but attested sense of "to bite." We have strengthened the language somewhat by adding the phrase "with their fangs." Some northern manuscripts, as well as the text of Gorresio (6.19.31), substitute forms of the root √daṃś, "to bite," which we believe to be an example of the well-known glossing character of the northern recension (see Pollock 1984a). For the most part, the commentators avoid any discussion of the term other than to gloss the irregular bhakṣayan with the correctly augmented abhakṣayan (Ct, Cg). Cr alone indicates his disquiet at the notion that the monkeys would eat the rākṣasas. He reads the simplex bhakṣayan (corrected to abhakṣayan) as a causative, in the sense of "to allow to eat or to feed," explaining that the monkeys kill the rākṣasas by crushing them and then feed them to dogs and other scavengers (śvādibhir akhādayan). Of all the translators consulted, only the author of the Gita Press translation (1969, vol. 3, p. 1522) follows this line of thinking, rendering, "allowed them to be devoured (by jackals and vultures, etc.)."

27. "enemy" śatrum: As Cr points out, the enemy in question is Indrajit, with whom Aṅgada had initially engaged at 6.33.18–19. We are in agreement with Cg that the action described here is the continuation of the single combat that began in the previous sarga (pūrvaprasaktasyāṅgadendrajitor dvandvayuddhasya śeṣaṃ vaktum upakramate).

"He swiftly slew the charioteer and horses of Indrajit Rāvaṇi." rāvaṇer nijaghānāśu sārathiṃ ca hayān api: Literally, "He swiftly killed Rāvaṇi's charioteer and horses as well." D6,10,11,T2,3,G,M5, and the texts and printed editions of Ct omit this line (27cd). Only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1522) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 108) among the translators consulted render this line. However, they follow the reading shown in the text of Cg, where the accusative rāvaṇim is substituted for the genitive rāvaṇeḥ. According to this reading, Aṅgada strikes Indrajit as well as his horses and charioteer. Compare 6.33.19 above, where Aṅgada smashes Indrajit's chariot along with its horses and driver.

It is not clear whether Indrajit's charioteer here is actually slain (to be replaced by another later) or merely struck down, since, at 6.77.30, there is a more elaborate and graphic description of the slaying of Indrajit's charioteer. See 6.77.30 and notes.

Following verse 27, or in place of it, a variety of manuscripts read, in whole or in part, a passage of eight lines [731*] in which the battle between Aṅgada and Indrajit is further described. Manuscripts and printed texts of Cg (M3, VSP, KK) include only the first line of this passage: "As that terrible and fearsome battle continued . . ." (KK 6.44.29ab and VSP 6.44.29ab read ghore, "terrible," and bhṛśadāruṇe, "fearsome," respectively, for the critical edition's synonymous raudre and [a]tibhayañkare). This line is a variant of the formulaic line found above at 6.34.11ab.

28. "who possessed great powers of illusion" mahāmāyaḥ: A variety of manuscripts and the texts of the commentators show variants for this term. Cg, Cm, and Crā read mahākāyaḥ, "with a huge body." Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 108), following Cg, renders this variant as "huge." Ct, Ck, and the Gita Press edition read mahāyastaḥ, "greatly fatigued or distressed," misprinted in NSP (6.44.28) as mahāyas. This reading is rendered by those translators who follow the text of Ct, with the exception of Pagani (1999, p. 972), who translates, "s'aidant de sa grande connaissance de la magie." Although she follows the text of GPP, she appears to select that text's footnoted variant of Cr, who reads mahāmāyaḥ with the critical edition.

Following verse 28, B1,2,4,D2,5–7,9–11,S insert a passage of eight lines [734*]: "All the gods together with the seers and both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa praised that feat of Aṅgada, Vālin's praiseworthy son.[1][1–2] All beings were aware of Indrajit's prowess in battle. Therefore, they were pleased to see that great warrior discomfited.[3–4] Then the monkeys, together with Sugrīva and Vibhīṣaṇa, seeing their foe discomfited, were delighted and cried out, 'Well done! Well done!'[5–6] But Indrajit, having been bested in battle by Vālin's son of fearsome deeds, flew into a terrifying rage.[7–8]"

[1]"Aṅgada, Vālin's . . . son" vāliputrasya: Literally, "of Vālin's son."

Following 734*, line 3, D7,M3, KK and VSP (in brackets between 6.44.31ab and cd) insert a passage of one line [734 (A)*]: "He [Indrajit] who, having become invisible to all beings, was now unconquerable in battle . . ." A footnote in KK (vol. 6, p. 173) notes that this half verse is not to be found in the oldest manuscripts. No translations consulted render this line.

Following 734* or 734 (A), D6,7,T2,M3, and the texts and printed editions of Cg, Cm, and Crā insert a passage of five lines [735]: "At that point, Rāma addressed these words to the monkeys, 'All of you must stay close to the monkey king.[1–2] Since he was granted a boon[1] by Brahmā, Indrajit cruelly oppresses the three worlds.[3] Through the force of Kāla,[2] he has come here to accomplish his purpose at your expense.[3] I must, however, spare him today.[4] Still you need have no concern.[4–5]"

[1]"boon" -varaḥ: The boon is the gift of the divine serpent-weapons with which Indrajit will shortly bind and temporarily disable Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa (6.34.30 and 6.35.8–26 below). See 6.36.10 and note; and 7.30.10–13.

[2]"Kāla" kālena: Literally, "by destiny or time." We follow Cm, who explains, "by the force of time or destiny (kālabalena)," and accept the explanation of Cs, "by time or destiny, which makes manifest the boon of Brahmā (kālena brahmavarojjṛmbhakena samāgataḥ)."

[3]"accomplish his purpose at your expense"bhavatām arthasiddhyartham: One would normally read this phrase to mean "to accomplish a purpose on your behalf." However, given the context, and in keeping with the explanations of Cm and Cs, we understand that the reference is to Indrajit's purpose with respect to the monkeys, i.e., his victory over them (bhavatām arthasiddhyarthaṃ samāgataḥ kālabalena bhavato jetuṃ samāgata ity arthaḥ—so Cm).

[4]"I must, however, spare him" kṣamitavyaṃ me: Literally, "It must be pardoned or permitted by me." Both Cm and Cs explain that Rāma is unable to defeat Indrajit because of the respect that he owes [to the boon of] Brahmā (brahmaṇo mānyatvād iti bhāvaḥ). This is quite plausible and is in keeping with the theme of a warrior accepting capture or defeat by an enemy out of respect for the divinity who has granted that enemy a boon. Compare 5.46.36–41, where Hanumān similarly subjects himself to the power of Brahmā's divine weapons in the hands of Indrajit.

The passage occurs in GPP as unnumbered and bracketed between verses 6.44.32 and 6.44.33.

29. Ś,Ñ1,V,B3,4,D1,3,4,8,12,13 all omit this verse. According to the principles of the critical editors, this would give reasonable cause to relegate the verse to the apparatus (see Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv). According to the editors of GPP (6.44.33cd), pādas cd (brahmadattavaro vīro rāvaṇiḥ krodhamūrcchitaḥ "[Indrajit] Rāvaṇi, a hero . . . possessed a boon from Brahmā. Seething with rage . . .") are not known to the text of Cg; indeed, the half verse is omitted from VSP (see 6.44.37, where it would have occurred following pādas ab). KK includes the half verse in brackets following 6.44.37ab and notes that it is found in seven of the manuscripts collated for the edition. The critical edition notes that this half verse is omitted from D5,6,T1,2,M1–3.

"Indrajit Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇiḥ . . . rāvaṇiḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇi [son of Rāvaṇa] . . . Rāvaṇi." We have substituted the name Indrajit for one of the repeated patronymics.

"ruthless in battle" raṇakarkaśaḥ: B1,D9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead raṇakarśitaḥ (-karṣitaḥ—so critical apparatus), "worn out, fatigued, or harassed in battle."

"possessed a boon from Brahmā" brahmadattavaraḥ: See note to 6.36.10.

"Seething with rage" krodhamūrchitaḥ: Literally, "stupefied with rage."

30. "the rākṣasa" rākṣasaḥ: D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead the accusative dual rāghavau, "the two Rāghavas."

"in the form of great serpents" nāgamayaiḥ: Literally, "made or consisting of nāgas."

Following verse 30, D5–7,9–11,S (G2 omits) insert a passage of one line [737*]: "Shrouded there through the power of illusion, and deluding the two Rāghavas in battle . . ."

Following 737*, all the above manuscripts continue, while a number of other manuscripts include, in various locations, a passage of two lines [738*]: "Invisible to all beings and fighting deceitfully, the night-roaming rākṣasa bound the brothers, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, in bonds made of arrows."

Following 738*, D5–7,9–11,S continue with a passage of two lines [739*]: "The monkeys then saw those two heroes, tigers among men, suddenly struck down by that enraged rākṣasa[1] with his arrows in the form of venomous serpents."

[1]"by that . . . rākṣasa" tena: Literally, "by him."

Following 739*, all the above manuscripts continue, while a number of other manuscripts include in various locations, a passage of four lines [740*] in upajāti meter: "When the son of the rākṣasa king proved unable to harm those two as long as he remained visible, that evil rākṣasa[1] resorted to the power of illusion and thus bound the two princes."

[1]"evil rākṣasa" durātmā: D4,5,G,M3,5, and the texts and printed editions of Cg read instead mahātmā, "the great one," which Cg glosses as "very wise (mahābuddhiḥ)." Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 109) follows this reading, rendering, "the powerful one."

Sarga 35

1. "where Indrajit had gone" tasya gatim: Literally, "his place or path."

"ordered . . . to search for him" dideśa: Literally, "he instructed or ordered." We follow Cr in supplying the ellipsis (anveṣayitum jñāpayāmāsa).

2–3. "to the two sons of Suṣeṇa" dvau suṣeṇasya dāyādau: The term dāyāda can refer specifically to a son, to any male heir, or, generically, to any male relative. We agree here with Cg and Cr, who cite Amarakośa 3.3.88 in support of the first meaning (dāyādau putrau dāyādau putrabāndhavāv ity amaraḥ—Cr). The names of the two sons are not specified here nor apparently elsewhere. At 6.28.2 the same term, dāyāda, is used in connection with Suṣeṇa (suṣeṇaḥ sahadāyādaḥ). See 6.28.1–3 and note.

"that bull among monkeys" plavagarṣabham: V3,D7,9–11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct instead read plavagādhipam, "lord of the monkeys." This term normally refers to the monkey king, Sugrīva, but here it appears to be an epithet of Nīla, with the sense of "monkey leader, general."

"Vinata, Jāmbavān" vinataṃ jāmbavantaṃ ca: B2,D2,4,9–12,T3,M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Cv read instead dvividaṃ ca hanūmantam, "Dvivida and Hanumān."

4. "they . . . flung themselves into the sky" ākāśaṃ viviśuḥ: Literally, "they entered the sky."

5. "Indrajit Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇiḥ: Literally, "Rāvaṇi."

"expert in divine weapon-spells . . . the greatest of such weapon-spells" astravit paramāstreṇa: Literally, "knowing the astra, with the supreme astra." We understand the term astra to refer to the divine esoteric spell, or mantra, infused into material weapons to lend them supernatural power. See note to 5.36.26. Ct and Cr understand the term to refer here to the fearsome brahmāstra and supply an adjective, mantritaiḥ (Ct) or abhimantritaiḥ (Cr), which links the term "with arrows (iṣubhiḥ)" with the instrumental paramāstreṇa, to yield the sense "arrows into which was invoked [the spell governing] the brahmāstra." Cg reads instead the plural paramāstrais tu, which obliges him to take the term in apposition with iṣubhiḥ, "with arrows." He thus glosses, "arrows in the form of supreme divine weapons (paramāstrarūpair iṣubhiḥ)." Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 109) follows Cg, translating, "arrows powered with mighty celestial missiles." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 128), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 110) and Pagani (1999, p. 973), understands paramāstra here to refer to Indrajit's bow, an interpretation we do not find persuasive. Dutt (1893, p. 1232) understands the paramāstra and the arrows to be separate and unrelated, translating, "by means of a powerful weapon . . . as well as arms." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1524) incorporates Ct's interpretation in his translation, rendering, "by means of his very swift arrows charged with the potency of the supreme mystic weapon (presided over by Brahmā)." Gorresio (1856, vol. 9, p. 263) interprets similarly to Dutt.

"the swift movement of those swift monkeys with arrows that were swifter still" teṣāṃ vegavatāṃ vegam iṣubhir vegavattaraiḥ: Literally, "the speed of those speeding ones with speedier arrows."

6. "Pierced and mutilated" kṣatavikṣatāḥ: Literally, "wounded and injured." It is difficult to determine any clear distinction between the two nearly synonymous terms. Only Cr among the commentators attempts to do so, glossing, "having minor and major injuries (alpādhikavraṇayuktāḥ)." In any case, the sense clearly is that the monkeys are covered with multiple wounds. See note to 6.2.14.

"those tawny monkeys . . . could not discern him, obscured as he was by darkness, as is the sun by clouds" tam . . . harayaḥ . . . andhakāre na dadṛśur meghaiḥ sūryam ivāvṛtam: Literally, "the tawny [ones] did not see him in the darkness as if [he were] the sun shrouded by clouds." Our translation follows the gloss of Cr (harayo meghair āvṛtaṃ sūryam ivāndhakāra āvṛtaṃ rāvaṇiṃ taṃ na dadṛśuḥ).

7. "completely overwhelmed . . . with arrows" śarān . . . bhṛśam āveśayāmāsa: Literally, "to a great degree he caused arrows to enter."

"that pierced every vital point" sarvamarmabhidaḥ: Only a handful of manuscripts consulted by the critical editors actually appear to contain this reading. A variety of northern and southern manuscripts (Ñ1,B3,D5–7,9–11,T,G2,3,M3,5), and the texts and printed editions of the commentators read -deha-, "body," for -marma-, "vital point." This yields the meaning "piercing their entire bodies." Cr, however, interprets the word sarva-, "every, all," here not to refer to the entire bodies of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa but rather to all creatures, understanding, "arrows that pierced the bodies of all beings, the gods, etc. (sarveṣāṃ devādīnāṃ dehaṃ bhindanti tāñ charān)."

8. "Indrajit riddled . . . Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, with great serpents that had turned into arrows. Their bodies were thus thickly covered with arrows that had not a hair's breadth between them." nirantaraśarīrau . . . rāmalakṣmaṇau . . . indrajitā . . . pannagaiḥ śaratāṃ gataiḥ: The verse is rather elliptical. A literal reading of the skeletal syntactic structure would be "by Indrajit, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa [were rendered] ones whose bodies had no intervals by means of serpents that had become arrows." The verse, in fact, contains no finite verb or verbal noun. Several of the commentators supply the participle kṛtau, "were made or rendered." We have added the word "riddled" to complete the syntax of the sentence. Cr explains the sense of the compound nirantaraśarīrau, "the two whose bodies had no intervals," to be that the upper bodies of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa were devoid of any open spaces (uparibhāge 'ntararahitadehau kṛtau). We have attempted to interpret the term idiomatically. The idea, of course, is not that the brothers' bodies are pressed closely together but rather that their bodies are completely covered with Indrajit's arrows.

Cv understands the phrase "with great serpents that had turned into arrows (pannagaiḥ śaratāṃ gataiḥ)," we believe correctly, to refer to arrows that strike and wound their victims before turning to serpents, which then bind them in their coils. He says, "Having first discharged the functions of piercing, cutting, etc., they subsequently carry out the functions of serpents, biting, constricting, etc. (bhedacchedādikāryaṃ kṛtvā paścād daṃśanaveṣṭanādikaṃ pannagakāryaṃ kurvadbhiḥ)." Crā also understands the missiles to carry out both functions: that of arrows, i.e., cutting, and that of serpents, i.e., constricting (śarakāryaṃ bhedanaṃ pannagakāryaṃ saṃveṣṭaṇaṃ ca kurvadbhir ity arthaḥ). Cg merely understands that the serpents now carry out the functions of arrows, such as cutting, etc. (śarakāryaṃ bhedanādikaṃ kurvadbhir ity arthaḥ). The dual function of the missiles thus accounts for the fact that the heroes are both wounded and immobilized. See below, verse 19 and note. See, too, 6.40.37,49 and notes. Compare 6.90.16 and note.

"the brothers" bhrātarau: D6,7,9–11,T2,3,G3,M1,2,5, the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr, and some manuscripts representing the text of Cg read instead tāv ubhau, "those two." Printed editions of Cg read with the critical edition, but KK (6.45.8) indicates in its apparatus that ten of the manuscripts consulted read tāv ubhau with the vulgate. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 110) is thus the only translator consulted to render bhrātarau, "brothers."

9. "wounds, the pathways of blood" kṣatajamārgeṇa: The compound can be read in two ways. Ct, Cg, and Cm analyze the term kṣataja- as an instrumental tatpuruṣa compound in the sense of "born from or produced by a wound (kṣatajamārgeṇa kṣatena vraṇena jāto yo mārgas tena—so Ct)." The resulting compound then becomes the prior member of a karmadhāraya, the sense of which is "a path produced by a wound." We find this analysis to be somewhat forced and agree with Cr, who interprets kṣataja, "born from a wound," to refer to blood (rudhira). Vālmīki uses this kenning for blood elsewhere (cf., for example, 5.8.17; 6.42.37; etc.). The larger compound can then be taken as a genitive tatpuruṣa with the sense of "the path of blood." This, in turn, can be seen as a kenning for wound.

"blood" rudhiram: Cr and Cg are concerned about the potential theological implications of divinities such as Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa bleeding. Cr contents himself with noting that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa make their blood appear to flow through their power of magical illusion (māyayā). He understands the verb "flow (susrāva)" as a simplex with a causal meaning. (rudhiraviṣayakavicāreṇa rāmalakṣmaṇaśarīre bhītijanakarudhirapradarśanāyety arthaḥ. tayo rāmalakṣmaṇayor upari bahurudhiraṃ susrāva māyayā srāvayāmāsāntarbhāvitaṇijarthaḥ sravatiḥ.) Cg takes the matter rather more seriously.

He anticipates the objection expressed in a verse he quotes to the effect that, since the supreme divinity does not have, like other creatures, an ordinary body of flesh and blood, how can he possibly bleed? Cg responds that, although it is true that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa do not really have blood, they manifest it as an actor might, in keeping with their having taken on the condition of mortals. The objector counters by questioning the purpose of the divinity's obsessive demonstration of his human condition. Cg offers several explanations. First, he notes that, if Rāma did not exhibit such signs of mortality, the common people would think that he was a god, not a man, and, consequently, the dharmic behavior he has come to exemplify would be impossible for them to emulate. This, he suggests, is an esoteric explanation of Rāma's behavior. Second, Cg reminds us that Rāvaṇa can [by virtue of his boon] be destroyed only by a human being. Third, Cg observes that by first succumbing to, and then escaping from, the bondage of Indrajit's serpent-weapons, Rāma is providing an example for people that calamities may come and go swiftly. (nanu na bhūtasañghasaṃsthāno deho 'sya paramātmanaḥ. na tasya prākṛtā mūrtir māṃsamedosthisaṃbhavetyādibhī rāmalakṣmaṇayor divyavigrahasyāprākṛtatvasmaraṇāt kathaṃ rudhirodgama iti ced atrāhuḥ. vastuto 'nayo rudhirābhāve 'pi manuṣyabhāvanānurodhena naṭa iva rudhirāṇi darśayataḥ sma. nanv evaṃ nirbandhena manuṣyabhāvaṃ bhāvayataḥ kiṃ prayojanam? śṛṇu. sarvātmanā manuṣyabhāvanānanurodhe jana evaṃ manyeta nāyaṃ martyaḥ kiṃ tu devas tena tadvad asmākaṃ na śakyam anuṣṭhātuṃ dharmān iti. sarvathā manuṣyabhāvanāyāṃ tu mahājanānuṣṭhānadarśanena svayam anuṣṭhāsyati loka iti rahasyam. rāvaṇasya manuṣyaikavadhyatvena tadbhāvanety apy āhuḥ. nāgapāśabaddhatayāvasthānaṃ tu dharmaniratānām api kadācid āpad upatiṣṭhati nivartate ca jhaṭitīti lokānāṃ pradarśanāyeti. evaṃ mohādiṣv api draṣṭavyam.) See notes below to verses 17, 19, and 20. See, too, 6.36.4–7; 6.37.19; 6.39.4,6; 6.75.17; 6.76.25,32; 6.79.1; 6.88.33; 6.89.24; and notes. Cf. note to 6.38.7. See Leslie 1999.

"resembled kiṃśuka trees covered with their bright red blossoms" puṣpitāv iva kiṃśukau: Literally, "like two blossoming kiṃśuka trees." The kiṃśuka, or palāśa tree (Butea frondosa), is noted for its bright red, odorless blossoms and, in the epic, frequently serves as an upamāna for wounded and bleeding warriors. See 6.55.22; 6.60.34; 6.62.19; 6.76.28; and notes.

10. "as hard to discern as a scattered mass of collyrium" bhinnāñjanacayopamaḥ . . . antardhānagataḥ: Literally, "like a shattered heap of collyrium . . . invisible." The image is not entirely clear. Translators have rendered it in various ways. Our best understanding is that the poet refers to the obscurity with which Indrajit has shrouded himself by using the image of a diffuse cloud of black collyrium powder. Cg is silent on the term here, but when it is repeated below, at verse 14, he explains, "the term is used because of the likelihood of a grayish dusty area at the top of [a pile] of collyrium (añjanopariprадeśasya dhūsara-[misprinted as dūra in GPP]tvasaṃbhavād bhinnety uktam)." Cr glosses, "similar to a mass of compounded or prepared collyrium (siddhāñjanasamūhasadṛśaḥ)." Dutt (1893, p. 1233) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 110) take the participle bhinna- in two of its other related meanings. The former translates, "crushed," and the latter, "cloven." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 128), perhaps following Cr, renders, "mêlé d'huile." In this interpretation, he is, as is so often the case, followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 110). Pagani (1999, p. 973) and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1524) simply omit the adjective. Many northern manuscripts and printed editions of Gorresio and Lahore substitute nīla-, "black." See verse 14 below.

"his eyes rimmed with red" paryantaraktākṣaḥ: According to Cg, this description [as opposed to a description of the full reddening of the eyes] is intended to suggest that Indrajit is now only slightly angry (aneneṣatkopatvaṃ lakṣyate). See 6.31.72 and note.

12. "Rāghavas! . . . you both" rāghavau: We agree with Cg in understanding this as a vocative. There is thus no real object in the verse for the verb nayāmi, "I lead" (see below). Cg instructs us that we are to supply the pronoun from the previous verse, making the appropriate transformation from nominative to accusative. (rāghavāv iti saṃbodhanam. atrāpi yuvām iti dvitīyāntatayā vipariṇamyānuṣañjanīyam.)

"In my towering rage" roṣaparītātmā: Literally, "whose mind is overcome with anger."

"I shall send" eṣaḥ . . . nayāmi: Literally, "he [i.e., I] shall lead." The use of the third person pronoun for the first person is not uncommon in Sanskrit [with or without the first or second personal pronoun]. Here Cg argues that the pronoun is used to show that Indrajit [although unseen] is quite close to the brothers (eṣa ity avyavadhānadyotanāya).

"tightly bound" prāvṛtau: Literally, "enclosed, encircled." D9–11 and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead prāpitau, literally, "caused to attain." This reading is inferior and defective, and obligates Ct to supply the word bandhanam, "bondage." This yields a sense quite similar to that of the critical reading. Cm observes that, although the manifest meaning here is quite clear, we should understand, in fact, that Indrajit means merely to bind the two Rāghavas with his arrows. It is the monkeys, Cm continues, that Indrajit plans to send to Yama. (prātītikārthaḥ spaṣṭaḥ. vastutas tu rāghavāv iṣujālena prāvṛtau kevalam. yamasādanaṃ nayāmi vānarān iti śeṣaḥ.)

"heron-fletched" kaṅkapatriṇā: The term kaṅka is normally thought to refer to the gray heron (Ardea cinera) (see Dave 1985, p. 400). However, Fitzgerald has argued persuasively that, when the term refers to a carrion bird in the Mahābhārata, the bird in question is most likely one or another of the species of the adjutant stork, and this usage is seen in the Yuddhakāṇḍa as well. See notes to 6.46.25–28. When the reference is merely to the fletching of arrows, with no description of the bird or its habits, we have preferred to translate, "heron," although the identification of the actual bird remains unclear. It is possible that the poet is making a subtle play on words here, since the word kaṅka is also a synonym for Yama, who is mentioned later in the verse. See 6.42.4 and note. Cf. 6.46.28; 6.47.127; 6.55.80; 6.87.26; 6.97.1; and notes.

13. "who understood righteousness" dharmajñau: Cg understands that this stereotypical epithet of the epic heroes is used here to suggest that they cannot bear [the thought of] employing their skill in shooting an unseen object by sound alone (śabdavedhaprayogāsahiṣṇū). If we understand his reasoning correctly, he is trying to explain why Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa do not deploy this advanced skill in archery to shoot down Indrajit, whether he is visible or not. Cg evidently believes that this skill is unsportsmanlike and non-dharmic, and so the perfectly righteous brothers disdain it, even though this may cost them their lives. Cf. note to 6.34.9.

14. "As obscure as a scattered mass of collyrium" bhinnāñjanacayaśyāmaḥ: Literally, "dark or black as a shattered heap of collyrium." We have rendered śyāmaḥ, "dark," here as "obscure," in keeping with our reading of the similar epithet at verse 10 above. In both cases, we believe that the reference is to Indrajit's obscurity or invisibility. See note to verse 10 above for Cg's comments in this regard.

16. "they could not even see" na śekatur udīkṣitum: Ct understands the purpose of this phrase [with his synonymous v.l. avekṣitum] to indicate that Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa are merely feigning or acting out the condition of humans (tādṛśāv iva sthitau manuṣyatvanāṭanāyeti bodhyam). Cr, who shares Ct's variant reading, thinks that we should read the infinitive as an unmarked causative, giving the phrase the sense that the heroes were unable to manifest their true nature (ātmānaṃ darśayituṃ na śekatuḥ). His idea is that the heroes forego their true power and that this suggests their strict adherence to the bounds of morality. (sāmārthyaṃ dadatur antarbhāvitaṇijarthaḥ. etena rāmasya maryādāpālakatvaṃ dhvanitam.) The reference is, no doubt, to Rāma's unwillingness to transgress the boon of Brahmā by evading Indrajit's divine weapons. See note to 6.34.28, 734(A)*. See, too, note to 6.36.10.

17. "pierced with arrows and darts" śaraśalyācitau: Literally, "covered or heaped up with arrows and darts." Cr glosses, "covered, pervaded (vyāptau)." We are inclined to agree with Cg, who glosses, "rendered transfixed by arrowheads (śarāgraprotau kṛtau)." Cr understands the heroes to be injured with two different types of arrows (śaras and śalyas) (śaraśalyābhyāṃ bāṇaviśeṣābhyāṃ).

"trembled" prakampitau: Cr gives the participle a causative spin, in the sense of "causing their own army to tremble (svasenāprakampanakartārau)."

"cut loose from their sustaining cords" rajjumuktau: Literally, "freed from ropes." Cg, reading ahead to verse 18, and Cr understand the upamāna to be Indra's banners, which, freed from their cords, are now fluttering about [on the ground—see notes to verse 18 below]. (rajjumuktau muktarajjū. ata eva prakampitau mahendrasya dhvajāv iva kṛtau—so Cg.)

18. "Weakened by the piercing of their vitals" marmabhedena karśitau: Literally, "drawn or pained by the piercing of [their] vitals." Cr, unhappy with his heroes being weakened, adds the particle iva so that the phrase would mean "as if weakened." See note to verse 9 above.

"lords of the earth . . . fell to the earth" nipetatuḥ . . . jagatyāṃ jagatīpatī: The poet plays with the repetition of the word jagatī, "earth, world," to enhance the pathos of the heroes' situation. Cr, still unwilling to entertain the notion of Rāma's suffering, once again reads the simplex nipetatuḥ, "fell," as a causative. He thus explains, "the two of them caused the monkeys to fall down by displaying their condition (tādṛksvāvasthādarśanena vānarān nipātayāmāsatuḥ)."

"staggered" saṃpracalitau: Cr, who as elsewhere dislikes the idea of his divine heroes suffering, glosses, "who set the minds of all beings in motion (sarveṣāṃ buddhicālakau)." See note to verse 9 above. D1,5,7,10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct read instead saṃprabalitau, "mighty."

19. "Their every limb constricted by arrows" śaraveṣṭitasarvāṅgau: The idea here, as noted by Ct, Cv, Cg, and Cm, is that the heroes are constricted by the serpents that have taken the form of arrows (śarabhūtasarpaveṣṭitasarvagātrau—so Ct). See verse 8 above and note.

"suffering and in great agony" ārtau paramapīḍitau: Cr offers a grammatical explanation according to which the two participles are to be seen as derived from a denominative root formed from the kvip suffix, which, in accordance with the vārttika on Pā 3.1.11, is used to indicate imitative behavior. (paramapīḍitāv iva ca babhūvatur iti śeṣaḥ. ārtaparamapīḍitaśabdāv ācārakvibantaprakṛtikakartṛkvibantau.) This, of course, is in keeping with Cr's insistence that the heroes are merely miming suffering (see note to verse 9 above). Cg distinguishes the two near synonyms by characterizing the former as mental suffering and the latter as physical suffering (ārtau manahpīḍāvantau paramapīḍitau śārīrakapīḍāvantau). See notes to 6.39.5 and 6.47.126. See also note to 6.2.14.

"the battlefield, a hero's bed" vīraśayane: Literally, "a hero's bed." We have followed the interpretation of Ct, Cg, and Cm, who read the term as a kenning for battlefield (vīrāḥ śerate 'sminn iti vīraśanayaṃ raṇabhūmiḥ—Cg). Cv and Cg, as an alternative, offer "bed of arrows (śaratalpaṃ vā)," reminiscent of the famous iṣuśayyā, the "bed of arrows," upon which the dying Bhīṣma rests in the Mahābhārata (6.115.8ff.). See verse 24 below and 6.36.4–7 and note. See, too, 6.37.18; 6.38.27; 6.39.12; and notes.

"spattered with blood" rudhirokṣitau: Cr, of course, hastens to explain that the blood has been produced only through the power of illusion (māyāpātitaraktenokṣitau siktau tau). See note to verse 9 above.

*20. "There was not a finger's breadth between the wounds that covered their bodies." na hy aviddhaṃ tayor gātraṃ babhūvāṅgulam antaram: Literally, "there was not an unpierced limb, having a gap of [even] a finger, of those two." The text of the critical edition, particularly the collocation of the words gātram, aṅgulam [āṅgulam?], and antaram, is syntactically problematic and textually questionable. As far as one can reconstruct the situation from the critical apparatus, this particular collocation appears to be found only in B2 and D5,6. D6 is one of the manuscripts associated with the commentary of Cg. However, printed editions of Cg's text (VSP and KK = 6.46.20) have the facilior reading gātre, found also in the text of Ct, including GPP [6.46.20], which notes no variant for Cg. This variant is also found in the printed editions of the northern recension [= Lahore 6.21.22 and Gorresio 6.20.22]. The critical apparatus of KK notes the variant with gātram in seven of its manuscripts, but these then lack the critical edition's aṅgulam antaram, reading instead aṅgulamātrakam. The situation is further complicated in that the vowel sandhi makes it unclear whether the word in question is aṅgulam or āṅgulam. According to Cg's text in KK and Cs's reading, there is the option of reading the adjective āṅgula in the sense of "connected with or in the measure of a finger's breadth." Cg's commentary itself appears to indicate that he reads both gātram and a[or ā]ṅgulam antaram. Cg struggles with this awkward construction, offering two less than persuasive interpretations. In the first, after arguing that we should take the word aṅgula, on the basis of a citation from the Amarakośa (Trikāṇḍī), which we cannot locate, as signifying the space occupied by a finger, he states that the heroes' bodies were not uninjured even in the space of a finger's breadth. For his second interpretation, he takes āṅgulam [so KK and Cs, contra GPP and VSP] as an adjective modifying antaram, in the sense of a space "connected with the fingers (aṅgulasaṃbandhi)." (aṅgulam aṅgulipramāṇam. athavāṅgulir aṅgulam iti trikāṇḍīsmaraṇād aṅgulipramāṇavācyaṅgulaśabdo 'kārānto 'py asti. tayor gātram aṅgulamātre 'py avakāśe 'viddhaṃ nābhūd iti bhāvaḥ. yadvā tayor gātram aṅgulam aṅgulasaṃbandhy apy antaram avakāśaḥ.) Cs glosses āṅgulam as "the measure of a finger (aṅgulipramāṇam)." On the basis of the textual evidence and the syntactic impossibility of the critical reading, we propose emending—with the southern commentators as in the printed editions of their text (a reading also found in Ś,Ñ,V,B1–3,4,D1,3,8,10–13,M3)—gātre for gātram and reading āṅgulam as an adjective modifying antaram. The literal meaning thus becomes "on their bodies, there was not a space of the measure of a finger that was unpierced."

In keeping with his consistent effort to portray Rāma as invulnerable, Cr offers an idiosyncratic interpretation of the verse. He takes antaram, "space, interval," in the sense it frequently has at the end of compounds of "other, different." He then interprets this as a description of the heroes' bodies as being "different or distinct from ordinary bodies, and therefore perpetually uninjured. (antaraṃ prākṛtavilakṣaṇam ity arthaḥ. ata evāviddhaṃ nityaṃ bhedasaṃsargarahitam.)" See note to verse 9 above.

It is noteworthy that Dutt (1893, p. 1233) remarks, in a footnote, that "This sloka is rather obscure, and the Bengali translators have conveniently passed it by!"

"There was no part . . . that had not been wounded" nānirbhinnam: Literally, "not unwounded." This then construes with the negative particle na in pāda a governing the finite verb babhūva in pāda b. Ñ1,V1,B4,D10,11, and the texts and printed editions of Ct, Ck, and Cr read instead nānirviṇṇam, which would normally mean "not undejected." Ck, however, glosses, "without wounds (avidāram)." Translators who follow Ct's text offer a similar interpretation. Cr interprets the term idiosyncratically, explaining it as meaning "[whose bodies are] a constant source of passion or delight to their kinsmen (nityaṃ svajanānurāgi [tayor gātram])."

"immobilized" na . . . astabdham: Literally, "not unparalyzed." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B1,2,D3, M1,2, and the texts and printed editions of Ct and Ck read instead adhvastam, "[not] undamaged or uninjured." Ct is aware of the critical reading as a variant, and he glosses it as "moving or writhing (ceṣṭāvat)." Cv provides a unique interpretation, understanding, "having skin rendered immobile because of having arrowheads not removed (anirgataśarāgrasamuttambhicarmety arthaḥ)."

21. "copiously" tīvram: We follow Cg in reading this adverbially in its sense of "intensely or violently (atyantam)." It is also possible, although not as convincing, to read the term as an adjective in the sense of "warm or hot," modifying "blood."

"two fountains" prasravaṇau: The term, which literally means "flowing forth," can refer to any source of water: a fountain, spring, waterfall, etc. It is also, of course, the name of a mountain near where Rāma, Sītā, and Lakṣmaṇa lived up until the time of Sītā's abduction at Araṇyakāṇḍa 47. The mountain is so named because of its copious streams. See, for example, 3.29.21; 3.47.30; and 3.60.14. Ct, Cg, and Cm all interpret in this latter sense, i.e., "like two Mount Prasravaṇas (prasravaṇau prasravaṇākhyaparvatāv iva—so Ct)." Translators are divided, some translating "spring," and others, "Mount Prasravaṇa."

22. "Rāma . . . pierced to the vitals" rāmo viddho marmasu: Cr takes advantage of the visarga sandhi between rāmaḥ and viddhaḥ (i.e., rāmo 'viddho marmasu) to provide an alternative reading, "[Rāma] not pierced to the vitals (marmasv apy aviddho rāmaḥ)."

"fell first" papāta prathamam: Cr, continuing with his theological reading, argues that Rāma falls in keeping with his role as the maintainer of the bounds of moral behavior. The reference is, no doubt, to his unwillingness to transgress the boon of Brahmā (see note to verse 16 above). He falls first, according to Cr, after reflecting that, unless Lakṣmaṇa sees him fall, he himself will not fall (etena rāmasya maryādāpālakatvaṃ sūcitaṃ prathamam ity anena matkartṛkapatanadarśanam antarā lakṣmaṇo na patiṣyatīti hetur vyañjitaḥ).

"raging" krodhāt: Literally, "out of anger."

